

Division

BS2364

.Z194

1917

copy 1

copy 1

INTRODUCTION

TO THE

NEW TESTAMENT

BY

✓
THEODOR ZAHN

PROFESSOR OF NEW TESTAMENT EXEGESIS, ERLANGEN UNIVERSITY

TRANSLATED FROM THE THIRD GERMAN EDITION

BY

JOHN MOORE TROUT, WILLIAM ARNOT MATHER, LOUIS
HODOUS, EDWARD STRONG WORCESTER, WILLIAM
HOYT WORRELL, AND ROWLAND BACKUS DODGE

FELLOWS AND SCHOLARS OF HARTFORD THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

UNDER THE DIRECTION AND SUPERVISION OF

MELANCTHON WILLIAMS JACOBUS

HOSMER PROFESSOR OF NEW TESTAMENT CRITICISM AND EXEGESIS AND DEAN OF THE FACULTY

ASSISTED BY

CHARLES SNOW THAYER

DIRECTOR OF THE CASE MEMORIAL LIBRARY

THREE VOLUMES IN ONE

SECOND EDITION

REVISED

NEW YORK

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

1917

AUTHOR'S PREFACE TO THE ENGLISH EDITION

I HAVE been asked by Professor Jacobus, who first suggested the plan for the translation into English of my Introduction to the New Testament, and to whose praiseworthy energy the carrying out of the plan is due, to prepare an Introduction for the English edition. This affords me a welcome opportunity to express my hearty thanks, first of all to Professor Jacobus himself, and also to Dr. Thayer, his fellow Professor in the Hartford Theological Seminary, who has seen the entire work through the press, and to the younger theologians, by whom the first draft of the translation has been prepared, for the great sacrifice of time and labour required in order to present this work to the English-speaking public in a form as complete as possible, and at the same time convenient for use. What these difficulties are no one is in better position to appreciate than the author himself, who is responsible for the plan and the style which render his work difficult to read—especially for foreigners—and to translate. Of these difficulties I was very early reminded. I still recall, often with very mingled feelings, the words with which E. Renan¹ once described my book on Ignatius of Antioch (1873): “Quiconque aura le courage de lire ces 650 pages, écrites d’un style obscur et embarrassé, possédera réellement les éléments pour résoudre la question; mais tout le travail du raisonnement et de la critique restera bien à sa charge." For this criticism, certainly not flattering, I have found a twofold consolation. Whoever attempts to answer definitely a question complex in character and long discussed without satisfactory results, and to prove in as thorough a manner as possible that his is the only possible answer, will certainly not succeed in writing an elegant romance such as the brilliant Frenchman's Vie de Jésus. If, with a fair degree of completeness and accuracy, he succeeds in supplying the reader with the elements from which a correct judgment can be formed, he may reasonably crave some indulgence for "the obscure and confused style" which reflects the great variety of the material handled, and of the observations to be made. As regards criticism itself, this very Ignatian question is an instructive illustration of the fact that the wide currency of a critical view is no guarantee that this view will be permanently held. Even Renan admitted that my "uncritical monograph" definitely disposed (définitivement écarté) of the hypothesis of W. Cureton, which was a favourite one in Germany also, that the genuine portion of the Ignatian literature consisted of the brief recension of only three Epistles edited by Cureton himself from a Syriac translation. Renan's judgment on this point has proved correct. At the same time, his own new hypothesis, that only Ignatius' Epistle to the Romans and some sentences in the other Epistles are genuine, found scarcely any acceptance; whereas to-day the genuineness of the seven Epistles, the attempt to prove which in 1875 was regarded by the majority of critics as a youthful venture, and as evidence of a lack of critical judgment, is almost universally accepted. Such experiences are a plea for patience; they also strengthen the hope that patient work in the realm of early Christian literature will not be done in vain.

¹ Journal des Savants (1874), p. 34.

Likewise, in the literary criticism of the New Testament the last forty years have witnessed at least the beginnings of a trend toward betterment. Unhealthy eccentricities in criticism have appeared, especially in the criticism of the Pauline Epistles, but at the same time sound tendencies have made themselves felt. One of these sounder tendencies I hold to be the greater appreciation of the tradition, without which it is impossible for any criticism to make an historical presentation. To be noted also is a modest realisation of the gaps in our knowledge which forbids us regarding all that seems strange to us, and especially what is unintelligible, as evidence against the genuineness of the document in question. To be noted further is an increasing distrust of a priori constructions of every kind, and more attention to material and personal details, which were inserted quite unconsciously on the part of the New Testament writers, but which are of inestimable value to us, because frequently they afford us a better insight than do leading ideas, into the connection between literary remains and the circumstances and conditions under which they were produced.

This development of the historical sense among theologians has redounded to the benefit of my Introduction. In one of the reviews of the first volume of the first edition (1897), the reviewer made the conjecture that owing to the great bulk of the work the circulation would not be wide. The conjecture has not proved true. The English translation of the third German edition now completed is to me an encouraging confirmation of the hope with which I ventured to dedicate the first edition to the University of Cambridge. I can only hope that the great and self-denying efforts which the translators have made may be rewarded by a corresponding influence of the work in the wide English-speaking world.

THEODOR ZAHN.

ERLANGEN, March 1909.

EDITOR'S PREFACE

EVER since the appearance of Dr. Zahn's great work on New Testament Introduction, it has been evident that sooner or later its stores of critical investigation would have to be placed at the disposal of the English-reading world. The problems of New Testament study are too important to allow the results which this renowned scholar's years of scientific study have gathered into the two large volumes of his great book permanently to be locked up in a foreign language.

To release this scholarship, however, was no easy undertaking. A thousand pages of closely printed matter, written in a style often most difficult to follow even in the text, and with notes too constantly abbreviated in the spirit of a scholar's abundant knowledge of the facts, and too frequently confused with indistinct allusions to unfamiliar literature, presented a formidable task of translation, which any set of men might hesitate to attempt, and which was practically impossible for any individual. Notwithstanding, in the spring of 1900 a formal request was made of the author that certain Fellows of Hartford Theological Seminary, Mr. John M. Trout, Mr. Louis Hodous, and Mr. William A. Mather, should be allowed to take the work in hand. Permission was cordially granted them, and being then engaged in study abroad they entered upon the beginning of their work in the summer of that year. During the year several conferences were held with Professor Zahn, to whose helpful suggestions the translators are greatly indebted.

It was fully expected that the larger part of the text would be translated before return to this country would necessitate such engagements in the active ministry as to restrict the time possible to be devoted to the task. To a large extent this hope was realised; but the early departure to Foreign Mission service of Mr. Hodous and Mr. Mather, who had undertaken the preparation of the notes, left the burden of completing what had been begun practically with Mr. Trout. Upon his shoulders it has rested since that time, and to his faithful and patient efforts, carried on in the midst of pressing pulpit and pastoral cares, is due largely the successful accomplishment of the undertaking.

To his aid in the translation of the notes there came at different times Mr. Rowland B. Dodge, Hartranft Prize Scholar of Hartford in 1905, Mr. Edward S. Worcester, William Thompson Fellow of Hartford for 1901-1903, and Mr. William H. Worrell, John S. Welles Fellow of Hartford for 1906-1908, all of whom laboured with willing sacrifice of time in rendering service to the work. Along with them in translating, but particularly in the extra service of assisting the editor in his supervision of the translation and in the especially laborious care of the proofs, the aid of Professor Charles S. Thayer of the Case Memorial Library of the Seminary has been invaluable. If, in spite of the necessarily scattered and interrupted character of the work which has been carried on through these years, the results are marked with accuracy and completeness, it has been due largely to him. From him has come also the General Index, which places the widely extended details of notice and of reference in the book at the immediate service of the reader. Associated with Professor Thayer in this work for one summer was Mr

Worrell, and with Mr. Mather before his departure to his foreign field was Mr. Frederick B. Hartranft of the Instruction Corps of the Seminary; while at various times the editor has had the help in reading proof of Mr. John J. Moment of the Class of 1906 and Mr. Alvin C. Bacon and Mr. Watson Woodruff of the Class of 1907 of Hartford Seminary.

It has been a long task, delayed by many and unexpected interruptions, not the least among which was the appearance of the third German edition after the first English volume was practically in print. The labour of correcting the whole translation to the details of all the changes and alterations which the tireless scholarship of the author had wrought into his book seemed beyond accomplishment; but it has been effected, and the work goes out in every detail a reproduction of the last German edition.

The Editor cannot hope to have escaped altogether the faults rendered likely by such a diversified translating, carried on in such a broken way; but he has appreciated the fidelity and the enthusiasm of those who have worked with him, and he has believed that it would be no small service that could be rendered to the English-reading scholarship of his day if he could place at its command what this book has to offer of the masterly results of scientific research in a field the treasures of which are ever open to those whose work is patient and whose vision is clear.

M. W. JACOBUS.

HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT,
April 1909.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION

THE reception given to the English translation of Zahn's monumental work has seemed to justify a second printing of it, particularly as in this re-presentation of its material opportunity would be afforded to correct typographical errors and faults in translation which reviewers of the First Edition had noticed and which had become evident to the Editor and his collaborators.

Accordingly, with the help of Professor Thayer and Professor Worrell, now on the Faculty of the Seminary Foundation, the entire work has been gone over with patient care, for the elimination of all mistakes which in any way detracted from the usefulness of the First Edition.

At the same time, through the use of selected paper the three volumes in which the work first appeared have been reduced to one, without change in paging or alteration in form. All references to the First Edition are therefore good for the Second Edition.

Doubtless, perfection in typographical accuracy and fidelity of translation have not yet been fully attained; but it is hoped that by this reviewing and compacting a greater serviceableness will be given this work, which must ever remain a storehouse of scientific research in the field of New Testament scholarship.

M. W. JACOBUS.

HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT,
June 1917

CONTENTS OF VOL. I.

	PAGE
I. INTRODUCTORY REMARKS CONCERNING THE LANGUAGE AND ITS HISTORY	1
§ 1. The Original Language of the Gospel	1
§ 2. The Greek Language among the Jews	34
II. THE EPISTLE OF JAMES	73
§ 3. The Destination of the Letter indicated by the Greeting	73
§ 4. The Circumstances of the Readers	83
§ 5. The Personality of James	101
§ 6. The Author's Training and Habits of Thought	110
§ 7. The External Evidence	123
§ 8. Divergent Views	136
III. THE THREE OLDEST EPISTLES OF PAUL	152
§ 9. Preliminary Critical Remarks	152
§ 10. The Historical Presuppositions and the Occasion of the Epistle to the Galatians	164
§ 11. Galatia and the Galatians	173
§ 12. Time and Place of the Composition of the Epistle to the Galatians	193
§ 13. The Origin of the Church in Thessalonica, and the Course of its History until the Composition of Paul's First Epistle to the Church there	203
§ 14. The First Epistle to the Thessalonians	215
§ 15. The Second Epistle to the Thessalonians	224
§ 16. The Genuineness of the First Three Epistles	242
IV. THE CORRESPONDENCE OF PAUL WITH THE CORINTHIAN CHURCH	256
§ 17. The Early History of the Church	256
§ 18. The Condition of the Corinthian Church at the Time when First Corinthians was written	273
§ 19. Survey of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians	307
§ 20. Occasion, Purpose, and Effect of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians	321

	PAGE
V. THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS	352
§ 21. Contents of the Letter and the Progress of its Thought	352
§ 22. The Integrity of the Epistle to the Romans	378
§ 23. Constituency and Origin of the Roman Church	421
§ 24. The Occasion of the Letter	434
VI. THE LETTERS OF THE FIRST ROMAN IMPRISONMENT	439
§ 25. Time and Place of the Composition of the Epistles to Philemon, the Colossians, and "the Ephesians"	439
§ 26. The Epistle to Philemon	452
§ 27. The Epistle to the Colossians	459
§ 28. The Destination of the Epistle to the Ephesians	479
§ 29. The Genuineness of the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians	491
§ 30. The Historical Presuppositions and the Occasion of the Epistle to the Philippians	522
§ 31. Paul's Situation at the Time when Philippians was written	539
§ 32. The Genuineness of the Epistle to the Philippians	556

CONTENTS OF VOL. II.

VII. THE LAST THREE EPISTLES OF PAUL	1
§ 33. The Facts presupposed in the Second Epistle to Timothy	1
§ 34. The Facts attested by the First Epistle to Timothy	27
§ 35. The Facts presupposed in the Epistle to Titus	43
§ 36. The End of Paul's Life	54
§ 37. The Genuineness of the Epistles to Timothy and Titus	85
VIII. THE EPISTLES OF PETER AND JUDE, AND THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS	134
§ 38. The Readers and the Author of the First Epistle of Peter—the Internal Evidence	134
§ 39. Time and Place of the First Epistle of Peter	158
§ 40. The Genuineness of the First Epistle of Peter	173

§ 41. The Author and Readers of the Second Epistle of Peter according to the Letter's own Testimony . . .	72
§ 42. The Occasion of the Second Epistle of Peter . . .	2
§ 43. Epistle of Jude	22
§ 44. The Genuineness of Jude and the Two Epistles of Peter	262
§ 45. The Tradition concerning the Epistle to the Hebrews . . .	293
§ 46. The Literary Form and the Historical Presuppositions of the Epistle to the Hebrews	312
§ 47. Readers, Date, and Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews	341
 IX. THE FIRST THREE GOSPELS AND ACTS	 367
§ 48. The Unwritten Gospel	367
§ 49. The Common Tradition in the Church regarding the Origin of the Gospels	386
§ 50. History of the "Synoptic Problem"	400
§ 51. The Tradition regarding Mark and his Gospel	427
§ 52. Title, Plan, and Conclusion of Mark's Gospel	456
§ 53. Comparison of Mark's Gospel with the Tradition	487
§ 54. The Tradition regarding Matthew and his Gospel	506
§ 55. Contents, Plan and Purpose of Matthew's Gospel	531
§ 56. Comparison of the Gospel of Matthew with the Tradition regarding it	570
§ 57. The Relation of Mark's Gospel to the Gospel of Matthew	601
 ADDENDUM	 617

CONTENTS OF VOL. III.

IX. Continued. —THE WRITINGS OF LUKE	PAGE 1
§ 58. The Tradition concerning Luke and his Work	1
§ 59. The Twofold Recension of the Text of Acts	8
§ 60. Preface, Plan, and Purpose of Luke's Historical Work	41
§ 61. The Sources used by Luke	94
§ 62. The Author of the Work attributed to Luke and the Time of its Composition	142
§ 63. Retrospect and Forecast	165
X. THE WRITINGS OF JOHN	174
§ 64. The Tradition	174
§ 65. The Testimony of the Fourth Gospel to its Author	207
§ 66. The Supplementary Chapter	232
§ 67. The Relation of the Fourth Gospel to the earlier Gospels	254
§ 68. Purpose and Method, Character and Readers of the Fourth Gospel	299
§ 69. Integrity, Date of Composition, and Genuineness of the Fourth Gospel	333
§ 70. The First Epistle of John	355
§ 71. The Lesser Epistles of John	374
§ 72. The Nature, Structure, and Unity of Revelation	384
§ 73. The Condition of Affairs in the Church according to Revelation i.-iii.	408
§ 74. The Author of Revelation	428
§ 75. Contemporary-Historical or Futurist Interpretation	436
XI. CHRONOLOGICAL SURVEY	450
CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE	481
INDEX	487

ABBREVIATIONS FOR REVIEW TITLES

AJPh.	. American Journal of Philology.
AJSL.	. . American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures.
AJTh	. . American Journal of Theology.
AOF.	. . . Altorientalische Forschungen.
BZ.	. . . Byzantinische Zeitschrift.
BbZ	. . . Biblische Zeitschrift.
ChW.	. . . Christliche Welt.
Expos.	. . . Expositor.
ET	. . . Expository Times.
GGA.	. . . Göttingische Gelehrte Anzeigen.
GGN.	. . . Göttingische Gelehrte Nachrichten.
JBL	. . . Journal of Biblical Literature.
JbBW	. . . Jahrbücher der Biblischen Wissenschaft.
JbDTh	. . . Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie.
JbKPh	. . . Jahrbücher für Klassische Philologie.
JbPTh	. . . Jahrbücher für Protestantische Theologie.
JbPK	. . . Jahrbuch der Kgl. Preussischen Kunstsammlungen.
JHSt.	. . . Journal of Hellenic Studies.
JPh	. . . Journal of Philology.
JQR	. . . Jewish Quarterly Review.
JRAS	. . . Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society.
JThSt	. . . Journal of Theological Studies.
LCBl.	. . . Literarisches Centralblatt.
LR	. . . Literarische Rundschau.
MBBA	. . . Monatschrift der Berliner Akademie.
MDPV	. . . Mittheilungen und Nachrichten des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins.
MGWJ	. . . Monatschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judenthums.
MVG	. . . Mittheilungen der Vorder-Asiatischen Gesellschaft.
NGWG	. . . Nachrichten der Königlichen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen.
NHJb	. . . Neue Heidelberger Jahrbücher.
NJbDTh	. . . Neue Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie.
NKZ	. . . Neue Kirchliche Zeitschrift.
OLZ	. . . Orientalische Litteraturzeitung.

PEF . . .	Palestine Exploration Fund.
RB . . .	Revue Biblique.
REJ . . .	Revue des Études Juives.
RKZ . . .	Reformirte Kirchenzeitung.
SBAW . .	Sitzungsberichte der Berliner Akademie der Wissenschaften.
SWAW . .	Sitzungsberichte der Wiener Akademie der Wissenschaften.
ThJb . . .	Theologische Jahrbücher.
ThLb . . .	Theologisches Litteraturblatt.
ThLz . . .	Theologische Literaturzeitung.
TQ, TThQ, or ThQSc	} (Tübingen) Theologische Quartalschrift.
ThR . . .
ThStKr . .	Theologische Studien und Kritiken.
ThTij or ThTjd	} Theologische Tijdschrift.
TU . . .
TU . . .	Texte und Untersuchungen.
TZfTh . .	Tübinger Zeitschrift für Theologie.
WZfKM . .	Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes.
ZfÄgSp or ZfÄ	} Zeitschrift für Ägyptische Sprache und Altertumskunde.
ZfA . . .
ZfA . . .	Zeitschrift für Assyriologie und Verwandte Gebiete.
ZfATW . .	Zeitschrift für Alttestamentliche Wissenschaft.
ZDMG . .	Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft.
ZDPV . .	Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins.
ZfHTh . .	Zeitschrift für Historische Theologie.
ZfKG . . .	Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte.
ZfKTh . .	Zeitschrift für Katholische Theologie.
ZfKW or ZfKWuKL	} Zeitschrift für Kirchliche Wissenschaft und Kirchliches Leben.
ZfLTh . .
ZfLTh . .	Zeitschrift für Lutherische Theologie.
ZfNTW . .	Zeitschrift für Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft.
ZfThuK . .	Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche.
ZfWTh . .	Zeitschrift für Wissenschaftliche Theologie.

ABBREVIATIONS OTHER THAN FOR REVIEW TITLES

BRP	Edward Robinson, Biblical Researches in Palestine.
CIG or CIGr .	Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum.
CIL	Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum.
CISem	Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum.
Dalman Gr ² .	Dalman, Grammatik des Jüdisch-Palästinischen Aramäisch , 2te Aufl. 1905.
EB	Encyclopædia Biblica
Forsch. i.-vii. 1.	Zahn, Forschungen zur Geschichte des Neutestamentlichen Kanons und der Altkirchlichen Literatur , 1888-1892.
GAP	Buhl, Geographie des Alten Palästina.
Grundriss . .	Zahn, Gr. der Geschichte des Alt. Kanons , 2te Aufl. 1904
HDB	Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible.
HK i.-iv. . . .	Handkommentar zum N.T. von Holtzmann, Lipsius, etc., 2te resp. 3te Aufl.
Hoffmann . . .	Die Hl. Schrift des N.T.'s Zusammenhängend Untersucht i.-ii. 3 (2te Aufl.); iii.-xi., 1868-1886.
Kühner-Blass .	Kühner, Ausführliche Grammatik der Griechischen Sprache , 1 Teil, Elementar- u. Formenlehre , 3te Aufl. besorgt von Fr. Blass.
Kühner-Gerth .	Preceding , 2 Teil, Satzlehre , 3te Aufl. besorgt von Bernh. Gerth.
MS	Manuscript.
N.T.	New Testament.
O.T.	Old Testament.
PRE ³	Real - Encyclopädie für Protestantische Theologie und Kirche , 3rd ed.
RE	Real-Encyclopädie.
S ¹	Peshito.
S ²	Philoxeniana (only for the four shorter Catholic Epistles and Revelation).
S ³	Syriac Text of Thomas of Heraclea.
Sc	Syrus Curetonianus.
Sh	Syrus Hierosolymitanus.
Ss	Syrus Sinaiticus.

- Schürer . . . Geschichte des Jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, 3 Aufl. i.-iii., 1898-1901 [English translation of 2nd ed.,
"The Jewish People in the Time of Christ"].
- Skizzen . . . Zahn, Sk. aus dem Leben der Alten Kirche, 2 Aufl. 1898.
- SWP . . . Memoirs of the Survey of Western Palestine.
- TU . . . Texte und Untersuchungen.
- ZKom . . . Kommentar zum N.T. unter Mitwirkung von Bachmann, Ewald, Horn, Riggenbach, Seeberg, Wohlenberg, heraus-
geg. von Th. Zahn, 1903.

See also the bibliographies on pages 14, 58, vol. i., and bibliographies of commentaries given throughout this work in connection with the discussions of the separate books of the N.T.

The editors have attempted to make all other abbreviations full enough to be self-explanatory.

CITATIONS.

Passages in the O.T. are cited according to the figures of the Hebrew Text; the O.T. Apocrypha, if not otherwise noted, according to the edition of Fritzsche, 1871; the witnesses for the N.T. text, except as noted above under S, according to Tischendorf-Gregory; the Church Fathers according to the Vienna "Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum," and "Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte," herausgeg. von der Berliner Akademie.

INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT.

I.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS CONCERNING THE LANGUAGE AND ITS HISTORY.

§ 1. THE ORIGINAL LANGUAGE OF THE GOSPEL.

THE gospel is older than the N.T. Between the time when Jesus proclaimed the coming of the rule of God in His kingdom and the emergence from His Church of the earliest document which has come down to us, possibly some two decades elapsed; and some seventy years passed before the appearance of the last of the writings found in the N.T. collection. Even if the investigation of this oldest Christian literature should result in showing that no single part of it originated on the soil of Palestine, or within the Jewish Christianity of the first generation, we should still be unable, without some knowledge of the language in which Jesus taught, and in which the Apostles preached the gospel to the Jews in Palestine, to form a correct conception of the beginnings of Christian literature. For, quite independent of the results of all literary criticism, and especially of the answer to the question whether the N.T. writings were composed, as tradition says they were, almost without exception by native Jews, and to no small extent by Palestinian Jews, the fact remains, that the Christian preaching began from Palestine, and that Jews who had no idea of giving up their nationality carried it beyond the limits of their land and nation. This statement, in which Paul (Rom. xv. 27), Luke (Acts xi. 19), and Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44) agree, does not require further proof. It does, however, need to be explained why a religious movement, which had its roots in the Judaism of Palestine, produced very soon after it began a distinctive literature which has come down to us only in the Greek language.

The first question that suggests itself concerns the language in which Jesus preached to the people and instructed His disciples (n. 1). Fortunately, in answering this question, we are not left wholly to our knowledge of the linguistic condition in Palestine in Jesus' time,—a knowledge which is still very much in need of clarification and confirmation,—nor are we dependent upon inferences from examples of a similar character. For the Gospels themselves, particularly those which pass under the names of Mark and John, preserve for us not only single words used by Jesus and those with whom He mingled, but also a number of short sayings of His in their original form. There can be no doubt that in introducing these foreign words into their Greek writings with Greek translations frequently attached (n. 2), the evangelists were firmly convinced that they were reproducing what Jesus said in its original form, and that it was their duty to convey the same also to their readers, though most of these were acquainted only with Greek. Nor could they very well have been mistaken in this belief; for, leaving quite out of consideration the facts to be established later, that the second evangelist was a native of Jerusalem, and the fourth evangelist one of the twelve apostles, an error of this kind would have been possible only if these

Greek authors had been removed from Jesus and those who heard Him by a period of history during which, and by a region of country in which, on the one hand, the gospel was no longer preached in its original language, while, on the other hand, it had not yet come to be propagated by the use of the Greek language. Only in these circumstances could Greek Christians, who were entirely uninformed about the previous history of their faith, have taken for original what was in fact only a translation. But there were no such period and region as those suggested intervening between Jesus and our Gospels. A few years after Jesus' death the gospel made its way directly from Jerusalem to the Greek population of Antioch.

We possess, therefore, documentary evidence concerning the language used by Jesus. While no fragments of His preaching are preserved, all the utterances recorded are important, and were spoken at critical moments. Among these utterances are two expressions used by Jesus in prayer (Mark xiv. 36, xv. 34), one of which is a phrase taken from one of the psalms and used by Jesus in supplication during the agony of His death (Matt. xxvii. 46; Mark xv. 34). From these passages we discover in what language Jesus pondered the words of the O.T. and communed with His God in prayer. As we learn from other passages, He used this same language when He healed the sick and called the dead to life among the people of Galilee (Mark v. 41, vii. 34). This must, therefore, have been the language in which Jesus preached to the people and taught His disciples. But all the sayings of Jesus, and of those among whom He moved, which are preserved to us in their original form, exhibit the same linguistic features. These features are not those of the Hebrew language, or of a confused mixture of Hebrew and some other language; but, with the exception of a few foreign words, more or less modified in form, they are those of the Aramaic (n. 3) or Syriac tongue. For the use of the latter name there is as much historical justification as for the use of the former; since, during the centuries when this language was the dominant one in Palestine, it was very commonly called Syriac by the Jews and by those Christians who were so situated as to be familiar with the linguistic conditions of Palestine and the adjoining regions (n. 4). The only advantage in using the term Aramaic, instead of Syriac, to designate the language spoken by Jesus and by His immediate followers in the early Church, is the fact that we have become accustomed to employ the term Syriac exclusively with reference to the language of the Christian literature of the Syrian national Church, which began to be prepared first in Edessa after the close of the second century.

If we are inclined to the false notion that the language of Jesus was an uncultivated vernacular, a Jewish jargon, the terms Aramaic and Syriac may serve to remind us that we are dealing with a language which, during the five hundred years preceding the advent of Christianity, had gradually spread until it had become the dominant language of western Asia. And in spite of the rivalry with Greek that had existed since the time of Alexander, it maintained this position over wide regions until it was replaced by the Arabic of Islam. It was not without some reason that a Syrian of the sixth century A.D. called it the queen of languages (n. 5). Its reign was a long one. As early as 700 B.C. the Jerusalem court officials could propose to an Assyrian general that he carry on his negotiations with them in Aramaic, in order that the people standing by, who knew only Hebrew, might not understand what was said (Isa. xxxvi. 11; 2 Kings xviii. 26). Aramaic was the native language of neither party, but was employed as a medium of intercourse between powers speaking different languages, just as French is used now in negotiations between Russians and Italians.

At the time of the Persian world-empire, Aramaic had already become the official language in which the royal government and the satraps of the western provinces maintained communication with their polyglot subordinates, including those as far removed as Egypt (n. 6). From this time on Aramaic came more and more into use as a living vernacular, especially in districts where heretofore other Semitic languages had prevailed. Long before the time of Christ, the old "language of Canaan," as the Israelites once called their own language (Isa. xix. 18),—because of the fact that it did not differ essentially from the languages of their nearest heathen neighbours,—had ceased to be the spoken language of Palestine and the adjoining regions. Phœnician was no longer spoken in Tyre and Sidon. While this old language continued to be spoken in Carthage, and, after the fall of the Carthaginian State, for centuries longer in the Roman provinces of North Africa, in its original home it had given place to Aramaic or Syriac (n. 7). In the old dwelling-places of the Edomites and the Moabites, and in the entire Nabatæan kingdom, which stretched from the Elamitic gulf to the vicinity of Damascus, Aramaic was the dominating language, as is evident from numerous inscriptions (n. 7), in the time of Christ and of king Aretas iv., father-in-law of Herod Antipas (cf. 2 Cor. xi. 32), whose reign lasted from about 9 B.C. to 40 A.D.

In the midst of Palestine dwelt the Samaritans, a mixed race, who spoke an Aramaic dialect, possibly from the beginning of their history. Nor was the little remnant of the Jewish nation that resettled in and about Jerusalem able to resist permanently this general development. Consequently, when the nation freed itself from its oppressors, and secured a larger degree of independence by the Maccabean revolt, the Jews had ceased to speak their own language. Of course, they did possess something that the neighbouring peoples did not have, in the large body of literature which had come down to them from the times of their kings and prophets,—a sacred literature, to which they now clung as the charter of their national calling, and as the law of worship, of faith, and of civil life. This literature was collected, and new prophetic, historical, and poetical writings were added in the old and sacred language. The introduction of Aramaic forms and words was more strenuously avoided than in the times before and during the Exile, just because of opposition to the inroads of the Aramaic spoken by all the tribes, in the midst of which the little Jewish community had to maintain its existence. The hymns and set liturgical forms for use in the temple worship were taken from the Hebrew Bible. The Hebrew Bible was read and expounded to the people in the synagogues, and there soon grew up a distinct class of learned men who made it the subject of special study.

In the case of a people whose individuality and continued existence depended so much upon their religion, and whose religious life was so thoroughly conditioned by its hold upon its classical literature as was that of the Jewish people at the time of the second temple, the language in which this literature was written could not fall entirely into disuse. It not only survived in the sacred books and in inscriptions upon coins (n. 8), but strenuous efforts were also made to keep it in use as a spoken language. Jesus the son of Sirach, a resident of Jerusalem, wrote his book of proverbs in biblical Hebrew about 180 B.C., and his grandson in Egypt translated it into Greek after 132 B.C. Because it was the sacred language, the scholars gave it preference in their disputations, and as a medium for the presentation of their traditional lore. In order to adapt it to these purposes, by the construction of new forms and the introduction of foreign words (n. 9), they modified it into a learned language, the Modern Hebrew of the Mishnah. Of the uneducated multitude they spoke with contempt (John vii. 49 ; Acts iv. 13), and called their language the "speech of the illiterate." At a time when they themselves had to acquire the sacred language of the Scriptures artificially, they protested against the use, in their own learned circles at least, of the living language of daily intercourse (n. 10). But the effort was ineffective, since the firmness and authority with which it was made came too late. Long before the time of Christ this language which the scholars despised, the Sursi, as the Jews of the Holy Land were wont to call it (n. 4), had become the vernacular of Palestine and the adjoining regions on the east and north (n. 11). Like every other Semite who grew up in these regions, the Jew learned Aramaic as his native tongue before he could learn to read and write and to study the Hebrew Bible. The rule laid down by an aged interpreter of the law, that fathers should teach their sons the sacred language first, only shows that the reverse was the general case. The daughters are expressly exempted from this requirement ; nor did anyone expect them to learn Hebrew (n. 10). So that even in families which were zealous for the law the wives had no knowledge of Hebrew. At the time of Christ, Hebrew was, in the strict sense of the word, the native tongue of no Jew. The small sections of country where the Jews lived together closely and in large numbers, were interspersed with and surrounded by other Aramaic-speaking peoples, Samaritans, Syrians, Edomites, and Nabatæans. Within these narrow limits, necessarily, the language was practically homogeneous. Without the aid of an interpreter Jesus conversed with the Samaritan woman from Sychar and with other Samaritans (John iv. 7-43 ; Luke xvii. 16), also with the Syriac-speaking Phœnician woman (n. 7). Syrians serving in the Roman army understood every word of the table-talk engaged in by the Jews, who supposed that what they said was not understood by them (Jos. Bell. iv. 1. 5).

This community of language, which can be proved, and which makes it permissible to speak of a vernacular, did not exclude very perceptible differences of dialect. These differences were necessarily all the greater since Aramaic had been but very little employed for literary purposes, and particularly since there was no common literature which brought the various Aramaic-speaking tribes and religious communities together. From His dialect, the Samaritan woman at Jacob's Well is able at once to recognise Jesus as a Jew (John iv. 9), and vice versa. Especially when spoken by Jews, Aramaic must have had a peculiar stamp. The Jewish people were so zealous in the practice of their religion, that a large number of Hebrew expressions taken from the language of the Bible, from the cultus, and from the rabbis, must have been adopted into the language of daily life, and in the nature of the case these expressions were only partly Aramaicised. Just as the Modern Hebrew of the learned classes took on its peculiar form not without being strongly influenced by Aramaic, so it was impossible and not to be expected that Jews throughout the Orient, especially in Palestine, and most particularly in Jerusalem, the seat of national worship and the seat of rabbinic learning, should speak Aramaic without using some Hebraisms. The Jews themselves not infrequently called the Aramaic which they spoke Hebrew, at least they did so in their intercourse with Greeks and Romans in contrasting their language with Greek (n. 12). It was not only their mother tongue, but also their national language, and those who retained it were called Hebrews in contrast to the Hellenists (§ 2). Inevitably, also, the various Aramaic dialects spoken by the non-Jewish part of the population in different districts had their influence upon the Aramaic spoken by the Jews living in these regions. As spoken in Babylon, the language sounded different from what it did in Jerusalem; nor did all the Jews in Palestine speak it in exactly the same way. The Galilean was easily recognised in Jerusalem by his pronunciation (n. 13). But these differences, which were not greater than those existing among the High German dialects still spoken (n. 14), must not cause us to overlook the common character of the Aramaic spoken by all "Hebrews," i.e. by Oriental Jews who were not Hellenists.

Especially to be rejected as wholly wrong is the notion that at the time of Christ, Hebrew was spoken in Judea and Jerusalem, and Aramaic only in Galilee. According to Acts i. 19, the Aramaic name of the "field of blood" belonged to the language of Jerusalem Jews; and there were other places in and near Jerusalem which had Aramaic names, such as Bethesda (n. 15). On the occasion of the processions in connection with the feast of Tabernacles, and at the triumphal entry of Jesus, the Galilean pilgrims and the inhabitants of Jerusalem joined in shouting the Hebrew Hoshia-na in its Aramaicised form Oshanna (n. 3, p. 21). No difference is to be observed between Judea and Galilee in the use of the numerous Aramaic proper names which appear in use along with the old Hebrew names (n. 16). There were many Aramaic expressions, frequently employed and long current, that were in use by all "Hebrews," among these some associated with religious thought and life, such as the title Messiah and the party name Pharisees (n. 17). When Josephus, a native of Jerusalem, and a scion of a priestly house, wrote his history of the Jewish War in the "language of his fathers," i.e. the language spoken in Jerusalem,—a history which was afterwards re-edited in Greek,—he did so in the belief that it would be intelligible to the Jews on the other side of the Tigris and in Arabia. But, as is quite clear from this intention of Josephus, and from the combined impression of all the statements which he makes relative to the matter, the language which he used was not that of the O.T. nor the learned language of the rabbis, but the vernacular of Palestine, which was intelligible to all Jews not entirely estranged from the national life, regularly spoken by the "Hebrews" proper, and used by them in correspondence. We have three official documents (n. 18) dealing with certain questions about the calendar and tithes, which were issued between the years 80 and 110 by Gamaliel—probably not the famous teacher of Paul (Acts v. 34, xxii. 3), but his no less distinguished grandson—in his own name and that of his colleagues, i.e. of the highest court of the Jews in Jabne. One of these is directed to the brethren in Upper and Lower Galilee, a second to those in Upper and Lower Daroma, i.e. Judea and South Palestine, and the third to the brethren of the Babylonian diaspora, to those of the diaspora in Media, to the Greek diaspora, and all the other exiles of Israel. The account in which the three documents are incorporated is in Hebrew; the documents themselves are written in good Aramaic. In view of this fact, there can be no doubt that the document issued by the Jerusalem Sanhedrin—which was still in existence—to the man who afterwards became the Apostle Paul, introducing him, and giving him authority among the Jews in Damascus (Acts xxii. 5), was also written in Aramaic. But if the most learned body of the nation found it advisable to use this language in its official deliverances, and if they made no distinction among their countrymen in Judea, in Galilee, and in the diaspora, then it necessarily follows that Josephus must have written his history of the Jewish War of 63–70 in the same language, since it was a work prepared for the rapid propagation of certain views. An account of this war in Hebrew would have made about the same impression on Josephus' contemporaries, especially the Jews of Mesopotamia and Arabia, who were included among those whom the book was intended to reach (n. 12), that a history of the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-71 in the language of the Nibelungenlied would make upon modern Germans. In his defence before the Sanhedrin, had not the presence of the Roman commander necessitated the use of Greek (Acts xxii. 30-xxiii. 10), Paul might have spoken Hebrew, at least with the expectation of being understood, only he would have created the impression of delivering a learned address, rather than of defending his life, which was in danger. To have spoken to the excited mob, which he addressed from the steps of the Roman barracks (Acts xxi. 40-xxii. 21), in the learned language of the time, or in the language of an Isaiah, would have been largely a waste of energy, if not a direct occasion for ridicule. The ἑβραῖς διάλεκτος (Acts xxi. 40, xxii. 2), of which he made use, could have been no other than the Aramaic of common daily life. The fact that, in a Hebrew work like the Mishnah, the sayings of those introduced as speaking are usually reported in Hebrew, is no more proof that these persons spoke Hebrew than our Gospels are evidence that Jesus spoke Greek. On the contrary, from the fact that this same Mishnah transmits in Aramaic single sayings of the Hillel who was born some thirty or fifty years earlier than Jesus, and of others of his contemporaries, it is natural to conclude that Aramaic was widely employed even in rabbinic circles (n. 19).

By Jesus' time Aramaic had come into use also in the synagogue services (n. 20). The story related of Gamaliel the elder, the teacher of Paul, how he ordered a targum, or Aramaic paraphrase of the Book of Job, to be buried, does not, of course, prove the existence at the time of such written translations of the law and prophets also, and still less does it prove that such translations were read in the synagogues in place of the sacred text, or along with it. This came later. But the existence of a targum of the Book of Job in the year 40 A.D. does certainly prove that at this time the Hebrew Bible was unintelligible even to men who studied other parts of the O.T. besides the biblical pericopes, parashas, and haphtarahs. Long before the preparation of the written targums which in part have come down to us, and which were made in order to explain to the people the biblical text, understood by them only imperfectly, use was made in the synagogues of oral translations into Aramaic. It is clear, further, that if it was to accomplish its purpose, the exposition and application, i.e. the sermon which followed, also must have been in Aramaic. This must have been true also of Jesus' preaching in the synagogues, upon the mountains of Galilee, and in the courts of the temple at Jerusalem.

What we learn from extra-biblical sources concerning linguistic conditions in Palestine at the time simply confirms what we gather from the original testimony of the four Gospels. The language in which Jesus prayed and talked to the multitudes, and to His disciples, was used also in the Church gathered in Jerusalem shortly after His resurrection. This fact is so self-evident as hardly to call for direct proof. Still it is to be observed that the surname which, according to Acts iv. 36, was given by the apostles to Joseph of Cyprus very early in the history of the Church was Aramaic. Besides, the name assigned was not an ordinary one, but was chosen for a particular reason (n. 16). Expressions other than Greek, which we find employed from the very first in the worship of the Greek Churches, such as the Hebrew אמן, which was used without modification in prayer by Aramaic-speaking Jews, the Aramaicised form ωσαννα (n. 3, p. 21 f.), to which is to be added also αλληλουϊα (Rev. xix. 1-6, cf. Mark xiv. 26), were not adopted by the Gentile Christians from the Greek O.T., for not all of them are to be found there. Nor were they taken from the Hebrew Bible, which the Gentile Christians did not possess: they came rather with the gospel from Jerusalem. The occurrence of the Aramaic expression μαρναθα in the Greek eucharistic prayers of the so-called Didache (x. 6) in very close connection with an αμην and an ωσαννα, indicates that these liturgical formulæ originated in a congregation which used Aramaic in its worship. This could have been none other than the congregation in Jerusalem, the Church in Palestine. Paul makes use of the same formula in a passage where he expressly excludes from his greeting to the Church certain strangers who were disturbing the peace of the Church in Corinth, and threatening to destroy the cordial relations between the Church and the apostle (1 Cor. xvi. 22). As we shall see later, the persons for whom this threatening hint was meant were Jewish Christians from Palestine (§ 18, n. 12). By using the language employed in the Church from which they came, the apostle meant to make clear to these men themselves and to the Greek-speaking Christians in Corinth whom he had in mind.

The successors and heirs of the Jewish-Christian Church in Jerusalem, which ceased to exist after the time of Hadrian, were the Nazarites, who lived in the region east of the Jordan, and in some localities lying farther north in Syria, as Aleppo. As late as the fourth century they continued to cling to their national traditions. According to Epiphanius (Hær. xxix. 7), they were well trained in the use of Hebrew, and, like the Jews, read the O.T. in the original; they were also familiar with the rabbinic traditions as far back as the time of Hadrian. But the only Gospel which they used, the so-called Gospel of the Hebrews, was an Aramaic book, which is known to have been in existence from the middle of the second century (GK, ii. 648–672). Aramaic, consequently, was the language employed in their religious worship from the time of their enforced departure from Jerusalem before the middle of the second century.

The bearing of these results upon the beginnings of Christian literature must be reserved until the separate writings are discussed. But before we proceed to that discussion, it is necessary to consider another language element of predominating importance in the wide field of the apostolic missionary labours, and of great importance also in Palestine.

1. (P. 2.) G. DE ROSSI, Della lingua propria di Cristo e degli Ebrei nazionali della Palestina da' tempi de' Maccabei, Parma, 1772. The lines here laid down were followed out by PFANNKUCHE in his article on the vernacular of Palestine in the time of Christ and the apostles in Eichhorn's Allg. Bibl. der bibl. Literatur, viii. 3 (1798), S. 365–480. Cf., further, FR. DELITZSCH, “Über die paläst. Volkssprache, welche Jesus und seine Jünger geredet haben,” in Saat auf Hoffnung, 1874, S. 195–215. With regard to later utterances of this scholar, in which he declared Hebrew rather than Aramaic to have been the original language of Matthew at least, see below, § 55. A. NEUBAUER, “On the dialects spoken in Palestine in the time of Christ,” in Studia Biblica (vol. i. of the Oxford Studia bibl. et ecclesiastica), 1885, pp. 39–74. MARSHALL, “The Aramaic Gospel,” a long series of articles in the Expositor, New Series, vols. ii.–viii. (1890–1893). A MEYER, Jesu Muttersprache. Das Galiläische Aramäisch in seiner Bedeutung für die Erklärung der Reden Jesu und der Evangelien überhaupt, 1896. E. NESTLE, Philologica Sacra, Bemerkungen über die Urgestalt der Evangelien und der Apostelgeschichte, 1896. G. DALMAN, Die Worte Jesu mit Berücksichtigung des nachkanonischen jüdischen Schrifttums und der aramäischen Sprache erörtert, Bd. i., Einleitung und wichtige Begriffe. Nebst Anhang: Messianische Texte, 1898 (Eng. trans. 1902). Of fundamental importance from a philological standpoint is G. DALMAN, Grammatik des jüdisch-palästinischen Aramäisch, 2te Aufl. 1905. Also by the same author, Aramäische Dialektproben, Lesestücke zur Grammatik, etc., 1896. Lexica: J. BUXTORF, Lex. chaldaicum, talmudicum et rabbinicum, 1639; J. LEVY, Neuhebr. und chald. Wörterbuch, 4 vols. 1876–1889; ibid. Chaldäisches Wörterbuch über die Targumim, 2 vols. 1876; M. JASTROW, Dictionary of the Targumim, the Talmud babli and yeruschalmi, 2 vols. 1886–1903. G. DALMAN, Aramäisch-neuhebräisches Wörterbuch zu Targum, Talmud und Midrasch, 1897–1901. Though the rapid development of these studies is very gratifying, it is too soon to draw from them far-reaching conclusions as to the history and doctrine of the N.T. It is a bypath, and not a very alluring one at that, which leads from Wellhausen's remarks upon the concept “Son of man” (Israelit. u. jüd. Geschichte, 1st ed. S. 312), quite correct as many of them are, to the development of these by A. Meyer (op. cit. 91 ff.), and from thence to Lietzmann, Der Menschensohn (1896), and back to Wellhausen himself (Skizzen u. Vorarbeiten, vi. 187–215). Cf. Dalman, Worte Jesu, S. 191–219 (Eng. trans. pp. 234–268); Fiebig, Der Menschensohn, 1901; ZKom. Matt. 346–356.

2. (P. 2.) Referring to words of Jesus, Mark v. 41, xv. 34, ὁ ἐστὶν μετρημῆνευόμενον (cf. Matt. i. 23; Mark xv. 22; Acts iv. 36, xiii. 8; Mark iii. 17, vii. 11, 34, ὃ ἐστίν (cf. Matt. xxvii. 46; Acts i. 19); in Mark xiv. 36 there is simply a juxtaposition of the Aramaic and Greek expressions (cf. Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6). John sometimes uses the same or similar formulæ, i. 38, 41, 42, ix. 7, xi. 16, xx. 24, xxi. 2; sometimes he notes that a name used by him is Hebrew, without, however, adding a translation, v. 2; sometimes, after designating a place by its Greek name, he tells what it is called in Hebrew, xix. 13, 17.

3. (P. 4.) Aramaic and Hebrew words and phrases, which Jesus is said in the Gospel to have used, are the following:—(1) Mark v. 41, ταλιθα κουμ (BL^N) or κουμ (AD, the Latins, S¹, Aphraates, p. 65), to be written כּוּם כּוּם; cf. Dalman, *Gr.*² 150, A. 6; 321, A. 1. The Greek variants make it doubtful whether the final i, which in the Semitic character is to be written at any rate, was still audible. The statement of an anonymous onomasticon (ed. Lagarde, 199. 78), that κουμ is masc., κουμ fem., is grammatically correct, but is probably mere book-learning without regard to the actual pronunciation. (2) Mark vii. 34, εφφαθα (so most authorities, εφθεθα D^N Lat., effeta Jerome, Onomast., ed. Lagarde, 64. 2), correctly taken by Mark (ὃ ἐστίν διανοίχθητι) and the Syrian translators (Ss Sh S¹ כּוּם כּוּם) as a call in the masc. singular addressed to the deaf man, not as a call in the fem. plural—the ending being dropped—addressed to the ears, cf. Dalman, *Gr.*² 278, A. 1. (3) Mark xv. 34 = Matt. xxvii. 46. In both passages the text has been transmitted in many varied forms, partly owing to a regard for the parallel passage. The original reading of Mark is perhaps ελωϊ ελωϊ λεμα (N^C L, λαμα BD, λιμα AKM, λειμα EFG) σαβαχθανι (EFKL, Eus. Dem. x. 8. 14, σαβαχθανει CGH, σαβακτανει N, ζαφθανει DLat., ζαβαφθανει B); that of Matthew is perhaps ηλει ηλει (instead of this ελοι N, ελοι B, both drawn from Mark) λεμα (N^B L, λαμα D, λιμα or λημα most authorities) σαβαχθανι (al. -νει, DLat. ζαφθανει). Of the ancient Syrian translators (Sc lacks both passages, Sh Mark xv. 34), Ss has in Mark כּוּם כּוּם כּוּם כּוּם, i.e. exactly like the Syriac rendering of Ps. xxii. 1; it has the question in just the same form in Matthew also, S¹ likewise has it similarly in both Gospels, while Sh, on the contrary, has in Matt. xxvii. 46, כּוּם כּוּם כּוּם; Ss and Sh have כּוּם as the form of the address in Matthew (pp. 204, 211, only in the latter passage along with it being given the translation כּוּם), S¹ has כּוּם in both Gospels; cf. the writer's Das Evang. des Petrus, 1893, S. 33, 78. Epiphanius, Hær. lxix. 68, Dindorf, iii. 221, cf. lxix. 49, p. 196, remarks on Matt. xxvii. 46, that Jesus spoke the words ηλει, ηλει in Hebrew, following the original text of the psalm, but that He said what follows in Syriac. Lagarde, Gött. gel. Anz. 1882, S. 329, pointed to this passage as proof of the systematic correction of even our most ancient MSS. which is only partially correct. As proof of the historical originality of Matthew's כּוּם, a form which, while certainly Hebrew, was not unheard of in the Targum, is the fact that through this form the misunderstanding of the people (Matt. xxvii. 47–49; Mark xv. 35) becomes more intelligible; cf. ZKom. Matt. 705, A. 86 (contrary to view held in first and second editions of the Einführung). Mark, a native of Jerusalem, probably substituted כּוּם, to which he was more accustomed, and which in style was more suitable in an otherwise Aramaic sentence. The obscure pronunciation ελωϊ instead of ελαϊ, which was to have been expected, probably arose from dependence on the sound of the Hebrew elohim, elohai (cf. Dalman, *Gr.*² 156, A. 1), customary in the living language of the Aramaic speaking Jews. On the other hand, the Western reading αφαθαι in both Gospels, which had found its way also into B in a still more corrupt form (see above), quite certainly points to scholarly knowledge and conscious consideration of the Hebrew text of the Psalms; cf. Westcott-Hort, Appendix, 21. For evidently an a, which could easily have fallen out after λεμα or λαμα, is to be supplied; so that αφαθαι, an entirely regular transliteration of the Hebrew אפחאי, is to be considered the original form of the reading. The fact, moreover, that D has λαμα in both Gospels (B only in Mark), discloses the effort to make the entire sentence Hebrew,—a result upon which Luther also ventured in both Gospels. We are in this matter not to be led astray by the fact that the mutilated text αφαθαι was traced back to the Aramaic אפחאי by those acquainted with Syriac, and was translated, as in D (Mark xv. 34), by ὠνειδισάς με (cf. also Dalman, Worte Jesu, i. 43, A. 2 [Eng. trans. 54, n. 1]). (4) Mark vii. 11, κοψαυ = δῶπον, in Matt. xv. 5 only the translation. In the εἰς τὸν κοψαυᾶν (al. -βωραυ, -βαρα, -βαν) of Matt. xxvii. 6, where the high priests are speaking, and in Jos. Bell. ii. 9. 4, where, however, we should certainly read κοψαυᾶς, and not, with Niese, κοψωρας,—the Aramaic stat. emphat. appears. In Mark vii. 11, where the word forms the predicate (cf. Jos. Ant. iv. 4. 4; c. Apion. i. 22), this form was at least not necessary; hence Ss also in Mark vii. 11, Matt. xv. 5, is content with the stat. absol. קרנן (Sc S¹ קרנני); on the other hand, in Matt. xxvii. 6, Ss S¹ have בית קרננא, Sh בקרננא. (5) Mark xiv. 36, ἀββα=ὁ πατήρ. This is its only occurrence in the Gospels, but it is found also in Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6, cf. ZKom. Gal. 204, and, with regard to Bar-abba, below, n. 16. Instead of this, Ss has here as in Matt. xxvi. 39 (πάτερ) אבי, a form which S¹ pedantically enough places as a Syriac translation beside the exact transcription אבא in Mark xiv. 36, and uses elsewhere for πάτερ as well as for ὁ πατήρ intended as a vocative, Matt. xi. 25, 26, xxxvi. 39; Luke x. 21. The East Syrians considered אבי better Syriac, while Sh has אבא in Matt. xxvi. 39; Luke x. 21. Cf. ZKom. Matt. 436, A. 40; Schlatter, Heimat u. Sprache des 4. Evang. 54). (6) Mark iii. 17, Βαρναβης (al. -εργης, -εργες, min. 700 [al. 604], ed. Hoskier, Βαρναβεζ, min. 565 [al. 473], ed. Belsheim, Βαρναβεγες) = νιὸς βροπῆς. Ss בני רנשי, so likewise S¹ with appended translation בני רעמא. Jerome on Dan. ii. 7, Vall. v. 625, and Onom., ed. Lagarde, 66. 9, demanded nothing less than a change of the text, which was alleged to be corrupt, into bane (or bene) reem. According to Kautzsch, Gr. des bibl. Aram. 9, the verb is not רנש, but רנ “to be angry” (Ss S¹ Matt. v. 22). The free translation in Mark is perhaps to be explained on the ground that νιὸς ἀργῆς would be very liable to misunderstanding; cf. Eph. ii. 3; Dalman, recently, *Gr.*² 144, A. 2; 199, A. 3, prefers רנש. The transcription, however, is remarkable. A superfluous a in Ἰωαχβεδῆ (Jos. Ant. ii. 9. 4, cf. iii. 5. 3—moreover, the text here as transmitted is uncertain) will not explain the superfluous o in Βαρναβης. Delitzsch and Nöldeke, Gött. gel. Anz. 1884, S. 1023, saw in this an attempt to reproduce a particular Galilean pronunciation; whereas Dalman, Worte Jesu, 39, A. 2 (Eng. trans. 49, n. 2), would prefer to have either o or a stricken out. (7) John i. 42, Κηφᾶς=ὁ Πέτρος; in the other Gospels only the translation. With regard to Paul’s usage, see below, § 38, on 1 Pet. i. 1. Jerome, Onomast. 66. 14; 77. 15, says: Syrum est; and rightly: for it is not קא, which occurs only twice in the O.T. and then in the plural, but the very common Syriac word ܫܢܢܐ (so Ss S¹ in John i. 42, and the Syrians generally as the regular substitution for ἥτρος, Sh ܫܢܐ). Instead of the translation ὁ ἥτρος we should have expected ἥτρος, or at best πέτρα, without the article (cf. Acts iv. 36); but John shows by this definite form that he felt the determinative force of the stat. emphat. It is established by Matt. xvi. 17 that Jesus gave this new name as a contrast to that which had been given Simon at birth, as the son of his earthly father. Matthew has preserved the Aramaic form ܕܢܐܢܐ. According to this the father bore the name of the prophet Jonah, cf. Matt. xii. 39-41; Luke xi. 29-32, which was common among Palestinian Jews even in later times (Levy, Neuhebr. Lex. ii. 229, "name of many Amorites, especially in the Jerus. Gemara"). According to the correct text of John i. 42, xxi. 15-17, and two fragments of the Gospel of the Hebrews (GK, ii. 693, 694, 712), his name was rather John. The latter name is written in the O.T. ܝܫܝܐ, or when contracted ܝܫܐ, e.g. Neh. xii. 22; Ezra x. 6; the former spelling as late as the coins of John Hyrcanus (a. 135-105; Madden, Coins of the Jews, 76-80) and the Targum (e.g. 2 Chron. xvii. 15), in which occurs also the shorter form (e.g. Jer. xl. 13). The ancient Hebrew pronunciation is reproduced most exactly in Greek by Ἰωάννης (2 Chron. xvii. 15; Ezra x. 6; Jer. xl. 13, xli. 11, etc., in LXX; Luke iii. 27; along with which occur also here and there Ἰωαννάν, Ἰωαννα, Ἰωαν, and in 2 Kings xxv. 23 in Cod. B the altogether incorrect Ἰωα); the next transliteration in the order of precision is Ἰωάνης, the form in the N.T. in Cod. B throughout, even where Tischendorf has not noted it, sometimes also in 8 Matt. xvi. 14, xvii. 1, 13; Cod. L John i. 32. In the Acts, D, which has the sharpened pronunciation everywhere in the Gospels, comes over to the side of B: Acts i. 5, 13, 22, iii. 1, 11, x. 37, xiii. 24, 25, xix. 3, 4. Once, in iii. 4, D alone has this form. This spelling must be attributed to the older recension of Acts, and therefore to the author himself. Moreover, the corresponding female name is spelled Ἰωάννα by BD in Luke viii. 3, and by DL in Luke xxiv. 10. The wide diffusion of the form Ἰωάνης (cf. also ܝܫܐ among the Syrians) cannot be due to a mere error of the Greek copyists, but implies that along with the old Hebrew form there was also a sharpened pronunciation current in Palestine; cf. Dalman, *Gr.*² 179, A. 5. An analogous case is the name of the high priest ܫܐܢܐ (Jos. Ant. xviii. 2. 1; Bell. v. 12. 2 correctly Avanos), which we find in the N.T. (Luke iii. 2; John xviii. 13; Acts iv. 6) written Avnas almost without variants; for this form certainly cannot be explained as arising from a confusion of memory with the name ܫܐܢܐ (1 Sam. i. 2; Luke ii. 36; Virg. Aen. iv. 9). (8) Matt. v. 22 πακα (BE and most authorities, πακα 8D and the Latins) is classed with the Talmudic opprobrious term ܫܐܢܐ (stat. emph.), and this is explained as an abbreviation of ܫܐܢܐ. This is the view even of Dalman, *Gr.*² 173, A. 2. The Syrians, who, without any hint that they were dealing with a foreign word, wrote ܫܐܢܐ (Ss Sc Sh S¹), seem with better right to have taken it for a Syriac word. Corresponding to the Hebrew ܫܐܢܐ (thin, lean, Gen. xli. 19) the word has acquired among the Syrians the meaning "insignificant, despicable," and among the Syriac speaking population about Antioch has been used as a derogatory form of addressing the lower classes, which has become almost meaningless. See, further, ZKom. Matt. 24. The μορι standing near it is Greek, of course. But since this Greek word occurs quite often in the form $\mu\omicron\mu$, $\mu\omicron\mu$ in the Midrash as an expression for "fool" (Neubauer, Athenæum, 1881, ii. 779; Stud. Bibl., Oxford, 1885, p. 55; Krauss, Lehnwörter, i. 50, ii. 328), it follows that the Galileans, who otherwise spoke Aramaic, used this, like many another Greek word, in common life. (9) The Hebrew $\mu\mu$, originally an adjective, but regularly an exclamation for the solemn confirmation of a prayer, a word of God, and the like. Usually in the LXX it is translated by $\gamma\epsilon\nu\omicron\iota\tau\omicron$, but sometimes (1 Chron. xvi. 36; Neh. v. 13) is transcribed as $\acute{\alpha}\mu\eta\nu$, and in this form was immediately introduced into the liturgical use of the Greek Churches, 1 Cor. xiv. 16; 2 Cor. i. 20. Even in the mouth of Jesus the single or double $\acute{\alpha}\mu\eta\nu$ is an elliptical exclamation, like $\nu\alpha\iota$ in Matt. xi. 9; Luke xi. 51, and is by no means an adverb modifying λέγω or the statement introduced by λέγω, that verb being on such a view a parenthetical inquam. The latter supposition is excluded by the simple fact that in many cases a $\delta\tau\iota$ dependent upon λέγω follows. But a usage peculiar to the speech of Jesus is the $\acute{\alpha}\mu\eta\nu$, λέγω $\acute{\epsilon}\mu\iota\nu$ (30 times in Matthew, 13 times in Mark, 6 times in Luke, 25 times with doubled $\acute{\alpha}\mu\eta\nu$ in John) at the beginning of a saying which is neither in answer to a question nor in any way related to another saying as its solemn confirmation, as in Jer. xxviii. 6; 1 Kings i. 36; Rev. v. 14. The usage in Rev. vii. 12, xix. 4, xxii. 20 is not essentially different from that of Jesus. With regard to Rev. iii. 14, see § 68, n. 8. Delitzsch (ZfLTh. 1856, S. 422 f.) conjectured that the original form was $\mu\mu\mu\mu\mu\mu$, the latter word being a contraction for $\mu\mu\mu\mu$. According to him, the Synoptists had given an exact translation, but John, in addition to this, and indeed quite after his manner, imitated the sound. The Babylonian Talmud was the only place where Delitzsch could find instances of the elision of the ν in the case of contraction, and on this account Dalman, *Gr.*² 243, will not admit that it occurred in the speech of Jesus; nevertheless, the conjecture remains probable. (10) Matt. vi. 24; Luke xvi. 9–13 $\mu\alpha\mu\mu\omega\nu\alpha\varsigma$ (μαμμωνας in N.T. is poorly attested; in Church literature it is the prevalent form), $\mu\mu\mu$ Pirke Aboth ii. 12, Aram. $\mu\mu\mu$, not infrequent, Levy, ii. 138 f., so also Ss Se S¹, $\mu\mu\mu$ Sh, Luke xvi. 13. Jerome, Ep. xxii. 31 (cf. Ep. cxxi. 6; ad Matth. vi. 24; Vall. vii. 36): "Nam gentili Syrorum lingua (Ep. 121: 'Non Hebræorum, sed Syrorum lingua') Mammona divitiæ nuncupantur." Ibid. Anecd. Maredsol. iii. 2. 86: "Mamona in lingua hebræa divitiæ nuncupantur, non aurum, ut quidam putant." Adam. Dial. c. Marc. (Lat. ed., Caspari, 37, effaced in the Greek text): "Mammonam . . . pecuniam dicit gentili lingua," which probably is to be traced back to Theophilus of Antioch, and refers to the Syriac spoken in the neighbourhood of that city, cf. ZKG, ix. 232 f., 238 f.; Iren. iii. 8. 1 (probably dependent upon Theophilus or Justin, or both): "Secundum Judaicam loquelam, qua et Samaritæ utuntur," etc.; August. de Serm. in Monte, ii. 14. 47, and Serm. 113 on Luke xvi. (cf. Quest. ev. ii. 34; Enarr. in Ps. liii. 2) distinguishes the "Hebrew" mammona, the meaning of which he knew through Jerome, from the Punic mammon, which he knew through his own acquaintance with the language, and which he says means lucrum; cf. Schröder, Phönic. Sprache, 30. See also ZKom. Matt. 291, A. 6; concerning the doubtful etymology, cf. Nestle, EB, col. 2914; Dalman, PRE,³ xii. 153. (11) σατανᾶς, in the Gospels and Acts, the authors of which regularly use διάβολος (made current by the LXX), used only by Jesus (this is true of Acts xxvi. 18 also), the only exceptions being Mark i. 13; Luke xxii. 3; John xiii. 27, and one other passage (Acts v. 3), where it is used by Peter. It is used ordinarily by Paul also (2 Cor. xii. 7, Antiochian reading σατάν, as in LXX 1 Kings xi. 14, 23). It is only in his later Epistles, from Eph. iv. 27 (?) on, that it is sometimes replaced by διάβολος. The Aramaic form occurs as early as Sir. xxi. 27 (τὸν Σατανά B al. -van*); it is found in the Targum, even where it has no support in the original text; it is used also in the Syriac Gospels, sometimes even for διάβολος, Sc Matt. iv. 1; Ss Luke iv. 2, 13; Ss Sc John vi. 70; S¹ more seldom, e.g. Matt. xiii. 39; Sh, on the other hand, regularly. (12) γένενα occurs outside of the Gospels (Matthew 7 times, Mark 3 times, Luke once) only once, Jas. iii. 6. The Hebrew גִּנְיָא; the pronunciation ge-hinnám, from which the Hellenised form of the N.T. arose by dropping the m, is also that of the Targums and Talmuds. (13) τὸ πάσχα is used by Jesus in Matt. xxvi. 2, 17, 18; Mark xiv. 14; Luke xxii. 8, 11, 15. Still earlier than this, in the LXX (φασεκ in Chron. only), and hence used also by Philo and Josephus (also spelled φασκα repeatedly by the latter author, Ant. v. 1. 4, ix. 13. 3; Bell. ii. 1. 3) regularly in this Aramaicised form of the Hebrew פֶּסַח. In Sh it is written פִּסְחָא in Matt. xxvi. 2, 17, 18, Luke xxii. 8, and quite often, though the form פֶּסַח also occurs, Luke ii. 41. In Sc Ss S¹ the form is פֶּסַח. Among the Jews the pronunciation pascha must be older than pischa. (14) σάββατα, as regards its form, treated as the plural of σάββατον, and actually used with a plural meaning in Acts xvii. 2, perhaps also in Matt. xii. 5, 10, 12, Luke iv. 31, is, however, originally the sing. emphat. form שַׁבָּת, and denotes: (a) a single Sabbath day, Matt. xii. 1, 11; Mark i. 21, ii. 23, iii. 2; cf. LXX very frequently, and perhaps even clearer instances in Jos. Ant. i. 1. 1, iii. 6. 6; Hor. Sat. i. 1. 69: "Hodie tricesima sabbata"; hence also the expressions ὁπὲρ σαββάτων, Matt. xxviii. 1, and ἡμέρα τῶν σ., Luke iv. 16, xiii. 14, 16, xiv. 5; Acts xiii. 14, xvi. 13, the latter phrase being used by Luke alone of the N.T. writers (in Mark vi. 2 it is an erroneous insertion of the Westerns); (b) the week, so at least in μία [τῶν] σαββάτων, Matt. xxviii. 1; Mark xvi. 2; Luke xxiv. 1; John xx. 1, 19; Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2. In Mark xvi. 9 this is changed into the un-Jewish πρώτη σαββ., a form corresponding to הַיּוֹם הַשֵּׁנִי the first day of the week, Sunday. Among the Jews also שבת, שבתא, or contracted שַׁבָּת, together with שבוע, had received the meaning of שבוע "week" (Levy, iv. 493, 506). Since even Josephus, in spite of his etymological learning, according to which σάββατα = ἀνάπαυσις (Ant. i. 1. 1; c. Ap. ii. 2. 11), uses ἑβδομάς, which properly denotes a group of seven, a week, also for the seventh day of the week, the Sabbath (Bell. i. 2. 4, 7. 3, ii. 19. 2; c. Ap. ii. 39; cf. 2 Macc. vi. 11), it is clear that the people generally had ceased to feel the distinction in derivation between שבת, שבתא, or rather the contracted form שַׁבָּת, and the word for "seven" שבוע, שבועא. Upon this supposition is explicable the signification given under (b). (15) Here the writer puts Βεελζεβοὺλ, a word cited by Jesus from the speech of His opponents as a term of reviling for Himself and for the devil as His ally (Matt. x. 25; Luke xi. 18), or put by the evangelists in the mouth of these opponents (Matt. xii. 24; Mark iii. 22; Luke xi. 15), or adopted by Jesus Himself (Matt. xii. 27; Luke xi. 19), and even used in a good sense (Matt. x. 25). The Syrian translators (Ss Sc S¹, unfortunately Sh is wanting in all these passages) have everywhere put for it ܒܥܠ ܝܒܠ, i.e. the Ekron god of flies, 2 Kings i. 2, 6; and even a writer as early as Jerome was so convinced of the correctness of this interpretation, that, on the strength of it, he declared the reading Beelzebub, which is attested in no Greek MS., to be the only correct one (Onom. 66. 11–13), and through his Vulgate presented to the Latin Church this form now so general among us. Not a particle of proof has yet been found in the LXX, the remains of the other Greek versions, the Targum, or the Talmudic-rabbinic literature, which would support the view that the later Jews altered the name of this Ekron god so arbitrarily, or that they took any interest in him at all; such proof must first be forthcoming before we can rest satisfied with such a quid pro quo. Yet even recent writers like Kautzsch, 9; Dalman, *Gr.*² 137; Graf v. Baudissin, *PRE.*³ ii. 514, content themselves with this explanation. To be sure, the thought of ܝܒܠ to dung, ܕܒܠ dung, ܕܒܠ dunging, and the application of these words to idol-worship, which had become customary (Levy, i. 509 f.), may have contributed to give the name Beelzebub an evil sense; but this name (and the only forms which have come down to us are Βεελ (or Βεε, or Βε) -ζεβουλ) cannot be a transcription of zebel or zibbul, consequently the name must have been ܒܥܠ ܕܒܠ “lord of the dwelling.” By the dwelling is meant naturally not that of God, the temple (1 Kings viii. 13), but the abode of the dead (Ps. xlix. 15), the stronghold of Hades, whence all the powers of destruction break forth (Matt. xvi. 18; Luke viii. 31; Rev. ix. 1–11, xx. 1–3). Jesus adopts the very word which His adversaries have used. When they call the devil a lord of the abode, they should at the same time consider that as such he has charge of an ordered household which he will not himself wantonly destroy, nor suffer to be plundered by others, so long as he can prevent it (Matt. xii. 25, 29). If they apply the name to Jesus Himself, He can appropriate it when reminding the disciples that He is the master of the house in which they form the household (Matt. x. 25). The first word of the compound name has the Aram. form, the second is Hebrew as well. Here belong also words which were spoken by those about Jesus, but as to which it is not expressly recorded that He used them Himself: (1) ܪܒܝ, רַבִּי, was the customary form with which the pupil addressed the teacher (John i. 38, translated by διδάσκαλε 8 times in John, 4 times in Matt., 3 times in Mark), and as such was referred to by Jesus Himself (Matt. xxiii. 7, 8; cf. John xiii. 13). Beside this, however, ܪܒܝ ܒܥܠ ܕܒܠ is used in addressing Jesus (Mark x. 51; John xx. 16)—both times with the variant reading ܪܒܝ ܒܥܠ ܕܒܠ. The pronunciation of ܪܒܝ “my lord and master,” may at that time have fluctuated between u and o in the penult. The Jewish pronunciation ribboni (Levy, iv. 416) probably belongs to a later period. Cf. also ZKöm. Matt. 643, A. 70. Among the Syriac versions, Sh S¹ have retained this word in John xx. 16, S¹ has ܪܒܝ in Mark x. 51, Ss ܪܒܝ in both passages, Sc is wanting. (2) Μεσσίας only in John i. 41, iv. 25, and then with the translation (ὁ) Χριστός = Aramaic ܡܫܝܚܐ, in the Targums, and especially among the Aramaic speaking Jews = מָשִׁיחַ. The Syrians, without exception, have used for this word the Aramaic form, which everywhere in the N.T. is to be presupposed as the original of (ὁ) Χριστός; Sh alone, who elsewhere also has preserved Greek forms (e.g. ܝܫܘܥ Jesus), wrote ܡܫܝܚܐ in John i. 41,

iv. 25, and thus it was possible for him also, in slavish imitation of the original, to add a translation, a thing which Ss Sc S¹ declined to do. The view of Lagarde (Verhältnis des deutschen Staats, etc., 1873, S. 29; Semítica, i. 50; Symmicta, ii. 92; Übersicht über die Bildung der Nomina, 1889, S. 93-95; Register und Nachträge, 1891, S. 62 f.), that Μεσσίας goes back to a מִשְׁחָה, which, according to him, was originally Assyrian or Babylonian, later Nabatean, i.e. trans-Jordanic, and means "the repeatedly anointing one," has justly met with no favour. It is beyond belief that the original meaning of the Aramaic word should have been misunderstood, not only by John, who was the first to transliterate it into Greek, and by all Greek speaking Christians, who called their Lord ὁ Χριστός even before the year 43-44, during which the name Χριστιανοί arose in Antioch (§ 40, n. 9), but also by the Jews, who long since had used it in the sense of "the anointed, the promised king" (e.g. also Onkelos, Gen. xlix. 10). The double σσ for single ψ, especially in the middle of a word, has analogies enough: Αβέσσα, Cod. B, 1 Sam. xxvi. 6; Jos. Ant. xvii. 1. 3; Αβέσσαλωμ, LXX 2 Sam. iii. 3, xiii. 1 ff., which also has some attestation in 1 Macc. xi. 70; Jos. Ant. vii. 1, 4; Ελισσαῖος, Cod. A, without exception after 1 Kings xix. 16, attested preponderantly in Jos. Ant. viii. 13. 7, and not inconsiderably in Luke iv. 27; Ιεσσαί, 1 Sam. xvi. 1 ff.; Isa. xi. 1 (Σ Ιεσαί); Matt. i. 5 f.; Luke iii. 32; ἠρηψ Dan. vi. 5 (al. 4), rendered by Jerome (Vall. v. 658) essaittha. If all this should be insufficient to explain the form Μεσσίας, we might regard as reproducing the original spelling the reading Μεσίās in John i. 42, iv. 25, a reading the attestation of which can hardly be called slight. (3) Matt. xxi. 9, 15; Mark xi. 9, 10; John xii. 13, ὠσαννα; Ss Sc (so far as they have these passages) and S¹ everywhere מִשְׁחָה; on the contrary, Sh מִשְׁחָה. Furthermore, osanna occurred in the Gospel of the Hebrews according to Jerome, Epist. xx. (GK, ii. 650, 694), it was early received into the liturgy of the Eucharist according to Didache x. 6, and it was shouted by the people in Jerusalem in the year 66 according to Hegesippus (Eus. H. E. ii. 23. 14). The original form of this, as is also shown by the context in the Gospels, is unquestionably the מִשְׁחָה of Ps. cxviii. 25. Whether he knew the whole psalm or not, every Jewish child was familiar with these words, occurring as they did in the liturgy of the feast of Tabernacles,—a feast, moreover, which the palm branches would recall; cf. Delitzsch, ZfLTh. 1855, S. 653 ff. The view proposed first, perhaps, by Merx in Hilgenfeld, NT extra can. iv. 26, ed. ii. p. 25, and adopted by Siegfried, ZfWTh. 1884, S. 359, and others, according to which the original form was an Aramaic מִשְׁחָה "save us," is in the first place opposed to all the tradition. The Greek translators of Ps. cxviii. 25 and the ancient commentators understood σωσον δὴ; cf. also Jerome, Onomast. 62. 29. Good proof must then be forthcoming before we can believe that Jews by misunderstanding the Biblical form found here a suffix of the first person plural. In the second place, the dative "to the son of David" (Matt. xxi. 9, 15) or "to the God of David" (Didache x. 6), excludes the possibility that those who thus hailed Jesus, or those who reported this, thought of an "us" as contained in the hosanna. In the third place, there is no verb מִשְׁחָה in Aramaic at all, nor one related to this in derivation. The Hiph'il of this Hebrew verb is rendered regularly in Targ. and Pesh. by פָּרַק. The Talmudic מִשְׁחָה as a name of the festal palm and neighbours of which were called Syrians by Josephus, Vita, 11; Bell. ii. 18. 1f., and he could not have remained ignorant of the language of the country. Moreover, he had acquired also some knowledge of Hebrew, probably even in his early years under Dorotheus in Antioch (Eus. H. E. vii. 32. 2), and often showed it in his exegesis; yet he applied the name "Syriac" not only to the language of Edessa, from which he translated into Greek the legend of King Abgar (H. E. i. 13. 5, 20, iv. 30), but also to the vernacular of Palestine, into which the several parts of the Greek service had to be translated orally by interpreters in polyglot Churches, such as those at Jerusalem and Scythopolis, for the benefit of those who did not understand Greek (Syr. text of the Book of the Martyrs of Palestine, ed. Cureton, p. 4; cf. the Latin and Greek excerpts published by Violet in TU, xiv. 4, S. 7, 110). Just so Silvia peregrin. Itin. Hieros., ed. Geyer, 99, 14–24; Jerome, Epist. cviii. 30; Vita Hilarionis, cc. xxii. xxiii. (Vall. i. 723, ii. 25); Marci, Vita Porphyrii Gaz. (Bonn, 1895), pp. 55–57. What is meant is the language of the so-called Evangelium Hierosolymitanum. Cf. in general Forsch. i. 18–44, 268–272, ii. 292–299; GK, i. 43, ii. 659 f. Moreover, Eusebius has no hesitation in calling the mother tongue of the Galilean apostles Syriac: Demonstr. ev. iii. 7. 10, ἀνδρες τῇ Σύρων ἐντραφέντες μόνῃ φωνῇ, cf. iii. 4. 44; Theoph. syr., ed. Lee, iv. 6, v. 26, 46, partly also in Greek in Mai, Nova p. bibl. iv. 1. 118, 120. So Quæst. ev. ad Steph. in Mai, 270 (probably words of the Julius Africanus who wrote at Nicopolis in Palestine a hundred years before Eusebius, Forsch. i. 40, n. 4, ὁ Μαρθαῖος Σύρος ἀνὴρ. In this sense Lucian, whose mother tongue was the Syriac spoken in Samosata (Forsch. ii. 297), called Jesus the well-known Syrian of Palestine, who is a good hand at healing demoniacs (Philopseudes, 16); and the Alexandrians derided the Jewish king Agrippa as a Syrian by hailing him as ὁ βασιλεὺς, a term about equivalent to monseigneur (Philoc. Flaccum, vi. Mangey, ii. 522 f.; cf. Dalman, *Gr.*² 152, A. 3). The "five-tongued" Epiphanius (Jerome, c. Rufinus, iii. 6) was a Palestinian by birth, indeed, according to a not very trustworthy tradition, a Jew, and brought up by a rabbi (Opera, ed. Dindorf, v. p. v f.); but when he seeks to speak with precision (Har. lxi. 68, above, p. 15), he calls the Aramaic words spoken by Jesus on the cross "Syriac," in distinction from the Hebrew words joined to them in Matt. xxvii. 46. Jerome in his explanation of the Hebrew names in the Bible regularly appends to the words and names in the N.T. which he regards as Aramaic the phrase Syrum est (Onomastica, ed. Lagarde, 62. 19; 63. 3, 13; 64. 27; 65. 12; 66. 14, 28; 67. 27; 71. 7; 73. 24; 75. 25), frequently with the further addition non hebraeum (60. 18, 21, 25, 29; 61. 23; 63. 17; cf. the passage concerning Mammonas above, p. 18, and the clear distinction between Hebrew and Syriac in Quæst. hebr. in Gen., ed. Lagarde, 22. 11; 50. 29). When the distinction between the Hebrew and the Aramaic form is insignificant, or one part of a compound word seems to admit of a Hebrew meaning, he expresses this also, though often rather unclearly. Onom. 60. 22: "'Barjona,' filius columbae, syrum est pariter et hebraeum, 'bar' quippe lingua syra filius, et 'jona' columba utroque sermone dicitur"; cf. 65. 30 f.; 67. 22, 28; comm. in Matth. x. 13 (Vall. vii. 60; cf. the text-critical note appended): "Quod enim graece dicitur χαίρε et latine 'ave,' hoc hebraico syroque sermone appellatur 'Salom lagh (lach?)' sive 'Salama lach' id est 'pax tecum'"; comm. in Gal. ii. 11 (Vall. vii. 409): "Quod quam nos latine et græce petram vocemus, Hebræi et Syri propter linguæ inter se viciniam Cephā nuncupent." On the other hand, Jerome when thinking of Dan. ii. 4 chose to call the Biblical Jewish Aramaic sermo chaldeus or chaldaicus (Præf. in Dan., Tob., Judith, ix. 1361, x. 2 f., 22), even though in his translation of Dan. ii. 4 he had used syriace. This explains, then, the combination Syrorum et Chaldaeorum lingua in the Prol. galeatus in libros Regum (Vall. ix. 454), and the statement about the Gospel of the Hebrews (c. Pelagium, iii. 2 Vall. ii. 782): "Chaldaico quidem syroque sermone, sed hebraicis literis scriptum est"; cf. GK, ii. 659 ff. Theodoret, who was acquainted with Syriac (cf. Forsch. i. 39–43), recognised no distinctions of dialect within that language as it was spoken in Palestine, in Phœnicia, on the Euphrates, and in Edessa, but such as according to Judg. xii. 6 existed within ancient Israel (Opp., ed. Schulze, i. 337). To this may be added the opinion of a modern philologist (Sachau, on the Palmyrene tax law of 137 A.D. in ZDMG, 1883, S. 564: "The language on no other monument is so closely related to Biblical Aramaic as that in this Palmyrene tax inscription. . . . It is the language which was spoken in Palestine at the time of the composition of Chronicles (circa 200 B.C.) and of Daniel (167–166 B.C.), as well as at Palmyra in Hadrian's time. . . . It is the language of Christ and His contemporaries." The ancient Syrian translators of the Gospels recognised their own tongue in the Aramaic words and sentences written in Greek letters, and transcribed them in Syriac letters either altogether unchanged (Mark v. 41), or with merely a slight change of form (Mark xv. 34), so that it was possible for them to dispense with almost all the remarks in the Gospels referring to translation. S¹, who was later than Ss Sc, was the first who quite often, e.g. Mark xiv. 36, John xx. 24, took the needless trouble of preserving for the Syrians these remarks so superfluous for them.

5. (P. 4.) The Treasure Cave (Syriac and German by Bezold, German part, p. 29, also on the margin of the Syriac text) names as the original language of mankind "the Syriac tongue, which is the Aramaic; for this tongue is the king (ܐܠܗ being masc.) of all tongues . . . for all tongues on the earth have sprung from the Syriac, and commingled with it are all discourses in books." Cf. the Syrian Tatian's opinion of Greek, Oratio ad Græc. i. 26, and the writer's explanation of this; Forsch. i. 271 f.

6. (P. 5.) Concerning Aramaic in the Persian period, cf. Nöldeke, Die semitischen Sprachen, eine Skizze, 2te Aufl. 1899, S. 34. Among other proofs are the Aramaic inscriptions and papyri from Egypt beginning with 482 B.C. (C. I. Sem. ii. No. 122). Cf. Ezra iv. 7.

7. (Pp. 5, 7.) The heathen woman from the region of Tyre and Sidon is called by Matthew (xv. 22), in accordance with his antique style (cf. ii. 20 f. γῆ Ἰσραὴλ, and also the saying of Judah quoted above, p. 22, n. 4), a Canaanite woman; in Mark vii. 26 she is called, with reference to her heathen religion, Ἑλληνίς (see § 2, n. 2), to which, however, Συροφονίκισσα is added in order to denote that she was a Phœnician by birth and a Syrian in speech,—certainly not in order to tell, superfluously enough, in what country Tyre (vii. 24) was situated; cf. Lucian, Deor. concil. 4, where Συροφονίξ in contradistinction to Ἕλλην denotes those Phœnicians who spoke Syriac. The earliest writings in which Συροφονίκη is found are those of Justin; he uses it when referring to an administrative measure which had been passed shortly before, but which probably remained in force only temporarily, saying (Dial. lxxviii.) of the Damascus of his time as contrasted with that of the time of Christ's birth: νῦν προσενέμεται τῇ Συροφοινίκῃ λεγομένῃ (cf. Spart. Hadrrianus, 14, and Tertullian, c. Marc. iii. 13, who is here dependent upon Justin). Archaeologists fail to give this sentence due weight when they put the first establishment of a province of this name as late as circa 194; see the summary in Marquardt, *Röm. Staatsverw.*² i. 423 f. Cf. also the inscriptions from the time of Aretas (Haritāt) iv. published by Euting, Nabatäische Inschriften (1885), Nos. 1–20, or C. I. Sem. ii. No. 196 ff. Perhaps even as early as Nehemiah's time Aramaic in various dialects was spoken in Moab and in Ashdod, so that the speech contrasted with the "Jews' language" in Neh. xiii. 24 is essentially the same as that in Isa. xxxvi. 11.

8. (P. 6.) Even as late as the times of the Hasmonæan princes, John Hyrcanus (135–105 B.C.) and Aristobulus (105–104), the language on the coins is pure Hebrew (Madden, Coins of the Jews, 1881, pp. 76–83). Moreover, when Alexander Jannæus (104–78) ventured to have stamped, not only coins with a Hebrew inscription, on which he designated himself as high priest, but also coins inscribed in Greek on the one side and in Semitic on the other, on which he assumed the title of king, he used in both cases a purely Hebrew expression (Madden, pp. 83–90). Even his Aramaicised name אנא is replaced by the original Hebrew forms יהונתן or ינתן; more rarely ינתן.

9. (P. 6.) Aids to the elementary study of the Modern Hebrew of the learned class: Geiger, Lehr- und Lesebuch zur Sprache der Mischnah, 2 parts, 1845; Siegfried and Strack, Lehrbuch der neuhebräischen Sprache, 1884. Since the Greek ἰδιώτης, pronounced הַרְיוֹט by the Jews, denotes the uncultured in contrast to the scholar, i.e. to the scribe among the Jews (Acts iv. 13, ἀγράμματοι καὶ ἰδιῶται, cf. Artemid. iv. 59 = ἀπαίδευτοι), לשון הריוט primarily forms the contrast to the "tongue of the learned" (לשון חכמים) or the "tongue of our teachers." When contrasted with the Aramaic vernacular, this learned tongue and the Biblical Hebrew were regarded as forming a single language; so that the tongue of the "sacred language," or "Sursi" (p. 22, n. 4), which is but another designation of the same language, came to be contrasted with the "sacred tongue" in like manner (Jerus. Sanhed. 25*d*, line 8). At other times, however, the "tongue of the learned" was in its turn distinguished from the "tongue of the Torah," or Biblical Hebrew.

10. (P. 7.) We must not form our judgment of the actual relation between Hebrew and Aramaic even among learned circles from such dictatorial words as those of Judah the "nasi" (above, p. 22, n. 4). Among the good works by which a man earns eternal life, one is for an inhabitant of the land of Israel to speak the sacred tongue (Jerus. Shekalim iii. 47*c*, line 2 from bottom), which shows that this was no insignificant task. A very ancient commentary (Sifre, in Ugolini, Thes. xv. 581) emphasises the fact that Deut. xi. 19 speaks only of sons, not of daughters, and appends the remark of a rabbi, Jose ben Akiba (this should read probably Akabja, see Strack, Eintl. in d. Talmud, 84): "Therefore it is said, When the boy begins to speak, the father should speak the sacred tongue with him and teach him the Torah. If he neglects this, he might as well have buried him." A learned Jew in Palestine confessed to Origen that he did not trust himself to give the Hebrew names of things not mentioned anywhere in the Holy Scriptures, and that the most learned were in no better case ; but he held that it was over hasty to make use of the Syriac tongue instead of the Hebrew in such cases (Orig. Epist. ad Afric. vi. Delarue, i. 18).

11. (P. 7.) Josephus, who employs πάτριος γλῶσσα (Bell. v. 6. 3) and πατρίως (Bell. v. 2. 1), uses also not infrequently and with propriety ἡ ἐπιχωρίως γλῶσσα. According to him, Bell. iv. 3. 5, the name of a certain Jew in this language meant δορκάδος παῖς, "Son of the Gazelle"; hence the Aramaic must have been ܩܪܕܐ ܕܥܝܠܐ; cf. Acts ix. 36 ; Levy, ii. 134. Cf. Bell. v. 4. 2, ἐκλήθη δ' ἐπιχωρίως Βεζεθὰ τὸ νεόκτιστον μέρος ὃ μεθρημηνεύμενον Ἀλλάδι γλῶσση καὶνὴ λέγουτ' ἂν πόλιν. This name has been transmitted in very manifold forms here and in ii. 15. 5 ; 19. 4 ; v. 5. 8 ; see below, n. 15.

12. (Pp. 8, 10.) The Aramaic or Syriac (above, p. 4 f.), spoken by the Jews of Palestine, is called ἑβραϊστί in John v. 2, xix. 13, 17 ; for whatever the decision as to the correct reading in v. 2, there are Aramaic word forms in all three passages (n. 15). It is most natural, then, to assume that the same was true of the title on the cross, xix. 20. The ἑβραϊστί in John xx. 16, if its genuineness may be considered established, refers to a late Hebrew form. Josephus, too, applies the term Hebrew to both Hebrew and Aramaic forms without distinction : Ant. iii. 10. 6, πεντηκοστή, ἣν Ἑβραῖοι ἀσπαρθὰ καλοῦσι, Heb. ܦܢܬܝܚܝܬܐ, Aram. ܦܢܬܝܚܝܬܐ, a form which first occurs in this signification of Pentecost. Although the distinction between Hebrew and Syriac must have been perfectly clear to him from the studies of his youth as well as from the O.T. (Ant. x. 1. 2, cf. iii. 7. 2), he substitutes without ceremony Aramaic for Hebrew forms not only in σάββατα, πέντε, where he had been preceded by the LXX (above, p. 18 f.), but also on his own responsibility, as, e.g., when he says of the priests, Ant. iii. 7. 1, οὓς χαναναίως (better χαναναίως) καλοῦσιν = ܩܗܢܐܢ; cf. Siegfried, ZfATW, 1883, S. 50. If, according to him, ἄδωμα = "red," is Hebrew (Ant. ii. 1. 1), χαγίρας or ἀγίρας, "lame" (Bell. v. 11. 5), can also be called Hebrew. The "tongue of the Hebrews," in which a freedman of King Agrippa i. announced to that monarch in Rome the death of Tiberius (Ant. xviii. 6. 10), can surely be none other than that from which the Alexandrians borrowed the derisive term Mari for the same Agrippa (above, p. 23). It is the πάτριος γλῶσσα of the Jerusalemites (Bell. v. 6. 3 ; 9. 2 ; cf. c. Apion. i. 9), to use which is termed ἑβραϊζειν (Bell. vi. 2. 1). In this language Josephus had originally written his work upon the Jewish War, so that the Jews throughout the whole East might read it (Bell. i. proem. 1 f.). In that very passage he designates the readers for which this first draft was intended primarily as οἱ ἄνω βάρβαροι by way of contrast to the domain of Greek literature (§ 1) ; and it is not until § 2, where he speaks of them as dwelling in the remotest parts of Arabia and also in Parthia, Babylonia, and Adiabene, that he incidentally drops the hint that he really has in mind only his own people in those regions. But this implies also that the living language which he calls his πάτριος γλῶσσα (his mother tongue, as we would say) was in the main the common language of the whole territory described. To be sure, king Izates of Adiabene, a convert to Judaism, sent five of his sons to Jerusalem in order that they might learn there the language and culture accurately (γλῶτταν τὴν παρ' ἡμῶν πατέριον, says Jos. Ant. xx. 3. 4) ; but all that follows from this is that a Syrian from Adiabene did not speak Aramaic quite so accurately as it was spoken "among us" in Jerusalem, to use Josephus' phrase. Upon the sarcophagus of a prince, probably of this royal house, is a double Aramaic inscription (C. I. Sem. ii. No. 156, cf. Schürer, iii. 121 (Eng. trans. ii. ii. 310, n. 287); above, p. 22, line 17). This, then, was the πᾶριος γλῶσσα of Josephus, which not infrequently he calls Hebrew. The same term was used also by those Church Fathers whose knowledge of the facts cannot be denied. Eusebius, or perhaps Julius Africanus (above, p. 23), calls Matthew in the same breath a Syrian man and "a Hebrew as to his speech." The same writer calls the Aramaic Gospel of the Hebrews, which he had in his hands and from which he made intelligent excerpts, "the Gospel which among the Jews is in the Hebrew tongue" (Theoph. iv. 12). Jerome, who by copying this Gospel and by translating it twice had become thoroughly acquainted with it, and who has indicated with precision the character of its language (above, p. 23), calls it very frequently a Hebrew Gospel, or the Hebrew Matthew (GK, ii. 651 ff.). Moreover, the same Aramaic words and names in the N.T. which in the Onomasticon and elsewhere he declares to be not Hebrew, but Syriac, are yet called Hebrew by him quite frequently in other passages (above, p. 18, line 35 f.; GK, ii. 660). Epiphanius, who, as was shown above, p. 15, line 38, was quite able to distinguish between Hebrew and Syriac, nevertheless in the same passage in which he expresses the distinction, and immediately before he does so (Hær. lxix. 68, Dind. iii. 221. 26), classes both languages under the concept of the ἑβραϊκὴ διαλέκτος. Likewise in Hær. xxvi. 1 he reckons the Syriac ἑρ "fire," primarily as belonging to the Hebrew tongue, but adds immediately that it is not the "deep," i.e. ancient tongue of this name, in which the name for fire is quite different, but the Syriac dialect to which it bears this relation. Nevertheless he asserts elsewhere (Ancor. 2) that βᾶρ is a Hebrew word. As late as 600 A.D. or thereabouts, Joannes Moschus used ἑβραϊστί of the vernacular of Palestine (Prat. spir. 136, Migne, 87. 3000, in the old translation syriace). From all of which it follows that in the whole realm of N.T. and ancient Church literature the word "Hebrew" denotes the Aramaic tongue of the Oriental Jews quite as much as it does the original language of the O.T. and the learned language of the rabbis.

13. (P. 9.) According to the corrected text of Mark xiv. 70, the way in which Peter's Galilean origin was discovered is not expressly stated, since Roman readers, for whom this Gospel was probably intended, were unacquainted with linguistic conditions in Palestine; yet it is presupposed. And Matt. xxvi. 73 says explicitly, for the benefit of its Palestinian readers, καὶ γὰρ ἡ λαλιά σου δῆλόν σε ποιεῖ. This word is not like διάλεκτος in the ancient sense of that word (Acts ii. 6, 8); it denotes, not a grammatically and lexically separate language or dialect, but the manner of speaking (cf. also John viii. 43), and has reference to accent and pronunciation. Variations of this kind had existed from time immemorial (cf. Judg. xii. 6, and Theodore's comment upon it, Schulze, i. 337). The anecdotes in which the Galilean "dialect" is ridiculed in the Talmud, especially Erubin, 53^b, concern the pronunciation of consonants of similar sound (Neubauer, 51; Dalman, *Gr.*² 57 ff.; for illustrations see Fischer in his revision of Winer's Chald. Gram. 31 ff.). There is not a hint in the New Testament that Jesus caused any surprise in Jerusalem by His pronunciation, although, like Peter, He was looked upon askance as an unlearned man (John vii. 15) and as a Galilean (John vii. 41). With all due respect for the learning and thoroughness with which of late Dalman has been at pains to distinguish Judean from Galilean Aramaic, one may question whether the separation of the sources which underlies this work furnishes a sufficiently secure foundation for such an undertaking.

14. (P. 9.) The Aramaic dialects spoken by non-Jews (East Syriac, West Syriac, Nabatean, Palmyrene), which exerted an unavoidable influence upon the speech of Aramaic-speaking Jews also, are one language in spite of their differences, as can be seen clearly upon comparison with the High German dialects (Alemannic, Swabian, Bavarian, Franconian, etc.). Similarly a certain idea of the relation of Hebrew to Aramaic may be gained by one not versed in those languages, if he contrasts High German with Low German. In both cases there is a correspondence between certain sibilants in the one language and certain dentals in the other (High Ger. Zeit=Low Ger. Tid, lassen=lâten, beissen=biten, muss=möt; in like manner, Heb. זהב gold=Aram. זהב rock=אֶשֶׁר, אֶשֶׁר Assyria=אַשּׁוּר). The difference is much greater, however, in the case of Hebrew and Aramaic, for the reason that Aramaic has no article, and possesses only an imperfect substitute for it in its status emphaticus with termination in â (ܐܬܐ).

15. (P. 9.) In John v. 2 the name of the pool at the sheep-gate, which the MSS. give in such various forms, is not indeed translated, as in ix. 7; yet the remark is made that it is a Hebrew word, which shows that the evangelist reflected upon its meaning. But there would be reason and sense in his doing so only in case he wrote Βηθεσδα and meant this to be understood as בֵּית חַנּוּן "house of grace," "mercy." By a deed of gracious love, in imitation of His Father who is ever working (v. 17-21), and in spite of the Sabbath, Jesus gave true meaning to the name of the place, while His opponents, who lacked the divine love (v. 42), accuse Him on account of this as a Sabbath-breaker, but for this very reason shut themselves out from the sphere of His quickening activity (v. 40). This reading, which is supported by the Greek MSS. (with the exception of D and the closely related NBL), was understood as above by the ancient Syrians (Sc Sh S¹, Ss is wanting here), and was so transcribed. Concerning the variants in text, and the attempts, continued to the present time, to give other meanings to the names, see ZKom. Joh. (ad loc.). In any case, then, the name would be Aramaic. Likewise Ακελδαμα (so most authorities, אכר לרן S¹, Ακελδαμαχ B, Αχελδαμαχ D, Ακελδαμακ E), which according to Acts i. 19 belongs to the language of those in Jerusalem (S¹ "in the language of the place"), and in agreement with Matt. xxvii. 8 is translated $\chiωριὸν αἵματος$. The first part of the compound name לרן , used in the Targums to translate the Heb. לָרֶן , has no essentially identical Hebrew word corresponding to it. Klostermann, Probl. 1-8, refers the second part to the Syriac לרן "to sleep," and accordingly translates the word "field of the dead." But such an interpretation seems to have insufficient grounds from an exegetical standpoint, cannot be regarded as corresponding to Palestinian usage, and even though the χ at the end is probably genuine, cannot be established on the strength of that. Dalman, *Gr.*² 202, A. 3, cites as parallels Ἰωσήχ , Luke iii. 26, for יֵשׁוּ , the abbreviated Joseph, and Σεπάχ for סֵפֶר . Γαββαθα , John xix. 13 (written also, though less accurately. Feḏeḏa, Sh. aram. S¹ aram., Se Se are wanting), is probably stai (Neubauer, 50; Dalman, Gr., 1st Aufl. 104, A. 1, but aram. 2nd Aufl. 100, A. 4; Words Jesu, 6 [Eng. trans. 7, n. 2]). Alongside of this the evangelist puts λῑθόστρωτος (or -ος), pavement, especially mosaic pavement; and though, indeed, he does not give it as the translation of Gabbatha, he remarks that the Jews in their language call this particular mosaic pavement in the praetorium at Jerusalem, or any pavement of that kind, "gabbatha"; so that he must have in mind a derivation which explains this. He cannot, then, have been thinking of ṛi, ṛi (mass.) "ridge," "hillock," or ṛi "summit," or of ṛeṛi "haliness" (Dalman, Wörter, 6 [Eng. trans. 7, n. 2]), but probably rather on ṛi (to pick up, rake together straw, wood, vegetables, etc.), and substantive ṛi, ṛi (small sticks of wood and the like; examples in Jastrow, 204; Levy, i. 291). The signification "parquet or mosaic floor" would be natural enough. Γολγοθα, Matt. xvii. 33; Mark xv. 21; John xix. 17; in Sh. aram., written exactly as in Targ. Onkelos Ar. xvi. 16, the stat. emph. of ṛi "skull," corresponding to the Heb. ṛi, rendered easier of pronunciation in Greek by omission of the second r, and in Se S¹ by omission of the first. The localities near Jerusalem, Βεθφαγ, Matt. xxi. 1, Mark xi. 1 (f), Luke xix. 29 (Sh. ʾar. ṛi, Se S¹ without a, written by the Jews also ʾar. ṛi, literally "house of the unripe fig"), and Γεθσημαν (-α, -αῖ), Matt. xxvi. 36, Mark xiv. 32 (misunderstood by all the Syriac versions; it is ṛi ṛi, literally "press of the oils"), are by no means Hellenised by the appending of a termination, like so many names in Josephus, but are exact reproductions of Aramaic plurals in a, or i for in, and are treated as indeclinable; cf. Dalman, Gr. 191. Moreover, Ὀφθαῖ, Jos. Bell. ii. 17. 9, v. 4. 2, is Aramaicised. Of course, in addition to these there remained in use time-honoured names such as ṛi Isa. viii. 6 in LXX (N also in Neh. iii. 15); Luke xiii. 4; John ix. 7, 11, Σαλαδα or Σαλαῖα, probably written by Josephus regularly Σαλαῖα, so that he could decline it. Bell. v. 4. 1. 2. As for the name of the Holy City itself, the Jew, and especially the Palestinian Jew, save when he wished to adapt it to the Greek by transforming it into Ἱεροσόλυμα, probably never pronounced it otherwise than Yerushalaim, and certainly in no case said Urishlem, the pronunciation in Edessa.

16. (Pp. 9, 12.) No enumeration of the N.T. can be given here, yet certain remarks can be made which will be in part pertinent to later detailed investigations. We find old Hebrew names, such as Jacob, Johanan, Joseph, Judah, Simon, among Galileans as well as in Jerusalem and Judea. It may be that people in Jerusalem, like the historian Josephus, preferred the full form ar (Jos. Vita, 1; Bell. i. proem. 1, Ἰακώβος, like the patriarch, Ant. i. 10. 7, the high priest Joseph Caiaphas, Ant. xviii. 2. 2; Joseph the son of Kamil, Ant. xx. 1. 3; the father of Jesus, a Judean, in the N.T. invariably written Ἰακώβ); and that, on the other hand, the abbreviated ṛi (Dalman, Gr. 190, 175, A. 2) was more usual among the Galileans (Mark vi. 3, probably also Matt. xiii. 55, a brother of Jesus, Mark xv. 40, 47; Matt. xxvi. 56 another; Jos. Bell. iv. 1. 4; 1. 6, probably Ἰακώβ should be read, a Jew in Gamala; among the great rabbi "Jesse the Galilean"; but there are many others also who were not Galileans in the lists given by Strack, Find. in d. Talmud, 77-83, about a dozen). The Heb. ṛi is written ṛi as early as Sir. i. 1; 1 Macc. ii. 3 (alternating with ṛi, ii. 1, 65), and regularly so in Josephus and the N.T., a form identical with a Greek name of even classical times (Pape-Benseler, Wörterbuch der griech. Eigennamen, s.v.; Fick-Bechtel, Griech. Personennamen, 251), and which, therefore, could not have sounded so strange to a Greek as Συμεών. This latter form was used regularly in the LXX, is the only form to be found in many passages in 1 Macc., and was used sometimes by Josephus also, Ant. xii. 6. 1 (along with Σίμων); Bell. iv. 3. 10; used in the N.T. of the old man in Luke ii. 25, 34; put in the mouth of James, Acts xv. 14, and used by Peter himself, 2 Pet. i. 1, with reference to Simon Peter; used of a teacher in Antioch, Acts xiii. 1; of the Israelitish tribe, Rev. vii. 7; and once in the genealogy, Luke iii. 30. This form sounded more ancient and more genuinely Jewish. The ε in it was an attempt to reproduce the sound of the י, as in Ἑλ-ε-άζαρος, and the υ served the same purpose as in Συχέμ, Gen. xxxiv. 2, along with which occurs Σίκιμα, Gen. xxxiii. 18. In a family in Jerusalem the husband bore the Heb. name Chananyah, the wife the Arm. Shappira or Shafira (Acts v. 1). In the home in Bethany we find together names of most various kinds, viz. מרים, which the Massoretes (Ex. xv. 20) intended should be read Miryam, but which seems to have been pronounced commonly Maryam in N.T. times, and even long before that; for the LXX everywhere has Μαριαμ; and Josephus, after his fashion of adding an ending so as to decline it in Greek, has everywhere Μαριάμη (probably it is to be spelled thus with a μ throughout), only once Μαρία, Bell. vi. 3, 4 (Niese, vi. 201). The name of Jesus' mother, as one might expect from the antiquated Hebraic style of the stories of the infancy, which are the only passages where that name occurs frequently (elsewhere only in Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; Acts i. 14), is in the nominative (v. 1; Luke ii. 19), accusative (also Matt. i. 20), and vocative Μαριάμ; in the genitive, however, Μαρίας, in the dative once Μαρία (Acts i. 14), and once Μαριάμ (Luke ii. 5). Only once elsewhere do we find the latter form attested as the name of a Christian woman of the East (Rom. xvi. 6; see below, § 23, n. 1). All other Marys of the N.T., including her of Bethany, are always called Μαρία. Cf. Bardenhewer, Bibl. Stud. i. 1. 1-17, especially also 9, n. 1, 2. Second, the sister Martha bears an Aram. name which is quite common even in Talmudic literature (Zunz, Ges. Schr. ii. 14; Levy, ii. 234, 251), but which is not Hebrew at all, מרתא, "the lady"; cf. also Orig. c. Cels. v. 62; Epiph. Hær. xix. 2. Third, the brother has the ancient Heb. name אֶלְעָזָר in an abbreviated form then common, Αάζαρ (-ος), John xi. 1; cf. Luke xvi. 20; Jos. Bell. v. 13. 7; Jastrow, 72. It is also indicative of the language then in use that in the N.T. there are numerous patronymics beginning with Bar-, but not one beginning with the corresponding Heb. Ben-. In Josephus, indeed, except for Barnabazos, which was probably the Jewish way of writing the Persian Pharnabazos (Ant. xi. 6. 4), Bar- is altogether lacking also; but this is simply because he translates it by υἱός or παῖς, or else substitutes the genitive of the father's name. The Simon whom he calls the son of Gioras, Bell. ii. 19. 2, 22. 1, had, according to Dio Cass. lxvi. 7; Tac. Hist. v. 12, the good Aram. name of בן גורא, i.e. "son of the proselyte." Like this Simon, most if not all the bearers of such patronymics probably possessed in addition personal names of their own; see above, p. 16, concerning Simon Peter. This must have been the case with the many who were called Bar-abba, "son of the father" (C. I. Sem. ii. No. 154, and the list of the Talmudic teachers in Strack's Einl. in d.

Talmud, 2te Aufl. S. 88, 90). Thus the name of the Bar-abba in Matt. xxvii 16-26, Mark xv. 7-15, Luke xxiii. 18, John xviii. 40, was Jesus, according to very ancient tradition, which has been confirmed recently by the reading of Ss in Matt. xxvii. 16 (Forsch. i. 105, 108; GK, ii. 699; this treats also of the misinterpretation of the name traceable to the Gospel of the Hebrews to the effect that it meant "son of their teacher"). So the Barsabbas of Acts i. 23, who bore the particular name Joseph, and in addition to this the Latin cognomen Justus; so also the other Barsabbas of Acts xv. 22, whose particular name was Judah. Aside from the cases, which are quite frequent, where the former person is confounded with Joseph Barnabas of Acts iv. 36 (GK, ii. 562), the reading in both passages of Acts, just as in Papias (Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 9), fluctuates between -σαββας and -σαβας. The former reading suggests שבא (= שבתא Sabbath and week, see above, p. 19), to which Hitzig, Merx' Archiv, i. 107, called attention (though he himself preferred שבתא host); the latter, קטן "the old man," as Theodoret translated it even when a proper name (Hist. Rel. 2, Schulze, iii. 1119). Other instances in Dalman, *Gr.*² 180, A. 2. Opinions still differ widely about the second element of Bar-nabas also (Hitzig, op. cit. 106; Klostermann, Probleme, 8-14; Deissmann, Bibelstud. 177; Neue Bibelstud. 16; Dalman, Gr., 1te Aufl. 142, again differently 2te Aufl. 178; Worte Jesu, 32 (Eng. trans. 40 f.); Nestle, Phil. sacra, 19 f.), and the meaning of Bar-timai (Mark x. 46) has not been cleared up yet even by Nestle, Marginalien, 83-92. The evangelist, who here, contrary to his custom, mentions by name a person healed by Jesus, plainly because he was known by this name in Christian circles (cf. Mark xv. 21 and Klostermann, Das Markusevangelium, 222, 292), does not show the slightest interest in the meaning of Timai. Otherwise he would have translated it. He might have contented himself with ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Τιμαίου, just as Ss does on the other hand with Bar-Timai, except for the simple reason that such an expression instead of an individual proper name would have been as strange to Greek readers in a prose narrative as it would have been natural to Jews or Syrians; hence after the Greek words he puts the Aram. form with a Greek ending, thus making clear that this was a proper name or the ordinary substitute for such. Moreover, we do not know the particular name of the Apostle Βαρθολομαῖος (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 14; Acts i. 13, Ss שׁוֹלֵמַי בֶּר, Sh חַסְדָּיָה בֶּר, which may mean "son of Ptolemy," but which can just as well go back to a Semitic name, Dalman, *Gr.*² 176. In the writings of the oldest Syrians, Aphraates, 65, and the translator of Eus. H. E. i. 12. 3, ii. 1. 1, iii. 25. 6, 29. 4, 39. 10, the name Matthias, Acts i. 23, is supplanted by Thulmai). It is therefore very possible, indeed,—and a very simple putting of facts together makes it also probable,—that he was called Ναθανάηλ = נְחֻמְיָה (John i. 46-50), an ancient Heb. name (Num. i. 8; 1 Chron. ii. 14, xv. 24, xxiv. 6; in later times, Ezra x. 22; Neh. xii. 36; also Jos. Ant. xx. 1, 2; Jerus. Hagiga, 77a, line 8 from bottom). If this name was rare in N.T. times, as seems probable, it is the more easily explained why Nathanael, like Barabba, Barnaba, Bartimai, was, as a rule, called by his father's name or his surname. Σιλᾶς, also, Acts xv. 22 ff., is an Aram. name. Especially to be rejected is the idea that it is a contraction from Σιλονανός or Σιλβανός (so B in 1 Pet. v. 12), which would be rather Σιλονᾶς or Σιλβᾶς (Jos. Bell. vii. 8. 1, α Φλαουιος Σιλβας, whose name, according to inscriptions and writers, is spelled now Silva, now Silvanus (see Prosopographia, ii. 75, No. 243). If the names Silas and Silvanus in the N.T. denote the same person (see below, § 13, n. 1), it is one of the many cases in which a Jew bore, besides his name in his native tongue, a Greek or Roman name of similar sound. It seems doubtful whether there was a Greek name Σίλας. The writer finds it only in C. I. Græciæ sept. No. 1772. On the other hand, it is quite common among Syrians and Jews. It occurs in the form ܣܝܠܐ on an East Aramaic inscription as early as the fifth century B.C. (C. I. Sem. ii. No. 101, there derived from ܣܠܐ); in the form ܣܝܠܐ on a Palmyrene inscription cited by Dalman, *Gr.*² 157, A. 5; several Rabbis with the name ܣܝܠܐ Jerus. Shabbath, 5a; Sanhed. 26a; Tosefta Berach. ii. 10; Midrash on Cant. viii. 10, and on Ruth ii. 18; cf. also the proverb on Ruth i. 1 (trans. by Wünsche, S. 12). Σιλᾶς is written thus in Acts by S¹. It is the name of a Jew from Babylonia, Jos. Bell. ii. 19. 2, iii. 2. 1 f.; of other Jews, Ant. xiv. 3. 2, xviii. 6. 7; Vita, 17, 53; of a Syrian in Emesa in the year 78 A.D., Le Bas-Waddington, iii. No. 2567, Σαμισιγέραμος ὁ καὶ Σειλᾶς. But in seeking for the derivation of this Aramaic name we are not to think of ܣܠܐ "to send," with Jerome on Gal. i. 7 (Vall. vii. 374, and Onomast., Lagarde, 71. 16, 72. 25; cf. also the Greeks in the same work, pp. 198. 61, 199. 70), nor of ܣܠܐ Gen. x. 24; 1 Chron. i. 18, 24 (LXX and Luke iii. 35 Σαλα), with Zimmer (JfPTh. 1881, S. 723), but of ܣܠܐ, "to ask, inquire."

17. (P. 9.) Since names of parties, like most names of peoples, are regularly used first in the plural and only after that in the singular, this reason alone should lead us to say that οἱ Φαρισαῖοι is the stat. emphat. plur. ܦܪܝܫܝܐ = Heb. פְּרִישִׁים, and not that Φαρισαῖος is the stat. emphat. sing. ܦܪܝܫܐ = Heb. פְּרִישִׁי. This latter assumption is unlikely even for grammatical reasons, since the numerous names in αῖος (Ἀγγαῖος, Ἀλφαῖος, Βαρθολομαῖος, Ζακχαῖος, Ζεβεδαῖος, Θαδδαῖος, Λεββαῖος, Ματθαῖος), and also the national and local names Ἀριμαθαῖος, Γαλιλαῖος, Ἰουδαῖος, Ναζωραῖος, are always based upon Heb. or Aram. forms which already have at least i and more often ai or ay as their final sound, so that the appended Greek ending is not ios, as Dalman, *Gr.*² 157, A. 2, thinks, but os. On the other hand, a form based upon Perishā or Pherishā must have been Φαρισας, like Γιωρας from גִּיּוֹרַא, Χαγιδας from חַגִּידַא (above, p. 26, n. 12; p. 30, line 45); cf. Messias, Kaiaphas, Kephas, Sabas, etc. Inasmuch, then, as no Greek form of the party name but Φαρισαῖοι is to be found, we must assume that the Jews of Palestine, among whom the name arose perhaps circa 150–130 B.C., never applied to the party either then or later any but the Aram. form of the name. Essentially the same is true of Σαδδουκαῖοι and Καναναῖοι (if in Matt. x. 4, Mark iii. 18 we are to read this latter word = ζηλωτής, Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13), likewise of Ἀσιδιαῖοι, which does not occur in the N.T. (1 Macc. ii. 42, vii. 13; 2 Macc. xiv. 6), and of the oft-quoted Ἑσσαιοι. To be sure, in the Talmudic literature, which emanated from the circles of the former Pharisaic party, the name regularly has the Heb. form פְּרִישִׁי; but this is an affectation of antiquity which proves nothing when set over against such witnesses for the usage in the living language of the Pharisee Paul, the evangelists, and Josephus. Concerning the Aram. forms Μεσσίας, κορβανᾰς, χαναναῖα, ἀσαρθᾰ, πᾰσᾰχα, σᾰββᾰτα, which relate to the life of religion and worship, see above, pp. 18, 19, 20, 26.

18. (P. 10.) With regard to the three letters of Gamaliel, cf. Derenbourg, Hist. et géogr. de la Palestine, 241–244. In Jerus. Sanhedrin i. 18d (the meaning is essentially the same, though the order is different, in Jerus. Maaser sheni v. 56c and elsewhere), after some introductory words, it runs, literally translated: "Rabban Gamliel said unto him (Johanan, the priest and secretary): Write to our brethren the sons of upper Doroma and to our brethren the sons of nether Daroma: May your peace increase. I make known unto you," etc. The salutation $\text{שָׁלוֹם וְרַחֲמֵי שָׁמַיָּם}$ = $\eta\ \epsilon\iota\rho\acute{\eta}\nu\eta\ \iota\mu\acute{\omega}\nu\ \pi\lambda\eta\theta\upsilon\nu\theta\epsilon\iota\eta$ is repeated in all these letters, cf. 1 Pet. i. 2; 2 Pet. i. 2. It is only in the third letter that Gamaliel speaks of the elders ($\sigma\upsilon\pi\epsilon\rho\iota\tau\eta$), who had been mentioned also in the introduction, as joint authors with him of the resolution and decree. Dalman in Dialektproben, 3, gives a pointed text of this among other ancient documents.

19. (P. 11.) Aram. sayings of Hillel: Pirke Aboth i. 13, ii. 6. In Jerus. Sotah ix. 24b (cf. Jos. Ant. xiii. 10. 3) a supernatural voice which the high priest Johanan (John Hyrcanus, 135–105 B.C.) heard, is given in Aramaic, and on the same page it is expressly said of a word which Rabbi Samuel the Less uttered when dying, that this was spoken in the Aramaic tongue. Cf. the Midrash on Cant. viii. 10, translated into German by Wünsche, 188.

20. (P. 11.) With regard to the relation of Gamaliel the elder and the younger to the Targum of Job, see Derenbourg, 241, 243. Concerning oral translation in the synagogue, see for brief discussions Zunz, Die gottesdienstlichen Vorträge der Juden, 2te Aufl. 9; Schürer, ii. 457 (Eng. trans. II. ii. 81); König, Einkl. in das Alte Testament, 99; more details in Hamburger, RE für Bibel und Talmud, ii. 1167–1174. Even if the rules of the Mishnah (Megillah iv. 4) had been in force as early as Jesus' time, such a short pericope from the prophets as the single sentence which he read in Nazareth (Luke iv. 18–19; Isa. lxi. 1–2a) would have been read through in Hebrew without interruption on the part of the methurg'man (also thorg'man = dragoman), or interpreter, and only after that ~~was~~ done would have been interpreted, either by the same person who had read it or by someone else. The narrator had no occasion to mention the latter proceeding, since it always took place. If Jesus omitted translating the text Himself, so long as He stood with the roll in His hand (Luke iv. 16), He probably combined the interpretation with the sermon, which He gave sitting (Luke iv. 20). For later times, cf. Joel Müller, Masechet Sopherim Einkl. 24; Kommentar, 256. Naturally the meaning of John vii. 15 is not that Jesus had not learned to read and write (cf. the ancient apocryphon, John viii. 6), but that He had received no classical education, which, in the case of other men, was the presupposition of their public activity as teachers. Men wondered in Jerusalem as in Galilee (Luke iv. 22; Matt. xiii. 54; Mark vi. 2), though with very mixed feelings, at this gifted, self-taught man. There would have been no occasion for such wonder if His knowledge of the Scriptures had been as scanty as A. Meyer, Je u Muttersprache, 54 f., is disposed to represent it in view of the discourses in the Gospels, excluding the fourth and even such passages as Matt. iv. 1–12, xxiv. 15; Luke xxiv. 27. The question, "Where did He get this learning or technical knowledge?" we cannot answer by precise biographical statements. The narrative in Luke ii. 46 justifies the assumption that from youth up Jesus took advantage of every opportunity to acquire knowledge of the Scriptures with uncommon zeal. In the judgment of those who heard His discourses, and in the recollection of His Church, He was not inferior in this respect to the teachers who had the regular rabbinical training.

§ 2. THE GREEK LANGUAGE AMONG THE JEWS (N. 1)

That Greek was a cosmopolitan language at the time when the N.T. books were written, was due primarily, of course, to the rapid conquests of Alexander, and the long continued existence of the great empires of his successors; but it can be fully understood only when due recognition is given to the fact that the Romans, themselves nourished by Greek culture, united east and west in a world-empire. According to a law, the working of which may be observed in a variety of instances, great political changes work their effect upon language only gradually. In Gaul, e.g., complete change from the Celtic vernacular to Latin was not effected under the Roman emperors, but took place later under the Frankish kings. In the same way the Hellenisation of Asia Minor, which had been prepared for so long in advance, made its most rapid progress under the Roman rule, and the process was not concluded until the time of the Empire. Under the Seleucidæ and the Ptolemies the transformation of Syria and Egypt went on even more slowly than that of Asia Minor during the same period. In fact, Aramaic spread more widely and took deeper root during the period of the Diadochi than in the Persian period. It was not until now, indeed, that Aramaic became the common language of the "Hebrews" and the vernacular of Palestine; and even so late as the Roman period it maintained its position as the distinctively national language through the whole of the Seleucidan empire. Before the Gates of Antioch, "the beautiful city of the Greeks," as it is called in the fifth century by the Syrian poet Isaac, the common people continued to speak Syriac until the triumph of Islam. While the uneducated peasantry in general remained entirely unacquainted with Greek, many of the inhabitants of the cities had some knowledge of the vernacular. The farther we go from the capital, the port cities, and the highways of commerce, the less disturbed do we find the sway of Aramaic and the more superficial the influence of Greek culture.

Under the dominion of the Ptolemies and, afterward, of the Seleucidæ, conditions in Palestine were somewhat different. In these times the Jewish community was like a small island which was not only girt about by Greek influence, but frequently also flooded by waves from the two great Greek powers between which it lay. The community was isolated from its countrymen in Galilee and Perea, and surrounded by a circle of Gentile cities, some of which offered very little resistance to the inroads of the Greek language and culture, and others of which were founded or colonised for the very purpose of Hellenising the land. Names of Macedonian cities, such as Pella and Dion, east of the Jordan, recall the times of Alexander himself, while names like Ptolemais (Accho) on the coast and Philadelphia in the east take us back to the reign of the Ptolemies. South and south-east from the Lake of Gennesaret, the regions occupied by the non-Jewish cities, Hippus, Gadara, Scythopolis, and Pella, formed an organised district, which, in Mark v. 20, vii. 31, Matt. iv. 25, is called ἡ Δεκάπολις, from the fact that originally it was a confederation consisting of ten autonomous cities. In ancient Samaria, Alexander himself had settled Macedonian colonists; and it was made still more a Gentile city, speaking the Greek language, by Herod the Great, who rebuilt it when it was falling into decay, calling it Sebaste, in honour of Augustus, and colonising it in part with discharged soldiers. Of similar character were the cities Antipatris (Acts xxiii. 31) and Phasaëlis, north of Jericho, both of which were founded by Herod. Of course, one must not be misled into the error of concluding, from the names of cities found in Greek authors, from inscriptions on coins, and from traces of Greek religious worship, that the Greek language was universally spoken in the cities mentioned and in others like them, e.g. in Caesarea (Strato's fortress) on the coast and its environs. Unless it is further defined, the expression πολις Ἑλληνική cannot be taken to mean a city in which the Greek language is spoken; because to the Jews, who had been exposed to the seductions and then to the threats and violence of Greek heathenism since the third century B.C., "Hellenic" was synonymous with heathen (n. 2). Among the inhabitants of the cities so designated by Josephus there were strong Jewish minorities, and of the non-Jewish population the majority were "Syrians" by birth and language. E.g., centuries later in the Christian era we find large numbers of people in and about Gaza and Scythopolis who not only spoke Syriac, but who were even unacquainted with Greek. This was due not to a reaction from Greek conditions, but simply to a continuation of the conditions that existed before and during the time of Christ; and only because the old Semitic names of cities survived after they were given Greek names was it possible for these Greek names to be displaced again, as was done so largely in the centuries after Christ. In the thought of the Palestinian Jews, Greek remained a foreign language, or rather "the foreign language" (n. 3). But, in spite of this feeling, how profoundly were the Jews influenced by it and by the culture which came with it, even as early as 170 B.C.! High priests borrowed their names from the Greek legends, as in the case of a certain Jesus, who gave up his Hebrew name and called himself Jason; and of a certain Menelaus, whose Hebrew name we do not know. It was upon this disposition and tendency manifesting itself among the best classes in Jerusalem that Antiochus Epiphanes relied in his attempt to destroy Judaism. The Maccabean revolt showed that there was still vitality in the faith and institutions of the Jews, but nevertheless it was not possible longer for the Jews to keep themselves aloof from Hellenism. Men might fight for religious freedom with prayer and sword, but the measure of political independence necessary for the maintenance of this religious freedom could not be won and retained without the use of diplomacy. The ambassadors of Judas Maccabeus who appeared in the Roman senate in the year 161 B.C. could not use in that place any other language than Greek. These enemies of the Greeks, whose fathers were still known by the Hebrew names Jochanan and Eleazar, were called Eupolemos and Jason, and the former was probably one of the first Jews to write Jewish history in Greek (n. 4). As evidenced by their coins, the Hasmonean high priests, as they developed into worldly princes, allowed their government to become more and more Hellenised.

The first of them, Aristobulus (105-104 B.C.), who styled himself a king, and who was known also as a Philhellene (Jos. Ant. xiii. 11. 3), calls himself on his coins simply "Juda the high priest." In the case of his successor, Alexander Jannæus (104-78 B.C.), part of the coins have only the Hebrew inscription, "Jonathan the high priest," while others are inscribed in Greek, "King Alexander," having on the reverse side the words "Jonathan the king" in Hebrew. From Herod the Great and his successors only Greek coins have come down to us. The founder of this foreign dynasty, which came into power by the favour of the Romans and through his own cunning and violence, made no concealment of the fact that he felt himself more a Greek than a Jew (Jos. Ant. xix. 7. 3). His first minister, Nicolaus of Damascus, was a Greek man of letters, and his court consisted of men of the same stamp. His sons he had educated in Rome. His army consisted largely of foreign mercenaries, Gauls, Germans, and Thracians, who would not have been at home in any other than a Greek command. In the theatres, amphitheatres, hippodromes, and all those heathen institutions established by Herod in and about

Jerusalem, in Jericho, and in all the cities of the land, predominantly Gentile, as Cæsarea (n. 4), Greek was practically the only language spoken. If the Jewish tragic poet Ezekiel, whose old Hebrew name suggests that he was a native of Palestine rather than of Alexandria, really wrote his poems for presentation on the stage, his use of Greek iambs would show that all his conceptions of the drama were Greek. Even the rabbis were of the opinion that Greek was the proper language for "Song" and all poetry intended for entertainment and amusement (above, p. 22, n. 4). The system established in 6 A.D., by which Judea and Samaria were put directly under Roman rule, and, with a brief interruption, governed by Roman procurators residing in Cæsarea until the fall of Jerusalem, far from checking further inroads of the Greek language, tended rather to increase its influence. According to Josephus (c. Apion. i. 9), he himself was the only man in the Roman army at the time of the Jewish War who understood the Jewish deserters. While the Herodian princes were Jews, at least to the extent that they understood the vernacular, the Roman officials, changing frequently as they did, never took the trouble to familiarise themselves with the language of the people. Here, as everywhere else in the East, they used Greek in their official relations. Many Latin names of objects may have been more commonly used in Palestine than previously, and may have passed over into the vernacular as foreign words. Undoubtedly also, out of deference to the ruling nation, public notices were sometimes written in Latin as well as Greek (n. 5). But this had no more practical use in Palestine than did the Latin inscriptions upon monuments and milestones in Asia Minor and other lands in the East. Greek was the only language that could be used as a medium of communication among the different bodies of soldiers who maintained the Roman authority in Palestine, representing as they did such a variety of nationalities (n. 6). Though the tax-gatherers and their subordinates may have been native Jews in the Roman districts (Luke xix. 2-9; Jos. Bell. ii. 14. 4) as well as in the domain of Herod Antipas (Mark ii. 14; Matt. ix. 9), all their business intercourse with their superiors in Caesarea had to be carried on in Greek.

But foreign rule, which in one form or another had burdened the land of the Jews for centuries, was not the only agency by which Greek thought and life were introduced. Jerusalem was the metropolis of Judaism the world over, including the "Greek diaspora." Among the embassies who brought tithes and offerings to the temple at Jerusalem from all parts of the world, and among the pilgrims who streamed thither of their own accord, especially at the time of the great pilgrim feasts, there were not a few Jews who, during their long residence abroad, had entirely or largely forgotten their native tongue and exchanged it for Greek. Among these pilgrims there were also Greeks and Hellenised barbarians, who, though they had not espoused Judaism formally and fully by accepting the rite of circumcision, were nevertheless attracted by its faith and worship, and attended the temple services in so far as these were open to them (n. 7). There were also a great many Jews from outside Palestine who had come to reside permanently in Jerusalem in order that they might be near the temple, and that they might end their days in the holy city, and be buried in the "land of Israel." Those who had grown accustomed to use the Greek language found no occasion in Jerusalem to give it up. Jews of this sort were called "Hellenists" in contrast to the "Hebrews," i.e. those who remained in the land of their birth and retained the Aramaic vernacular (n. 8). This unwillingness on the part of the Hellenists to give up their language is the chief reason why they had their own synagogues in Jerusalem. Two such are fairly distinguished in Acts vi. 9, — one whose adherents were Hellenists from Alexandria, Cyrene, and Rome ; the other made up of Jews from Asia Minor, especially from the provinces of Cilicia and Asia (n. 8). They would not have grouped themselves together in this way according to the countries from which they came, nor would they have been called Hellenists, if they had not insisted upon the retention in these synagogues at Jerusalem of the Greek form of worship and the Greek translation of the O. T., the Septuagint, to which they had become accustomed in the foreign lands in which they had made their homes. The Pharisees and rabbis could make no objection to this use of a foreign language, because these Hellenists, whose settlement in Jerusalem was due mainly to their genuine Jewish piety, were among the most zealous members of the community in the fulfilment of their religious and ceremonial obligations. The useless zeal of the rabbis for the sacred language was directed not against Greek, but against Aramaic as used by the common people (n. 9). Greek was spoken even in the more prominent rabbinic families ; and the law at one time enacted, that sons should not be taught Greek, was one of those renunciations which betray the peculiar earnestness of the times and the anxiety to preserve everything essential to the national good.

This leads to the consideration of the question, how far knowledge of Greek had spread among the middle and lower classes. That a considerable number of Palestinian Jews who came in contact with public life and were engaged in business generally belonged to these classes, is clear from the historical facts and conditions already mentioned. That this must have been the case becomes evident, when it is recalled how small the region was which was occupied more or less exclusively by Jews. It required only a day's journey, or a little more, in almost any direction from Jerusalem, to reach cities where more Greek than Aramaic was spoken. And in Galilee especially similar conditions must have existed all the way from Cæsarea on the coast to Cæsarea Philippi, which are to be met anywhere to-day near the language boundaries, where numbers of people are to be found who, though otherwise uneducated, are able to make themselves fairly well understood in two languages. And it is hardly necessary to appeal to similar conditions in modern times to prove that the cosmopolitan language, without which no Jew belonging to the better social classes could get along, had everywhere an advantage over the Aramaic vernacular, which no Greek or Roman needed to take the trouble to learn. Representatives of the common people, like the apostles Andrew and Philip, must have been called by these Greek names in ordinary life; otherwise the Hebrew names by which also they may have been known would somewhere crop out (n. 10). The Aramaic vernacular and the Hebrew used by the learned classes were full of words borrowed from the Greek, and included also the Latin terms with which the Jews in Palestine became familiar through contact with Greeks and with Greek-speaking officials, countrymen, and neighbours. In particular, technical terms of a legal character were probably for the most part Greek, but in everyday life and social intercourse also objects and relations were very commonly designated by Greek and Latin words. By reason of the ability of the Jews to adopt these foreign words into their speech through various devices, and even to form new verbs, Semitic in form, from Greek substantives, the common people were not at all conscious that these new elements in the language were foreign. Undoubtedly there were many such foreign words in the Aramaic spoken by Jesus. Words like συνέδριον, διαθήκη, παράκλητος, κύριε (as address), δηνάριον, ἄσάριον, κοδράντης, πανδοκεύς, πανδοκείον, λεγεών, and many others which we find in the discourses of Jesus, are not translations made by the evangelists, but were spoken by Jesus Himself, modified as they would be by a Jew, the evangelists simply restoring the original sounds and characters (n. 11). Besides, Jesus and His disciples must have been able when occasion required to reply in Greek when they were addressed in this language. Persons who would hardly have been called Greeks if they had spoken Aramaic like the Jews, nevertheless make request directly of the two disciples with Greek names that they may see Jesus personally (John xii. 21). Of Pilate's transactions with the representatives of the Sanhedrin who remained outside the pretorium, and with Jesus who was taken inside the pretorium, we have different and comparatively full accounts. If, as certainly was the case, Greek was used in the first transaction, there could not fail to be some hint of the fact if, in the intercourse between Pilate and Jesus, they had difficulty in understanding each other, or if an interpreter had been necessary. While the commander of the Roman garrison was surprised because Paul, whom he took for an uneducated Egyptian, understood Greek, the populace were surprised when Paul addressed them in their native Aramaic (Acts xxi. 37-xxii. 2; cf. above, p. 11). Even before he began to speak an expectant stillness fell over the crowd. Had he spoken Greek, as the crowd expected he would, it would not have been altogether without point; he would have been understood not only by the pilgrims of the Greek diaspora who had come to the feast (xxi. 27), but also by many of the natives of Jerusalem. But it is easy to understand why attention increased when Paul addressed them in the vernacular as "brethren and fathers." Even visiting Hellenists and Hellenists settled in Jerusalem who understood only with difficulty, some of them not at all, must have been touched sympathetically by this expression of genuine Israelitish thought and spirit. If only it be kept clearly in mind that Aramaic was the language ordinarily used by the Jews living within the bounds of Palestine proper, one can hardly go too far in the assumption of a certain practical familiarity with Greek, not only in Galilee, but also in Jerusalem; not only among the better classes, but in the middle and lower ranks of society as well (n. 9, end).

In this regard, the position of the early Church in Jerusalem was a peculiar one. According to the notices of Acts, which are the only sources we have, the membership of the Church from the start consisted predominantly of Hellenists (n. 8, 12). The first three thousand converts (Acts ii. 41) to gather about the personal disciples of Jesus, who were mainly Galileans, were not natives of Jerusalem and Palestine. From the names of their home countries one must infer that the language "in which most of them were born" was Greek. It is probable that the later accessions to the Church were largely from the native population, and that the Hellenists were already in the minority when they made complaint that their widows were not treated in the same way as the widows of the Hebrews (Acts vi. 1). But that they still constituted a considerable portion of the Church it is fair to infer from the fact that, of the seven men who as a result of this complaint were intrusted with the care of the funds for the widows and the poor, one was a proselyte from Antioch, and that no one of the seven has a Hebrew name. Though the Church was scattered after the death of Stephen, as soon as peace was restored, and the Church could reassemble in Jerusalem, many of the refugees came back; and then, as before, the Jerusalem Church was the mother Church of Christianity. And in this Church more than one language was and continued to be used. Of the fugitives who testified their faith wherever they went, and gathered the nuclei of new Churches, persons from Cyrene and Cyprus are distinguished as the most courageous (Acts xi. 19-21). The fact that it was in Antioch that they first ventured to preach the gospel to the Greeks as well as to the Hebrews, is proof that they themselves were Hellenists, or, to put it less strongly, Jews who were familiar with the Greek language. In the most important cities lying on the route from Jerusalem to Antioch, where primarily as a result of this dispersion Jewish Christian Churches were established, as in Cæsarea (Acts viii. 40, x., 1 ff., xxi. 8), Ptolemais, and Tyre (xxi. 4-7), though the members were Jewish Christians, Greek was spoken quite as much as was Aramaic (Syriac). In the cities of Cyprus and in Antioch, Greek was universally used. So that, even before the beginning of Paul's missionary work, Greek had a wide use in the Church, in spite of the fact that as yet its membership consisted almost entirely of native Jews. Nor is there any reason to assume, what is not suggested in the tradition, that at that time the Hebrews opposed this development, which had its origin in the nature of existing conditions, and which was destined to become more and more marked with the growth of the Church. People who boasted proudly that they were Hebrews (2 Cor. xi. 22) nevertheless found shortly afterwards a fruitful field for their propaganda in the Greek Churches of Asia Minor and Greece. It was not until after the last struggles with the Romans in 66-70, 116, and 133, that the Palestinian Jews made serious efforts to get rid of the Greek language (above, p. 40; below, n. 9). Likewise the strenuousness with which the Nazarite communities, described to us by Epiphanius and Jerome, restricted themselves in life and worship to national customs and the national language (above, p. 13), is to be explained from circumstances connected with the final catastrophe in the history of Jerusalem and of the Jewish nation. Their exile from the city was due to the enactments of Hadrian, who transformed Jerusalem into a heathen city, calling it Ælia Capitolina. In order to retain their nationality, they tore themselves away from Jerusalem, thereby severing all connection not only with the Gentile Christian Churches, but also with the Hellenistic branch of the Jewish Christian Church. But in the apostolic age the Church in Jerusalem and throughout Palestine was comprised to such an extent of both Hellenists and Hebrews, and these were so closely united, that the only evidences in our sources of the existence of this difference of language are incidental references to the fact. It is clear that the leaders and teachers of the Palestinian Church were the ones who were most concerned with this condition of affairs. Men like James, who for at least twenty years presided over the bilingual mother Church, and Philip, residing permanently as he did in Cæsarea, the population of which was principally Gentile and half Greek, also the apostles Peter and John, who at first served both the Hellenists and the Hebrews in the Jerusalem Church as preachers and as ministers to the poor, and who laboured later as superintendents of the Churches scattered throughout the regions around Jerusalem, and as missionary preachers in Palestine and adjoining districts (Acts ii. 42, vi. 2, viii. 14-25, ix. 32-xi. 18, xii. 17; Gal. ii. 11; 1 Cor. ix. 5),—no one of these could have fulfilled even the immediate duties involved by his office, to say nothing whatever of that extension of their apostolic work which they had in view outside of their own country and nation, without a good deal of readiness in speaking Greek. How much knowledge of Greek they had before they became disciples of Jesus and entered the service of the Church, how much ability they had for acquiring language, which ability may have differed in the individual cases, and whether they made special effort to perfect themselves in the language, we do not know. But the supposition that twenty or thirty years after Jesus' death these men were still the purist "Hebrews," unable to read a Greek book, to write a letter in Greek, or to address Greeks or Hellenists without the aid of an interpreter, has against it both the general conditions existing in Palestine at the time, and the peculiar position that these men occupied.

Reference has already been made more than once to the language conditions of the Jewish diaspora in the apostolic age. There is no doubt that the Jews in Egypt, where their number was estimated at a million, in Asia Minor, in the European provinces, and in Rome, used the Greek language in their daily intercourse and in their religious services, and that this was really the only language with which they were familiar. For proof we have only to remind ourselves of the Alexandrian translation of the O.T., which from the legendary accounts of its origin is called the Septuagint; of such pieces of writing as the preface with which the grandson of Jesus Sirach introduced the Greek translation which he had made of his grandfather's proverbs to the Jews in Egypt; of an author like Philo of Alexandria, who considered himself a Greek in language and training, contrasting himself in this regard with the Hebrews; and of the inscriptions found upon Jewish tombs in Rome (n. 13). The Hellenisation of the "diaspora of the Greeks," which was now practically complete, and which had taken place in many cases with surprising rapidity, will seem less strange when we recall that the vast majority of Jewish emigrants did not leave the "land of Israel" until after Aramaic had displaced the old sacred language in Palestine. Certainly the Jews in Alexandria who translated the O.T. into Greek still retained a respectable linguistic knowledge of the original; but that their native tongue was not the Hebrew of the O.T., which they could read tolerably well, but Aramaic, which they found used also in several chapters of the O.T., is proved by their transcriptions of Hebrew technical terms and not a few translations of single words. What was true of these scholars must have been much more true of the uneducated mass of the Jews in the diaspora. Their knowledge of Hebrew was originally limited to their recollection of a number (certainly of many) of liturgical passages which they understood only imperfectly. By the second generation this knowledge was likely to have dwindled to a few Hebrew words such as are found upon Jewish gravestones, the inscriptions otherwise being in Greek. The Aramaic colloquial, which the first generation brought with them from Palestine, was all the more easily and completely exchanged by the second generation, born abroad, for the cosmopolitan Greek without which they could not get along, because even among Jews in the East, who used Aramaic as their regular language and continued to do so, it was not regarded with any special reverence (above, pp. 5 f., 22). Aramaic was not a sacred language through which the pious Jew could gain access to the sources of his religion, and it was only in the far East that it was a language of common intercourse. Now essentially the same causes which led to the substitution of Aramaic for Hebrew among the Jews in the East, produced the Hellenisation of the Jews in Egypt, Asia Minor, and Europe. But, owing to the active intercourse that was kept up between the homeland and the Greek cities abroad, the return of Jews to Palestine (above, p. 39 f.), and the constant migrations from Palestine abroad, the extent to which Jews in the diaspora forgot their native tongue and came to use Greek in its stead, naturally varied very much in individual cases. The Oriental Jew who settled in Ephesus or Rome may very quickly have mastered Greek enough for practical purposes, but he could not at once forget his native tongue, and it would not be easy for him to learn to think and pray in Greek. This came with the next generation. One of the seven synagogues in Rome, the existence of which has so far been proved from inscriptions, was a synagogue of the Hebrews (n. 14). There can be little doubt that its adherents were Jews who had recently come from the East, and who in Rome were unwilling to give up the Hebrew O.T., the Aramaic oral translation and interpretation to which they had been accustomed in their synagogues at home. This synagogue of the Hebrews in Rome was the counterpart of the synagogues of the Hellenists in Jerusalem (above, p. 39 f.).

One case of the retention of the national language in the diaspora, and one of great interest to us, is that of Paul the apostle. To think of him as a Hellenist contradicts not only what is said in Acts xxi. 40, xxii. 2, xxvi. 14, but also his own very clear testimony. Twice with emphasis he calls himself a Hebrew (2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 5). He cannot have reference to his pure Jewish origin, since in both passages this is sufficiently described by other expressions (cf. Rom. xi. 1). Quite as little can he refer to the thoroughly Israelitish spirit or bent with which he grew up; Ἑβραῖος is never used in that sense, and in Phil. iii. 5 f., Gal. i. 13 f., his strong Jewish bias is denoted by other expressions, particularly by the reminder that he belonged to the party of the Pharisees. The only possible meaning left is that of Acts vi. 1, where the word is used in contrast to the Hellenists. In the Philippian passage, Paul calls himself a Hebrew when contrasting himself to the wandering Jewish Christian teachers against whom he warns the Philippians; and in the Corinthian passage when comparing himself to the followers of Peter who had come to Corinth from Palestine. He is a Hebrew in the same sense that they are Hebrews. The language in which he threatens them (1 Cor. xvi. 22, above, p. 13) is his own mother-tongue, and therefore also the language in which he was accustomed to pray. This is perfectly clear from Gal. iv. 6; Rom. viii. 15. The only word adequate for the expression of his consciousness of divine sonship, as this consciousness expresses itself in prayer before God, is the Aramaic child-word abba. He could expect only a few Christians in Rome, and fewer still in Galatia, to understand really what this prayer word meant; in both passages he adds a Greek translation. This makes it all the more certain that when he wrote the abba it was not with his readers in mind, but because, without reflection on his part, that word welled up with irresistible force out of the depths of his own heart. But the antithesis in both the passages where he so emphatically speaks of himself as a Hebrew is to be explained by the fact that it was with Paul's case in view that his opponents, especially those in Corinth, were boasting that they were Hebrews. In general, the Palestinians were disposed to look a little askance at their countrymen in the Greek diaspora, and the chief point of difference was that of language. So it is easy to see how the followers of Peter in their narrowness may have cast reflections upon Paul, suggesting that he was born in Tarsus, and that his many years of travel in Greek lands had thrown him out of touch with genuine Israelitish life, thus at the same time emphasising the fact that they had come to Corinth directly from the native land of Israel and of Jesus, and spoke the same language that Jesus spoke. So then, far from contradicting the statement of Acts that Paul was born in Tarsus, the emphasis and antithesis with which Paul calls himself a Hebrew goes rather to confirm the statement that he was born in the Greek diaspora, and that on this account his Hebrew character could be called in question (n. 15). In the same way his designation of himself as Ἑβραῖος ἐξ Ἑβραίων can be explained from the biographical notices of Acts. Inasmuch as he was brought to Jerusalem at an early age, there to be educated under Gamaliel for a rabbi (Acts xxii. 3), it was possible to explain the knowledge of Aramaic which he really did possess, and which could not be denied by anyone of his opponents, as one of the acquisitions of his student days in Jerusalem, while in reality he was the son of a Hellenistic household. But this is not a true representation of the case. His Hebrew character was rather an inheritance from his fathers. Aramaic was the language spoken in his father's house in Tarsus, the language in which his mother taught him to pray. There are other things also which confirm the opinion that his home was of this character. For one thing, his membership in the Pharisaic party was not merely in consequence of his training under the Pharisee Gamaliel, but an inheritance from his father and grandfather (n. 15). To be sure, Pharisees, like other Jews, sometimes made journeys abroad on various errands (e.g. Matt. xxiii. 15); but it is inconceivable that a Jewish family living in the Greek diaspora should continue for generations to count itself a member of the Pharisaic party. This party was kept up largely by its opposition to the party of the Sadducees, i.e. the high priestly aristocracy and their following. The seat of both parties was Jerusalem, and individual members of either who went abroad must soon have lost their distinctively Pharisaic or Sadducaic character. This shows that Paul's family had emigrated from Palestine only recently, and that it cherished zealously its connection with the home land. The first statement is supported by an apocryphal tradition (n. 16), the second by Acts. The father had given his son the old Hebrew name Saul (n. 16), and had sent him to Jerusalem in his boyhood to be instructed by the most distinguished Pharisaic teacher of the time. He had a married sister living in Jerusalem, and her son saved the life of his uncle by disclosing to the Roman commandant a plot against the apostle's life (Acts xxiii. 16-22). And later, in frequently interrupting his widely extended missionary labours in Gentile lands by journeys to Jerusalem, Paul remained loyal to the traditions of his family. It is very improbable that during the years of his residence at Jerusalem the young Hebrew, Saul, attached himself to the synagogue of the Hellenists from Cilicia and Asia (Acts vi. 9, above, p. 40; below, p. 60 f.). On the contrary, it may be considered certain that under the instruction of Gamaliel he became a more confirmed Hebrew, and made his acquaintance with the Hebrew O.T. Certainly there is nothing in his letters to prove the contrary (n. 17).

But even after full weight has been given to Paul's own testimony that he was a Hebrew, to the statements of Acts which agree with this testimony, and to the apocryphal tradition, the mastery of language and the breadth of view disclosed in his letters are by no means fully explained. He does not write Greek as a person would who had acquired the language with effort late in life (n. 18). Although he makes no claims to be an orator (2 Cor. xi. 6 ; 1 Cor. i. 17), and pays little attention to the purity of his diction, he does know how to use the language with versatility and effect. Paul was a man whose heart was easily moved and often deeply stirred, and there is no emotion which he is not able to express to his readers, as occasion may require, by delicate suggestion, in sharp tones of bitter irony, or in a full stream of irresistible eloquence. The most uninteresting material, such as the tedious details about a collection, disagreeable facts involved in cases of discipline, or the rebellious suspicions of persons greatly his inferiors, he is able to treat in so broad a manner that the reader is amply repaid for his effort to understand them correctly, although the matters referred to are no longer of interest. And when one takes into consideration also the dialectical skill which Paul shows when he attempts to teach, to argue, or to refute objections, it must be admitted by unfriendly modern readers, as by his ancient opponents, that "his letters are weighty and strong" (2 Cor. x. 10),—an estimate which is just as applicable to a short note like Philemon as it is to a lengthy Epistle like Romans. Paul had indeed a habit of frequently repeating certain words and phrases within a comparatively short passage, but this is not due to poverty of language ; it is to be explained rather by his indifference to elegance of style. In short, taking into survey all his writings left to us, the wealth of his vocabulary and the versatility of his grammatical constructions are astonishing. In comparison with his letters, considered simply from a literary point of view, the Fourth Gospel is monotonous and the Epistle of James is barren. From the Epistles, from the narratives in Acts, and from the discourses which the latter puts into Paul's mouth, we get uniformly the impression that Paul was a finely cultured man, thoroughly acquainted with the usages of Greek educated society. There is apparently no good reason for assuming, as some are fond of doing, that the knowledge of the poetical literature of the Greeks, of which there are traces here and there in the letters, was picked up from hearsay, and not derived from his own reading (n. 19). The manner in which he introduces the verse from Epimenides in Tit. i. 12 shows, better than would any mention of the poet by name, and of the work from which the verse is taken, Paul's familiarity with the traditions about this writer. It cannot be proved that the verse of the Attic comic poet, Menander, of which he makes use in 1 Cor. xv. 33, was a widely used proverb. In Acts, Paul is represented as knowing that the poetical quotation which he uses in his speech on the Areopagus (Acts xvii. 28) occurred not simply in one poet, Aratus, but in essentially the same form in another, Cleantes, i.e. "in several poets," and these poets of the Stoic school. Whether he was familiar at all with the philosophical literature, and if so to what extent, it is difficult to say. Certainly he studied the Greek O.T. with far more zeal than he did the heathen poets and philosophers. He is perfectly familiar with the LXX, and follows it in most of his quotations from the O.T. Indeed, he makes use of his knowledge of the Hebrew original so rarely that some have gone so far as to deny his acquaintance with it altogether (n. 17).

The question whence the Hebrew Saul derived all this wisdom it is not difficult to answer from the story of his life. Since his father could hardly have sent him to Jerusalem, to be educated in the principal school of the Pharisees, before he was twelve, and since also there is other evidence to show that he passed his childhood in Tarsus (n. 15), there is hardly any doubt that besides learning Aramaic at home he acquired at an early age a practical knowledge of Greek as it was spoken in the streets of his native city. He could not have failed to have occasion to use it even in Jerusalem. During his first visit there after his conversion—a visit lasting only fifteen days—he immediately had personal dealings with the Hellenists (Acts ix. 29), from which we may assume that even before the event which took place on the road to Damascus he had had relations with his Jewish countrymen from Cilicia (Acts vi. 9), although he did not belong to their synagogue. Being a Hebrew who knew Greek, he occupied a mediating position between those Hebrews who understood little or no Greek and the Hellenists who understood little or no Aramaic. But the most important factor in the development of this culture of which we find Paul possessed, is the fact that between his conversion and the beginning of his Christian ministry he spent at least five years (38–43 A.D.) in his native city, Tarsus, before Barnabas brought him to Antioch to assist in the work there (see Chronological Survey, part xi. vol. iii.). Since during this long period Paul was waiting for a new divine commission to preach the gospel to the Gentiles (Acts xxii. 21), undoubtedly he prepared himself for this new work. He had received scholarly training along the lines of Judaism, and nothing was more natural than that he should pursue such studies in the literature of the Greeks, among whom he expected to labour in the future, as seemed best suited to fit him for this work. For this purpose Tarsus was admirably adapted (n. 20). It was a prominent centre for the study of philosophy and rhetoric, and the citizens of Tarsus, unlike those of Athens, Alexandria, and other famous centres of learning, are praised for the very lively interest which they took in the sciences taught in their schools. Only rarely did students from abroad resort to Tarsus; while, on the other hand, many of the native students, not satisfied with the opportunities afforded them in their own city, completed elsewhere the education begun at home. In Paul's case Tarsus offered quite enough of literary information and stimulus to enable him to become a Greek to the Greeks, just as his rabbinic training received at home and in Jerusalem enabled him to be a Hebrew to the Hebrews (cf. 1 Cor. ix. 19-23).

The purpose of this text-book does not call for a historical, grammatical, and lexical investigation of N.T. Greek. At the present time, researches relating directly and indirectly to this subject are being so vigorously prosecuted, and consequently are in a condition so incomplete, that I would not venture in a compendium like this to set forth any definite results. Still a few remarks may be in order, so that statements about the language made in connection with the separate writings may not seem entirely arbitrary. As is well known, after the time of Alexander the Great there grew up a popular Greek, which in distinction from the various dialects, spoken and literary, into which the Greek of classical times had separated, was called ἡ κοινὴ or ἡ ἐλληνικὴ διάλεκτος. This language, based upon the later Attic, was used in literature and among the educated classes. The old dialects held their sway in the regions where they had been in use earlier; but there grew up also, as an offshoot from the literary language, a language used in daily life, varying greatly in the different lands in which it was spoken, but nevertheless taking its place along with the common literary language as a medium of general intercourse.

Only by artificial effort could its impure grammatical forms and mixed vocabulary be kept out of literature permanently. With this end in view the Greek stylists and their docile pupils had been endeavouring, ever since the beginning of the Christian era, to restore the use of the language in its Attic purity. There were those, however, more concerned about what they said than how they said it, who persisted in writing practically as they spoke. Such were the writers of the N.T. One principal cause for the continuous development of this living language after the time of Alexander, was the fact that of those speaking the Greek language there were ten non-Greeks to every genuine Greek, and of the former very many continued to make more or less use of their native tongues. In Egypt and Syria, there were some who spoke a mixture of Greek and their own language in their intercourse with Greeks and Romans (μιξοβάρβαροι). Others spoke Greek and even wrote it when necessary, but in both cases with gross violations of grammatical usage (solecisms). Then there were Syrians whose Greek style was not inferior to that of any native-born Athenian, e.g., that of Lucian of Samosata, whose native tongue was Syriac. Between these extremes were almost as many intermediate stages as there were individual writers. There was never any language that could be called distinctly Syrian or Egyptian Greek, although, just to the degree that Greek was a foreign language to the barbarian, the characteristics of his national language cropped out. This is true also in the case of the Jews. Certainly the manner in which they wrote Greek calls for special notice. For, although the Jewish Aramaic spoken at the time was not very different from the Aramaic spoken by Gentile Syrians, the effect of the O.T. literature and of the religious life inseparably connected with it was always to make the Jew look at things from a point of view distinctly national, and so gives an unmistakable character to his Greek style. And this was particularly the case when he dealt with subjects relating to his own history and religion. Even so we may not speak of the Greek written by Jews as if it were something uniform. For this reason the term dialectus hellenistica, which did not come into use until after the beginning of the seventeenth century, is not an adequate expression with which to describe the very complex facts in the case; and the number of different meanings which the word can have has given rise repeatedly to all sorts of misunderstandings (n. 21). The extremes of Jewish Greek are represented, on the one hand, by the LXX, including post-canonical books translated from Hebrew or Aramaic, such as 1 Macc., Sirach, Psalms of Solomon, etc.; and, on the other, by the writings of Philo. The latter wrote the current literary language, and wrote it just as well as did Clement of Alexandria who was born in Athens. So also Josephus' writings, thanks to the help of Greek correctors of whom he made use in editing his works, approach the κοινή of the educated classes. On the other hand, the Alexandrian translators in their effort to render literally the holy original, used language which was altogether inadmissible, and indeed impossible, in the speech of common life. Still even they did not try the patience of their readers with such absurdities as those of Aquila in the Christian era, who, in order to reproduce the two meanings of the Hebrew נֶסֶךְ , translated Gen. i. 1, Ἐν κεφαλαίῳ ἔκτισεν ὁ θεὸς σὺν τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ σὺν τὴν γῆν (Field, Hexapla, i. 7). Between these extremes, the Greek of the Alexandrian translators and that of Philo, were as many gradations of style as we find between the barbarous Greek of numerous inscriptions in Asia Minor and of various Egyptian papyri, and the Greek of the Syrian Lucian—with this difference, however, that in the case of Jewish literature it is possible to trace some little development. The language of the LXX must have exerted on the language of those who heard it from Sabbath to Sabbath a strong influence, comparable to that of the Luther Bible upon the language of the German people. The sermon which followed the reading and the synagogue prayers based upon the Greek Bible could not have been in language wholly different from that Bible. It was not without reason that R. Simon spoke of le Grec de la synagogue. Moreover, it is self-evident that native-born "Hebrews" who did not become acquainted with Greek until late in life would always have had to make an effort to think in Greek, and it is a question to what extent they really made such an effort. If a man like Paul, who was far more than a "Hebrew," continued to use Aramaic, even in his old age, when he wished to express his deepest emotions (above, p. 49), we must assume that the same was true of the disciples of Jesus. The use of the term "Jewish Greek" has some justification, though the idea may be exaggerated by association with the modern expression "Jewish German." Possibly there was a language actually spoken among Jews and Jewish Christians which with propriety could be so designated. But the writings which have been gathered up in the N.T. were all written under circumstances and conditions so complex, that the language of no one of them can properly be described by the single word Jewish Greek. And, on the other hand, there is no one of them, not even the two parts of the work of Luke, born a Gentile, the language of which is not consistent with the Jewish origin of every one of the N.T. writings.

1. (P. 34.) With regard to the penetration of the Greek culture and language into Judaism, cf. SCHÜRER, ii. 21-175, iii. 304-562 (Eng. trans. II. i. 11-148, II. iii. 156-381). A bibliography of the extensive literature on the character of the Greek written by Jews on the diffusion of the knowledge of the Greek language in Palestine at the time of Jesus and similar facts, is given by SCHMIEDEL in his revision of Winer's Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Sprachidioms (8th ed. part i. 1894), in the notes to §§ 2-4 and the addenda, p. xiii. f. Here belong also some works cited above, p. 14. Of more recent treatises may be mentioned: E. HATCH, Essays in Bibl. Greek, Oxford, 1889; J. VITEAU, Étude sur le Grec du NT (2 parts), Paris, 1893, 1896; DEISSMANN, Bibelstudien, Marburg, 1895; ibid., Neue Bibelstudien, 1897 (Eng. trans. of both, Edinburgh, 1901); ibid., "Hellenistisches griechisch," PRE,³ vii. 627-639; KENNEDY, Sources of N.T. Greek; or, the Influence of the Septuagint on the Vocabulary of the N.T., Edinburgh, 1895; BLASS, Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch, 2te Aufl. 1902 (Eng. trans., London, 2nd ed. 1905); ibid., Philology of the Gospels, London, 1898. Cf. also the brief remarks of Schlatter, Geschichte Israels von Alexander bis Hadrian, 2te Aufl. 1906, S. 22-28; ibid., Sprache und Heimat des 4. Ev. S. 7 ff. J. Voss, in his De septuaginta interpr. dissertationes, 1661, p. 76 ff. cc. xxiv, xxv, had contented himself simply with establishing the authority of the LXX by its use on the part of the apostles and the evangelists. But in his treatise, De Sibyllinis, Oxon. 1679, he went much further. He now made Christ Himself the witness for the authority of the LXX, p. 75 ff., believed that by Hellenists and Hebrews in Acts vi. 1 should be understood friends of Greek culture and genuine national Jews, p. 92 f., held that it was owing to a preconceived opinion that Christ and the apostles were supposed to have spoken Hebrew constantly and exclusively, p. 96, and in general unfolded a picture of the linguistic conditions of Palestine, according to which, except for a scanty knowledge of Hebrew among the learned (nor did he deny this wholly to Jesus, p. 94) and a mixed jargon of Syriac and Greek among the peasants, the ordinary language of everyone, Jesus included, was Greek. A hundred years later appeared D. DIODATI, J. C. Neapolitani de Christo Græce loquente dissertatio, Neap. 1767, against whom de Rossi wrote (above, p. 14), and a hundred years later still in a similar vein A. ROBERTS, Discussions on the Gospel: I. On the Language employed by our Lord and His Disciples (ed. 2), Cambridge and London, 1864. Such exaggerations are refuted simply by the facts adduced in § 1.

2. (P. 36.) 2 Macc. vi. 8, with reference to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, speaks of τὰς ἀστυγέιτονας πόλεις ἑλληνίδας, along with this vi. 9, xi. 24 of τὰ ἑλληνικά as heathen religion and custom; cf. iv. 10, ὁ ἑλληνικὸς χαρακτήρ; iv. 13, ἑλληνισμὸς καὶ ἀλλοφυλισμός. Jos. Vita, 13, uses the term ἑλαιον ἑλληνικόν of oil prepared by Gentiles in distinction from that which was ceremonially clean; cf. Ant. xii. 5. 1, 5, xv. 9. 5. He designates Gadara, Hippos, Scythopolis, Gaza as πόλεις ἑλληνίδες (Bell. ii. 6. 3; Ant. xvii. 11. 4, αἱ ἐν τῇ Συρίᾳ δεκαπόλεις over against πόλεις Ἰουδαίων, Vita 65, Niese 341, 349), meaning in every case simply that the majority of the inhabitants were non-Jews, and that the form of government was modelled after that of Greek communities. According to him, at the beginning of the Jewish War 20,000 Jews were slain by non-Jews in Caesarea (Bell. ii. 18. 1), 13,000 in Scythopolis (ii. 18. 3), 2500 in Askalon, 2000 in Ptolemais (ii. 18. 5). It was said of the Jews in Scythopolis (= Bethshan, Baishan) that in their pronunciation they interchanged certain Hebrew consonants (Levy, Loc. i. 224), hence they must have used "Hebrew," i.e. Aramaic, frequently, to say the least, when speaking to one another and to their fellow-countrymen. Josephus, in a passage where he has in mind the distinction between heathen worship and Judaism, calls the non-Jews in Caesarea Hellenes, Bell. ii. 13. 7, 14. 4, but remarks at the same time, ii. 13. 7, that the Roman troops in Caesarea, which for the most part were levied in Syria, and hence were composed of Syrians by birth and language (see above, p. 7), were of the same race as these "Hellenes"; indeed, he distinctly calls these non-Jews of Cæsarea Syrians in Ant. xx. 8. 7, 9; Bell. ii. 18. 1; Vita, 11; cf. above, pp. 22, 24, n. 7. With regard to the survival of the Aramaic language in Scythopolis and Gaza in Christian times, see p. 22. The Greek names of many of the "Hellenic cities," such as Gadara, have not been handed down with any certainty; others, such as Abila, Gerasa, bear their Greek names only on coins and isolated inscriptions.

3. (P. 36.) The subst. $\kappa\alpha\iota$ (related to the Heb. and Syr. verb $\kappa\alpha\iota$ Ps. cxiv. 1) when used alone denotes any foreign language, but in the Palestinian Talmud, in the passage about the four languages cited above, p. 22, and elsewhere (see Levy, ii. 515), it denotes without further modification the Greek tongue, so that the part. $\kappa\alpha\iota$ and subst. $\kappa\alpha\iota$ (properly = $\beta\acute{\alpha}\rho\beta\alpha\rho\omicron\varsigma$, 1 Cor. xiv. 11) denote simply a Greek-speaking person. In intercourse with Greeks and in books intended for Greek readers, the Jews were obliged to reverse the proceedings and to call themselves and their fellow-countrymen, so far as these spoke Aramaic and were unacquainted with Greek, $\beta\acute{\alpha}\rho\beta\alpha\rho\omicron\iota$ (Jos. Bell. i. procem. 1). A native of Jerusalem like Josephus could not indeed attain to such a degree of self-effacement as the Alexandrian Philo, who reckons himself among the Greeks when he treats of the contrast between the Hebrew language and the Greek (De conf. ling. 26, $\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\ \delta\epsilon\ \acute{\omega}\varsigma\ \mu\acute{\epsilon}\nu\ \epsilon\beta\rho\alpha\iota\omicron\iota\ \lambda\acute{\epsilon}\gamma\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota\ \Phi\alpha\upsilon\omicron\nu\eta\lambda\,,\ \acute{\omega}\varsigma\ \delta\epsilon\ \eta\mu\epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \alpha\pi\omicron\sigma\tau\rho\omicron\phi\eta\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$), and who highly praises among the merits of Augustus that he enlarged Greece by adding to it many Greeces, and that he thoroughly Hellenized the most important parts of the land of the Barbarians (Leg. ad Cai. xxi, $\alpha\phi\epsilon\lambda\lambda\eta\gamma\iota\sigma\alpha\varsigma$). Yet even as early as Aristotle's time there were fully Hellenised Jews (Jos. c. Apion. i. 22, $\epsilon\lambda\lambda\eta\gamma\iota\kappa\omicron\varsigma\ \sigma\acute{\upsilon}\ \tau\eta\ \delta\iota\alpha\lambda\acute{\epsilon}\kappa\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \mu\acute{\omicron}\nu\omicron\nu\,,\ \alpha\lambda\lambda\acute{\alpha}\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \tau\eta\ \psi\upsilon\chi\eta$). Cf., on the other hand, Jos. c. Apion. i. 11, and quite frequently.

4. (Pp. 37, 38.) Concerning Eupolemos, see the statement in Schürer, iii. 351 f. (Eng. trans. ii. iii. 203 f.). The identity of the historian with the one in 1 Macc. viii. 17 is opposed by Willrich, Juden u. Griechen, 1895, p. 157. The coins are found most conveniently classified in Madden, Coins of the Jews, 1881. Concerning Herod's troops, see Jos. Bell. i. 33. 9, 15. 6, 20. 3, 22. 2; Ant. xvii. 8. 2; concerning his military colonies, see Ant. xv. 8. 5, xvi. 5. 2; Bell. i. 21. 9. Concerning theatres, etc., in and near Jerusalem, see Ant. xv. 8. 1; cf. Schürer, i. 387 f., ii. 46 (Eng. trans. i. i. 432 f., ii. i. 32 f.); in Jericho, Bell. i. 33. 6, 8; Ant. xvii. 6. 3, 5, 8. 2. Concerning the tragedian Ezekiel (Clem. Strom. i. 155; Eus. Præp. ix. 28; 29. 4-12), see in brief Schürer, iii. 373 f. (Eng. trans. ii. iii. 225 f.).

5. (P. 38.) An instance in point is the title on the cross, John xix. 20 (Luke xxiii. 38?). Mention is made of bilingual inscriptions from the times just before Christ in Askalon, Tyre, and Sidon, Jos. Ant. xiv. 10. 2, 3, 12. 5. The case is different, however, with the inscriptions, partly Latin and partly Greek, which were placed upon the stone wall separating the inner from the outer court of the temple, and which forbade every non-Jew to advance further on pain of death, Jos. Bell. v. 5. 2, vi. 2. 4. The purpose here was a very practical one. The Latin inscriptions were to warn the Roman officials and soldiers. A Greek inscription of this kind was found in 1871, Survey of Western Palestine, vol. iii. (Jerusalem) 423.

6. (P. 39.) While an Alexander Jannæus was willing to have Pisidians and Cilicians but no Syrians in his army of mercenaries (Jos. Bell. i. 4. 3), the Roman garrison of Cæsarea, circa 66 A.D., consisted largely of native Syrians (Bell. ii. 13. 7; cf. iv. 1. 5, above, n. 2). A cavalry troop of the Augustans is mentioned repeatedly (Bell. ii. 12. 5; Ant. xx. 6. 1; cf. xix. 9. 2, according to which men of Cæsarea also served in it). We are not accurately informed as to the composition of the infantry in Cæsarea (5 cohorts, Ant. xix. 9. 2), in Jerusalem (John xviii. 3, 12; Acts xxi. 31 f., xxii. 24 ff., xxiii. 17-33), and elsewhere. The name σπείρα Σεβαστή (cohors Augusta) in Acts xxvii. 1 gives no information as to the origin of the soldiers that served in it. On the other hand, σπείρα ἡ καλουμένη Ἰταλική, Acts x. 1, certainly denotes a band the nucleus of which consisted of Italian volunteers. Schürer's argument, i. 462 f. (Eng. trans. i. ii. 51-54), against the historicity of the statement that such a band was stationed in Cæsarea at that time (perhaps circa 35-40) is based upon an unwarranted combination of data. The statement in Jos. Ant. xx. 8. 7, according to which in the year 66 not only the cavalry troop mentioned, but the whole Roman garrison of Cæsarea, was made up largely of men from Cæsarea and Sebaste, cannot be maintained in view of the statement in Bell. ii. 13. 7 (see above), and would prove nothing about the earlier time of Acts x. 1.

7. (P. 39.) Philo, who calls Jerusalem the μητρόπολις of all Jews on earth (c. Flacc. vii; Ley. ad Car. xxxvi), and who had visited it at least once himself (Fragm. in Eus. Præp. cv. viii. 14. 64, Mangey, ii. 646), speaks probably without exaggeration of the pilgrimages thither by Jews of all lands, de Mon. ii. 1, and of the bearing of tribute and gifts to that city, Mon. ii. 3; Ley. ad Cai. xxiii, xxxi, xl; cf. Jos. Ant. xiv. 7. 2, xvi. 6. 2-7, xviii. 9. 1; Cicero, pro Flacco, xxviii. Turning to the N.T., we find in John xii. 20 certain Greeks; in Acts viii. 27, an Ethiopian who apparently spoke Greek and read the Septuagint; in Acts xxi. 27, Jews from the province of Asia. Vice versâ, the central authority in Jerusalem, later in Jabne and Tiberias, kept in touch with all the Jews in foreign countries, and likewise with the διασπορά τῶν Ἑλλήνων, John vii. 35 = פרי שכיני, as it is called in one of the letters of Gamaliel mentioned above, pp. 10, 33 (Jerus. Maas. sheni, 56c).

8. (Pp. 40, 43.) In Acts vi. 1 we find the division into Ἑλληνισταί and Ἑβραῖοι within the community of Christians at Jerusalem; in Acts ix. 29, where the reading Ἕλληνας is not to be considered, Jews in Jerusalem hostile to Christianity are called Ἑλληνισταί. S¹ was right in the main in translating Acts ix. 29, "with the Jews who understood Greek"; Chrysostom was more exact in Hom. xiv on Acts vi. 1 and in Hom. xxi on Acts ix. 29 (Montfaucon, ix. 111, 169). The same name would form a contrast to Ἰουδαῖοι in Acts xi. 20, if it were to be read there; but for that very reason it is incredible that such is the reading. In Acts vi. 9 it is uncertain whether the author, in consideration of the fact that Λαβερτινων was a Latin word, prefixed to it τῶν λεγομένων, or whether we should read τῆς λεγομένης, which is supported by the most authorities. In the latter case it would be certain that two groups were meant to be distinguished. In the former case also this is the only thing probable, for otherwise simply καὶ τῶν ἀπὸ Κυρ. κτλ. would have been written instead of καὶ Κυρίκων καὶ Ἀλεξανδῶν. A synagogue of the Alexandrians in Jerusalem is mentioned also in the Jerus. Talmud (Megilla, 73d). Nothing seems more natural than that Cyrenians, like the Simon mentioned in Mark xv. 21, should have connected themselves with this synagogue. Allied to them also were the Libertines, i.e. descendants of Jews who had been brought to Rome by Pompey as prisoners of war and sold as slaves, but who afterward had been manumitted and made Roman citizens (Philo, Leg. ad Cui. xxiii; Schürer, iii. 84 (Eng. trans. ii. ii. 276). The thousands of Acts ii. 5 ff. also belong to the number of foreign Jews who had taken up residence in Jerusalem; for κατοικοῦντες, ii. 5, 14, not to be confused with παροικοῦντες (Luke xxiv. 18), signifies that they were permanent residents of Jerusalem (iv. 16, vii. 4, ix. 35, xiii. 27). This interpretation is but confirmed by the use of the same word in ii. 9. With reference to the language in the midst of which they had grown up, the Jews from Mesopotamia, etc., are called "dwellers in Mesopotamia" instead of "Mesopotamians," so as not to weary by an uninterrupted series of names of nations. The idea that at this time their fixed abode was still Mesopotamia, etc., is a misunderstanding, and is excluded by vv. 5, 14. Moreover, ἐπιδημεῖν (ver. 10), not to be confounded with παρεπιδημεῖν (1 Pet. i. 1, ii. 11, below, § 38, n. 4), denotes not a visit at a feast, but very commonly, as every lexicon shows, residence at home and return home, in contrast to a passing sojourn in a strange place. The attempt of Blass (NKZ, 1892, S. 826 ff., and in his Acta Apostolorum, Acts ii. 5) to omit the Ἰουδαῖοι in ii. 5 (following 8), and thus to transform the witnesses of the miracle at Pentecost into "God-fearing" Gentiles, i.e. so-called proselytes of the gate, is to be rejected. In ver. 10 it is said expressly of the "Romans" that they were partly Jews, partly proselytes (i.e., according to the usage of the N.T., of Josephus, and of the Early Church, circumcised proselytes of righteousness); but this also implies that all the rest were Jews by birth, and that it was only among the Romans that there were also certain proselytes. Without a hint being given of a change in the circle of hearers, Peter addresses them in a body as Jews and Israelites (vv. 14, 22, 36, 39), as inhabitants of Jerusalem (vv. 14, 29, ἐν ἡμῖν = in Jerusalem), as representatives of the Jewish people, among whom and upon whom Jesus had done His works (ver. 22), and who by the hand of the Gentiles had slain Him (ver. 23). For the author of Acts it would have been an insupportable thought that the hearers of the first preaching of the apostles should have been uncircumcised Gentiles (i. 6, 8, ii. 39, iii. 26, xiii. 46, etc.). Further, it is not demonstrable that εὐλαβεῖς, ii. 5, ever denotes, like φοβούμενοι or σεβόμενοι τὸν θεόν, proselytes of the second degree. These Jews who had returned from a foreign land to the home of their fathers are called "Romans, Parthians, Arabians," etc., just as the Jew Aquila is called Ἰουδικός, and the Jew Apollos Ἀλεξανδρεὺς τῷ γένει, Acts xviii. 2, 24. It is not their parentage which is stated in ii. 5 (this would have been expressed by ἐκ παντὸς ἔθνους or γένους, Acts xv. 23; Rev. v. 9, vii. 9; Gal. ii. 15; Phil. iii. 5; Rom. ix. 24), but the fact that they had come from the most various lands; cf. with reference to ἔθνος, § 21, n. 2. They were therefore native Jews throughout, and only in the case of the Romans is it remarked that there were also some proselytes among them. The only difficulty in this text arises from Ἰουδαίαν, ver. 9, for which Bentley, (Crit. sacra, ed. Ellies, p. 22) suggested Ἀσδῖαν or Ἰδουμαίαν, the present writer Ἰνδῖαν. For one of the motives for their return hinted at above, p. 39, namely, the wish to be buried in the Holy Land, see the instances in Weber, System der altsynag. Theol. 64, 352; for other instances of high regard for the Holy Land, 62 f., 192, 200 ff. All that has been said of the Hellenists in Jerusalem naturally has its exceptions; and it is also probable that Hellenist families in Jerusalem in the second and third generation again came to receive a Hebrew education. The family of the Boethusians, e.g., which came from Alexandria (Jos. Ant. xv. 9. 3), and from which five or six high priests arose during the last century of the temple, bears in its male and female members nothing but Hebrew and Aramaic names: Simon, Joazar, Eleazar, Eljonai, Marjam (Jos. Bell. i. 28. 4; Ant. xvii. 4. 2), Martha (Mishnah, Jebam. vi. 4). See the list in Schürer, ii. 216–220 (Eng. trans. ii. i. 197–202).

9. (Pp. 40, 43.) For the preference of Greek to Aramaic on the part of Judah the Nasi, see above, p. 22. In the portion of the Mishnah edited by him, Megillah i. 8, we read: "There is no difference between the (holy) writings (on the one hand) and the Thephilin and Mesusoth (on the other), except that the writings may be written in any desired language, whereas the Thephilin and Mesusoth may be written only in Assyrian" (i.e. Hebrew). Rabbi Simeon son of Gamaliel (the younger), says: "Also with reference to the writings, it has been permitted that they be written only in Greek." Connected with this in Jerus. Megillah, 71c, is the following: "Search was made, and it was found that the Torah cannot be translated satisfactorily into any language but Greek." In the same passage it is stated that the Greek translation of the Bible by Aquila had met the approval of the most celebrated rabbis of his time (circa 100–130). The fact that this slavishly literal translation was preferred to the Septuagint as well as the origin of this translation itself, rests in part upon the opposition to Christianity. There were no objections to the use of Greek in worship. There was seen in this rather a fulfilment of the prophecy in Gen. ix. 27 (Jerus. Megillah, 71b), and by a play upon words Ps. xlv. 3 was applied to Aquila, the most accurate translator of the Torah into the language of Japhet (op. cit. 71c). Although in Cæsarea the so-called Schema, the basal creed of Judaism (Deut. vi. 4–9, xi. 13–21; Num. xv. 37–41), was said in Greek, no serious objection was made to this (Jerus. Sotah, 21b, moreover the Mishnah itself, Sotah vii. 1; Megillah ii. 1). According to the express testimony of Rabbi Ishmael (Shekalim iii. 2), Greek letters were inscribed on the chests used for the offerings in the temple; while, according to Shekalim v. 3, certain tokens which served as receipts for gifts offered on the altar bore Aramaic inscriptions, cf. Joel, Blicke in die Religionsgesch. ii. 170 f. With reference to the Greek inscriptions of the Herodians in the Hauran (especially Waddington, No. 2329), cf. Schlatter, Gesch. Israels von Alexander bis Hadrian,² S. 26, 317, and also Sifre on Deut. § 33 (Sprache und Heimat des 4. Ev. S. 128), "Everybody runs to read a new δῶραγμα (edict)." In Sotah ix. 14 we read: "In the war of Vespasian the crowns of the bridegrooms were forbidden, and the drums. In the war of Titus (?) the crowns of the brides were forbidden, nor was anyone allowed to teach his son Greek. In the last war the bride was forbidden to go about in the midst of the town in a sedan chair." It is now probably universally recognised that instead of Titus we are rather to read Quietus, and hence to think of the Jewish revolt under Trajan, circa 116 (Schürer, i. 667 [Eng. trans. i. i. 286]). It is only of the ordinance which it was claimed arose in the last war, i.e. that of Hadrian, that the Mishnah says expressly that it was repealed

by the rabbis. But the prohibition with reference to the Greek language likewise failed to be maintained. In true rabbinic fashion, later writers used the letter of the ordinance, which speaks only of sons, not of daughters, in order to set it aside as far as possible. A rabbi Abbahu (circa 300) declares in the name of his teacher Johanan (died 279): "A man is permitted to teach his daughter Greek, since it is an ornament unto her" (Jerus. Shabbath, 7d; Sotah, 24c). To be sure, this Abbahu, who lived in Cæsarea, shows himself to an unusual degree to have been conformed to the world and open to Greek influences (Hamburger, RE, ii. 4-8; Levy, Verhandlungen der 33 Versamm. deutscher Phil. 1879, S. 81). The family of Gamaliel, which after the year 70 occupied an almost princely position for a number of generations, was pardoned for its diligent cultivation of Greek as a colloquial language just because of its social standing. Tradition is probably right in this particular, that the reaction against the adoption of the Greek language and culture is connected with the last spasmodic struggles of the nation to assert its independence. Even from the historical accounts all signs of this are absent before the year 66. Josephus, born 37 A.D., the son of an eminent priestly family, but not belonging to the aristocracy proper, had acquired, in addition to the rabbinic learning of which he could boast when only fourteen (Vita, 2; Ant. xx. 12), so great a knowledge of Greek in Jerusalem, that when twenty-six years old, without ever having been out of his country before, he could undertake a mission to Rome, and could mingle with the highest circles of society there, advocating his cause with zeal and success before the wife of Nero, Vita, 3. He also endeavoured to learn Greek from books, receiving instruction in grammar; but he confesses that the use of his mother-tongue hindered him from acquiring a correct pronunciation of Greek. In preparing the Greek revision of his work on the Jewish War, and probably also in writing the Antiquities, he availed himself of the assistance of several Greek literati, c. Apion. i. 9. In Ant. xx. 12 he explains that his education was lacking on this side, because among his countrymen a knowledge of foreign languages was not highly prized. Such knowledge was in their eyes something vulgar, being easily attainable, not only by any free man, but also by every slave who had a liking for it. It was only knowledge of the Law and ability to explain the O.T., in which few accomplish anything, that gave one a reputation for learning. According to this, it is a mistake to think that a knowledge of Greek was limited to the aristocratic circles in Jerusalem, much less to the scholars. Many a merchant and artisan probably excelled famous rabbis in this respect. Among the women, knowledge of Greek was at any rate much more common than knowledge of the sacred language (see above in this note, also pp. 7, 25, n. 10). Nevertheless it was expedient that Titus, when seeking to induce the besieged Jews in Jerusalem to surrender, should have treated with them through an interpreter (Jos. Bell. vi. 6. 2), just as it was also perfectly natural that Josephus should have used his mother-tongue when commissioned by Titus to address them (v. 9. 2, vi. 2. 1).

10. (P. 41.) Among the apostles, only Andrew, whose father and brother bore Hebrew names, and Philip have Greek names. Every one of the seven names in Acts vi. 5, among which also the name Philip occurs (cf. viii. 5, xxi. 8), is Greek; but this is explained by the occasion for the appointment of these seven men. "Hebrews" probably always had along with their Greek names Hebrew or Aramaic names, like the later Hasmoneans Johanan-Hyrkanos, Juda-Aristobulos, Jannay-Alexandros, Salome-Alexandra. So a Nicodemus (Jewish Nakdimon), perhaps identical with the one mentioned in John iii. 1, is said to have been called originally Bunay (Bab. Taanith, 20a). Latin names also were very common along with the Hebrew: Johanan-Marcus, Acts xii. 12, 25; Joseph-Barsaba-Justus, Acts i. 23; Jesus-Justus, Col. iv. 11; Shimon-Niger, Acts xiii. 1; Shila-Silvanus, above, p. 32, line 6. Even when we know only of the Latin name, as in the case of Niger, Jos. Bell. iv. 6. 1, Justus Julius Capellus or Capella and Crispus, Jos. Vita, 9, a Jewish name besides was probably not lacking. The Greek name Petrus (Phlegon, de Longævis, 3; in Josephus xviii. 6. 3 poorly attested for Πρωτος) occurs even in the case of Palestinian Jews (Jerus. Moed Katon, 82d, line 9 from bottom), but belongs to the apostles only as a translation of the surname Kepha given him by Jesus, above, p. 16, ZKom. Matt. 537.

11. (P. 42.) Concerning foreign words from the Greek and Latin in Jewish literature: J. FÜRST, Glossarium Græco-hebraicum oder der griech. Wortschatz der jüdischen Midraschwerke, 1890; KRAUSS, Griech. u. lat. Lehnwörter im Talmud, Midrasch u. Targum, 2 vols. 1898-1899; SCHÜRER, ii. 44-67 (Eng. trans. II. i. 31-47), gives a selection from the Mishnah arranged according to subjects, and DALMAN, *Gr.*² 182 ff., presents from the grammatical point of view examples drawn from the literature claimed to be Palestinian Aramaic. Greek and Latin words probably used by Jesus are, συνέδριον, Matt. v. 22, x. 17; Mark xiii. 9; in the LXX nine times, also in Ps. Solomon iv. 1; 2 Macc. xiv. 5, Jewish דין־דבר court of justice, especially the highest at Jerusalem; also title of a tractate of the Mishnah. Whether we should include here ἀντίδικος, Matt. v. 25; Luke xii. 58, xviii. 3, which is quite common in the Midrash literature, but which does not seem to occur in the Talmud and Targum, is doubtful. On the other hand, there is little doubt that he used παράκλητος, John xiv. 16, 26, xv. 26, xvi. 7; 1 John ii. 1; Didache, v. 2, πλουσίων παράκλητοι, πενήτων ἄνθρωποι κριταί; Clem. Quis dives, xxv, τὸν τῆς σῆς συνήγορον καὶ παράκλητον ψυχῆς; Heb. פִּרְקֵי אֲבוֹתִי Pirke Aboth iv. 11, "advocate." Here, as in the Targum of Job xxxiii. 23, the word is used in opposition to נִשְׁמָר = κατήγορος, or rather κατήγορ, Rev. xii. 10, a form which probably belonged to the Greek colloquial; a similar form is συνήγορ (= συνήγορος), נִשְׁמָר, which in Jewish literature forms the contrast to kategor much oftener than does peraklit, e.g. Jerus. Joma, 44b; cf. Krauss, BZ, 1893, S. 526. Among the Jews the meaning of the more infrequent peraklit has become broadened and is plainly treated as active = παρακαλῶν. In the Targum of Job xvi. 20, xxxiii. 23, the Aram. פִּרְקֵי אֲבוֹתִי corresponds to the Heb. פִּרְקֵי, which in both passages, even in xvi. 20, where it does not suit, the translator has taken in the sense of "interpreter, representative of another before a third party, mediator." Two Jewish translators, Aquila and Theodotion, render Job xvi. 2, נִשְׁמָר "comforters," by παράκλητοι, where the LXX has παρακλήτορες and Symmachus παρηγοροῦντες (Field, Hexapla, ii. 30). Thus Philo, Opif. mundi, 6, expresses the thought that God, without having been persuaded or exhorted thereto by anyone, bestowed the riches of His goodness upon His creatures, οὐδενὶ δὲ παρακλήτῳ—τίς γὰρ ἦν ἕτερος—μόνῳ δὲ αὐτῷ χρησάμενος ὁ θεὸς ἐγνώκτα. Less characteristic is Vita Mosis, iii. 14. Likewise Origen, de Orat. 10, treats the παράκλητος πρὸς τὸν πατέρα in 1 John ii. 1 as active, among other things paraphrasing it συμπαράκαλῶν τοῖς παρακαλοῦσι. Originally the word was not construed actively, but such a meaning grammatically is by no means impossible. To the examples in Kühner-Blass, ii. 289, should be added λαλητός, "speaking, able to speak," Iren. Fragm. xiv., Stieren, 833. Tertullian, who translates παρακαλεῖν by advocare, c. Marc. iv. 14, p. 191, παράκλησις by advocatio, Publ. xvii, and παράκλητος by advocatus, Prax. ix, found it necessary to form advocator, Marc. iv. 15, p. 193; Greeks, however, and Jews who used the foreign term παράκλητος, could dispense with the other form παρακλήτωρ found in the LXX. Jesus, who in John xiv. 16 applied the term to Himself primarily, had been up to that time not the advocate called to the aid of the disciples, but the teacher speaking to their hearts in the name of God, the interpreter through whom God spoke to them. After His departure this is the office of the Spirit, xiv. 26. On the other hand, it is the ascended Jesus who, in the name of the disciples and for their advantage appeals to the heart of God, intercedes for them, 1 John ii. 1. The extent to which the meaning of the word can vary is just the same in the N.T. as in Jewish writings. διαθήκη, Matt. xxvi. 28; Mark xiv. 24, Luke xxii. 20, cf. xxii. 29, Acts iii. 25, διατίθεσθαι, of testamentary disposal, very common in the form קרי or קריא, in the sense of a testamentary disposal of one's property in the event of death, as distinguished from מתנה, a gift during one's lifetime, Jerus. Pea, 17d; on the other hand, διάθεμα, which was uncommon even among the Greeks, or the verb διεθέμην (according to JASTROW, 294), which occurs in a saying of Simon the son of Gamaliel, was unintelligible to a later rabbi Joshua (Jerus. Baba Bathra, 16c, lines 17–19). κύριε as a form of address to a superior, Matt. vii. 21 f., xiii. 27, xxi. 30; John xiii. 13 f.; also the numerous cases where in the narrative Jesus is thus addressed. How common the Greek word was among the Jews is shown by the fact that קרי is adduced as an example of the corrupt pronunciation of the Galileans, in whose mouth it became כרי (supposedly = χείριε?), b. Erubin, 53b; moreover, in b. Chullin, 139b, we have even the doubling of קרי, which goes to show that in Matt. vii. 21 we have not a translation, but merely a transcription. Outside of the Targums, which are acquainted also with קרים ὁ κύριος, and use it even of God (Levy, Targ. Wörterbuch, ii. 360; *Dalman, Gr.*² 186), we meet with קרי almost exclusively, and that, too, in the vocative; but this is explained by the fact that the form of address κύριε was more frequently to be heard than the other case forms, and was the first to become common among the Jews (cf. Monsieur and le Sieur). In this it is like the Greek proper names, which as spoken by the Syrians were often in the vocative form (Nöldeke, Syr. Gr. § 144). However, what is found in the lexica under כרי (also = χαῖρε, χαρά, or χάρις), קרי, קרים, is still very much in need of sifting. πανδοχέυς, or more correctly πανδοκεύς, and πανδοκεῖον, Luke x. 34, 35, the former as פנרק (yet it also has the spelling of the latter in the Mishnah, Gittin viii. 9; Kidd. iv. 12), the latter as פנרק, פנרקה, פנרקה, were very common, as is especially evident from the further fact that even the feminine פנרקה = πανδοκεύτρια occurs not infrequently in the Mishnah (e.g. Jebam. xvi. 7), Targums, etc. δηνάριον, Matt. xviii. 28, xx. 2–13; Mark xii. 15; Luke vii. 41, x. 35, xx. 24, in the mouth of the disciples, Mark vi. 37, xiv. 5; John vi. 7, xii. 5. The transliteration כרי is at least as common in the Mishnah as the Heb. equivalent מ (examples in Schürer, ii. 54, A. 162 [Eng. trans. ii. i. 39, n. 161]); in the Jerus. Talmud

(also דִּינָא in an Aram. context), Targ., and Mid. the proportion is probably about the same. Also ἀσάριον, Matt. x. 29, Luke xii. 6, which as אִסָּר (אִסָּר) is very common in the Mishnah (Erubin vii. 10 ; Kidd. i. 1, etc.) and in all Jewish literature, was probably used by Jesus in this form ; probably also κοδράντης, Matt. v. 26, Latin quadrans in the form קִרְיֹנָס. It is not necessary to suppose that Mark of Jerusalem, who in xii. 42 writes for his Roman readers λεπτὰ δύο ὃ ἐστι κοδράντης, did not learn this last expression until he came to Rome, for we read almost exactly the same thing in Jerus. Kidd. 58d, שְׁנֵי פְרוּטוֹת קִרְיֹנָס. But, in any event, Luke, who in the parallel passages, xii. 59, xxi. 2, uses the purely Greek λεπτόν, which had not made its way into the Jewish vernacular at all, has not preserved for us, as Schürer, ii. 55, A. 169 (Eng. trans. II. i. 40, n. 171), thinks, the wording of the original written source used also by Matthew ; for this was written not in Greek, but in Aramaic. Elsewhere, also, Luke has substituted the genuine Greek word for the Latin term used by the Jews of Palestine ; thus φόρος, xx. 22 (xxiii. 2), instead of κῆνσος, Matt. xxii. 17 ; Mark xii. 14 (Matt. xvii. 25, xxii. 19). How completely the latter word had become naturalised is seen from the fact that קִנָּס, קִנָּס occurs mostly in the later and secondary sense of “mulet, fine,” that a denominative verb קִנָּס was in use, and that a Greek derivative form κήνσωμα, קִסְמָא, which cannot be pointed out elsewhere, occurs (Krauss, Lehnwörter, ii. 534, 554). λεγιών, λεγεών, Matt. xxvi. 53, cf. Mark v. 9, 15 ; Luke viii. 30, לֵיּוֹן, plur. לֵיּוֹנִין and לֵיּוֹנָה. Levy in both his lexica maintains that this has a second meaning, “commander” ; and on the basis of that A. Meyer makes bold assertions concerning Mark v. 9, 15 ; but such a meaning is incredible at the outset, since the Romans had no title of an officer that was formed from legio. When the word denotes an individual, we must either alter לֵיּוֹן into לֵיּוֹנָא (legatus ; Fürst, Gloss. 130) or understand a soldier (miles legionarius ; Krauss, ii. 305). A verb corresponding to ἀγαπεύειν in Matt. v. 41 (xxvii. 32 ; Mark xv. 21 ; cf. Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, 37 ; DEISSMANN, Bibelst. 81 [Eng. trans. 86 f.]) has not been pointed out as yet in Jewish literature ; but the substantive אֲהָבָה = ἀγάπη (Epict. Diss. iv. 1. 79 ; Artemid. Oneirocr. v. 16) is very common, and the Jews appropriated ἀγαπευτής also, which shows that these words, though derived from the Persian (Herodot. viii. 98), did not become naturalised among the Jews until Hellenistic times. The people were for the most part not conscious that such words were foreign, as is shown by the remark of the linguist Epiphanius that φοῦρναξ = fornax = κάμινος, belonged to the vernacular of Palestine (Hæc. xxx. 12). The Latin furnus, or even furna, in the form פּוּרְנָא, פּוּרְנָא, was common among both Jews and Syrians ; cf. Krauss, BZ, 1893, S. 524 ; Lehnwörter, i. 72, ii. 434.

12. (P. 43.) Concerning Acts ii. 5 ff., see above, p. 61. The half foreign character of the young Church in Jerusalem is confirmed by iv. 36 (Barnabas from Cyprus), vi. 1-5 (above, p. 63, n. 10), xi. 20 (Κύπριοι καὶ Κυρηναῖοι), xxi. 16 (Mnason, a disciple from the early days of the Church, from Cyprus). Perhaps we may reckon with these the family of Simon of Cyrene (Mark xv. 21 ; Rom. xvi. 13 ; below, § 22). The further growth is given in iv. 4, without a statement of their origin ; v. 16 mentions people from the towns in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem ; vi. 1 refers to the increase of the Church as occasioning the complaint of the Hellenists, in so far as they seem to have been forced by it into the background ; vi. 7 speaks of many priests, or more probably according to $\Sigma^S \text{ ὁ λαὸς Ἰουδαίων}$, i.e. Judeans, cf. Klostermann, Probleme, 13; cf. the variants in 3 Macc. vi. 1; further, Pharisees are mentioned xv. 5, i.e. certainly genuine "Hebrews," even if zeal for the law was common to all Jewish Christians in Palestine, whatever their origin or language, xxi. 20. What was said above, p. 44, of Caesarea, Ptolemais, and Tyre, is probably not true of Damascus. Although belonging to the Decapolis, it had received no Greek name, but had, on the contrary, a large Jewish population; according to Jos. Bell. ii. 20. 2, almost all the wives of the Gentiles were attached to Judaism, and in the war 10,500 Jewish men were slain in one day. The names Hananyah and Judah in Acts ix. 10 f. are Hebrew.

13. (P. 46.) Concerning Philo as a Hellene, see above, p. 59, n. 3. The question to what extent he and other Jews of the diaspora were acquainted with Hebrew (answered in very different ways, e.g., by Frankel, Vorstudien zur Septuaginta, S. xv. 45 f., who denies him all such knowledge; and by Siegfried, Philo, 142 ff.) may be allowed to remain unanswered all the more since the point at issue as between "Hebrews" and Hellenists is not a scholarly knowledge of Hebrew, but the practical use, either of Greek or of Aramaic, inaccurately called Hebrew (above, p. 46 f.). Philo, c. Flacc. vi, states that the Jews in Alexandria and in Egypt, as far as the Ethiopian border, were no fewer than a hundred myriads (1,000,000). Among perhaps a hundred and fifty Jewish epitaphs from Rome, there are, according to A. Berliner, Gesch. der Juden in Rom, i. 53, only forty in Latin, the rest—indeed, all those dating from the first three centuries A.D.—are in Greek. It is only seldom that the word "Peace," or "In peace," or "Peace upon Israel," is added in the Hebrew language and character. See the list in Berliner, i. 71–92, which is convenient, even if not satisfactory in every respect. For Aramaic forms in the LXX, see above, p. 18 f. No. 13. Here belongs also $\gamma\epsilon\omega\rho\alpha\varsigma$ for the Heb. γ = $\pi\rho\sigma\eta\lambda\upsilon\tau\omicron\varsigma$, Ex. xii. 19; Isa. xiv. 1; cf. above, p. 30, line 45. The translation $\nu\kappa\eta\sigma\eta\varsigma$ in Ps. li. 6, cf. Rom. iii. 4, gives to the Heb. נָּכַח ("to be pure") the meaning of the Aram. נָּכַח ("to conquer"). Other examples in Frankel, 201.

14. (P. 47.) C. I. G. No. 9909, also Schürer, Gemeindeverfassung der Juden in Rom, 35, No. 8—epitaph of a certain Salome, daughter of Gadia, who bears the title of a $\pi\alpha\tau\eta\rho\ \sigma\upsilon\nu\alpha\gamma\omega\gamma\eta\varsigma\ \text{Αἰβρίων} = \text{Ἑβραίων}$. Another epitaph, first brought to light by Derenbourg in Mélange Renier, 1887, p. 439, calls this same Gadia "father of the Hebrews" ($\pi\alpha\tau\rho\delta\varsigma\ \tau\omega\acute{\nu}\ \text{Ἑβραίων}$). For the interpretation given in the text, cf. Schürer, ibid. 16; ibid. Gesch. iii. 46 (Eng. trans. II. ii. 248); still more definitely Berliner, 104, who cites Neubauer also in support of this; while Derenbourg, who appeals to Jos. Ant. xi. 8. 6, etc., tries to make out that the Hebrews in and about Rome were Samaritans. Gadia (Jastrow, 211, גַּדְיָא II.; Berliner, 55) and Salome were ordinary names among Palestinian Jews.

15. (Pp. 49, 50, 53.) With this and the following note, cf. the writer's essay, "Zur Lebensgesch. des Paulus," NKZ, 1904, S. 23 ff. (among others against Mommsen, ZfNTW, 1901, S. 81 ff.) and S. 189 ff.; also PRE,³ xv. 61–88. Acts xxii. 3 tells unequivocally in what sense Paul is called Ταρσεύς in xxi. 39, cf. ix. 11, 30, xi. 25. It was a needless supposition of Fabricius, Cod. apocr. NT, iii. 571, that on account of the tradition to be cited in n. 16 Jerome must have read in Acts xxii. 3 with Cod. A, $\gamma\epsilon\gamma\epsilon\mu\eta\mu\acute{\epsilon}\nu\omicron\varsigma$ (simply

"having been"). The contrast between the birthplace and the place of education was unmistakable. Starting with the fact that Paul was born in Tarsus, the Ebionite work entitled ἀναβαθμοὶ Ἰακώβου (Epiph. Hær. xxx. 16, 25) asserts that he was a Hellene on both his father's and his mother's side. Paul would not have called himself a citizen of Tarsus if he and his father had not really possessed, in addition to the civitas Romana, municipal citizenship in his native town (cf. a number of inscriptions in JHSt. 1889, p. 50 ff., Nos. 12-20, Ῥωμαῖος καὶ Ἀνδάρης, and similar expressions). The fact that Paul spent the first part of his youth in another city than Jerusalem and among a population differing in race from him, is attested also in Acts xxvi. 4; for there is no doubt of the genuineness of the τε (SABES¹), and certainly not of the τὴν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, which Blass strikes out; and, moreover, ἐν τῷ ἔθνει μου cannot mean "among the Jewish people," which in any case would be a singular mode of expression in an address to the Jew Agrippa (cf. per contra ἡμετέρα, ἡμῶν, xxvi. 5-7), but = ἐν τῇ πατρίδι μου. For this use of ἔθνος, cf. below, § 21, n. 2. He says in this address that all the Jews know how from his youth up he has led a life of strict conformity to the law, and this, too, not merely as a result of his rabbinic training, but "from the beginning," in his native city of Tarsus, as well as later in Jerusalem. This piety, inherited as it was and early instilled into him in the home before ever he sat at Gamaliel's feet (cf. 2 Tim. i. 3), is defined more closely in xxvi. 5 as Pharisaic piety; cf. Phil. iii. 5; Acts xxiii. 6, where we are certainly to read Φαρισαίων, not Φαρισαίου. For several generations the family had belonged to that party. Moreover, in Gal. i. 14 (τῶν πατρικῶν [not πατρῶων] μου παραδόσεων) Paul is thinking of his father, as in Gal. i. 15 of his mother; and one can hardly avoid the conjecture that he uses the words ὁ ἀφορίσας με (Gal. i. 15), ἀφορισμένος (Rom. i. 1), as a play upon the name of the Pharisees,—a name which earlier he had borne with pride, but which now he can employ in an altogether different sense; cf. Clem. Hom. xi. 28, τῶν Φαρισαίων . . . οἱ εἰσιν ἀφορισμένοι. Cf. Orig. in Matt. serm. 20 (Delarue, iii. 843, cf. 835 f. 847). Epiph. Hær. xvi. 1; Jerome, Interpr. hebr. nom. (Lagarde, Onom. 61. 20, 69. 6; also 204. 47).

16. (P. 50.) Jerome in Ep. ad Philem. 23 (Vall. vii. 762): "Quis sit Epaphras concaptivus Pauli, talem fabulam accepimus: Ajunt parentes apostoli Pauli de Gyscalis regione fuisse Judææ, et eos, quum tota provincia Romana vastaretur manu et dispergerentur in orbem Judæi, in Tharsum urbem Ciliciæ fuisse translatos; parentum conditionem adolescentulum Paulum sequutum. Et sic posse stare illud quod de se ipse testatur 'Hebræi sunt,' etc. (2 Cor. xi. 22), et rursum alibi 'Hebræus ex Hebræis' (Phil. iii. 5), et cetera, quæ illum Judæum magis indicant quam Tharsensem." Ibid., Vir. Ill. v: "Paulus apostolus . . . de tribu Benjamin et oppido Judææ Giscalis fuit, quo a Romanis capto cum parentibus suis Tharsum Ciliciæ commigravit." From this latter passage the story passed over into Latin Bibles, cf. Card. Thomasius Opp., ed. Vezzosi, i. 382 (ex oppido Judææ Egirgalis). The fact should not have been overlooked that the tradition which is given in full in the commentary on Philem. 23 (written A.D. 387) is essentially altered through careless abbreviation in the later work, Vir. Ill. v. The tradition, in the only form in which it needs to be considered, does not say that Paul emigrated with his parents from Gischala to Tarsus, but means that his parents, on the occasion of a capture of Gischala by the Romans, were (taken prisoners of war, and thus, perhaps having been sold as slaves, involuntarily) removed to Tarsus, and that Paul (inherited and) shared in his youth this condition of his parents. It surely goes without saying that Jerome learned about this fabula not through hearsay, but from an older commentary. Probably his source is Origen's commentary on Philem., cf. GK, ii. 1002. Photius draws his similar statements (Quæst. Amphil. 116, 117, Migne, 101, col. 688 f.; perhaps also the further statements in Quæst. 211, col. 965) from the same source, and by no means from the Greek translation of Jerome, Vir. Ill., though he often shows dependence upon this elsewhere (Forsch. ii. 8, iii. 35; Wentzel, Die griech. Übers. der viri ill. 1895, S. 1 ff.). The τῷ Ῥωμαϊκῷ δόματι of Photius, e.g., corresponds to the Romana manu of Jerome. Although the Coptic fragments of the Acts of Paul have furnished no verification, the supposition remains probable, that this legend, which was quite highly esteemed by Origen (GK, ii. 865 f.) is the ultimate source of the tradition. The fabula of Jerome, hardly worthy of notice, is in keeping with his attitude toward apocryphal writings, which differed from Origen's; and the Acts of Paul, which was written circa 170, represents its hero as a Hebrew. Prayers spoken in Hebrew are represented as being the apostle's last words before his execution (Acta Petri, Pauli, etc., ed. Lipsius, p. 115; GK, ii. 875, 877). In any case this tradition, which does not contradict Acts, and yet cannot by any possibility have been derived from it, is too definite to have been invented. Hero Krenkel, Beiträge z. Gesch. des Paulus, 8 ff., is right as against Hausrath, *Neutest. Zeitgesch.*¹ ii. 404; Schenkel's Bibellex. iv. 408. The criticism of neither, however, is satisfactory, since both confuse the careless version in Vir. Ill. v with the original tradition, and overtax our credulity by the assumption that there existed in Gischala until Jerome's time a true (so Krenkel) or false (so Hausrath) tradition of this purport. The tradition that Paul's parents lived in Gischala in Galilee (see Buhl, Geogr. Palæstinas, 233; Schürer, i. 616 ff., ii. 445 f. [Eng. trans. i. ii. 226 f., ii. ii. 70 f.]) before they removed to Tarsus, where their son was born, is one that probably dates from the second century, is independent, and supplements the NT statements in a most satisfactory way. If the first person who recorded this tradition, very probably Jerome, regarded the taking of Gischala by the Romans in 67 A.D. (Jos. Bell. iv. 2. 1-5), i.e. perhaps about the year of Paul's death, as the occasion of the captivity of Paul's parents, it was certainly a gross error on his part. But aside from the fact that we do not know this certainly, such an error on the part of this reporter would not prejudice much the essential truth of the tradition worked over by him. The event might very easily have taken place in the year 4 B.C., when Galilee suffered severely at the hands of the legions of Varus and his Arab auxiliaries; and among others the inhabitants of Sepphoris were made captives and slaves (Jos. Ant. xvii. 10. 9; Bell. ii. 5. 1; cf. the allusion in Keim, Gesch. Jesu, i. 318, A. 1 [Eng. trans. ii. 15, n. 1]). The story thus corrected deserves credence for the added reason that in this way it becomes explicable why such a strict Pharisaic family should have come to Tarsus; they came to Tarsus, just as the original contingent of the Roman Jewish population came to Rome, in the condition of prisoners of war and then slaves. As the latter for the most part obtained their freedom and at the same time Roman citizenship (above, p. 61), so Paul's father must have done, and that, too, before Paul's birth, for Paul was born a Roman citizen (Acts xxii. 25-28, cf. xvi. 37 f., xxiii. 27). As such he must also have had a Roman prænomen, nomen, and cognomen in this general form: (Marcus Claudius) Paulus. In the interpretation of a hideous dream, Artemidorus says (Oneirocr. v. 91): "The slave receives at his emancipation three names instead of the one which he has borne hitherto, taking two names from the master who gives him his freedom. The view that Paul took this name in honour of his convert Sergius Paulus, was known even to Origen (com. in Rom., præf., Delarue, iv. 460), was spread especially by Jerome (Vir. Ill. v; ad Philem. 1, Vall. vii. 746 f.), and of late has been defended by Krenkel (18); but this view finds no support in Acts xiii. 9, where it is said simply that in addition to his Jewish name Saul, Paul bore the Roman name Paulus, the name which Luke uses thenceforth. Cf. Ἰανναῖον τὸν καὶ Ἀλέξανδρον, Jos. Ant. xiii. 12. 1; also Σίμων ὁ καὶ Πέτρος (Alexandrin. Inschr. Bull. di arch. crist. 1865, p. 60). Concerning this formula in general, see the writer's note on Ign. Eph. Inscr., or Deissmann, Bibelst. 182 (Eng. trans. 313). It is still more improbable that the apostle exchanged the name Saul for Paul after his conversion; for Luke applies the Hebrew name to him after that event as well as before it. It was natural that a Pharisee who, since his son was born a Roman citizen, had to give him Roman names, should have given him also a Heb. name, and that Paul should have ordinarily borne the latter name as a disciple of the rabbis and a persecutor of the Christians in Jerusalem, and on the other hand his Roman cognomen as a missionary to the Gentiles. The doubts of Krenkel (20 f.), that an orthodox Pharisee should have called his son after king Saul, the persecutor of David, are not sufficient to cast suspicion upon the statement of Acts. Many contemporaries of the apostle in Palestine were called Saul (Bell. ii. 17. 4, a relative of the house of Herod; Bell. ii. 18. 4, a prominent man in Scythopolis); Abba Shaul is a rabbinic authority of the second century (Strack, Eint. in d. Talmud, 84); moreover, the female name Shaulah occurs in rabbinic circles (Levy, Neuhebr. Lex. iv. 491). The question whether the fathers who bestowed these names thought more of king Saul, who was by no means a monster, and who like Paul belonged to the tribe of Benjamin (Rom. xi. 1; Phil. iii. 5), or of the meaning of the word ("the one asked for"), need not be considered. Conjectures as to why the particular name Paul was chosen are to be found in a letter of Levy to Delitzsch, ZfLTh. 1877, S. 12.

17. (Pp. 51, 52.) The question as to what extent Paul shows a knowledge of the Hebrew O.T. is in no wise settled by the work of KAUTZSCH, De VTi locis a Paulo apostolo allegatis, 1869, or of VOLLMER, Die alttest. Citate bei Paulus, 1895. At the same time, isolated remarks in reply, for which alone there would be room here, would not help in its solution. Cf. König, ThLb. 1896, No. 14.

18. (P. 51.) E. CURTIUS, Sitzungsber. der Berliner Akad. 1893, S. 934: "Paul did not acquire Greek as a missionary acquires the language of the natives, in order to make himself understood by them as far as might be necessary. Paul did not acquire the language for missionary purposes at all, but grew up in it." With the qualification made above in the text, this is correct. Blass, Gr. des neutest. Griech. 2 5 f. (Eng. trans. 2nd ed. 5), finds in Paul's speech before Agrippa, which he regards as "very accurately reproduced," signs that Paul was in a measure familiar with the finer Attic forms, and made use of them when before a select audience.

19. (P. 52.) Even in early times attention was paid to Paul's quotations from profane literature, Clem. Strom. i. 59 (cf. Pæd. ii. 50; Epiph. Hær. xlii., ed. Pet. p. 362; Jerome, Ep. lxx ad Magn.; comm. in Gal. iv., Eph. v., Tit. i. (Vall. i. 426, vii. 471, 647, 706); Socrat. H. E. iii. 16; pseudo-Euthalius (Zacagni, Mon. coll. i. 420, 543, 545, 558, 567). Concerning Tit. i. 12, see below, § 35, n. 1. The verse from the Thais of Menander (Fragm. com. gr., ed. Meineke, iv. 132), or, according to the Church historian Socrates, from a tragedy of Euripides (cf. Clem. Strom. i. 59), which Paul appropriates in 1 Cor. xv. 33, is not, to be sure, quoted by him as the saying of a poet. But, on the other hand, we are not to conclude from the fact that the Pauline text as handed down is without the metrical form (χρήσθ', as Lachmann printed it, instead of χρηστά, the form handed down), that Paul dictated the word in unmetrical form, and was not conscious that he was quoting poetry. Copyists have very frequently destroyed the metrical form of such quotations (e.g. Just. Apol. i. 39, γλώσσα ὁμώμοκεν for γλώσσ' ὁμόμοχ' in a verse of Euripides). In a sacred text, which was to be read in church, anything that would remind of a comedy would be disturbing rather than pleasing. Yet in later times verses from Menander were inscribed even on Christian tombstones (C. I. G. No. 3902r; Ritter, De compos. tit. christ. 27; de Rossi, Inscr. christ. ii. 1, procem. viii.). In Acts xvii. 28, where ποιητῶν is an addition to fit the facts which does not make its appearance until the second recension of the text, the idea expressed in any case is that several writers have said essentially the same thing. The quotation agrees literally with Aratus, Phainom. v. 5; as also Acts xvii. 25 corresponds to the preceding sentence in Aratus, πάντη δὲ θεοῦ κεχρήμεθα πάντες. Cf. also the citation of the Jew, Aristobulos, in Eus. Præp. xiii. 12. 6; but a quite similar thing is said by Cleanthes, Hymn. in Jovem, v. 4 (Mullach, Philos. græc. fragm. i. 150), ἐκ σοῦ γὰρ γένος ἐσμέν. Aratus of Soloi in Cilicia, whither his family probably moved from Tarsus, is thought to have composed his Phainomena in Athens (see in brief, Knaack in Pauly-Wissowa, RE, ii. 394); Cleanthes was for years a disciple of Zeno in Athens, and then head of the Stoic school there until his death. Paul could therefore reckon them both among the Athenian poets. Since both were Stoics, he could also say with reference to the Stoics present (xvii. 18), τινὲς τῶν καθ' ὑμᾶς ποιητῶν.

20. (P. 53.) With the statement in the text concerning Tarsus (above, p. 54), cf. Strabo, xiv. p. 673. That writer also mentions a considerable number of well-known Stoics and other philosophers also and of philologists who came from Tarsus. Cf. Lightfoot, Ep. to the Phil., 3rd ed. p. 301 ff., ibid. 308; Bibl. Essays, 205 f. Concerning the time of waiting in Tarsus, cf. the Chronological Survey, Part XI., and also Skizzen, 67, 69.

21. (P. 56.) JOS. SCALIGER, who in his Animadv. in chron. Eusebii after the Thes. temp. 1606, p. 124, ed. 1658, p. 134, reproduced correctly the ancient interpretation (above, p. 60) of Ἑλληνισταί, Acts vi. 1, nowhere to my knowledge speaks of Hellenistic language. On the contrary, JOH. DRUSIUS, Annot. in NT, 1612, on Acts vi. 1 (Critici sacri, Frankf. 1696, tom. iv. 2193) writes: "Hi græca billia in synagogis legebant et græce sciebant, peculiari dialecto utentes, quam hellenisticam vocant, cujus frequens mentio in his libris." On the analogy of

οἱ σοφισταί (sc. τέχνη, ἐπιστήμη), derived from ἡ σοφιστική, we might have had οἱ Ἑλληνισταί, formed from ἡ ἑλληνιστική διάλεκτος; but such is not the case. Further, since Luke, who in the extant literature is the first writer and the only one for a long period to use this word, unquestionably understands by Ἑλληνισταί Jews, it did not seem unfitting to call the Greek used by such Jews Hellenistic. But this limitation of the concept lies merely in the historical setting here. In itself the word Ἑλληνισταί refers to all non-Hellenes who speak Greek or who in general have adopted Greek customs and ways of thinking. Indeed, the intrans. ἐλληνίζειν taken alone means simply "to speak Greek," and in general "to appear as a Greek"; yet it lies in the nature of things that it is used only where there is a contrast to other languages (Luc. Philopseudes, 16, ἐλληνίζων ἢ βαρβαρίζων), and hence as a rule only of non-Greeks (Xenoph. Anab. vii. 3. 25; Æschines, c. Ctesiph. 54 of Demosthenes with reference to his Scythian grandmother, βάρβαρος ἐλληνίζων τῇ φωνῇ), just as ῥωμαίζειν denotes Roman ways of thinking on the part of non-Romans (Jos. Bell. ii. 20. 3), and Ἰουδαίειν Jewish manner of life on the part of non-Jews (Gal. ii. 14). Moreover, the transitive and occasionally passive ἐλληνίζειν (Thuc. ii. 68; Jos. Ant. i. 6. 1) and ἀφ'ἐλληνίζειν (Philo, above, p. 59, n. 3) must everywhere mean simply to make Greek a person or thing that is not Greek; cf. "Germanise," "Anglicise," and similar terms. So also ἐλληνισμός means, as a rule, Greek ways adopted by non-Greeks. We are not justified by such passages as 2 Macc. iv. 13 (above, p. 58, n. 2, line 4) in limiting this concept to Greek language, culture, and customs only so far as they were appropriated by Jews; we must rather apply the term Hellenism to all the Greek culture spread abroad since Alexander's time among the barbarian peoples, and thereby modified according to their individual peculiarities. On the same principle, dialectus hellenistica must denote all Greek spoken by barbarians (Egyptians, Syrians, Jews, Phrygians, Scythians) with its consequent modifications in each case. As a matter of fact, the term "Hellenistic" has often been used in this sense, and, what is altogether confusing, the Hebraistic colouring of the Greek written by Jews has even been contrasted with Hellenistic, and in the works written by Jews in Greek the Hebraisms as a rule have been distinguished as exceptions from the Hellenistic used elsewhere in them. If a writer is unwilling to give up the unfortunate concept of the dialectus or lingua hellenistica, he should state clearly in the preface to the work in which he is going to use the term whether he employs it in the narrow sense which Drusius gave it, or in the wider sense so common to-day. In the former case, Hebraisms would be just the characteristic marks of that peculiaris dialectus. In the latter case, the Greek written by Jews would be a variety within that species of Greek speech which people choose to call "Hellenistic." Likewise this variety, in distinction, say, from the Greek which Copts (Egyptians) wrote, would be recognised by its Hebrew or Aramaic colouring; for in proportion as Jews have been able to divest themselves of their national peculiarities in the use of the Greek, they have approached or fully adopted the common Greek, whether that was the cultured literary language or the vulgar colloquial of their time.

II.

THE EPISTLE OF JAMES.

§ 3. THE DESTINATION OF THE LETTER INDICATED BY THE GREETING.

REGARDING the origin of this Epistle, there is no tradition whose certain age or apparent originality makes it of use as a guide in the investigation. Though the document itself is in the form of a letter, it contains very little which can be connected with events of which we have knowledge from other sources. With the exception of the author (i. 1), mention is made of no person living at the time when the letter was written; nor is there notice of any historical event which had taken place in the immediate past, nor reference to any event that had happened in the life of the author or of the readers (n. 1). Nothing is said which indicates the abode of the author or the place where the readers lived. Here, as in the case of all the N.T. Epistles, the address placed on the outside of the letter, and designed to assist the messenger in delivering it into the proper hands, has not been preserved (n. 2). On the other hand, unlike some of the N.T. Epistles (1 John, Heb.), James does retain the salutation at the beginning of the letter, which in ancient literature contained both the address to the reader, as is customary in modern letters, and as a rule also the writer's signature. Doubtless in many instances it happened that persons receiving letters did not know from whom they came until they opened them and saw the writer's name in the greeting. On the other hand, as a general rule, the address to the reader served no such practical purpose, but, like the greeting proper with which the superscription was generally concluded, it could be used to express in various ways the esteem in which the person addressed was held and the way in which the writer felt toward him. Consequently, in greetings of this kind, we generally find, in addition to the mention of the person addressed by name, and where necessary of his place of residence also, elements of a purely ideal character (n. 3). There are instances in the N.T. of greetings where the designation of the person addressed is altogether of this kind, as, in fact, is the case with Jas. i. 1.

Hopeless as the undertaking may seem in the absence of every other clue, we are compelled, provisionally at least, to seek a historical and geographical background for the letter by an exegetical discussion of the words ταῖς δώδεκα φυλαῖς ταῖς ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ. Taken alone, the words αἱ δώδεκα φυλαί can hardly mean anything but the Jewish people, and the Jewish people in their entirety (n. 4). But throughout the entire letter it is clearly presupposed, both by implication and by express statement (ii. 1), that the readers as a body accept Jesus as the Messiah. Even if this were not so, it hardly needs proof that what we have here is not an epistolary address to the entire Jewish nation (n. 5). Naturally, therefore, one looks to the accompanying ταῖς ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ to supply the exacter definition which the conception requires. That this modifying phrase gives a characterisation of the readers' situation which cannot be logically dispensed with, and which is by no means unimportant for the determination of the conception itself, is clear from the conditions existing in apostolic and post-apostolic times (n. 6). At that time no one could say that the Jewish nation as such was living in a dispersion, either as regards its condition or its location, nor is any such statement made. No matter how largely the Jews were living outside of Palestine, and no matter how widely they were scattered, the nation retained its fatherland. Long after Jerusalem was destroyed, and even after the still more stringent measures adopted by Hadrian, Jews and Jewish Christians called Palestine "the land of Israel," and so it is spoken of to-day (n. 7). Jews living abroad, such as Philo, for example, nevertheless considered Jerusalem, "where stood the temple of the Most High God," their capital (c. Flacc. vii; Leg. ad Cai. xxxvi). The high priests ruling in Jerusalem treated Palestine, with its land and people, as their domain (John xi. 48), and Jews living in Palestine were accustomed to speak of their countrymen living abroad as the diaspora among the Greeks (John vii. 35), as the exiles in Babylon and other lands, in contrast to themselves who lived in the land of their fathers and constituted the nation (n. 7). Consequently no author informed at all as to the facts could say that the Jewish nation was living in the diaspora. On the other hand, if it is assumed that someone hostile to the Jewish nation made use of this exaggerated and awkward expression (instead of some such phrase as ταῖς κατὰ πᾶσαν τὴν οἰκουμένην διεσπαρμέναις) in order to direct attention to the sorry plight into which the Jews had fallen, one is still at a loss to understand why he makes it include his Christian readers also, and how he could have omitted to indicate by a word the religious condition which distinguished his readers from Israel as a whole. These objections retain their full force also against the interpretation, often attempted, by which it is maintained that, so far as the words are concerned, James does address the Jews living outside of Palestine, but really means the Jewish Christians living outside of Palestine (n. 8). And besides, this construction stands in absolute contradiction to the idea of the "Twelve Tribes" which indicates specifically the Jewish people with special emphasis upon their entirety. The interpretation is right only in its recognition of the fact that ταῖς ἐν τ. δ. is one of those appositives or attributes which complete the idea and at the same time express a contrast to another determination of it which might be possible, or which is assumed to be known (n. 6). Here the contrast is not between individual Jews, or single tribes of Israel, and the remaining Jews or tribes, but between the "Twelve Tribes" which live in the dispersion, so constituting a homeless diaspora, and another "Twelve Tribes" of which this is not true. It is only by such an assumption that we get a natural explanation of the omission of the usual τοῦ Ἰσραήλ after ταῖς δ. φ. (n. 4). This phrase is replaced by one which, while on the one hand retaining the comparison with the Jewish people, on the other brings the object which it describes into sharp contrast with the Jewish people. Unlike the twelve tribes who have Palestine for their native land, Jerusalem for their capital, and the temple as a centre of religious worship, the twelve tribes addressed in the letter have no earthly fatherland, nor any capital upon earth, but always, no matter where they may be settled, live scattered in a strange world, like the Jewish exiles in Mesopotamia or Egypt. It is no new doctrine concerning a twofold Israel which James develops here; this would be entirely out of place in a greeting. He assumes that his readers are familiar with the general thought which he has in mind; and more than this, that the language which he uses to express the idea will be understood at once. It is not likely that he was mistaken (n. 9). It is only for us moderns, before we have made a careful examination of the historical conditions under which the letter was written, that the greeting can have a double meaning. The expression, the twelve tribes in the diaspora, may mean either the entire body of Christians living at the time, the sense in which Peter and Paul use practically identical expressions, or it may mean the believing Israel, the entire body of Jewish Christians,—a sense in which Paul sometimes uses expressions of this kind. Between these two meanings the letter itself must decide. It is to be remembered, however, that there was a time when such an alternative did not exist, because the believing Israel constituted the entire Church (n. 10).

1. (P. 73.) Some writers have thought that they found in Jas. v. 11 a reference to the death of Jesus as an event that had taken place before the eyes of the readers. This is the view of as late a writer as W. Schmidt, Lehrbegr. des Jakobus, 76. But since in the same verse δ κύριος undoubtedly refers to God, κύριος without the article, occurring as it does just a few words before, cannot possibly mean Jesus. Where there is a distinction, it is in the reverse direction, κύριος meaning God, and δ κύριος, Jesus (Jas. v. 8, 10, 14, 15). If the death of Jesus is to be understood, then we must remember that this was in no way witnessed by "the twelve tribes in the dispersion," that no one at all saw the resurrection, and that only a few beheld the ascension. There is no intelligible reference to the patience of Jesus or to His blessed departure contained in τὸ τέλος. In fact, the juxtaposition of ὑπομονή and τέλος (cf. Matt. x. 22, xxiv. 13; Jas. i. 4) makes it clear that what is meant is the end in keeping with Job's patience and constancy, the end which God the Lord put to His testing of Job. On logical grounds the reading ἴδετε has much to commend it; and if this is the true reading, there should be a heavy mark of punctuation before it. It was so understood even by Greek commentators: Leontius, c. Aphthartoc. et Nestor. iii. 13; Cramer, Cat. viii. 35. Among more recent writers, see Hofmann, ad loc.

2. (P. 73.) The salutations which stand at the head of most letters of antiquity preserved to us in literature are not to be confused with the address of the letter, the inscription written upon the outside of the sealed Epistle. Among the Ägypt. Urkunden aus den Berliner Museen, which have been appearing in parts since 1892, as in other collections of similar content, there are not a few letters, mostly of a business character and dating from the first century A.D., which illustrate this relation, and which are instructive in other ways also. No. 37 of the 15th Aug. 51 (i.e. about contemporaneous with James) has at the top of the enclosed letter Μυσταρίων Σποτόητι τῷ ἰδίῳ πλείστα χαίρειν, and on the outside has the address Σποτόητι Λεσώνῃ εἰς τὴν νῆσον τ . . . No. 93, Πτολεμαῖς (sic) Ἀβού(τι) τῷ τιμιωτάτ(ῳ) πατρὶ πλ(είστα) χαίρειν, the outside address Ἀβούτι οὐετρανῷ χ(αίρειν) π(αρά) Πτολ(εμαίου) υἱού. Sometimes the address on the outside names also the place of destination: No. 423, εἰς Φιλαδελφίαν Ἐπιμάχῳ ἀπὸ Ἀπίωνος υἱού. After this a still more precise direction to the bearer, introduced by ἀπόδος ("to be delivered at") This form of the address is particularly common: Nos. 38, 164, 261, 332, 435, 523, 530, Oxyrhyn. Pap. ii. 293, No. 293 of 27 A.D. Near as address and salutation often stand to one another, yet these examples confirm the fact that there is a distinction—and that a self-evident one—between the two, the address being primarily a direction for the bearer, though occasionally informing the receiver from whom the letter comes before he opens it, the salutation, on the other hand, being an address and greeting directed to the recipient of the letter. Chrysostom (Montfaucon, iii. 55) remarks that on receiving a letter one is not wont to read immediately what is within, ἀλλὰ πρότερον τὴν ἐξωθεν ἐπιγραφὴν ἐπερχόμεθα καὶ ἐξ ἐκείνης μανθάνομεν καὶ τὸν πέμψαντα καὶ τὸν ὀφείλοντα ὑποδέξασθαι. Since the address served its purely practical purpose at the moment of delivery, it is not to be wondered at that it fell away in the literary transmission of letters. Especially with more voluminous letters consisting of several sheets, in ancient as in modern times, the address, together with the enfolding sheet (envelope) on which it was written, in most cases probably was soon destroyed. The salutation, on the other hand, which in case of proper delivery of the letter served no practical end, and hence occasionally could even be omitted altogether, was regularly transmitted in the literature together with the other essential and constituent parts of the letter. Of the three letters in the Aristeas legend (Jos. Ant. xii. 2. 4-6), the first has only an address, the second and third have only a salutation. Of the three regular parts of ancient salutations (name of the writer of the letter in the nominative, name of the recipient in the dative, and greeting), the third had among the Greeks from ancient times usually the form χαίρειν, the form employed in Jas. i. 1, but only twice elsewhere in the N.T., Acts xv. 23, xxiii. 26; cf. the six letters of king Philip (Epistologr. gr., ed. Hercher, 461 ff.). The remark of Artemidorus, Oneirocr. iii. 44, ἴδιον γὰρ πάσης ἐπιστολῆς τὸ χαίρει καὶ ἔρρωσο (cf. Acts xv. 23, 29), is not to be taken literally with reference to the opening salutation; for unless the greeting took the form of a grammatically independent sentence, the writer's designation of himself in the third person required, instead of the χαίρει usual in oral address (seldom so in letters, Barn. Epist.; Berl. äg. Urk. 435, 821; Oxyrh. Pap. i. 189, No. 122; Fayûm towns, p. 285, No. 129), the elliptical infinitive χαίρειν dependent on λέγει, εὔχεται understood (cf. 2 John 10, 11) and often strengthened by πλείστα, cf. Berl. äg. Urk. 37, 93, 623; Ign. ad Polyc. (address); in the other letters of Ignatius except ad Philad. there are Christian embellishments. Other Greek forms, such as εὖ πράττειν, preferred by Plato to χαίρειν, it is alleged, and employed in the pseudo-Platonic letters (Hercher, 492 ff., especially Ep. 3, p. 496; cf. Plato, Charmides, 164), and ὑγιαίνειν (Berl. äg. Urk. 775, 794), which writers as early as Pythagoras and Epicurus are said to have used commonly (Lucian, de lapsu in salut. 4-6, cf. Pearson, Annot. in epist. Ign., ed. Smith, 6; Bernays, Lucian und die Kyniker, 3 f., 88 f.), did not pass over into common Christian usage; cf., however, Acts xv. 29, εὖ πράξετε, and 3 John 2, εὐοδοῦσθαι καὶ ὑγιαίνειν, also as early a passage as 2 Macc. i. 10.

3. (P. 74.) We find prosaic mention of place united to ideal elements in all Epistles addressed to local Churches, i.e. in those of Paul except the private letters and Eph., also in Rev. i. 4; 1 Pet.; Clem. 1 Cor.; in the letters of Ignatius, of Polycarp, and of the Churches of Smyrna (Mart. Polyc.) and of Lyons (Eus. H. E. v. 1. 3). Every external indication of the recipient, such as would have been necessary for the address of a letter, is lacking in Eph. i. 1 (§ 28, n. 4); 2 Pet. i. 1; Jude 1; 2 John 1, and probably also Rom. i. 7.

4. (Pp. 74, 76.) Usually we find (τῶν) Ἰσραὴλ or words of similar meaning appended to αἱ δώδεκα φυλαί; Ex. xxiv. 4; Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 30; Rev. xxi. 12; Protev. Jac. i. 1; cf. Acts xxvi. 7, τὸ δωδεκάφυλον ἡμῶν; Clem. 1 Cor.

IV. 6, τὸ δωδεκάφυλον τοῦ Ἰσρ.; Prot. ev. Jac. 1. 3, τὴν ὁδοεκάφυλον τ. Ἰσρ. (see the variants in Tischendorf, p. 3; Thilo, Cod. ap. 166); Test. patr. Naphth. 5, τὰ δώδεκα σκῆπτρα τοῦ Ἰσρ.; Clem. 1 Cor. xxxi. 4, τὸ δωδεκάσκηπτρον τοῦ Ἰσρ.; Just. Dial. cxvñ, ἑμῶν αἱ δώδεκα φυλαί. The context alone can render such an addition unnecessary, e.g. Ex. xxxix. 14; Sibyll. iii. 249. This is not practicable, however, at the beginning of a letter, especially of such a one as James, which at all events is not addressed to the Jewish people. Consequently Jas. i. 1 is distinguished from all the other passages cited by its lack of a genitive with αἱ δ. φ. Further, it must be borne in mind that since the political separation of the Israelitish people and State, and especially since the return of but a fraction of the nation from the Exile, αἱ δώδεκα φ. τ. Ἰσρ. was synonymous with an emphatic πᾶσαι αἱ φ. τ. Ἰσρ. (Josh. xxiv. 1; Judg. xxi. 5-8) or πᾶς Ἰσραὴλ (2 Chron. xxix. 24, cf. xxx. 1, 5; Rom. xi. 26), cf. Ezra vi. 17 or 1 Kings xviii. 31 with xiv. 21, or Ezek. xlvii. 13 with xlviii. 19, or Sir. xxxiii. 11 (συνάγαγε πάσας φυλὰς Ἰακώβ) with xlv. 23, or Rev. xxi. 12 with vii. 4. Over against the statement "All Israel (כָּל יִשְׂרָאֵל) has a share in the future world" (Mishnah Sanhedrin x. 1), Rabbi Akiba declared: "The ten tribes will not return," in reply to which Rabbi Eliezer, plainly in dependence upon Isa. viii. 23-ix. 1, asserted that at last the light would arise again upon them also (Sanh. x. 3). It goes without saying that it would have been quite impossible for a Jew and Christian of ancient times to designate as the people of the twelve tribes a part of the Jewish people, such as the Jews of the diaspora; and even if this were not self-evident, it would be proved most clearly by the Apocalypse of Baruch, written probably c. 80 A.D. Viewed from the standpoint of the time after the first destruction of Jerusalem, the nation divides itself into three parts: (1) the two and a half tribes of the former kingdom of Judah, which were deported to Babylon; (2) the nine and a half tribes of the former northern kingdom, which were deported farther toward the north-east; and (3) the few from all twelve tribes who remained behind among the ruins of Zion (lxxvii. 1-19, lxxviii. 1, lxxx. 4f., cf. i. 2, lxii. 5, lxiii. 3, lxiv. 5). Including these three divisions, Baruch writes, lxxviii. 4: "Ecce colligati sumus nos omnes duodecim tribus uno vinculo." On this point cf. the fantastic speculations about the lost ten, or nine and a half, tribes in 2 Esdr. xiii. 40 ff., and in the writings of the Christian Commodianus, Instr. ii. 1, Apol. 941-998, ed. Dombart. See also Zöckler, Bibl. und Kircheng. Studien, v. 74-114.

5. (P. 74.) This was the view of M. Baumgarten, Apostelgesch. ii. 2. 121. So far as the formal correctness of the exegesis of Jas. i. 1 is concerned, this is certainly to be preferred to the view of H. Grotius on Jas. i. 1 and of Credner, Einl. 595, that the letter is addressed to "Jews outside of Palestine" quite aside from their division into Christian and unbelieving Jews; and also to the view of Spitta, that the letter was written by a Jew and addressed to the Jews in the diaspora who had not been touched at all by Christianity as yet; see n. 8 and § 8. But what was said above in the text is a sufficient answer to Baumgarten as well.

6. (Pp. 74, 76.) The history of the interpretation of Jas. i. 1 compels us to recall some rather trivial considerations. We must decide whether ταῖς ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ belongs to that class of appositives and attributives which could be omitted without impairing the logical and grammatical completeness of the concept, or whether we have here really a closer definition and limitation of the concept, a contrast being thus expressed to something else under the more general class to which the concept might be referred if it were not for this closer specification. Examples of the first kind are Jas. ii. 25, ἡ πόρνη, Matt. i. 6, τὸν βασιλέα; Matt. xxi. 11, ὁ ἀπὸ Ναζαρέθ; Acts xxiv. 5, πᾶσιν τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις τοῖς κατὰ τὴν οἰκουμένην ("all Jews" are nothing more nor less than "the Jews in the whole world"); Mark iv. 31, in like manner, πάντων τῶν σπερμάτων τῶν ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. Examples of the second kind are Rom. x. 5, τὴν ἐκ τοῦ νόμου (cf. Phil. iii. 9); 2 Cor. i. 1, τῇ οὔσῃ ἐν Κορίνθῳ; Acts xi. 22, xv. 23, τοῖς ἐξ ἐθνῶν, in contrast to the writers and their Jewish fellow believers. In many cases, such as Gal. i. 22 (Is ταῖς ἐν Χριστῷ in contrast to unbelieving Jewish communities?), the decision may remain doubtful, but not so in Jas. i. 1.

7. (P. 75.) In the Pesachhaggadah (ed. D. Cassel, 5): "Here this year, next year in the land of Israel." So in Matt. ii. 20 f., and very commonly in the Mishnah, e.g. Baba Kamma vii. 7; Jebamoth xvii. 7, and above, p. 22, n. 4. Also in direct contrast to the diaspora in Babylonia, e.g. Bab. Sanhedr. 38a. Διασπορά, like the corresponding נִדָּח, נִדָּחָא, נִדָּחָא (Levy, Neuhebr. Lex. i. 332, Jastrow, 221, 247), had originally the abstract meaning "act or state of dispersion, banishment from home" (Jer. xv. 7; Dan. xii. 2; LXX Ps. Sol. ix. 2; Clem. Hom. iii. 44; so also 1 Pet. i. 1, § 38, n. 5); it then came to mean "the territory in which the banished ones are dispersed" (Judith v. 19; so also Jas. i. 1 and John vii. 35, since we should there read εἰς, not πρὸς τὴν διασπορὰν τῶν Ἑλλήνων; cf. Paralip. Jeremie: Βαρὺχ ἀπέστειλεν εἰς τὴν διασπορὰν τῶν ἐθνῶν, cited by Wetstein, i. 888, on John vii. 35, not to be found in Ceriani, Monum. v. 1-18); finally, it meant "the Jews dwelling in scattered communities outside the home land (Deut. xxviii. 25, Cod. B, ἔσῃ διασπορά; Isa. xlix. 6; 2 Macc. i. 27; Ps. Sol. viii. 34 f.), the same who in Gamaliel's letters are called "sons of the diaspora," above, pp. 10, 33.

8. (P. 75.) This was probably the meaning of Didymus (Migne, xxxix. 1749), "Judæis scribit in dispersione constitutis," with the note appended that this could be interpreted also of the spiritual Israel. Most significant is the way in which pseudo-Euthalius, in order to gain the desired meaning, improves upon the clumsy author (Zacagni, Coll. mon. i. 486), τοῖς ἀπὸ τῶν δώδεκα φυλῶν διασπαρείσιν καὶ πιστεύουσιν εἰς τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰ. Χρ. Even apart from this additional assumption that they were Christian Jews, the mode of expression presupposed in James would be hardly more sensible than expressions, say, like this: "that German nation which lives in America." If he had been speaking of real Jews, James must have written τοῖς ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ Ἰουδαίοις or ἀδελφοῖς; cf. 2 Macc. i. 1 (also i. 10), τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς τοῖς κατ' Ἀγνυπτον Ἰουδαίοις; Apoc. Baruch, lxxviii. 2, "fratribus in captivitatem abductis"; see also the letters of Gamaliel, above, pp. 10, 33. To this day the expression used by James as a rule is grossly misinterpreted: (1) αἱ δ. φ. = "the Jewish people in its entirety"; (2) as limited by ταῖς ἐν τ. δ. = the Jews dwelling outside of Palestine; (3) = Christians, but only as determined from the contents of the Epistle. Cf. the commentaries of Kern, 79; Wiesinger, 49; Beyschlag, 43. This seems to be the view of Mayor also, who, in his introduction, ex., refers us to his comment on Jas. i. 1, p. 30, and in his comment on that passage refers to the introduction, without, in either place, going into a very thorough discussion of the concepts. Recently (1896) this position has been taken by Spitta with the greatest frankness, Zur Gesch. u. Literatur des Urchristentums, ii. 14, though he abandons the idea that either author or readers are Christians; see below, § 8.

9. (P. 76.) Since this idea is important in several questions of N.T. introduction, its development must be set forth briefly here. Even the Baptist, gathering suggestions as he did from O.T. prophecies, conceived at least as possible a future race of Abraham, into which non-Jews would be received in place of unworthy Israelites (Matt. iii. 9; Luke iii. 8). In the mouth of Jesus this thought became the prediction of a future actuality (Matt. viii. 11 f., xxii. 9 f.; Luke xiii. 28 f., xiv. 21 f.; John x. 16, xii. 32, cf. xii. 20; also on the negative side, John viii. 33-40; Matt. xv. 13). Jesus spoke of this future fellowship as of another ἔθνος in contrast with the Jewish people led by the high priests and rabbis (Matt. xxi. 43). There is, of course, no need of proof to show that He meant His readers to understand by this, not some other particular nation, the Greek, e.g., in which case all non-Greeks, His own disciples at that time among the rest, would have been excluded from it, but rather the same people of God whom He elsewhere called His Church, and represented as a house to be built by Him (Matt. xvi. 18, xviii. 17). The thought that the Christian Church, composed of men of various nationalities, and based not on birth at all, but on faith in Jesus, was a new people of God, the true race of Abraham, or a spiritual Israel, was consequently implanted in His Church from the beginning, and was developed by it in manifold directions. Indeed, an instance of this is the frequent likening of Christ's redemption of mankind or of His Church to the deliverance of Israel from Egypt (1 Cor. v. 7, x. 1 ff.; Rev. i. 5 f., v. 9 f.; 1 Pet. i. 15-20; Jude 5), a comparison which found expression also at every celebration of the Lord's Supper, this feast serving as the antitype of the Passover meal. Paul especially developed the thought that the Church, composed of believing Jews and Gentiles, was the legitimate continuation of the people of God which began with Abraham (Rom. 4; Gal. iii. 7-29; 1 Cor. x. 1); or, to put it in another way, that the Gentiles, who before were excluded from citizenship in Israel and from the sphere of saving revelation, were now, so far as they had become believers, incorporated into the holy people (Eph. ii. 11-22), or, like wild olive branches, were grafted into the good olive tree (Rom. xi. 17-24). While in these passages Paul represents Christianity as the continuation of the O.T. Church, being simply an enlargement of Israel through the reception of believing Gentiles, in other passages, written from a different point of view, the great schism which Jesus produced in His own nation finds its appropriate expression. It is, after all, not the Jewish nation, but only a small fraction of it, which has united with the believing Gentiles to form a new people of God. In contrast to the Jewish people, the vastly greater part of which will have nothing to do with the gospel, and, like Ishmael, is begotten according to the flesh, since it is connected with Abraham only through bodily descent and other externalities. Christianity is like Isaac, who was begotten according to the promise, i.e., according to the Spirit, but was persecuted by his brother (Gal. iv. 21-31). The thought that the Christian Church, in contrast to the Jewish people, is the spiritual Israel, is so usual with Paul, that he once tacitly presupposes it, and quite incidentally calls the Jewish people with its cultus "Israel according to the flesh" (1 Cor. x. 18; cf. Buttmann, Neutest. Grammatik, 81 [Eng. trans. 92]). This spiritual Israel also has its metropolis, which likewise can be termed Jerusalem. It lies, however, not in Palestine, but in heaven, where the ascended King of the spiritual Israel is enthroned (Gal. iv. 26, cf. Heb. xii. 22). There the members of the true Israel are enrolled, even while still living upon earth (Phil. iv. 3, cf. Luke x. 20); there is the proper seat of the commonwealth, of which they are citizens even here (Phil. iii. 20), and there they are received if they die before the return of the Lord (2 Tim. iv. 18). The reverse side of this view is that Christians here have no sure and abiding dwelling-place (Heb. xiii. 14) and no citizenship. Peter gave especial prominence to this idea, not only transferring to the Gentile Churches all Israel's titles of honour (1 Pet. ii. 9 f., cf. i. 15), but also likening their condition in the world to that of those Jews who are scattered abroad far from their native land, calling them sojourners in distinction from the citizens of the cities and lands in which they dwelt, or strangers who tarry only for a time, in contrast to those who live upon this earth as if they could remain here always (i. 1, 17, ii. 11; cf. § 38). It is to Peter that most of the later Church usage with regard to παροικεῖν, παροικία is related: Clem. 1 Cor. (address); 2 Cor. v. 1, 5; Polyc. ad Phil. (address); Mart. Polyc. (address); Dion. Corinth. in Eus. II. E. iv. 23. 5; Epist. Lugd. in Eus. v. 1. 3; Apollonius in Eus. v. 18. 9; Irenæus in Eus. v. 24. 14. Indeed, the connection is traceable even down to our attenuated use of "parish." Moreover, the concept of the διασπορά is further developed in Iren. i. 10. 1 (διασπαρμένη); iii. 11. 8; Can. Mur. 77 (GK, ii. 7, 142). Hermas, Sim. ix. 17, in a manner quite characteristic of him and yet often misunderstood, applied the figure of the twelve tribes to all mankind as the field of mission work and the source of the materials for the building of the Church; cf. the writer's Hirt des Hermas, 223-232. On the other hand, Hermas represents the Church as the true Israel, making Michael Israel's guardian angel, the chief overseer of the Church, Sim. viii. 3. 3; cf. the writer's Hirt des Hermas, 230 f., 264 f. But the thought of the spiritual Israel was developed in still another direction; and here again we must look to the many-sided apostle. Inasmuch as Paul did not abandon his belief in the ideal continuance and future revival of his nation in its calling as leader in religious history, he was forced to inquire after a real ground and pledge of this belief. He found the answer in the fact that God, in accordance with the O.T. promise, has even yet left to His people a remnant in which the people as a people is preserved for this its calling (Rom. ix. 29). Every single Israelite who is converted to Christ is a practical proof of the fact that God has not cast off this people for ever; and there are thousands of such Jews. The seven thousand of Elijah's time is a typical expression for their numbers, but falls far below the reality (Rom. xi. 1-7, cf. Acts xxi. 20). These Jews who believe in Christ, who through the Spirit have received a circumcision of the heart, are the real Jews (Rom. ii. 29, cf. Phil. iii. 3), the "Israel of God," which, when Christians in general are referred to, can be especially singled out as a narrower circle (Gal. vi. 16). Corresponding to this, the spiritual fatherhood of Abraham in its relation to Christianity is twofold; he is the father of all believing Gentiles, but in an especial and more limited sense by reason of circumcision he is the father of Christian Jews (Rom. iv. 11 f.). Whether this thought is expressed also in

Rev. vii. 1-8 (xxi. 12) is not so easy to determine. There is no need of proof, however, to show that it must have been an exceedingly natural thought for every Christian of Jewish birth who was as lovingly attached to his people as were Paul and James.

10. (P. 77.) An essentially correct interpretation of the "address" is to be found in Thiersch, Die Kirche im apost. Zeitalter, 3te Aufl. 109; a more thorough demonstration is given by Hofmann, vii. 3. 8 ff., 159 ff.

§ 4. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE READERS.

There is no reason to doubt that the readers whom James addresses were, without exception, Christians. In ii. 1 they are exhorted to hold their faith in Christ without respect of persons; and there is nothing to indicate that this exhortation is intended for only a part of those to whom he is writing. The confession which James makes so frankly for himself at the very beginning of the letter (i. 1) is likewise their confession; the only question is whether they are willing to live in accordance with it. They have implanted in them the word of truth, by which God has begotten them and the author alike to a new life (i. 18, 21). How long they had been Christians, and through whose influence they had been converted, is not indicated.

Even with the exact meaning of the salutation left undecided (§ 3, p. 76 f.), it is yet clear from it that the letter was not intended for a single local Church, but for a large number of Churches, widely separated. Where the author speaks of elders of the Church, he does so only as an example, and means the elders of the particular Church where a case of serious illness, such as he has in mind, may occur (v. 14). If, as is perfectly possible, συναγωγή ὑμῶν in ii. 2 means a building and not the coming together of the congregation for worship, or the congregation as gathered from time to time for worship (n. 1), the omission of the article shows that a number of such buildings belonged to the readers. As a matter of fact, the plural κριτήρια in ii. 6 indicates that in the region where the readers lived there were a number of tribunals.

Some of the readers lived in cities, others in the country. Besides wealthy landowners and the day labourers in their employ (v. 1-6), there were merchants among them whose business took them from city to city, often requiring a residence of a year or more (iv. 13-17). On the other hand, without assuming at all that James meant his reproofs to apply alike to all his readers, one does get from the letter the impression that the readers were a homogeneous body, representing about the same grade of intelligence, having similar tastes, and exposed to the same moral dangers. Theoretical knowledge of the way of salvation is everywhere presupposed (i. 18, 21, ii. 1, iv. 17), and no effort is made to instruct them further in this regard. Many of them boast their faith, make capital of their religious knowledge (ii. 14, iii. 13), exhibit a passionate zeal for teaching others, and give free rein to their tongues, even yielding to rude curses in their anger at those who prove to be unteachable (i. 18 f., 26, iii. 1-18, n. 2). In fact, among themselves they are more inclined to revile and curse than they are to help one another by prayer and loving admonition (iv. 11 f., v. 16, 19 f.). At the same time they are zealous in the fulfilment of formal religious duties (n. 3). There is no want of prayer, but an entire lack of the energy of faith and sincerity of motive, without which prayer works no outward effect and brings no inward peace (i. 6-8, iv. 3, 8, cf. v. 15-18). The most serious defect which the author discovers, however, is the want of a proper correspondence between their conduct and the vital content of the word which they have heard and know (i. 22-25); the faith which they confess with their lips, they do not manifest in a life that evidences its truth and vitality (ii. 14-26); particularly do they fail in works of mercy and love (i. 27, ii. 13, 15 f.), in bridling the tongue (i. 26, iii. 2 ff.), and in being patient in suffering (i. 3 f., 12, v. 7-11). Many of those who boast about their faith could well be put to shame by the good conduct of the confessor of another religion—doubtless a Jew. With good reason such a one might compare the dead faith of the Christian with the involuntary recognition of the existence of God by evil spirits (n. 4). The readers are constantly charged with prizing too highly the things of this world. Among those engaged in commerce this tendency manifests itself in utter disregard of all religious restraint (iv. 13–17); those who are landowners rob their labourers without mercy (v. 4–6); while such as have no property are full of vain longings for better conditions (iv. 2), and give way constantly to impatient sighs and complaints, not only against their oppressors (v. 7–11), but even against God (i. 13, iv. 7). This same spirit leads to contemptuous treatment of the poor and cringing politeness toward the rich (ii. 1–9). The author brands them all “adulteresses,” unfaithful to their covenant vow to God, and forgetful that in and of itself the love of the world is enmity against God, and that the Spirit which God has sent to dwell in them is a Spirit of jealous love, whose presence precludes all division of the heart (iv. 4 f.). They all need to be reminded of the transitoriness and worthlessness of the things which they overvalue (i. 10 f., iv. 14, v. 2 f.), and to be made to feel the incomparably greater value of the things which God gives and promises to them as Christians (i. 9, 12, 17 f., 21, ii. 5, iv. 6, v. 7 f.). A feeling of general discontent seems to have taken possession of the readers, as appears from the fact that immediately following the χαίρειν of the greeting, indeed with this very word, James begins his exhortation that they count it pure joy when they fall into all sorts of trials, and that they never on any account regard God as the author of the temptation to sin that may be involved in such trials (i. 2, 13). The expression shows clearly that the author is not referring to some single great distress and danger which affects or threatens all the readers, but to trials as varied as are their own separate conditions or personal aptitudes.

According to i. 9–11, one principal cause for the state of affairs described was the sharp distinction made between rich and poor. It is clear also from the same passage that these distinctions were made within the Church; for, in his exhortation to the readers, James urges that instead of complaining about the difficulties of his lot, and asking God's help only in a half-hearted way, the Christian rejoice with a certain feeling of pride; if in humble circumstances, let him remember the high place that belongs to him as a child of God (i. 18); if he is rich, let him glory that in spite of wealth he is privileged to be reckoned among the poor and lowly to whom the grace of God is given (n. 5). In the same way the severe reproof which in v. 1–6 is administered to the rich for their luxurious living, and to landowners for their heartlessness, is meant for confessors of the Christian faith. In and of itself it is hardly conceivable that James should have directed such an earnest and such a practical reproof to non-Christians whom he knew it would never reach; in fact, such a supposition is ruled out altogether by the clear parallelism between the two paragraphs beginning with ἄγε νυν (iv. 13, v. 1); inasmuch as iv. 15 shows that the merchants of whom he is speaking (iv. 13–17) must have been members of the Church. Moreover, when it is recalled that v. 7–9 not only follows the reproof of the landowners, but is also a consequence of it (v. 7, μακροθυμήσατε οὖν), and when it is further remembered that the suffering which the readers are exhorted to endure with patience is the oppression of the field labourers just described, the brethren mentioned in v. 9 (μὴ στενάζετε κατ' ἀλλήλων, ἀδελφοί) must have included the oppressors among the readers as well as the oppressed. James does not address the rich any more than the covetous merchants as brothers, but reserves this epithet until he comes to speak words of comfort to the oppressed (v. 7). He calls the oppressed labourer "the righteous," in contrast to his oppressor whom he calls a murderer (v. 6). This is a severe judgment, but it is in keeping with the entire character of the reproof, which is designed to awaken terror. Moreover, the exhortation to lament in view of the impending judgment, which we have in v. 1, is found also in iv. 9, where without any question the persons addressed are Christians, though they are called sinners, not brethren. And in a still earlier passage (iv. 2) the readers as a body are charged with committing murder through their contentions about worldly possessions. Of course, this is not to be taken literally, any more than the epithet μοιχαλίδες in the immediate context (iv. 4) applies to a few of his women readers and not to all the readers. As the context shows, the expression is certainly employed in the well-known figurative sense in which it is used in the O.T. and by Jesus (e.g. Matt. xii. 39). The strong expression in v. 6 is anticipated by what is said in v. 4. Because the landowners withhold or reduce the lawful wages of their harvesters while living themselves in luxury, they are held like unjust judges to have deprived them of their rights, and like murderers to have taken their very life. The same strong comparison is to be found also in Sir. xxxi. 21 f. (al. xxxiv. 25), a book which seems to have been carefully read by James (§ 6, n. 10). These charges of murder and adultery were perfectly intelligible to readers acquainted with the circumstances here alluded to, and who knew how Jesus had interpreted the Decalogue.

The reference in ii. 1-7 is different. Here a case is assumed in which two persons come into the place of assembly together, the one well dressed and prosperous, the other a poor man in soiled garments. Neither of them is described as a Christian. The author simply pictures the different way in which these two persons are received by the Christians as they assemble for worship. The one is politely shown to a comfortable place, while the other is told in a contemptuous manner to remain standing, or to occupy one of the poorer seats. The description suits only such visitors at the Christian services, who are not members, or not yet members of the Church (n. 6). The readers are not reproved because they show preference to wealthy non-Christians over poor Christians, but simply because the poor man is mistreated on account of his poverty and shabby dress (ii. 6), while the rich man is treated with obsequious politeness for no other reason than his fine appearance. Such "respect of persons" is inconsistent with faith in the exalted and glorified Christ (ii. 1), as well as with God's stated attitude toward the poor and the general conduct of the rich toward the Christian (ii. 5-7). "Hath not God chosen those who are poor so far as this world is concerned and in the judgment of the world, to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which He has promised to them that love Him?" (n. 7). So God had actually treated the poor as a class since the days of Jesus. In every sense of the word the gospel had been preached to the poor. On the other hand, when he describes the rich as a class, James appeals to the daily experience of the readers. It is by the rich that they are oppressed and dragged before judgment-seats, and it is the rich who blaspheme that worthy name by which they are called. Both from the illustration with which this whole discussion is introduced (ii. 2), and from the reminder that God has chosen His Church chiefly from among the poor (ii. 6), it is entirely natural to suppose that the comparatively few rich persons in the Church are here left out of account. While these latter may have manifested more the spirit of the wealthy than of the Christian (i. 10, iv. 16, v. 1-6), making their poor fellow-Christians feel the superiority of their social position (καταδυναστεύουσιν), and while in isolated cases contentions about property (iv. 1 f., v. 4, 6) may have led them to prefer charges against their poorer brethren before secular magistrates (cf. 1 Cor. vi. 1 ff.), here, where the author is describing the treatment which Christians were accustomed to receive at the hands of wealthy men as a class, the description gets its colour not from the conduct of wealthy Christians, but of wealthy non-Christians. Only of such could it be said that the chief reason why Christians should dislike and not honour them was the fact that they blasphemed the name of Jesus, which was borne not by themselves, but by the Christians (n. 8). Although there is no statement directly to that effect, it is easy to see how this blasphemy was uttered in connection with the civil processes, in which a malicious hint to the effect that the accused belonged to the sect of the Nazarenes or Christians must have prejudiced their case in the eyes of a non-Christian judge. If such was actually the case, no explanation is necessary why it is the rich non-Christians who are charged with such blasphemy. It is also easy to see how in common life men of wealth and position would be likely to express their contempt for the Nazarene and His poverty-stricken Church more frequently than would the poor (cf. John vii. 48 f.; Luke xvi. 14.—Acts iv. 1, 5 f., v. 17.—Acts iii. 6, xi. 29; Gal. ii. 10; 1 Cor. xvi. 1; 2 Cor. viii. 9; Rom. xv. 25–31).

That the readers were Jews is proved neither by ii. 21 (ὁ πατὴρ ἡμῶν; cf., however, Rom. iv. 1 ff.; 1 Cor. x. 1; Clement, 1 Cor. xxxi. 2) nor by the greeting (above, p. 76 f.); nor does it follow certainly from the use of συναγωγή (n. 1), and the employment of the expression “Lord of Sabaoth” (v. 4) in a passage where even a Gentile Christian, if he were familiar with the Scriptures, would recognise an echo of Isa. v. 9. It is proved rather by the general impression which the letter gives of the character of its readers. Though its purpose throughout is practical, the letter contains no warning against idolatry and the evils associated with it (n. 9), nor against unchastity, a subject dwelt upon at such length and with such emphasis in all letters written by Christians to Gentile Christians and Christians living among the Gentiles. Nothing is said which indicates the proximity of the readers to Gentiles and their contact with Gentile institutions. Furthermore, there is no mention of the relations of slaves to their masters,—relations, the significance of which was altogether different among Gentile Christians from what it was among Jews and Jewish Christians in Palestine. The non-Christians with whom the readers come in contact are Jews, not Gentiles. In ii. 18 f. this is self-evident (n. 5), and in ii. 6 f. it is the only natural inference; since it is necessary to assume the peculiar relations existing between Jewish Christians in Palestine and their chief opponents in order to explain naturally why it is just the upper classes who profane the name of Jesus by their treatment of those who bear his name (see above). Moreover, the sins and weaknesses which James denounces are the very ones for which Jesus scourged His countrymen, particularly the Pharisees. What James wants his readers to get rid of are the remnants of inherited faults (n. 2 end). Among these are the superficial hearing of God's word instead of that living of it which shows that it has been inwardly appropriated; pious prattle and profession instead of the practice of what they believe (Jas. i. 19–26, ii. 14–26, iii. 13; cf. Matt. vii. 21–27, xiii. 19–22, xv. 8, xxi. 28–31, xxiii. 3); the disposition to dogmatise and proselytise (Jas. i. 19 f., iii. 1–18; cf. Matt. vii. 3–5, xv. 14, xxiii. 4, 15 f.; Rom. ii. 19–24); the failure to fulfil the real requirements of the law, mercy, love, and justice, while paying devotion to its letter (Jas. i. 26 f., ii. 8–12, 15 f., v. 4–6; cf. Matt. xii. 7, xv. 2–9, xxiii. 23–33; Mark xii. 40); the getting of wealth without any thought of God, with the impossible attempt to divide their affections between God and earthly possessions (Jas. iv. 4, 13, v. 2; cf. Matt. vi. 19–24; Luke xii. 15–34, xvi. 13); the exercise of prayer without faith in God (Jas. i. 5–8, xiii. 16 f., v. 16 f.; cf. Matt. vii. 7–11; Luke xi. 5–13, xviii. 1–8); the judging, slandering, and cursing of their neighbours (Jas. iii. 9, iv. 11 f.; cf. Matt. v. 22, vii. 1); and the taking of oaths too lightly. The examples of oath formulæ in Jas. v. 12 are such as were in use among the Jews, not among the Greeks and Romans (n. 10); while the numerous references to objects in nature are at least suited to conditions in Palestine (n. 11).

If from what has been said above it is reasonably certain that the body of the readers to whom the letter was addressed were Jewish Christians living among their countrymen, this by no means precludes the possibility of there having been among them a number of native Gentiles and proselytes. Hofmann (vii. 3. 81–84, 159) held with good reason that there is reference to these in Jas. ii. 25; the lesson from Abraham's example is developed to its completion and finally stated in ii. 24; then follows the example of the heathen woman Rahab, which neither substantiates what has been said before nor develops a new phase of the truth, and appears to be dragged in without purpose. It does have point, however, if referring to a number of Gentiles who had been received into the Jewish Christian Churches, and if designed to say: the example of Rahab has the same lesson for them that the history of Abraham has for his descendants.

This being the case, we are able to determine when the letter was written, and to answer the question left unanswered above (p. 76 f.). If by the twelve tribes in the dispersion James meant the entire Christian Church, then the letter must have been written at a time when as yet there were but few Gentile converts, and while these were still members of Churches which otherwise were composed of Jewish Christians, i.e. before Paul's missionary labours had resulted in the organisation of a number of Churches composed mainly of Gentile Christians, and before the Gentile Church began to develop along lines independent of the Jewish Christian Church. The same conclusion holds also if we assume that James intended by the expression to designate the Jewish Christian as the true Israel; for in the membership of the Churches organised in Asia Minor, Macedonia, Greece, and Rome, there was included among the Gentiles a considerable number of Jews who had accepted Christ. These James could not ignore when speaking of the twelve tribes in the dispersion. Nor if his letter was meant for them could he have remained so entirely silent concerning the very peculiar position which they occupied in relation to the Gentile majorities in the Churches where they were; neither could he have ignored so completely all those questions arising out of this situation, which since the first missionary journey of Paul and Barnabas had agitated the minds of Jewish and Gentile Christians alike, and occupied the attention of leaders on both sides. If it be assumed that the letter was written after the time when a faction of the Jewish Church undertook to force the observation of the Mosaic law upon the newly formed Gentile Church as a means and condition of the acceptance of the Gentiles with God, it is impossible, in view of the historical situation, to understand the entire silence of the letter about the question of the obligatoriness of the Mosaic law upon all Christians. Equally difficult of explanation is the simple way in which the author speaks, on the one hand, of the word with its life-begetting power and of the law of liberty (i. 18-21, 25, ii. 12); and, on the other hand, of justification by works (ii. 14-26), without in any way suggesting in contrast the bondage of the law. If, now, as is probable, the Gentile Christian Churches in Lycaonia were not organised before the year 50 or 51 (Chron. Survey, Part XI.), we have the latest date at which

James could have addressed his letter to the Church while it was still entirely Jewish, and confined to Palestine and the regions immediately adjoining. Only thus does the designation of the readers in Jas. i. 1 become perfectly clear. Although the idea expressed in this address can be traced back to the preaching of Jesus, and even to that of the Baptist (above, p. 81), the definite form which it here assumes, if it is to appear natural at all, must have some historical explanation. The Churches organised in various parts of Palestine and Syria prior to the year 50 were colonies of the mother Church in Jerusalem. Up to the time of Stephen's death Jerusalem was practically the only centre which the Church had; by the persecution of 35 the Christians were driven from Jerusalem and scattered even beyond the bounds of Palestine, with the result that many of the ties which had bound them to the Jewish nation while they remained a part of it, were severed. Wherever these Christians went they became the nuclei of new Churches, and we know that they travelled as far as Cyprus and Antioch. The journey of Peter and John to Samaria (Acts viii. 14-24), the more extended journeys of Peter (Acts ix. 32-xi. 2), the sending of Barnabas to Antioch (Acts xi. 22), and the visits to this city of other Jewish Christians like Agabus and John Mark (xi. 27, xii. 25), show that effort was made to hold the scattered members of the Church together. And this was the purpose for which the Epistle of James was written. Under these conditions, how natural that the feeling should grow that the Church was another people of God, chosen by God through Jesus, the true Israel! How natural also that existing conditions should suggest a term which should fittingly express the relation of the spiritual Israel both to the Jewish nation and to God's heavenly kingdom (n. 12). So James did not employ an obscure allegory, which was arbitrarily invented by himself, and afterwards spun out by other authors, and applied in a different direction, but actual conditions in the Church at the time became of themselves a symbol perfectly intelligible to James' contemporaries who found themselves in this situation.

1. (Pp. 83, 89.) According to N*BC, we should read in Jas. ii. 2, εἰς συναγωγὴν without the article. For this reason, if for no other, we must reject the assertion that, in inconceivable contradiction to the salutation, the real destination of the Epistle is evidently "a single narrowly exclusive conventicle of Essene Jewish Christians" (Brückner, Chronol. Reihenfolge, 293). Further than this, ὑμῶν, following as it does an address to the readers which plainly characterises them as Christians, just as certainly excludes the view that what is referred to is a Jewish synagogue, which these Christians yet occasionally visit. Something regarding συναγωγή may be found in Harnack on Herm. Mand. xi. p. 115, and in the writer's Forsch. ii. 164. It denotes originally, and in profane Greek usually, (1) the act of collecting and assembling the meeting, Ex. xxiii. 16, xxxiv. 22; Deut. x. 4; Sir. xxxiv. 3; Ps. Sol. xvii. 50 (cf. xvii. 48, x. 8); of the meetings of Christians for worship, Ign. ad. Polyc. iv. 2; Dionys. Al. quoted in Eus. H. E. vii. 11, 17, cf. 9. 2. Also in a heathen inscription published by Foucart, Assoc. relig. 238, not a corporation, but a "réunion en l'honneur de Zeus"; (2) concretely: the assembled congregation, commonly for ηγγ Ex. xii. 3; Num. xiv. 7, 10, xvi. 19, not infrequently also for ληρ Num. x. 7. As in our "meeting," this second meaning cannot always be distinguished clearly from the first, e.g. Acts xiii. 43; Herm. Mand. xi. 9, of Christian meetings: ὅταν ἔλθῃ . . . εἰς συναγωγὴν ἀνδρῶν δικαίων, and ibid. §§ 9, 13, 14, three times more; cf. also the Gnostic Acts of Peter (ed. Lipsius, p. 56. 23, cf. p. 53. 17) and ἐπισυναγωγή, Heb. x. 25. So probably is it to be understood in our passage, though it is not impossible that we have here the third meaning, namely, place of meeting, Matt. vi. 2, 5; Luke iv. 16, vii. 5; John xviii. 20; Acts xviii. 4, 7, xxiv. 12. Whereas in these and other passages συναγωγή, without any modifying word, denotes Jewish meeting-places, the ὑμῶν here would seem to indicate that the Christians addressed had their own particular places of worship by themselves. An inscription of 318 A.D. (Le Bas-Waddington, iii. No. 2558) designates a building as συναγωγὴ Μαρκωνιστῶν. It does not seem to me at all certain that the African Commodian, Instr. i. 24. 11, understands by synagoga a Christian church. (4) Even aside from the meeting at a particular place and time, it may mean in general the religious community, association of those with common interests, for ηγγ Ex. xii. 19, 47, xvi. 22; Num. xvi. 24 (the company of Korah); Ps. xxii. 17; for ληρ Ex. xvi. 2, 3; Num. xv. 15, xvi. 47 (al. xvii. 12); cf. 1 Macc. ii. 42 (συναγ. Ἀσιδαίων), vii. 12 (συναγ. γραμματέων). Quite early, however, συναγωγή was used as the specific designation of the Jewish religious community in contrast to the Christian ἐκκλησία. We see this usage at least in process of formation in Rev. ii. 9, iii. 9; Just. Dial. cxxxiv (Αἰία ὁ λαὸς ὑμῶν καὶ ἡ συναγωγή, Παχὴλ δὲ ἡ ἐκκλησία ἡμῶν). We see it fully established in Commod. Instr. xxxix. 1-4; Apol. 253. Eusebius lays stress upon the fact that Jesus called His Church, not συναγωγή, but ἐκκλησία (Theoph. syr. iv. 12). On the other hand, the Ebionites in East Palestine called their Church community συναγωγή, and seem also to have retained the title ἀρχισυναγωγοί (Epiph. Hær. xxx. 18). The Evang. hiëros. translates ἐκκλησία in Matt. xvi. 18, xviii. 17 by συναγωγή (Forsch. i. 372, n. 1). The Christian compiler of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Benjamin, 11) terms the Church and the individual congregations of the Gentile Christians συναγωγή and συναγωγαὶ τῶν ἐθνῶν. But we find the word sometimes used of the Christian Church and its individual congregations even where we may not assume a direct connection with Palestine and Judaism: Just. Dial. lxiii; Theoph. ad Autol. ii. 14 (τὰς συναγωγὰς, λεγομένας δὲ ἐκκλησίας ἁγίας); Iren. iii. 6. 1 (here in an interpretation of Ps. lxxii. 1); Iren. iv. 31. 1 and 2 (αἱ δύο συν., the Jewish and the Christian, suggested by the story of Lot's daughters), a combination like that of Victorinus on Gal. iv. 24 (Mai, Script. vet. coll. iii. 2. 38), who, however, uses the opposite term: "ecclesiis Judæorum et Christianorum." In the discussion of our passage, we may leave out of account the common Greek usage under No. 1, and we should notice that James by no means avoids the word ἐκκλησία when he wishes to designate the Church as a corporate body (v. 14). When, then, he designates the Church assembly (or place of assembly) by συναγωγή instead of by ἐκκλησία (cf. per contra 1 Cor. xi. 18, xiv. 28, 35; 3 John 6; Didache, iv 14), and this, too, not in a theological discussion or in rhetorical speech, but in the simple description of an external event, this may be considered good evidence that we are here on Jewish soil or near it. This view is confirmed by the Ebionites of Epiphanius, by the Evang. hiëros., which arose in Palestine and exhibits many other Jewish expressions, and by the compiler of the Testaments, who, whether by nature or by design, wrote Greek just like a Jew (under No. 4). Hermas (under No. 2) shows by his speech that he is a Jew by birth or education (cf. the writer's Hirt des Hermas, 485-497). It should also be noted that Justin was born in Palestine; that Theophilus (under No. 4) and Ignatius (under No. 1) were bishops of the Syrian capital, and that the Marcionite "synagogue" referred to was some miles south of Damascus. Cf. also Epist. Hadriani given in Vopiscus, Saturninus, viii. 2, "Archisynagogus Judæorum . . . Christianorum presbyter"; Lampridius, Alex. Sev. 6, "Syrum archisynagogum." With regard to the failure to distinguish between Syrians and Jews, cf. Origen on Job xlii. 18 in Pitra, Analecta, ii. 390 f.

2. (Pp. 84, 90.) The continuity of thought in iii. 1-18 is unbroken, and this fact determines the meaning of particular sentences in it. The cursing, iii. 9, can hardly have reference to fellow-Christians, for in that case they would have been designated as such (cf. per contra, iv. 11); it refers rather to men whom the Christian, obtrusively desirous of being a teacher (iii. 1), would like to instruct and convert, so that James is calling to mind simply the dignity common to all men by virtue of their creation in the image of God. Moreover, in iii. 13-18, the matter under discussion is not, as it is from iv. 1 on, the behaviour of Christians one toward another, but rather the demeanour of the one who, lifted up by the consciousness of his own religious knowledge, desires to teach others, and thus falls into a bitter, disputatious tone, failing, however, for that reason to achieve the desired result, namely, the righteousness of the person to be instructed (cf. i. 20). The πραΰτης, which is the proper disposition for the reception of the word, is the very attribute which is indispensable in the teacher also (Matt. xi. 29; 2 Tim. ii. 24 f.; 2 Cor. x. 1; Gal. vi. 1; 1 Pet. iii. 15, towards non-Christians; Tit. iii. 2, "toward all men"; Ign. Trall. iii. 2; ad Polyc. ii. 1). In all probability μὴ ψεύδεσθε κατὰ τῆς ἀληθείας in iii. 14 is not an idle pleonasm, but (like Xenoph. Apol. Socr. 13, οὐ ψεύδομαι κατὰ τοῦ θεοῦ) = καταψεύδεσθαι (τι) τινος, "to make a lying statement about a thing or person" (cf. Ign. Trall. x.; Herm. Vis. i. 1. 7; Jos. c. Apion. ii. 10 beginning, 13 end; Ep. ad Diogn. iv. 3; Ep. Lugd. in Eus. H. E. v. 1. 14; Hippol. Refut. vii. 20 in.; Eus. v. 28, 6 and 16; Plutarch. de Superst. 10 end). If this is so, the warning here is not simply against lying, but it is presupposed that the person in question is speaking about the truth, i.e. saving truth, but that in so doing he makes statements that are in contradiction to that very truth. On this view, κατακαυχᾶσθε also, which further is modified by κατὰ τῆς ἀληθείας, is not any boasting in general, but a boasting specifically with reference to the truth, a bragging about the truth, which, however, at the same time contradicts it. This untruthfulness is not, however, a theoretical departure from Christian doctrine, but is rather practical, consisting in the fact that one who claims to be a knower and teacher of revealed truth opposes himself to others, thereby showing a lack of the wisdom and gentleness which necessarily flow from the real possession of the truth. Jas. i. 20 bears upon this very point. At all events, the translation, "The wrath of man doeth not what is right before God," sic Luther, is incorrect; for (1) the connecting link between i. 17 and i. 18–25 is plainly the concept λόγος ἀληθείας. Consequently the subject treated in i. 19 f. cannot be talkativeness and passionateness in general, but rather the evil disposition to teach others the word of God instead of allowing oneself to be instructed, thus becoming angry instead of waiting for God to give His blessing. (2) The thought involved in such a translation would require ὁ ὀργιζόμενος instead of ὀργή, if the passage were to be measurably clear. (3) Such a general statement would be very incorrect, for there is an anger which is righteous. (4) The evidently intended contrast between ἄνδρὸς and θεοῦ does not, on this view, receive its proper emphasis. We are not indeed to read with the later MSS. κατεργάζεται, yet neither is ἐργάζεται to be taken in the sense of ποιεῖ, as in Jas. ii. 9; Acts x. 35; Matt. vii. 23; rather, as in John vi. 27; 2 Cor. vii. 10, it has the meaning of κατεργάζεται (Jas. i. 3). The object of the verb is the thing produced. A man's anger does not bring about God's righteousness (cf. Matt. vi. 33, and below, § 7). This is a fruit which is sown in a peaceable spirit, and the growth and ripening of which must be waited for with patience (Jas. iii. 18). No man can come to believe that he himself can achieve righteousness through angry speech; yet, on the other hand, nothing is more common than for heralds of the truth to imagine that they should convert their hearers by passionate zeal. It can be therefore only the latter error that James is opposing; cf. Schneckenburger, Beiträge z. Einl. 199; Hofmann, vii. 3. 35. In Jas. i. 21 περίσσεια is used unquestionably in the sense of περίσσευμα (Rom. v. 17), and hence cannot mean excess (Matt. xii. 34); for a man should lay aside not only a certain excess of wickedness, but all wickedness. The only meaning possible is therefore "residue, remainder" (Mark viii. 8). The writer means the old hereditary faults which still cling even to those born of God, — the first-fruits of His creatures (i. 18), — in other words, the evil Jewish nature, the "leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees" (Matt. xvi. 6-12, xv. 1-20).

3. (P. 84.) Jas. i. 26 f., θηρσκός θηρσκέια, θηρσκέειν denotes not the pious disposition (εὐσέβεια, ὁσιότης, also θεοσέβεια, though this concept inclines towards θηρσκέια; cf. Seeberg, Forsch. v. 264 f.), but the outwardly displayed religion, worship, ceremonies (Philo, Quod deterior, vii, Mang. i. 195, πεπλάνηται γὰρ καὶ οὗτος τῆς πρὸς εὐσέβειαν ὁδοῦ, θηρσκέϊαν ἀντὶ ὁσιότητος ἡγούμενος καὶ δῶρα τῷ ἀδεκιάστῳ διδοῦς; cf. Wis. xi. 15, xiv. 16, 18, 27; Jos. Ant. ix. 13. 3; Col. ii. 18, 23; Clem. 1 Cor. xlv. 7); so that it also comes to mean not infrequently a publicly-professed religion together with its worship in distinction from other religions and forms of worship: Acts xxvi. 5; Ep. ad Diogn. i.; Melito quoted in Eus. iv. 26. 7; Ep. Lugd. in Eus. v. 1. 63.

4. (P. 85.) The words in Jas. ii. 18, ἀλλ' ἐρεῖ τις, at any rate do not introduce an objection to the author's preceding statements to be expected from one of the readers or from a like-minded Christian, as is the case in 1 Cor. xv. 35, cf. Rom. ix. 19, xi. 19; for the person speaking in ii. 18, 19 agrees with James in requiring works and in condemning faith without works; and the people characterised in ii. 14-17 are the ones who are taken to task in ii. 18, 19 also. On the other hand, James cannot introduce himself, or a Christian who agrees with him, as speaking in this way (cf. Rom. x. 18, 19); for what reason would there be in introducing a third person, when that person has nothing to say which James himself could not say just as well? Further, it is hard to understand how James could assert of himself so confidently, even though in the disguise of a third person, that he, in distinction from the one addressed, had works to show; cf. per contra, iii. 2. Then, too, it would be quite uncalled for on James' part to defend himself against the charge that he lacked the faith of which the person addressed boasted. This charge is implied in the speaker's offer through his works to prove his faith, thus called in question by his opponent. Finally, in recognising the formal orthodoxy of the Christians addressed, James could not possibly have limited their creed to their confession of monotheism. For these outwardly professing Christians are not content simply to acknowledge the unity of God, which the devils also do, or even to bless God as their Lord and Father (iii. 9), which the devils do not do, they confess their faith in Christ (ii. 1). From all of which it follows that the ἐρεῖ τις of ii. 18 is not an empty and purposeless phrase; rather there is thus introduced into the discussion between James and the τίς of ii. 14 a speaker who is represented as really a third person, and that, too, of another faith. But this third person must be a Jew, not a pagan; for the speaker praises the Christian addressed, even if in a sarcastic tone, for confessing monotheism, the fundamental dogma of Judaism. Not only is it evident that the Jewish Christians, following the example of Jesus (Mark xii. 29), held fast to the doctrinal content of the "Shema" from Deut. vi. 4-6, which every Israelite repeated morning and evening daily; but there is also no reason to doubt that as persons "zealous for the law" (Acts xxi. 20), they repeated it with their fellow-countrymen after their conversion as well as before it. Later Jewish Christians emphasised the μοναρχικὴ θηρσκέια so much, that the distinguishing mark of Christianity came to be regarded as of less importance than the fundamental dogma common to Jews and Jewish Christians (Clem. Hom. vii. 12, v. 28;

Ep. Petri ad Jac. 1). But besides this, James would have defeated his own purpose if he had made the Jew introduced by him speak of the doctrinal difference between Judaism and Christianity. Lastly, as to the form of the introduction, it goes without saying that the Jew does not begin to speak until after ἐπεὶ τις, and hence that the ἀλλά is spoken by James himself. After giving his own judgment, he uses ἀλλά to introduce as something new and startling the doubly humiliating judgment of the Jew—ἀλλά, even without καί, being adapted to this purpose (cf. John xvi. 2; 2 Cor. vii. 11). That it is not James himself who is speaking in ii. 18, 19, follows also from the fact that in these sentences not a single thought from ii. 14–17 is developed further. It is not until ii. 20 that James begins to speak again, and resumes the thought of ii. 17. The assumption of Spitta, Z. Gesch. u. Lit. ii. 79, that an objection of the man of faith without works, who has been attacked by James, has fallen out after ἐπεὶ τις, and that James begins to answer this with ὁ πιστὸς ἔχει, is not called for by the text, and for positive reasons is inadmissible.

5. (Pp. 86, 90.) Since ὁ ταπεινός and ὁ πλούσιος in i. 9 f. form an antithesis, the former cannot be a lightly accented epithet of a merely explanatory character (the brother, who by very reason of being a brother, is, as everybody knows, always poor likewise); it is rather within the class denoted by ὁ ἀδελφός (perhaps better without ὁ, following Cod. B) that the poor is contrasted with the rich. On the view that the rich non-Christian is contrasted with the poor Christian, the ground upon which the rich man should boast remains unclear. If ταπείνωσις denotes the exact opposite of ἔψος, i.e. lack of moral and religious worth, or even lack of the riches of the rich man,—an interpretation which has no usage at all to support it,—then the same καυχάσθω, which is meant very seriously when used with its first subject, must, when used with the second, have the sense of a mocking challenge: "Let the rich man boast, if he likes, in his baseness or his miserable riches." Such a rendering is impossible, for the added reason that the argument which follows presupposes not an ironical challenge to sinful boasting, but an earnest exhortation to glory only in the possessions that endure. Nor indeed can ταπείνωσις denote the attitude of humility (cf. Jas. iv. 6–10; Sir. iii. 18), for to glory in this would be the worst kind of pride; it denotes rather, as might be expected from its position in antithesis to ἔψος, the rank and condition of lowliness (Luke i. 48; Phil. iii. 21). If the rich man is a Christian, of course he also possesses the exalted station of which the poor Christian should rest assured; but as it is fitting for the latter to emphasise just that side of his condition as a Christian which forms a contrast to his outward situation, so likewise is it for the former (cf. 1 Cor. vii. 22 with reference to slaves and free). We need only recall Matt. xix. 23–26; Luke vi. 24, xvi. 14 f., 19–31, to see that the rich man is the very one who should be glad and thankful to belong among the confessors of Jesus, those who were called οἱ μικροί by Jesus Himself, and who are despised by the world. The reason added in i. 10b–11 is intended primarily to enforce the warning to the rich man implied in 10a, but it thus bears at the same time upon the positive exhortation. This reason agrees with the context; for just as poverty is a temptation to the poor man, so are riches for the rich man. It is also very applicable to the Christian who is rich; for since he is rich, indeed since he is a man living in the flesh, he is actually like the fast fading flower; cf. Jas. iv. 14; 1 Tim. vi. 6-10, 17-19; Ps. xc. 5 f., ciii. 15.

6. (P. 88.) We have evidence that Christian preaching was permitted temporarily in Jewish synagogues (Acts ix. 22, xviii. 4-6, xix. 8), and that Jewish Christians in Palestine visited the synagogues, the Jews on their part resorting to prohibitive measures in order to exclude them (cf. Derenbourg, Hist. et géogr. de la Palestine, 354 f.). The perfectly reasonable inference, then, is that the reverse was true, and that Christian services were visited by non-Christians. Quite aside from such an inference, however, we have direct proof in 1 Cor. xiv. 23-25 that this was the case. Whether this was done from a religious desire, or from curiosity, or even with hostile intent, is indifferent in this supposed case.

7. (P. 88.) It will not do in Jas. ii. 5 to connect πλουσίους κτλ. with τοὺς πτωχοὺς as its attribute; for (1) a δέ or ἀλλὰ would be necessary with πλουσίους; (2) the men whom God has chosen are not rich in faith before and apart from their being thus chosen, and are certainly not heirs of the kingdom; it is only through being chosen that they become so. Consequently what we have here is the good Greek usage of ἐκλέγεσθαι with a double accusative, the εἶναι (Eph. i. 4) not being necessary in such a construction, cf. Mayor, 79 f. It stands to reason that James does not say here that all the poor and none of the rich find grace before God, any more than we may infer from Matt. xi. 25 that all uncultured people and none of superior culture attain to a knowledge of salvation. The self-evident meaning of general statements such as these, which briefly sum up a multitude of individual experiences (1 Cor. i. 27 f.), is clearly expressed by Paul in 1 Cor. i. 26 (οὐ πολλοί).

8. (P. 89.) The blaspheming in Jas. ii. 7 is not an indirect dishonouring of the name of God or of Christ through the unworthy behaviour of those who confess Him; for (1) this could not well have been left unexpressed (cf. Eus. H. E. v. 1. 48, διὰ τῆς ἀναστροφῆς αὐτῶν βλασφημούντων τὴν δόδον); (2) the blasphemers must have been designated as themselves bearers of the name of Christ (ἐπ' αὐτοὺς instead of ἐφ' ὑμᾶς; cf. Herm. Sim. viii. 6); (3) such indirect blasphemy of God or of Christ is always expressed in the passive form elsewhere: Rom. ii. 24 (Isa. lii. 5); 1 Tim. vi. 1; Tit. ii. 5; 2 Pet. ii. 2; Clem. 1 Cor. i. 1 (xlvii. 7); Clem. 2 Cor. xiii. 1-4; Ign. Trall. viii. 2; Polyc. ad Phil. x. 2. "The honourable name," judging simply from the O.T. parallels, from which the expression is borrowed (Isa. xliii. 7; Jer. xiv. 9, xv. 16; Amos ix. 12; cf. Acts xv. 17), can be none other than the name of God or of Christ. In what form the readers bore this name, whether as μαθηταὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ (John vii. 3, xviii. 25; Acts iv. 13), or as Ναζωραῖοι (Acts xxiv. 5, following the usage Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ναζωραῖος, Matt. xxvi. 71; John xviii. 5; Acts xxvi. 9; cf. GK, ii. 662 f., n. 2, where there is reference also to the reviling of the Nazarenes on the part of the Jews), or as Χριστιανοί (Acts xi. 26, xxvi. 28; 1 Pet. iv. 16; cf. Mark ix. 41), is as impossible to conclude from the expression used by James as to gather from the above O.T. passages in what form Israel bore Jehovah's name. In this passage, which would lend itself most inappropriately to such a reference, there is no trace of any government persecution of the Christians because of their confession, as there is none in other passages (e.g. i. 2-12) where such reference would be quite in place.

9. (P. 90.) In the matter of worship and similar topics, cf. Acts xv. 20, 29, xxi. 25; 1 Cor. v. 10 ff., viii. 1-xi. 1, especially viii. 10, x. 7, 14-22; 2 Cor. vi. 15; Gal. v. 20; 1 John v. 21; Rev. ii. 14, 20, xxi. 8, xxii. 15; Didache, iii. 4, v. 1, vi. 3; Herm. Sim. ix. 21. 3. Cf. also the reminder of the readers' former worship, 1 Cor. vi. 9, 11, xii. 2; 1 Thess. i. 9; Gal. iv. 8; 1 Pet. iv. 3; Clem. 2 Cor. i. 6, iii. 1, xvii. 1, and the parallels, Col. iii. 5; Eph. v. 5; Herm. Mand. xi. 4; Polyc. ad Phil. xi. 2. In the matter of πορνεία, cf. Acts xv. 20, 29, xxi. 25; 1 Cor. v. 1-13, vi. 9-11, 13-20, vii. 2, 9, x. 8; 2 Cor. vii. 1, xii. 21; Gal. v. 13-21; Eph. iv. 19, v. 3-14; Col. iii. 5; 1 Thess. iv. 3-5; 1 Tim. i. 10; 2 Tim. ii. 22, iii. 6; Rom. i. 24-27, vi. 19-21, xiii. 13; 1 Pet. iv. 3; Rev. ii. 14, 20-24, xiv. 8, xvii. 1 ff., xix. 2, xxi. 8, xxii. 15; Didache, ii. 1, iii. 3, v. 1; Herm. Mand. iv. 1; Clem. 2 Cor. iv. 3, viii. 6-ix. 4, xii. 5, xiv. 3-5; Pliny, ad Traj. xvi. 7. On the other hand, James speaks in general only of worldly luxury, i. 27, iv. 1-4 (as to μοιχαλίδες, see above, p. 87), iv. 9, v. 1-3, 5. Perhaps in ii. 11 there is a testimony to the prevailing honourableness of the readers as regards the conjugal life. The command μὴ μοιχεύσης was generally observed, the command μὴ φονεύσης often through hard-heartedness transgressed, cf. iv. 2, v. 6. In the matter of the life among the Gentiles, cf. 1 Cor. v. 1, 10 ff., ix. 24, x. 32, xv. 33; 2 Cor. vi. 14-18; Eph. iv. 17 ff.; 1 Pet. ii. 12-17, iv. 3 ff.; Rom. xii. 2, xiii. 1-7; 3 John 7; Ign. Trall. iii. 2, viii. 2; Herm. Mand. x. 4; Sim. i. 10, viii. 9. 1. In the matter of slaves, cf. 1 Cor. vii. 21 f.; Eph. vi. 5-9; Col. iii. 22-iv. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 18-25; 1 Tim. vi. 1 f.; Tit. ii. 9 f.; Philem. 10-21; Didache, iv. 10 f.; Ign. ad Polyc. iv. 3 (1 Cor. xii. 13; Gal. iii. 28; Col. iii. 11); also the writer's Skizzen, 93-115, especially 102, also 136 ff., 350, n. 17.

10. (P. 91.) For the form of oath, cf. Matt. v. 34-37, xxiii. 22, and in addition Lightfoot, Op. ii. 2, 93, 359; Schöttgen, Hor. Hebr. 1733, pp. 48, 202. It is characteristic of the Jewish, in distinction from the Gentile oath, that it avoids the name of God. In place of such a sacrilegious formula, Philo recommends swearing preferably by the Earth, Sun, Stars, Heaven, and the Universe entire (Leg. Spec. i, ed. Mangey, ii. 271).

11. (P. 91.) The scorching wind, i. 11 (Luke xii. 55), the early and the latter rain, v. 7 (providing ὑετόν be an essentially right completion of the passage, cf. Deut. xi. 14), fig, olive, and vine culture (iii. 12) in addition to considerable agriculture (v. 4, 7), salt springs (iii. 12), unless in the obscure and most uncertainly traditioned text there be a reference to ἡ θάλασσα ἡ ἀλυκή—the Dead Sea (Num. xxxiv. 3, 12; Deut. iii. 17; Josh. xv. 2, 5; cf. Gen. xiv. 3; Ezek. xlvii. 9 ff.). On the other hand, we can understand the Mediterranean as the source of the conceptions in i. 6, iii. 4, without assuming that James, at the time he wrote, was resident in Joppa—a view that Hitzig at one time expressed; cf. for additional points, Hug, Eintl. ii.³ 511.

12. (P. 93.) Acts viii. 1, πάντες διεσπάρησαν; viii. 4, οἱ οὖν διασπαρέντες διῆλθον κτλ.; xi. 19, οἱ μὲν οὖν διασπαρέντες διῆλθον ἕως . . . Ἀντιοχείας. The connection of Jas. i. 1 with these facts I find first noticed by Georgius Syncellus, ad A. M. 5537, ed. Bonn, i. 623. Accordingly we are to consider as included in this greeting the communities in Judea, Samaria, and Galilee, Acts viii. 1, 14, 25, 40, ix. 31, 32, 36, x. 24, xxi. 8; Gal. i. 22; 1 Thess. ii. 14; further, those at Ptolemais and Tyre, in Cyprus, and at Antioch, Acts xi. 1-26, xiii. 1, xxi. 3, 7, and then the one at Damascus, where it would seem that, even before the death of Stephen, there were disciples, Acts ix. 2-25. In fact, the community which reassembled in Jerusalem after the persecution that followed Stephen's death is not to be excluded. To be sure, without taking into account the half-Jewish Samaritans, Acts viii. 14, and such isolated cases as Acts viii. 27, x. 1-11, 18; cf. xv. 7, there were, even previous to the first mission tour, not a few Gentile Christians in Antioch. But supposing that they numbered into the hundreds, their proportion to the many myriads of Jewish Christians (Acts xxi. 20) was never more than 1 to 100, and the way in which James gives passing notice to this exceptional class (above, p. 91) and then pays no further attention to it, is in perfect keeping with the relations existing in the Church up to 50 A.D.

§ 5. THE PERSONALITY OF JAMES.

The author introduces himself to his readers by the simple mention of his name, which was a very common one among the Jews, and by the modest designation of himself as a Christian (i. 1). The omission of all reference to the occasion for his writing is not explained entirely by the fact that what he writes is not a letter, but an address thrown into the form of a letter in order the more easily to reach his readers, who were widely scattered (n. 1). There is no indication as to the grounds on which James based his right to address his opinions in any form to the entire Church of his time with so much earnestness and with so little regard to personal feelings. The tone of the letter is not overbearing; James calls his readers brethren, and reckons himself among them, not only when he is referring to their experience of divine grace (i. 18), but also when speaking of their moral weaknesses and actual failures (iii. 2, 9). But he speaks as an older brother accustomed to receive attention from his brothers when he gives advice, and unquestioning obedience when he rebukes them (n. 2).

Who is this James whose authority is so widely acknowledged? The opinion that he was the Apostle James, the son of Zebedee, is of late origin, and was not very generally held (n. 3). On account of the obvious connection between the number of the apostles and the twelve tribes of Israel, one would expect that an apostle, in addressing the twelve tribes of the spiritual Israel, would indicate the fact that he was one of the twelve apostles. Although James the son of Zebedee, who was executed very early in the history of the Church, in the year 44 (Acts xii. 2), was one of Jesus' intimate disciples, there is no evidence that his position was so commanding as to render unnecessary any explanation on his part why he, and not one of the other apostles, should write his opinions to the entire Church. In Acts i.-xii. only Peter and John are prominent. Moreover, when this James is mentioned, he is always spoken of as one of the sons of Zebedee, or as a brother of John (Matt. iv. 21, x. 2, xvii. 1, xx. 20, xxvi. 37, xxvii. 56; Mark i. 19, iii. 17, v. 37, x. 35; Luke v. 10; John xxi. 2; Acts xii. 2), or this relation is indicated by the context (Mark i. 29 cf. i. 19, ix. 2, x. 41 cf. x. 35, xiii. 3 cf. iii. 16-18, xiv. 33; Luke vi. 14, viii. 51, ix. 28, 54; Acts i. 13). What has just been said argues also, and in some respects with even greater force, against the assumption that the letter was written sometime after the death of James the son of Zebedee by the Apostle James the son of Alphæus; unless this second James of the apostolic circle is artificially identified with a third person of the same name. Where the name of this second Apostle James actually occurs he is always spoken of as the son of Alphæus (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13). On the other hand, in spite of the frequency of its occurrence, the name James is always deemed a sufficient designation of the James who at the latest from the year 44 on was the head of the Jerusalem Church and the leader of Jewish Christianity: Acts xii. 17, xv. 13-21, xxi. 18; Gal. ii. 9—according to the correct reading, James is mentioned before Peter and John; Gal. ii. 12.

That, among the Christians of the apostolic age, there was one James distinguished above all his contemporaries of the same name is strongly attested by Jude 1. This is the James who, according to the tradition of the second century, was the first bishop of Jerusalem. Although the accounts of Hegesippus, Clement of Alex., and later authors are partly legendary, so much may be regarded as historical: this James never ceased to love his countrymen and to pray for their conversion; on account of his strict observance of the law and otherwise ascetic manner of life, and on account of his faithful attendance upon the temple worship, he was held in high esteem, even among non-Christian Jews, and, among other titles, bore that of "the Just." Shortly before the outbreak of the Jewish War, probably at the time of the Passover in the year 66, because of his public confession of Jesus, he was hurled from the top of the temple by fanatical Jews, stoned, and finally clubbed to death (n. 4). In this account the subordination of the distinctively Christian to the Jewish elements in the description of James' character impresses one as being original. It was just because of this disposition of his that the orthodox rabbis and Pharisees tried to induce him openly to deny that Jesus was the Messiah. His unhesitating confession left no doubt as to where he stood. Similarly for the Ebionitic account which makes James the head of all the Churches centring in the Hebrew Church at Jerusalem, there must be some historical basis (n. 5). So long as the Church was composed only of congregations whose charter members had been members of the Jerusalem Church before they were scattered abroad by persecution, and before the missionary work among the Gentiles, which began from Antioch, made this city a new centre of church life independent of Jerusalem, the man at the head of the mother Church must have had authority throughout the entire Church. Until this independent movement developed, his name was a power even in Antioch, and could be used to intimidate even a man like Peter (Gal. ii. 12; regarding the time, cf. Chron. Survey, Part XI.). Such a position on the part of the writer is presupposed in this letter, which tradition has always ascribed to James, the head of the Jerusalem Church.

Tradition is just as unanimous in identifying this "bishop" James with James "the brother of the Lord." There is little doubt, therefore, that the writer of this letter is the James referred to by Paul in Gal. i. 19 (n. 6). As to the sense in which he was called a brother of the Lord, there has been difference of opinion ever since the beginning of the second century, and after the fourth century the question was warmly debated. But it is easy to see that it was dogmatic and æsthetic rather than historical considerations which prevented a general acceptance of the facts as stated in the Bible and in the earliest traditions of the Jerusalem Church. It is shown elsewhere (Forsch. vi. 328-363) that this James, his brother Jude (Jude 1), together with a Simon and a Joseph, all younger brothers of Jesus, were real sons of Joseph and Mary (Mark vi. 3; Matt. xiii. 55). After the death of their father they lived with their mother (Mark iii. 21, 31-35; Matt. xii. 46-50; Luke viii. 19-21), without, however, keeping themselves entirely apart from their brother's public work. When Jesus selected Capernaum as the centre of His prophetic work in Galilee, His brothers removed thither with their mother (John ii. 12; cf. Matt. iv. 13); while their sisters, who were probably married, continued to reside in Nazareth (Matt. xiii. 56; Mark vi. 3). Still, Jesus' brothers were never among His intimate disciples. We learn from John vii. 3-10 that six months before Jesus' death His brothers did not believe in Him. But the words which this remark of the evangelist is intended to explain, bitter as they may seem, are very far from betraying indifference, and certainly do not show any hostility. Since

Jesus' influence on the people in Galilee was already on the wane, and the ranks of His faithful followers were growing constantly thinner (John vi. 60-71), the brothers impatiently urge the Lord to go back now to Jerusalem, which He had avoided for a long time, and there at the centre of Jewish life, where He had won considerable following earlier (John ii. 23, iii. 22-iv. 3), to remove all doubt, particularly their own doubt, regarding His high calling by there performing miracles such as He had been doing in Galilee since His withdrawal from Jerusalem. Jesus did not follow their suggestion, or, at least, He followed it in such a way as to teach them that they ought to accommodate their ideas to His. We are unable to trace accurately the development of their relation to Him. We only know that at the latest within a few days after the Resurrection they had decided for Jesus; for on the day of the Ascension we find them gathering for prayer with their mother and the apostles (Acts i. 14), and we have the record of a separate appearance of the risen Jesus to James, the brother of the Lord (n. 7). In the year 57, Paul mentions the brothers of the Lord and the apostles as being married missionaries. Jude was a married man, for tradition mentions his grandsons; and this may have been true also of Joseph and Simon. Paul could hardly have meant to include James; for though the tradition has more to say about James than about any other of Jesus' brothers, it makes no mention of descendants of his; only distant relatives are spoken of. The picture of James as a stern ascetic, so deeply impressed upon the memory of the early Church, favours the view that he remained unmarried. And then, according to all the evidence which we can gather from the N.T. (Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18; Gal. i. 19, ii. 9, 12), from the tradition of the Church, and from the Ebionitic literature, James was a resident of Jerusalem, whereas the persons referred to in 1 Cor. ix. 5 were itinerant teachers.

In order thus to overshadow every contemporary of the same name in the early Church, from the death of James, the son of Zebedee, in 44 to the time of his own death in 66, James must have occupied a very prominent place in Jerusalem; and it is to be remembered that this list includes not only a certain James the Less (Mark xv. 40), but also the Apostle James, the son of Alphæus. Whether the latter died undistinguished at an early date, or whether his influence was never widely exerted, we do not know, but the fact that his position in the early Church was an entirely subordinate one must simply be recognised. Just as the bare name Simon stands for Simon Cephas, even under circumstances where the Apostle Simon the Zealot seems to be present (Luke xxiv. 34; Acts xv. 14), so from 44 to 66 and long afterward the name James was always understood as referring to the eldest of Jesus' four brothers.

1. (P. 101.) As regards the authoritative tone in which the author speaks, there is a general resemblance between the Epistle of James and the communications of Jewish patriarchs (above, pp. 10, 33), the Easter letters of the Christian patriarch of Alexandria (GK, ii. 203), or even the Lenten pastoral letters of bishops in our own time. In these cases, ecclesiastical custom, or the recognised official character of the authors, is sufficient occasion for writing. On the other hand, compare the explanations or even apologies in Rom. i. 1-16, xv. 14 ff.; 1 Cor. i. 11; 2 Cor. ii. 3, 9, iii. 1, vi. 11-13, vii. 8 ff., xi. 1 ff., xiii. 10; Eph. iii. 3 f.; Col. ii. 1-5; Phil. iii. 1; 1 Pet. v. 12; 2 Pet. i. 12; Heb. xiii. 18, 22; Ign. Rom. iv. 3; Eph. xii. 1; Trall. iii. 3; Polyc. ad Phil. iii. 1, xii. 1. The only remains of early Christian literature which are comparable with James in this regard are the Johannine Epistles.

2. (P. 101.) Change of tone is reflected in change of address. ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοί, i. 16, 19, ii. 5; ἀδελφοί μου, i. 2, ii. 1, 14, iii. 1, v. 12, 19; ἀδελφοί, iv. 11, v. 7, 9, 10. Until, finally, the name of brother is omitted altogether, iii. 13, iv. 1, 13, and the tone becomes that of severest rebuke, ii. 20, iv. 4, v. 1.

3. (P. 102.) The old Latin translation, the latest and best edition of which is that of J. Wordsworth (Stud. bibl. Oroniensiæ, i. 113-123), based on the only existing MS. (ninth or tenth century), has this note at the end, "explicit epistola Jacobi filii Zæbedei" (sic). A trace of this same view, for which Wordsworth in another passage, i. 144, probably by an oversight, makes Jerome responsible, is to be found in the confused lists of the twelve apostles and seventy disciples known as those of Hippolytus and Dorotheus, where it is said of James the son of Zebedee, that he preached the gospel "to the twelve tribes of Israel in the diaspora." Then either no other James is mentioned among the apostles, while James the brother of the Lord is mentioned among the seventy disciples without any suggestion that he wrote the letter (Chron. pasch., ed. Bonn, ii. 122, 136; cf. Cave, Hist. lit. 1720, p. 107), or, without his being made the son of Alphæus, his name is found among the apostles between "Judas of James" and "Thaddæus Judas" on the one hand, and Simon Zelotes and Matthew on the other (Lagarde, Const. ap. p. 283). In the first printed edition of the Syriac N.T. (ed. Widmanstad, Viennæ, 1555), the following is found in Syriac on a title-page just before the Catholic Epistles: In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ we print three Epistles of James, Peter, and John, who were witnesses of our Lord's revelation, when He was transfigured before their eyes on Mount Tabor, and when they saw Moses and Elias, who talked with Him. Until it is proved that this statement is found in ancient MSS. the entire title must be regarded as the work of the Jacobite bishop Moses of Mardin, who furnished the MS. for the edition of 1555. Of an entirely different character is the frequent designation of the writer of the letter as an apostle. Thus at times he is so called by Eusebius (Montfaucon, Patr. coll. nova, i. 247), in the sixth century MSS. of the Pesh. in Wright's Catal. of Syr. MSS. pp. 80, 81, 82, and in the Latin versions of Origen, cf. ed. Delarue, ii. 139, 158, 671 ("apostolus est qui dicit"), but never in the writings which are extant in Greek. This may be due to Jerome's identification of the bishop James with James the son of Alphæus, or simply to the fact that in ancient times the apostolic title was quite freely used (cf. Skizzen, 341, n. 12)—being given to the seventy disciples (Iren. ii. 21. 2; Tert. c. Marc. iv. 24 in.)—but especially to authors whose writings were regarded with more or less unanimity as belonging in the N.T., as Luke (Hippol. De Antichr. 56), Barnabas (Clem. Strom. ii. 31 and 35), Clement of Rome (Clem. Strom. iv. 105). In modern times the authorship of the Epistle by James the son of Zebedee has been defended by G. Jäger, ZfLTh. 1878, S. 420 ff.

4. (P. 103.) Cf. the treatise on "Brüder und Vetter Jesu," Forsch. vi. 225-363. The title $\acute{\alpha}\ \delta\iota\kappa\alpha\iota\omicron\varsigma$ was given him not only by Christians, such as the redactor of the Gospel of the Hebrews (GK, ii. 700, Frag. 18), Hegesippus (Eus. ii. 23. 18, iv. 22. 4), Clement (Eus. ii. 1. 3 f.); but, according to Hegesippus, by all from the time of Jesus (Eus. ii. 23. 4), particularly by the unbelieving Jews (Eus. ii. 23. 6, 15-17). Probably by the event which followed shortly after the death of James, Hegesippus did not understand the siege and capture of Jerusalem by Titus (A.D. 70), but the outbreak of the Jewish war under Vespasian in the spring of A.D. 67 (Eus. ii. 23. 18, $\kappa\alpha\iota\ \epsilon\iota\theta\upsilon\varsigma\ \omicron\upsilon\delta\epsilon\sigma\pi\alpha\sigma\iota\alpha\upsilon\omicron\varsigma\ \pi\omicron\lambda\iota\omicron\rho\kappa\epsilon\acute{\iota}\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$). A war which not only ended with the siege and capture of Jerusalem, but which in its previous conduct had been characterized mainly by the investment and capture of fortified places (Jotapata, Gamala, Tabor), might very appropriately be described as a $\pi\omicron\lambda\iota\omicron\rho\kappa\epsilon\acute{\iota}\nu\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma\ \text{Ἰουδαίους}$; cf. 2 Kings xvii. 4, 5; Eus. H. E. iv. 5. 2 and 6 title; cf. also Chron. ad a. Abrah. 2039 of the entire Hadrian-itic war. This statement of Hegesippus is our only authority, since the passage in Josephus (Ant. xx. 9. 1) where it is said that "James the brother of Jesus, the so-called Christ," along with several others, was condemned to be stoned for breaking the law by a court appointed by the high priest Ananus, in the year 62, shows unmistakable signs of interpolation by a Christian hand. Besides this passage, which is accurately quoted in H. E. ii. 23. 21, Eusebius cites another statement of Josephus (ii. 23. 20) which represents the destruction of Jerusalem as a penalty for the killing of James. This statement is not to be found in any of the extant MSS. of Josephus, but is given in essentially the same form by Origen, c. Cels. i. 47 (cf. ii. 13), and is elsewhere referred by him to the Antiquities of Josephus (Com. in Mt. xiii. 55, ed. Delarue, iii. 463). Since Eusebius cites the passage in direct discourse, while Origen gives it only in indirect discourse, it is highly improbable that Eusebius took it from Origen. More likely both read it in their Josephus, but not in the twentieth book of the Antiquities cited by Eusebius in the context, but in the Jewish War, in the fifth book of which something similar was found by later readers (Chron. pasch., ed. Bonn, i. 463). Origen, quoting from memory, made a slight mistake in citing his authority, as he does in making other quotations from Josephus (e.g. on Matt. xvii. 25; Del. iii. 805). This passage, which is not to be found in existing MSS. of the Jewish War, is even more open to suspicion than Ant. xx. 9. 1, which is extant. It is on the authority of the latter passage that the Chronicle of Eusebius fixes the date of James' death (a. Abrah. 2077, in the redaction of Jerome 2078, i.e. 61 or 62 A.D.), while the date given in the Paschal Chronicle (ed. Bonn, i. 460), 69 A.D., is based upon the other apocryphal Josephus passage, or upon a wrong interpretation of the statement of Hegesippus. The statements of Jerome, Vir. Ill. ii (cf. xiii), which depend upon Eusebius and which are very confused, are worthless. While Jerome seems to think that the gravestone of James, erected on the spot where he was executed, beside the temple, remained there only until the time of Hadrian, Hegesippus, who did not write before 180, says, ἐτι αὐτοῦ ἡ στήλη μένει παρὰ τῷ ναῷ. Andreas Cretensis, who lived in Jerusalem in 680, says of James (Anab. Hieros. ed. P. Kerameus, i. 12), λαβόντες αὐτὸν ἔθαψαν ἐν τόπῳ καλουμένῳ Καλῷ πλῆσιόν τοῦ ναοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ. In Jerome's time (Vir. Ill. ii end) it was a matter of common belief that he was buried on the Mount of Olives.

5. (P. 103.) Ep. Petri ad Jac. 1; Clementis ad Jac. 1; cf. Skizzen, 64 f., 342, n. 17. Nothing is said in Acts concerning the beginning of the "episcopate" of James. Just as we learn in Acts xi. 30 without any previous notice of the existence of presbyters in Jerusalem, so in Acts xii. 17 we learn that "James and the brethren" means the entire Jerusalem Church. Though not an apostle, he stands in close relation to the presbyters (Acts xv. 6, 13, 22 f.), and the latter are represented as gathering to him (Acts xxi. 18). Clement makes the vesting of James with the episcopate follow immediately upon the ascension (see Eus. ii. 1-3, and Forsch. iii. 73, 75, n. 1). Hegesippus says that James assumed the leadership of the Jerusalem Church, not like the bishops of other Churches who became the successors of the apostles who founded the Churches, on the death of the latter, but in conjunction with the apostles while these still remained for the most part in Palestine (Eus. ii. 23. 4, μετὰ τῶν ἀποστόλων, not post apostolos, as in Jerome, Vir. Ill. ii). More trustworthy seems the statement of Eusebius (ii. 1. 2), which probably rests back upon other passages in Hegesippus, that he became bishop after the death of Stephen. The changes in the organisation of the Jerusalem Church, which we observe from Acts xi. 30 on, were probably the result of the temporary dissolution of the Church in the year 35 (Acts viii. 1-4), not of the events recorded in Acts xii. As late as the fourth century, in Jerusalem was shown the seat in which James was accustomed to sit (Eus. vii. 19.

32. 29). Gregorius Barhebr. (Chron. Eccl., ed. Abbeloos et Lamy, i. 62), who could not have derived his information from Eusebius, testifies that this was true in the time of the Antiochian Bishop Timæus (called by him Timothy), circa 270-280 A.D. While the principal reason for James' promotion to a place of commanding influence may have been his personal integrity, there was another influence that helped to bring it about. After his death, Simeon, another relative of Jesus, was chosen bishop (Heges.; see Eus. iv. 22. 4). The grandchildren of Judas the brother of Jesus were considered by non-Christians to be of the line of David, and until the time of Hadrian occupied prominent positions in the Palestinian Church (Heges.; see Eus. iii. 20. 1-8, 32. 6, cf. iii. 11. 12, 19). As late as the third century there were still kindred of Jesus in Palestine and outside who were honoured with the title δεσπόσυντοι (belonging to the family of the δεσπότης, i.e. Christ. Cf. 2 Pet. ii. 1; Jude 4), and who boasted about their nobility (Africanus; see Eus. i. 7. 11, 14). According to the same writer, they had spread from Nazareth and Kokaba throughout the world. According to the Syrian tradition, three successive bishops of Seleucia, in the third century,—the third a contemporary of Porphyrius, the opponent of Christianity,—were descendants of the carpenter Joseph (Greg. Barh. Chron. Eccl. iii. 22 f.; Assemani, Bibl. Or. ii. 395). With these traditions compare the fact that after the destruction of the temple and of the high priesthood, which had always had a certain show of princely dignity (Acts xxiii. 5), the Jews called the Rabbi who, after seventy, stood at the head of the highest rabbinic school and court, a prince (רִבְזִי), regarded the office as hereditary, and laid emphasis upon the descent of Hillel and his posterity, from David on the maternal side. One is reminded also of the so-called exiliarch, the "head of the diaspora" in Babylon, and of the Jewish ethnarchs of Alexandria. James, and after him Simeon, was such a Nasi of the Christian twelve tribes. So, when in Clem. Recogn. i. 68, James is called episcoporum princeps in contrast to Caiaphas, the princeps sacerdotum, it is not out of keeping with the view current in the earliest Jewish Christian Church.

6. (P. 104.) C. Wieseler's hypothesis (ThStKr. 1842, S. 80 ff., cf. his Kom. zum Galaterbrief, ad loc.), that the brother of Jesus mentioned in Gal. i. 19 was not an apostle, while the James referred to in Gal. ii. 9, 12 is James the son of Alphæus, scarcely requires refutation to-day. It would be easier to believe that two different persons are referred to in Gal. i. 19 and Gal. ii. 9, 12, if in the former passage mention were made simply of a James, and then later of a James further distinguished as ὁ ἀδελφὸς τοῦ κυρίου. Gal. i. 19 deals with an event which took place while James the son of Zebedee was still alive, and in the connection it was natural to note that the James in question was not an apostle. On the other hand, the events mentioned in Gal. ii. 9, 12 took place subsequent to the death of the son of Zebedee.

7. (P. 105.) From 1 Cor. xv. 7 it is not clear whether the James referred to is an apostle or not. Nor is the statement of the Hebrew Gospel decisive; for, on the one hand, it represents the James to whom the risen Christ appeared as the brother of Jesus, known as "The Just"; but, on the other hand, it speaks of him as partaking of the Last Supper with Jesus, apparently regarding him as an apostle (Fragment 18, GK, ii. 700). This Gospel contradicts both Paul and the canonical Gospels when it speaks of the appearance as if it were the very first that occurred in the early morning. According to 1 Cor. xv. 7, the appearance to James occurred toward the end of the forty days (Acts i. 3, xiii. 31), and so must have taken place in Galilee, where Jesus appeared to more than five hundred brethren before He appeared to James. There is nothing to indicate that the brothers of Jesus were present at the Passover during which Jesus was put to death. John xix. 26 f. is more easy to understand if they retained their critical attitude and at the time remained away from Jerusalem. Although the Hebrew Gospel varies from the true tradition at this point, it does not impress one as being a mere idle tale. It is supported by 1 Cor. xv. 7. The saying of Jesus to James, "My brother, eat thy bread, for the Son of Man is risen from the dead," is beautiful. The vow of James which the saying presupposes, namely, that he will eat no more bread until he sees the Lord risen, is not only thoroughly Jewish (Acts xxiii. 14), but quite in keeping with the personal character of James, who was a Nazarite (Heges.; see Eus. ii. 23. 5), and there is no reason for questioning its historicity. The sentiment expressed in such a vow is not unlike that of Thomas (John xx. 24-29, xi. 16). In the very unbelief there is a longing to behold what it is not yet possible to believe.

§ 6. THE AUTHOR'S TRAINING AND HABITS OF THOUGHT.

Better acquaintance is to be had with James from his own letter than from the scant remains we have of trustworthy tradition. It is due quite as much to James' way of looking at things as to the circumstances of the readers to whom he wrote, that he does not feel it necessary to develop the faith confessed by him and his readers (i. 1, ii. 1) in any of its theoretical aspects, but insists as strenuously as he can that they make their lives conform to the orthodox faith which they profess. That he had a profound and vital opinion concerning the cardinal doctrines of the Christian faith, is proved by incidental references to the glory of Christ (ii. 1), to sin and the deep roots which it has in human nature (i. 14 f., iii. 7 f.), and to the power of God's word, once rooted in the Christian's heart, to create new life and to save. This word is a law of liberty which the Christian can and ought to obey (i. 18, 21, 25, n. 1). It is shown further by references to the Spirit which God has sent to dwell in the hearts of Christians (iv. 5), to the still greater boon which Christians are finally to receive (iv. 6),—the heavenly kingdom to be ushered in with the parousia of the Lord, of which they are heirs, and to the new creation of which they, the children of God begotten by the word of His truth, are the first-fruits (i. 12, 18, ii. 5, v. 8 f.). While a man like Paul, even in cases where the application of religious truth to life was direct, always sought to show the relation between the content of the Christian faith and its practical application by recalling the facts of the gospel history and showing the natural development of the practical application from these facts, James always begins at once with practical exhortation. He is not so much a teacher who develops the truth, as he is a preacher who speaks like a prophet (n. 2). A man of the logical type of mind and a teacher who had been trained in the schools could hardly have failed, in a discussion as elaborate as that in Jas. i. 2–17, to make clear to the readers the distinction between the two ideas in the word πειρασμός. Nor would such a person have been likely to cite Gen. xv. 6 without stating in what sense he understood the reckoning of faith there spoken of to be righteousness, and without showing wherein this idea here expressed differed from his own conception of δικαιούσθαι.

Without any extended discussion or argument, James shows that he has a vital grasp of the truth, in language which for forcibleness is without parallel in early Christian literature, excepting the discourses of Jesus. We have here the eloquence that comes from the heart and goes to the conscience, a kind which was never learned in a school of rhetoric. The flow of words (n. 4) seems to be just as natural as the succession of ideas (n. 3). Several words do not occur in literature before James. Whether some of these were coined by the author or whether all of them were in common use in the locality where he lived, we do not know. But it is very clear that the author got his facility in the use of Greek, not in some rhetorical school, but from life. His language is comparatively free from gross mistakes, and even shows some feeling for the euphony and rhythm of the Greek tongue (n. 5). And yet on the whole how limited is his command of this foreign language. In the entire Epistle there is scarcely one periodic sentence, the language used consisting for the most part of short sayings, questions, and exclamations. There is no good reason for denying that James wrote Greek by assuming that the letter was written originally in Aramaic (n. 6); nor is it right to make his inability to do so an argument against the historical character of the tradition concerning James. If the membership of the mother Church consisted from the beginning in large part of Hellenists who kept on using the Greek language after their settlement in Jerusalem (above, pp. 39 f., 42 f.), the same is likely also to have been the case in the Churches colonised from this centre. Then, besides the native Jews, who were called Hellenists, in Cæsarea (Acts x.), certainly also in Ptolemais and Tyre (above, p. 44), there must have been added to the Church a number of Gentiles and proselytes, who had no more occasion after than before their conversion to familiarise themselves with the Jewish vernacular, Greek being the language of common intercourse in those cities; and in Antioch this number must have been very large. Now, if an author wanted to be understood by these Greeks and to reach the heart of these Hellenists, it was necessary to address them in Greek. And he could do so in the confidence that he would be understood by much the larger part of the "Hebrews" living in this extended region. The latter were certainly to be found not only in Jerusalem, but also in Lydda, Joppa, Damascus, and elsewhere (above, p. 66, n. 12). But, writing from Jerusalem in the circumstances that he did, while not formally excluding the Christians near him from the address, he must have had these far less in mind than the more remote Churches, including those as far away as Antioch, who could not have the benefit of his oral instructions. We saw, moreover, that James took account of the Gentiles who were among his readers (above, p. 91). What was there, then, to prevent him from adapting the form of his letter to the large number of Hellenists among his readers by writing in a language which was certainly intelligible to all, and which it did not greatly inconvenience him to use? Even the greeting, i. 1, shows conscious adaptation to the habits of these Greeks and Hellenists; for, without obscuring the sense at all, James could have used a Jewish greeting, as do Paul and the other apostles, translating it into Greek and adapting it for Christian use (n. 7).

To assume that from the position which James occupied in Jerusalem he would have had no opportunity to acquire the facility in the use of Greek which the author of this letter had, or that he lacked the ability to acquire it, is entirely arbitrary (above, p. 45). Assuming that the letter was written between 44 and 51, the author had been from fifteen to twenty years a member, and for a number of years the official head, of this Jerusalem Church, which very early in its history had more Hellenists than Hebrews in its membership. As the head of this Church, James must have been familiar with the Greek O.T. (above, p. 40), so that it would be entirely natural in writing a Greek letter that he should make his quotations from the LXX (n. 8). Still the letter is not altogether without traces of the author's familiarity with the original text. James lives and moves in the atmosphere of the O.T. Besides the few instances where the O.T. is quoted directly (ii. 8, 11, 23, iv. 5, 6) and specific references to individuals and facts in the O.T. (ii. 21, 25, v. 10 f., 17 f.), there are numerous passages where the author's thought seems to flow unconsciously in the mould of O.T. language (i. 10 f., ii. 7, iii. 9, v. 4, 20). One of his quotations is from a writing unknown to us (n. 9). While the Book of Proverbs, written by the Palestinian Jesus the son of Sirach, is not quoted, the letter does show familiarity with a number of his sayings (n. 10), though it would be going too far to say that there was any particular mental affinity between this author and James. On the other hand, there is a resemblance both in thought and in language between James' letter and the discourses of his brother Jesus which have come down to us, which is all the more natural if James was not directly under Jesus' influence during the latter's public ministry, and if the resemblance is due neither to artificial imitation of nor to conscious dependence upon the discourses of Jesus. There is not a single word of Jesus' quoted, much less anything from the Gospels. And yet, although none of the sayings of Jesus are reproduced in exactly the form in which they have come down to us, it is possible to fill the margin of the Epistle with parallels of Jesus' discourses which resemble James more closely in thought than the parallels from Jewish literature, some of which are closer verbally (n. 11). Though James may have become acquainted with most of the words of Jesus preserved in the oral tradition of the Church by hearing them from others, still there were not a few of these sayings which he had heard from Jesus' own lips, though often with doubt and disapproval (above, p. 104 f.). After he became a believer, what he learned from others and what he had heard himself fused together in his thought, and the impression of the personality of Jesus, under the influence of which he had been ever since his childhood, made the tradition so vital that it developed in him a Christian character which in the early Church made him seem all but superior to the apostles themselves.

Unlike his brothers, he felt no call to engage in missionary work (1 Cor. ix. 5; above, p. 105). Here also the letter is in keeping with James' character, for there is very little of the gospel in it, and of all the N.T. writings it is the one least adapted to give us an idea of the sort of preaching by which converts were made. It does, however, presuppose this preaching. It is also in keeping with the description which we have of the character of James of Jerusalem, that his letter, while presupposing the Christian faith, pays little attention to forms of statement specifically Christian, and that its teachings have the O.T. and Jewish stamp. If this were not the case, we should have to deny that the Epistle was written by James, for he was a man who was looked upon as an authority by the Jews of his own time and by the Ebionites of a later period, such a man that, as he was being stoned, Jewish priests are said to have exclaimed, "Stop! what do ye? the Just is praying for you." It was possible to be deceived into supposing that James' Christian confession was only an adjunct of his Jewish piety, which could be cast off without changing his character. But this supposition proved to be mistaken (above, pp. 103, 107).

1. (P. 110.) From the connection of i. 18, 21, 22, 25 it appears that the law, whose continued contemplation and fulfilment is urged upon the readers, is identical with the word of truth, through which God has given them their religious life, making it thus an "implanted word," or at least is included as an essential element in it. Now, if it is self-evident that i. 18, 21 f. refer not to O.T. revelation but to the gospel of Christ, it is also plain that i. 25, ii. 9-12, iv. 11 f., refer not to the Mosaic law as such, but to the law contained in the gospel. When it is characterised, then, as a "perfect law," the epithet is not loosely applied to divine law in general (Ps. xix. 8), but marks the law which is binding upon the newborn, and is implanted in them as a perfect law in distinction from another which is imperfect. This distinction is made still clearer by the added phrase, τὸν τῆς ἐλευθερίας. But since "freedom" is not regarded, in the common experience and usage of any age, as a natural attribute of "law," but rather as its contradiction, it is plain that James meant his readers to feel in the very form of his expression (cf. Rom. ix. 30) the contrast between this law and another to which the phrase could not apply. There is a law of bondage, also, which for that very reason is imperfect. By this can be meant no other than the Mosaic law, which was not implanted in the heart, but inscribed on tables of stone (Jer. xxxi. 31-34; Heb. viii. 7-13; Rom. viii. 15; Acts xv. 10), and which, particularly in the hands of the Rabbis, had become a heavy yoke of slavery (Matt. xxiii. 4, cf. xi. 29 f., xii. 7); while by the same treatment, on the other hand, it was reduced in fact and impoverished in spirit (Matt. v. 21-48, xv. 1-20). The law contained in the gospel demands not less, but more, than the Mosaic law as expounded by the Pharisees. At the very point, therefore, where James reminds his readers of the increased responsibility of Christians and the seriousness of the judgment which awaits them (ii. 12), he dwells once more upon the character of Christian law as a law of liberty. In this he is quite in accord with the preaching of Jesus. The fact that this new and perfect law of liberty includes commandments from the Decalogue also, and that special stress is laid (ii. 8-11) upon the law of love to one's neighbour, which is likewise an O.T. command, is again in agreement with the preaching of Jesus, and with the teaching of Paul as well (Rom. ii. 23-27, viii. 4, xiii. 8-10; Gal. v. 14, vi. 2). When James calls the law of love a "royal law," he cannot mean simply that it was given by a king, for that is true of all commands of God and Christ. Nor is there any usage to justify the interpretation, "a law royally superior to all others, an all-inclusive law." He means rather that it is a law for kings and not for slaves. In Philo, de creat. Princ. iv, Mangey, ii. 364, βασιλική ὁδός denotes the manner of life and conduct which befits a king. It would seem that James was so understood by Clement (Strom. vi. 164, vii. 73, cf. GK, i. 323; Mayor, 84). How admirably this suits the context is apparent. The heirs of the kingdom (ii. 5), who are themselves kings (Rev. i. 6, v. 10; 1 Pet. ii. 9), ought to be ashamed to meet the rich with fawning politeness, offered under pretext of due brotherly love, and at the same time dishonour the poor. The reverse legalistic attitude accordingly is closely related to the idea expressed in ἐλευθερίας. As a king's sons, the disciples of Jesus are free, just as He Himself was; and if as members of the pre-Christian people of God they perform what is there required of them, they are still free nevertheless (Matt. xvii. 24-27).

2. (P. 111.) The distinction between διδάσκαλος and προφήτης is by no means absolute. In Acts xiii. 1 it is hardly permissible to arrange the various names under the two titles separately. By the transition to the first person plural in iii. 1, James intimates that he is one of the διδάσκαλοι in the broader sense. But the difference between διδαχή and προφητεία was clearly felt in the life of the Church till well into the second century, cf. 1 Cor. xii. 8-10, 28, xiv. 6, 26; Eph. iv. 11 (cf. ii. 20, iii. 5); Herm. Mand. xi.; Didache, x. 7; xi. 3, 7-12; xiii. 1-4, cf. Forsch. iii. 298-302; Ign. Philad. vii. Although 1 Cor. xiv. 3, 24 f. deals with quite another distinction between prophecy and the gift of tongues, its characterisation of the prophetic type of discourse is of general validity, and is applicable to James. Andrew of Crete calls James a προφήτης (Anal. Hieros. ed. P. Kerameus, i. 3. 7, 14. 3); and in referring to the Epistle, from which he makes extended extracts, he speaks repeatedly of its prophetic style (iv. 31, v. 24, vii. 28). Luther did not, as is commonly said, call James "a straw Epistle" outright, but, contrasting it with John, Romans, Galatians, and 1 Peter, he wrote in 1522 what he did not reprint in later editions of his Bible: "Therefore St. James' Epistle is a right strawy Epistle as compared with them; for it has no real gospel character" (Brlangen, ed. 63. 115). There is, nevertheless, both here and in the introduction to James and Jude (63. 156 ff.), a degree of unfairness, which is as easily accounted for as it is regrettable. Cf., further, Kawerau, "Die Schicksale des Jas. in 16 Jahrhundert." (ZfKW, 1889, S. 359 ff.).

3. (P. 111.) Χαίρειν, i. 1, is echoed immediately in πᾶσαν χαράν, the opening words of the first section, i. 2-18, which set forth and urge the right attitude toward the assaults of temptation. The special mention among God's gifts of the regenerative word (i. 18) forms the transition to the second section, i. 19-27, which calls for the right acceptance of this word in heart and life. Care for widows and orphans, which is mentioned (i. 27) as an example of the proper activity of the word, leads on to the reproof of a wrong attitude toward both rich and poor in the third section, ii. 1-13. The contrast between believing and doing, pointed out in the very beginning of this section, becomes the theme of the fourth section, ii. 14-26. As this passage censures the dead faith, which expresses itself in words and not in deeds (ii. 14, 16, 19), it is naturally followed by the fifth section, iii. 1-18, rebuking the tendency to instruct others (cf. i. 19), and pointing out the danger of sins of the tongue (cf. i. 26). In the description of true and false wisdom (iii. 13-18), James does not lose sight of its immediate occasion (see above, p. 95 f., n. 2); but the description becomes so comprehensive, and passes finally into so urgent a commendation of peaceableness, that it brings to mind in contrast the many disputes among the readers, which are dealt with in the sixth section, iv. 1-12. The desire for the betterment of external conditions, which is noted as the chief ground of these dissensions, appears most markedly among the merchants and the landowners, but also among the farm hands, who complain against them. To these classes the seventh section, iv. 13-v. 12, with its three subdivisions, refers. Not only Job, however, but Elijah is an example to be considered. The Christian is not simply to endure in patience what is well-nigh unendurable; prayer offers to the individual and to the Church a means for the relief of earthly suffering and the cure of moral hurt which transcends even the natural order. This is pointed out in the eighth section, v. 13-20. Thus, at the close, as at the beginning of his Epistle, James treats of earthly suffering, patience, and prayer.

4. (P. 111.) Mayor, clii-cciv, presents a comprehensive examination of the language of James, and concludes, not improperly, that it contains fewer formal violations of good usage than any other N.T. book, except perhaps Hebrews. This is by no means to assert, however, that Paul had not far greater facility in the use of Greek, or that the style of James could be confused with that of a classical writer. There are only three periodic sentences of any extent in the whole letter (ii. 2-4, 15-16, iv. 13-15). The first two are similarly arranged; the third (and perhaps the second also) is not correctly carried out. The genitive absolute participle, the accusative with infinite, and the optative, are entirely lacking. The use of the particles is exceedingly limited, e.g. ἄν (iii. 4, v. 7, spurious; only iv. 4, ὅς ἐάν), μέν (only iii. 17; never μέν—δέ), ἄρα, ἐπεί, ὥστε, do not occur, ὥνα appears but twice (i. 4, iv. 3). Rare words are ἀνέλεος, ii. 13 (instead of ἀνελεήμων, LXX), altered to ἀνίλεως by the Antiochians; ἀνεμίξεσθαι, i. 6; ἀπειραστος, i. 13, of persons = untested, or above temptation (differently, Jos. Bell. Jud. v. 9. 3, vii. 8. 1), next again in Clem. Strom. vii. §§ 45, 70, Const. Ap. ii. 8, in an apocryphal citation; ἀποσκίασμα, i. 17,—it is perhaps a matter of chance that this is not found till the later Church Fathers, for Plutarch has ἀποσκιασμός; δαίμονιώδης, iii. 15, first reappearing in the Jewish Christian Symmachus, Ps. xci. 6, δίψυχος, i. 8, iv. 8; Clem. 1 Cor. xi. 2, also in an apocryphal citation, xxiii. 3, cf. Clem. 2 Cor. xi. 2 (δίψυχεῖν and διψυχία some twenty times in Hermas); θρησκός, i. 26, only in grammarians and lexicographers; πολύσπλαγχνος, v. 11, recurring for the first time with its derivatives, Herm. Vis. iv. 3. 5; Sim. v. 7. 4 (cf. the writer's Hirt des Hermas, 330, 399, 487), and Clem. Quis Dives, xxxix; προσωπολημπτεῖν, ii. 9 (together with the more common προσωποληψία, ii. 1, cf. Rom. ii. 11; Col. iii. 25; Eph. vi. 9); χαλιναγωγεῖν, i. 26, iii. 2, cf. Herm. Mand. xii. 1. 1; Polyc. ad Phil. v. 3; Lucian, Tyrannic, 4; χρυσοδακτύλιος, ii. 2, otherwise unknown.

5. (P. 112.) With regard also to paronomasia, alliteration, rhythm, etc., Mayor, cxcv ff., is well worth reading. In many passages he finds something of a "Miltonic organ-tone," and in others a volcanic fire glowing through the words. It is still a question whether πάσα δόσις ἀγαθὴ καὶ πᾶν δῶρημα τέλειον, i. 17, is an hexameter, known and quoted by James, as, for example, Ewald, Das Sendschr. an die Hebr. u. Jak. Rundschreiben, 190, and Mayor, 53, think probable, or one accidentally formed with a permissible use of the short final syllable of δόσις in the arsis. The analogy of Heb. xii. 13 (cf. Winer, § 68. 4) favours the latter view, as does the circumstance that the line contains only a subject and no predicate. The conjecture that it was a one line adage, "Every gift is good, and every present perfect," in the same sense as "Don't look a gift horse in the mouth" (H. Fischer, Philologus, 1891, p. 378), needlessly charges James with a decidedly ill-timed use of a somewhat flippant proverb.

6. (P. 112.) The almost forgotten hypothesis of an Aramaic original (Berthold, Hist. krit. Einl. vi. 3033 ff.) has been revived by J. Wordsworth (Stud. Bibl. Oxon. i. 141-150). He does not base the theory upon an enumeration of errors and obscurities in the Greek text which would be explained by the reference to an Aramaic original, but on the Latin translation of the Cod. Corb., which presupposes, he says, a Greek original very different from the text otherwise transmitted. Then the existence of two Greek texts so divergent is to be explained on the ground that they are two independent versions of an Aramaic original, and this in turn is confirmed by correspondences between the Latin Corb. and the Pesh. Now, these correspondences amount to no more than those between Corb. and other versions and Greek MSS. (cf. e.g. Tischendorf on Jas. ii. 25), and would be significant only in case one could assert and prove that the Pesh. contained not a translation of James but the original. The only point which might demand attention, namely, the translation of ἰμάρια by res, Jas. v. 2, as an indication that the Syriac word used in the Pesh. was here the underlying term, is after all of no consequence; for, as Mayor, ccvii, shows, Rufinus, Eus. ii. 23. 18, translates ἰμάρια in the same way. The originality of the Greek text is established not only by the lack of proof to the contrary, but by the unconstrained manner of the Epistle, which, if it were not in the original language, would imply a mastery of the translator's art unparalleled among the ancients. In i. 1, 2 the paronomasia between χαίρειν and χαρά, so essential to the thought, would have to be ascribed to the translator. For nothing could have stood in an Aramaic original but the ܢܒܐ of the Pesh., which excludes the possibility of assonance, and which, in connection with the usual N.T. salutation, would have been rendered by εἰρήνη, and not χαίρειν, by any ancient translator; see the following note.

7. (P. 113.) The Jews of the Hellenistic period considered the Gentile χαίρειν an equivalent for the Semitic salutation of peace; cf. Jerome, p. 23 above, n. 4. This appears even in the LXX, Isa. xlvi. 22, lvii. 21, cf. Luke i. 28; then at the opening of letters, not only those from Gentile rulers to Jews (ad. Est. viii. 13, Swete, 77³=vi. 1, Fritzsche, 62, 63; 1 Macc. x. 25, xi. 30), but also letters from Jewish high priests to Gentiles (1 Macc. xii. 6; Jos. Ant. xii. 2. 6, according to Aristeas). 2 Macc. i. 1 shows a combination of Jewish and Greek forms in the intercourse between the Jews of Palestine and those of Egypt, first χαίρειν and then εἰρήνην ἀγαθήν (more skilfully in Barn. i. 1, χαίρετε . . . ἐν εἰρήνῃ). In the second letter, 2 Macc. i. 10, a thoroughly Greek expression, χαίρειν καὶ ὑγαίνειν, see above, p. 78, n. 2. The Semitic greeting, Dan. iii. 31, vi. 25 (cf. Ezra v. 7), which Gamaliel also uses (see above, p. 33, n. 18), is translated by LXX and Theodotion pretty literally εἰρήνη ὑμῖν πληθυνθείη, cf. 1 Pet. i. 2; 2 Pet. i. 2; Jude 2. εἰρήνη alone in closing, 1 Pet. v. 14; 3 John 15. There are also strictly Jewish expansions, like that of ap. Baruchi, lxxviii. 2, in the letter to the nine and a half tribes beyond the river (Ceriani, Monumenta S. et Prof. v. 2. 168): ככל מלת המלך הנה מכתבך, cf. Gal. vi. 16; Jude 2, ἔλεος καὶ εἰρήνη. After χάρις, with its resemblance in sound to χαίρειν, had established itself in connection with εἰρήνη, ἔλεος might still be added, 1 Tim. i. 2; 2 Tim. i. 2 (Tit. i. 3?); 2 John 3. James contents himself with the simplest, because he knows that the more ceremonious greeting of the Israelite may degenerate into empty formality (cf. John xiv. 27), and that the Greek salutation, though not exactly the expression of a serious conception of life, may be lifted to a higher plane of thought. John, who incidentally assumes the customary use of χαίρειν in the spoken intercourse of Christians (2 John 10 f.), does not hesitate to appropriate the specifically Epicurean form, 3 John 2, cf. p. 78, n. 2. Bengel, Gnomon on Acts xv. 23, "Non semper utuntur fideles formulis ardentissimis." It is noteworthy that, except for the letter of a Gentile, Acts xxiii. 26, this χαίρειν occurs elsewhere in the N.T. only in Acts xv. 23, in a document sent at James' suggestion to the Gentile Christians of Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia. Other resemblances between Acts xv. 13-29 and James have been noticed (Schneckenburger, Beiträge zur Einl. 209; Mayor, iv), e.g. Acts xv. 13, ἄνδρες ἀδελφοὶ ἀκούσατέ μου, cf. Jas. ii. 5; Acts xv. 17 (Amos ix. 12), ἐφ' οὓς ἐπικέκληται τὸ ὄνομά μου ἐπ' αὐτούς, cf. Jas. ii. 7; Acts xv. 29, ἐξ ὧν διατηροῦντες ἑαυτούς, cf. Jas. i. 27, ἄσπιλον τηρεῖν ἑαυτὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ κόσμου. Such similarities tend constantly to confirm the tradition, which ascribes the origin of both letters to the same period and the same circle.

8. (P. 113.) In Jas. ii. 23, Gen. xv. 6 is cited according to the LXX with the passive ἐλογίσθη, and not the active construction of the original. The connective δέ, which is well attested, also, in Rom. iv. 3, and recurs in Clem. 1 Cor. x. 6, Just. Dial. xcii, appears as early as Philo, de Mut. Nom. xxxiii, Mangey, i. 605, and then in the text of Lucian, ed. Lagarde. Lacking A and B for Gen. xv. 6, it is hard to say whether καὶ or δέ is original in the LXX. Jas. ii. 8=Lev. xix. 18, LXX; but this could scarcely have been translated otherwise. One can hardly determine from Jas. ii. 11 the arrangement of the Decalogue to which James was accustomed. The order of the commandments as James uses them is based upon their content (see above, p. 100, n. 9), μή instead of οὐ, Ex. xx. 13 ff., was an amendment of style, cf. Luke xviii. 20. καθ' ὁμοίωσιν θεοῦ γεγονότας, Jas. iii. 9, is derived from Gen. i. 26, LXX. Jas. iv. 6 = Prov. iii. 34, but differs materially from the Hebrew, to which the substitution of θεός for κύριος brings it no nearer. If we grant that Jas. i. 10 f. is manifestly based on Isa. xl. 6-8, ἄνθος χόρου is an agreement with the LXX against the Hebrew ("flower of the field"). The same is true of Jas. v. 4, if Isa. v. 9 is, in the main at least, its foundation. But in one passage, at any rate, and perhaps two, the case is different. Jas. v. 20 (cf. 1 Pet. iv. 8) has affinities with the Masoretic text of Prov. x. 12, but none with the LXX. Jas. ii. 23, καὶ φίλος θεοῦ ἐκλήθη, does not indeed purport to be part of the citation from Gen. xv. 6, but it is introduced as an undoubted fact, that is, as one to be found in the O.T. It is derived from the original of Isa. xli. 8; 2 Chron. xx. 7, whereas the LXX in both passages, in different forms, makes the one "loving" God into one "loved" by Him. Still the application of this term to Abraham need not necessarily be accounted for by personal acquaintance with the original text. James might also have learned it in the synagogue, like Philo, who, in quoting Gen. xviii. 17 (de Sobr. xi. ed. Mangey, i. 401) inserts after Abraham's name τοῦ φίλου μου, to which there is nothing in the Hebrew to correspond. In another citation of the same passage (Leg. All. iii. 8 M. i. 93) he has, instead of this, τοῦ παιδός μου, like the LXX. The epithet occurs also in the Book of Jubilees (xix. 10, xxx. 21, ed. Rönseh, 24 f., 56 f., 420 f.), which was probably written in Palestine in the first century. It is doubtful whether this term was in the thought of so early a writer as Apollonius Molon (circa 80 B.C., according to Schürer, iii. 402 [Eng. trans. II. iii. 252]) when he explained the name Abraham etymologically as πατὴρ φίλος (Eus. Præp. ev. ix. 19. 2, cf. Hilgenfeld, Eiñl. 542). Symmachus, at a later period, translated Isa. xli. 8, τοῦ φίλου μου (Field, Hexapla, ii. 513), and seems then to have been followed by the Antiochian recension of the LXX (Holmes-Parsons on 2 Chron. xx. 7).

9. (P. 114.) The formula ἡ γραφή λέγει (without ἔτι, moreover), as well as the fragmentary and obscure form of the saying Jas. iv. 5, forbid the view of Hofmann, vii. 3. 111 f., and Mayor, 131, that this is simply a free combination of O.T. ideas (Ex. xx. 5, xxix. 45; Deut. xxxii. 21; Isa. lxiii. 10). The saying does indeed ally itself with that O.T. line of thought (cf. 1 Cor. x. 22; Rom. x. 19) of which μοιχαλίδες, iv. 4, is already just a suggestion, but in such a way that we recognise that it must have been taken from a connection unknown to us. "Enviously (jealously) does that spirit long (love its object) which He (God) has made to dwell in us." Spitta, 117-123, conjectures that the saying is taken from the Book of Eldad and Modad cited by Hermas, Vis. ii. 3. 4. Resch, who does not consider it an anachronism that James should already quote gospels as Scripture, is positive that we have here a citation from a Hebrew gospel (Agrapha, 256). It is to be hoped that Spitta's proposition (118 f.) to connect πρὸς φθόνον with ἡ γραφή λέγει in the sense of περὶ τοῦ φθόνου (!) will not meet with approval. Kirn, ThStKr. 1904, S. 127 ff., would read πρὸς τὸν θεόν, cf. Ps. xlii. 2; Eccles. xii. 7. The change of subject between ἐπιποθεῖ and κατόκισεν need not surprise us in a quotation thus removed from its context. Otherwise we should not hesitate to read κατόκησεν with the Antiochians.

10. (P. 114.) Jas. i. 5=Sir. xli. 22, μετὰ τὸ δοῦναι μὴ ὀνειδίξει, cf. xviii. 17, xx. 14, always of human beings. Jas. i. 13 f.=Sir. xv. 11-20. Jas. i. 19=Sir. iv. 29, μὴ γίνου ταχὺς (al. τραχὺς, θρασὺς) ἐν γλώσση σου (in contrast with slothfulness in works); v. 11, γίνου ταχὺς ἐν ἀκροάσει σου καὶ ἐν μακροθυμίᾳ φθέγγου ἀπόκρισιν (and gentle in answering), cf. vi. 33-36. Jas. i. 20 (p. 96 above)=Sir. i. 19 (al. 22), οὐ δυνήσεται θυμὸς ἄδικος δικαιοθῆναι κτλ., Jas. i. 25=Sir. xiv. 23. Jas. ii. 1-6=Sir. x. 19-24 (22, ἀτιμάσαι πτωχόν=Jas. ii. 6). Jas. iii. 2=Sir. xiv. 1, μακάριος ἀνὴρ ὃς οὐκ ὠλίσθησεν ἐν στόματι αὐτοῦ; cf. xxv. 8, xix. 16, τίς οὐχ ἡμαρτεν ἐν τῇ γλώσση αὐτοῦ. Jas. iii. 9 (to be considered with its context)=Sir. xvii. 3, 4. Jas. v. 3=Sir. xxix. 10, 11 (ἀργύριον μὴ ἰωθῆτω . . . χρυσίον), cf. xii. 10. Jas. v. 4, 6=Sir. xxxi. (xxxiv.) 22 f. (al. 25 f.), cf. iv. 1-6. Jas. v. 13 ff.=Sir. xxxviii. 9-15. There is not enough material to determine whether James had read the Hebrew original of Sirach, or the Greek translation, or both. The parallels from Wisdom, and those from Philo diligently collected by Schneckenburger, Annotatio in Epic. Jac. 1832 (in his comments on the several passages); Siegfried, Philo, 310-314; Mayor, l, are useful for illustration, but are by no means sufficient to show that James was acquainted with these writings. With regard to Philo, cf. Feine, Jakobusbrief, 142-146. Parallels from Greek philosophical literature, especially that of Stoicism (Mayor, lxxix ff.), are even less pertinent. One might rather undertake to show that Epictetus had read James. Hilgenfeld, 539, A. 2, saw in Jas. iii. 6 (τὸν τροχὸν τῆς γενέσεως) a "conclusive" proof that James was familiar with the conceptions of Orphic mysticism. In that case, as it was the progress of souls contemplated in the doctrine of metempsychosis which was spoken of in Orphic phraseology as κύκλος γενέσεως, and occasionally also (with a reference to the wheel of Ixion) as τροχὸς γενέσεως (Lobeck, Aglaophamus, 798 ff.), we must suppose that James seized upon a phrase which he did not understand, without making the least use of the corresponding idea. But James uses γένεσις here just as in i. 23, and he compares human existence to a wheel, because he is thinking of it in its constant activity. The tongue, though itself a very unstable member (iii. 8), stands amid the members (καθίσταται ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν) as the centre of the body, and in relation to it may be likened to the hub or axle of a wheel which continually revolves about it. Cf. in addition also the gloss after Sir. xx. 30 (in Fritzsche on margin) ἀδέσποτος τροχὸς τῆς ἰδίας ζωῆς. It is remarkable that, in connection with the Orphic suggestions in James, no one has adduced also the line in Clem. Strom. v. 127, δαίμονες ὃν φρίσσουσιν (Jas. ii. 19), and the oracle of Apollo of Miletus in Lact. de Ira, xxiii, and the Egyptian incantations (Pap. mag. Lugd., ed. Dieterich, JbKPh., Supplement, Bd. xvi. 800; Neue griech. Zauberpap., ed. Wessely, Denkschr. der Wiener Ak. xlii. 2. 65).

11. (P. 114.) James' affinity with the discourses of Jesus can be but imperfectly indicated by means of figures. The less immediate parallels are placed in parentheses. Jas. i. 2=Matt. v. 12 (Luke vi. 23 is further removed on account of ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ). Jas. i. 4=Matt. x. 22, xxiv. 13. Jas. i. 5 f., 17=Matt. vii. 7 (αἰτεῖτε καὶ δοθήσεται ὑμῖν)-11, xxi. 21 (μὴ διακριθῆτε)-22 (Luke xi. 9-13; Mark xi. 23). Jas. i. 22-25=Matt. vii. 21-27; Luke vi. 46-49. Jas. i. 26 f.=Mark xii. 40 (Matt. xii. 7, xv. 2-9, xxiii. 2-4, 23-26).

(Jas. ii. 1-4 = Mark xii. 38 f.; Matt. xxiii. 6-12.) Jas. ii. 5 = Luke vi. 20, 24, xii. 21; Matt. v. 3. (Jas. ii. 8, 10 f. = Matt. v. 19 ff., xix. 18 f., xxii. 36 ff., with the synoptic parallels, and with reference to the conceptions ἐλευθερία and βασιλικός, p. 116, note 1, above.) Jas. ii. 13 = Matt. v. 7, xviii. 23-37; Luke vi. 33. (Jas. iii. 1 = Mark xii. 40, λήμψονται περισσότερον κρίμα.) Jas. iii. 10-12 = Luke vi. 43-45. (Jas. iii. 18 = Matt. v. 9.) Jas. iv. 4 = Matt. vi. 24; Luke xvi. 13; and for μοιχαλίδες, Matt. xii. 39; Mark viii. 38. Jas. iv. 9 = Luke vi. 25. Jas. iv. 10 = Matt. xxiii. 12; Luke xiv. 11, xviii. 14. Jas. iv. 11 = Matt. vii. 1; Luke vi. 37. Jas. iv. 12 = Matt. x. 22. (Jas. iv. 17 = Luke xii. 47.) Jas. v. 2 f. = Matt. vi. 19. (Jas. v. 8 f. = Matt. xxiv. 33; Mark xiii. 29.) Jas. v. 12 = Matt. v. 33-37, xxiii. 16-22. Jas. v. 17 = Luke iv. 25 (with regard to the note of time, which is not to be traced directly to the O.T., cf. Hofmann, vii. 3. 143). The correspondence between Jas. v. 14 and Mark vi. 13 indicates a close connection with the earliest days of Christianity. We have nothing to do here with the sacramental use of oil in the ancient Church; James stands, like Jesus, on the soil of Judaism, cf. Spitta, 144 f. Those sayings deserve special consideration, to which certain of James' readers appealed in a way that he disapproved. Since προσωπολημπτεῖτε, Jas. ii. 9, maintains the connection with ii. 1, we are to infer from ii. 8 that to justify obsequiousness toward persons of prominence, in spite of their own generally hostile attitude, appeal was made to Lev. xix. 18, that is, of course, to its meaning as interpreted by Jesus, Matt. v. 43-47, according to whom the command is not rightly fulfilled till it includes love to enemies. In Jas. ii. 14 it is implied that the persons whom the writer would oppose fall back upon the proposition ἡ πίστις μου σώζει (σώσει, σέσωκεν) με, cf. Matt. ix. 22; Mark v. 34, x. 52; Luke vii. 50, viii. 48, 50, xvii. 19, xviii. 42 (viii. 12). It has been repeatedly pointed out that those elements in James which remind us of the Gospels are closely related to Luke (Nösgen, ThStKr. 1880, S. 109; Feine, Vorkanonische Ueberlieferung des Lucas in Ev. u. der AG, 132; the same, Jakobusbrief, 70 ff., 133 f.), but it cannot be said that the points of contact with Luke outnumber those with Matthew. The only inference which can be drawn is that Luke, even in what is peculiar to his Gospel, follows early Palestinian tradition. The same is true of the Fourth Gospel, for James presents noteworthy resemblances to this Gospel also; cf. P. Ewald, Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage, 58-68; Mayor, lxxxiv. ff. Jas. i. 18 = John iii. 3 [ἀποκνεῖν = γεννᾶν, which even in John iii. 4 is applied primarily to the function of the mother; βουληθεῖς, cf. John iii. 8, ὅπου θέλει, and the denial of any other θέλημα, John i. 13. ἄνωθεν καταβαίνον, Jas. i. 17, may also remind us of John iii. 3, 13 (vi. 33, 50), and λόγῳ ἀληθείας of John xvii. 17]. Jas. i. 25 = John viii. 31 f. [Jesus' word, or the truth contained in it, is the means of freedom to him who abides in it; add the blessing of the doer, John xiii. 17.] Resch, Agrapha, 131 ff., 255 ff., claims to have found extra-canonical sayings of Jesus in Jas. i. 12, 17, iv. 5, 6, 7, especially Jas. i. 12, on account of the alleged formula of quotation. But as James left ἐπηγγείλατο without an expressed subject, and ὁ κύριος or κύριος or ὁ θεός was plainly inserted later by way of supplement, it is impossible to assume that Jesus, of whom, except for i. 1, he has not yet spoken, is the intended subject. Cf. rather Jas. ii. 5 and Zec. vi. 14 LXX, ὁ στέφανος ἔσται τοῖς ὑπομένουσιν αὐτόν. The crown of life, like the crown of righteousness (2 Tim. iv. 8) and the crown of glory (1 Pet. v. 4), is a general term for the reward of the persistent and victorious fighter. The assertion that, because this phrase appears also in Rev. ii. 10, James must have read the Apocalypse, or that he refers directly to the promise of Jesus found in that passage (Pfleiderer, Urchristentum, 867), needs no further refutation. Brückner, who declares this to be unquestionable (Chronol. Reihenfolge der Briefe des NT, 289), adduces even more trivial resemblances. All we can say is that James and Revelation show a certain similarity in their point of view; cf. Spitta, Offenbarung des Johannes, 521; Feine, Jakobusbrief, 131. According to Brückner, 291, and Pfleiderer, 867, James' dependence on Hebrews is also indisputable, since Jas. ii. 21, 25=Heb. xi. 17, 31, and Jas. iii. 18=Heb. xii. 11; further parallels in Mayor, cii. According to Holtzmann (ZfWTh. 1882, S. 293), James more than once presents itself as a direct answer to Hebrews. Cf., further, M. Zimmer, "Das schriftstellerische Verhältniß des Jakobus zur paulin. Lit.," ZfWTh. 1893 (year 36, vol. ii.), 481-503; and again, on the other hand, Feine, NJbDTh. iii. 305-334, 411-434. On the Epistle's relation to Romans and to 1 Peter, see § 7.

§ 7. THE EXTERNAL EVIDENCE.

Between the time of the composition of the letter, as determined in the preceding paragraphs, and the time when James came to be recognised generally as a part of the N.T. Canon, there is an interval of more than three hundred years, cf. Grundriss,² S. 21, 43, 45, 53, 56, 61, 68, 70, and below nn. 4-6. The Latin Church did not receive it into its N.T. until after the middle of the fourth century, and then only gradually. The Churches in Mesopotamia and adjoining regions did not include any of the so-called Catholic Epistles in the Syriac Bible which they used. In the Peshito, James takes its place in the Canon for the first time along with 1 Peter and 1 John. The recollection of this fact still survived in the time of Theodore of Mopsuestia, who, against the authority of his own Church, the Greek Church of Antioch, went back to the original Syriac Canon, claiming that James and the other Catholic Epistles ought not to be included in the Canon. The Alexandrian Church is the only one which, as far as the sources enable us to determine, can be proved always to have included James in the Canon along with a number of other Catholic Epistles on a basis of equal authority with the rest. In the case of the Churches in Jerusalem and Antioch, this can be shown to be probable. All this is not so strange, if the fact is taken into consideration that the N.T. Canon was composed of the books coming down from the apostolic age which were adopted as lectionaries in the religious services of the Gentile-Christian Church, and if it is admitted that James was addressed to the Church in the year 50, while its membership was still almost entirely Jewish.

That this is the right date for the composition of the letter, is confirmed by the clear traces of its influence upon the Christian writers of the period immediately following the year 50. Assuming that the letter reached Antioch while Paul and Barnabas were still engaged in teaching there, or during their first missionary journey, it is not likely that Paul would have failed to read the letter of a man of such recognised authority as James. And it can be proved that he had read it with care. It has, of course, been very often claimed that Jas. ii. 14-26 was written in opposition to Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, or to counteract the degeneration of Christian life resulting from teaching of this kind. But, in order to maintain the first position, it is necessary to assert that James misunderstood Paul's doctrine in a way almost incredible, or that he perverted it wilfully, and then undertook to refute it by a cowardly trick (n. 1). But such a supposition contradicts the impression which every unprejudiced reader gets from the letter regarding the intellectual and moral character of the author. What James opposes in ii. 14-26 is not a doctrine, but a religious profession which was unhealthy and not genuine. Equally untenable is the other assumption, that what is here said is directed against a practical abuse of Paul's doctrine of justification. It is a well-known fact that the effect of the gospel preaching in the apostolic age, as well as later, among those superficially affected by it, was to produce moral apathy rather than to stimulate moral energy. All the apostles sounded a note of warning against it, or testified against it (Gal. v. 13; 1 Pet. ii. 16; Jude 4; 2 Pet. ii. 1 ff., cf. 1 John i. 6, ii. 4; Rev. ii. 14, 20-24; 1 Cor. vi. 9-20), defending Christianity against the charges made on this ground by non-Christians (Rom. iii. 8, cf. vi. 1). It is true that at different times Paul's letters have been misinterpreted and misused (2 Pet. iii. 16), particularly by Valentinus and his school. That, however, these Gnostics paid little attention to the doctrine of justification by faith, is proved by the conceited way in which they despised those who were no more than believers. We know that Marcion, who professed to be a faithful disciple of Paul, combined with his fanatical hatred of the O.T. ethical views of an ascetic kind. But how could either the error of Valentinus or of Marcion have induced a man in his senses to write what we have in Jas. ii. 14-26? That neither Marcion nor any of the great Gnostic teachers could have taken such an attitude, goes without saying. The tendencies which they represented had nothing whatever to do with Paul's doctrine of justification on the ground of faith; and, besides, it cannot be proved that it was Paul's particular doctrine, and not the common Christian teaching about redemption by grace and the consequent freedom of the Christian, which was abused by thoughtless believers and slandered by non-Christians. Finally, what James opposes is not libertinism, but the moral indolence which went along with the consciousness of faith and of orthodox profession. According to James, his readers were convicted of the worthlessness of their faith and their confession not by the immorality of their living, but by their lack of good works. When he represents them as speaking (ii. 14), it is not a Pauline formula which he puts into their mouth; he makes them say, rather, that they have faith, meaning that their faith saves them. If this was based upon any formula at all, it must have been some such saying as the one used so often by Jesus, "Thy faith hath saved thee" (above, p. 122, n. 11).

Although, in view of what has been said, opposition to Paul's doctrine of justification, and opposition to any tendency supporting itself by false appeals to Paul's teaching, is out of the question, it is not to be denied that a relation exists between Jas. ii. 14-26 and Rom. iv. 1 ff. (n. 2). The statement in Rom. iv. 2, that Abraham was justified by works, thereby obtaining something of which he could boast, is introduced as the opinion of someone else. The statement contradicts Paul's conclusion that the manner in which Christians obtain righteousness and life excludes all boasting (iii. 27). Or if Paul held both views to be correct, then Abraham must have had a religion different from the Christian's. But if this be the case, then the question is raised whether Paul and the readers who have agreed with him in the preceding exposition are not forced to admit that they are apostates from the religion of Abraham, and without any vital relation to him. Moreover, there is nothing in the preceding context which leads up to this statement, to the discussion of which the whole of chap. iv. is devoted. It is not one of those apparent conclusions from the preceding discussion, which Paul so often introduces in order to strengthen the position already developed by refuting supposed inferences from it. Neither is it a familiar sentence taken from the O.T., for the statement is contrasted emphatically with Scripture (iv. 3). From what source, then, was this proposition taken? In Jas. ii. 21 we have the statement that Abraham was justified by works, and in ii. 23 the title of distinction which Abraham thereby obtained is given. In the same passage, Gen. xv. 6 is quoted just as it is in Rom. iv. 3, with the same text and at the same length (above, p. 119, n. 8). Paul does not dispute the application which James makes of Gen. xv. 6, nor does he question directly James' thesis. But from the Scripture passage which James had used incidentally, and left without definite explanation, he develops his own thesis, namely, that Abraham's significance for the history of religion rests upon the fact that in the Genesis account his righteousness is reckoned as faith, and so his justification is on the ground of faith. There is no conflict at all between Paul and James; Paul takes up the thought where James left it, and develops it further. The conception δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ (Rom. i. 17, iii. 21, x. 3, cf. 2 Cor. v. 21; Phil. iii. 9) did not originate with Paul. It goes back to Jesus (Matt. vi. 33), starting from his description of the difference between true righteousness and the human makeshift for it, the righteousness of the Pharisees. James uses the same contrast (i. 20, above, p. 96). Paul merely puts emphasis upon the thought suggested in θεοῦ, and so develops a new idea. Is it merely by accident that δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ (Rom. i. 17) occurs for the first time just after Paul has called the gospel a δύναμις εἰς σωτηρίαν (Rom. i. 16), and that it is just before he makes the statement that the word of the Christian proclamation is τὸν δυνάμενον σῶσαι (i. 21), that James speaks of the δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ (i. 20)? There is also a very close connection between Rom. v. 3 f. and Jas. i. 2-4, especially if καὶ καυχώμεθα ἐν ταῖς θλίψεσιν be taken as a hortative. Not only is there exact verbal correspondence between Paul's εἰδότες (Jas. γινώσκοντες) ὅτι ἡ θλίψις ὑπομονὴν κατεργάζεται and Jas. i. 3, but the passage in Romans throws light upon the meaning of James' somewhat obscure language. The expression, "ways by which your faith is tested," must certainly mean the same as "manifold trials," or, according to Paul, "tribulations." Finally, the question is raised in the mind of a thoughtful reader by Jas. i. 4, how the ὑπομονή is to persist to the end and to be made perfect. It was this that suggested to Paul the writing of Rom. v. 4 f. Even the word δοκιμή is a reflection of James' δοκίμιον. Anyone's character may be described as tested or proved when the means of testing it are rightly and patiently endured. Furthermore, although the thoughts expressed in Rom. vii. 23, ἕτερον νόμον ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν μου ἀντιστρατευόμενον τῷ νόμῳ κτλ., and Jas. iv. 1, ἐκ τῶν ἡδονῶν ὑμῶν τῶν στρατευομένων ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν ὑμῶν, show differences, they are essentially the same, and neither of them is obvious. Now, if these parallels prove that Paul had James in mind when he wrote Romans, then it may be the more readily admitted that there are indications of a use of the same in other passages where the dependence cannot be absolutely proved (n. 2). Altogether, a letter which left Paul unsatisfied with its conclusion about Abraham's justification, and which influenced him to take up the passage Gen. xv. 6 and discuss the subject with far greater thoroughness (Rom. iv. 3-24) than he had done heretofore (Gal. iii. 5-7), must have made a deep impression upon him.

But it is important to bear in mind that Romans is the only one of Paul's letters which shows traces of James' influence. 1 Peter was written in Rome, probably in the year 63 or 64 (§ 39). Granted that the resemblance between this letter and James is such as to necessitate the assumption that one of them depends upon the other, it is easy to see that throughout it is Peter who elaborates James' short suggestions, expands his pithy sentences, and tones down the boldness and abruptness of his thought (n. 3). Chronologically, the next document which shows clear traces of the influence of James is the letter, sent probably about the time of Domitian's death (Sept. 96), from the Roman Church to the Corinthian Church, which, according to ancient and unanimous tradition, was written by Clement, the head of the Roman Church (n. 4). In the Shepherd, written during Clement's lifetime by Hermas, a lay member of the Roman Church, there are a number of passages from James which are made, as it were, texts for extended remarks (n. 5). If we leave out of account those parts of the Church where James was early accepted into the Canon, and the later periods when James was commonly quoted, these are all the clear evidences which we have of the influence of the Epistle upon Christian literature (n. 6). Not only do these references to James in Romans, and its use in 1 Peter, confirm the conclusion already arrived at, that James was written in or before the year 50; but if the organisation of the Roman Church was due in no small measure to the influence of Jewish Christians who came from Palestine and settled in Rome, and if during the first decades of its history its membership was composed largely of Jewish Christians (§ 23), then there is nothing strange about the fact that it is this series of writings prepared in Rome in the years 63-64 and 96-100 which betray acquaintance with James, and that it is in Romans that Paul refers to this Epistle. It was among the Christians there that he could assume acquaintance with James' teaching, and he is wise in making the reference that he does to his Epistle.

1. (P. 124.) It is well understood that Paul developed and defended his doctrine that men are justified not by the works of the law, but through faith in Christ, in opposition to the Judaistic demand that the Gentiles should submit to circumcision, and with it to the whole Mosaic law, if they would become Christians in full standing, and partakers of salvation. For anyone who knew anything whatever of the great struggle of the decade 50-60, this position defined with historical precision the works of the law, to which Paul denied justifying efficacy. On the other hand, the faith to which Paul does ascribe this efficacy is more fully defined in his designation of it in his most polemic Epistle (Gal. v. 5, cf. Tit. iii. 8), as the faith which works itself out through love. All misunderstanding as to the ethical consequences of his teaching is precluded by his unconditional requirement of the observance of God's commands (1 Cor. vii. 19; cf. Rom. viii. 4) or the fulfilment of the law of Christ (Gal. vi. 2), by his insistence on the avoidance of all vicious life as a condition of blessedness (1 Cor. vi. 9 f.; Gal. v. 21; Rom. viii. 5-13), and by his expectation of a judgment awaiting Christians, when inquiry shall be made into their actual conduct (2 Cor. v. 10; Rom. ii. 6 ff., xiv. 10; 1 Cor. iv. 3-5). The faith, however, to which James denies saving efficacy is not only not the faith which he praises elsewhere (i. 6, v. 13-18) as the vital strength of prayer, unailing in its operation, and for which he claims that its possessor is rich in the midst of outward poverty (ii. 5). To James' mind the "empty" man (ii. 20, κενός, contrasted with πλούσιος, ii. 5, cf. Luke i. 53) is rather the man who says he has faith, while at the same time he has no works to show for it. It is true that James calls this inactive faith faith also, but only in the way in which the speaking of charitable sounding phrases is called love in 1 John iii. 18, that is to say, a love with word and tongue as over against love in deed and in truth. James neglects here, as in the similar instance in which the words πειρασμός, πειράζεσθαι denote very different things (i. 2-15, see p. 111 above), to distinguish with precision between true and false faith. But he is careful not to deny saving power to all faith. The question μή δύναται κτλ., ii. 14, like the question τί τὸ ὄφελος, is dependent upon the particular conditions stated, as indeed αὐτόν for ἄνθρωπον shows. Moreover, he puts it beyond question that this λεγομένη πίστις has nothing in common with what he himself considers faith, further than the name. It is an intellectual conviction, which even the devils may possess. It is to true faith what sympathising words are to really helpful love (ii. 15 f.), what the corpse is to the body (ii. 17-26). Now, just as this faith to which James denies all saving efficacy bears no resemblance to that which Paul sets forth as the condition and means of justification, so is it too with the works which James represents as the basis of justification and those works of law to which Paul denies any such value. The offering of Isaac and the reception of the spies by Rahab are anything but the fulfilment of legal requirements; rather are they heroic acts of faith; and James expressly emphasises (ii. 22) the fact that faith was involved in them, and in them found its realisation. On the other hand, he makes not the slightest attempt to represent them ingeniously as works of law, by characterising them, for example, as the fulfilment of some exceptional command of God, and thus the rendering of obedience. How could a man of sound intelligence imagine that ii. 14-26 was any refutation of Paul? Even the fact that James makes use of the very passage (Gen. xv. 6) with which Paul supports his doctrine of justification, is no proof that he was familiar with the latter's treatment of it. On the contrary, it would then be incomprehensible that James should not have made an attempt, at least, by a different exposition of the passage, to invalidate Paul's very obvious deductions. James gives no interpretation of the passage at all, but is satisfied to represent the fact to which it testifies as a presage of Abraham's subsequent justification by his works, without so much as hinting what he understands by this imputation of faith as righteousness. We may conclude, however, from the context that James was not in the habit of designating this imputation (which he himself adduces from Gen. xv. 6 without any modifying addition) as δικαιούσθαι. It was absolutely wrong to infer from the mere use of δικαιούσθαι ἕκ τινος by both James and Paul, that one was dependent upon the other. Neither of them invented the verb, and the prepositional connection is the most natural one; cf. Matt. xii. 37, and similarly κρίνεσθαι, Rev. xx. 12 (Luke xix. 22). Certainly James conceives the good conduct, which he considers indispensable, as a fulfilment of law (i. 25, ii. 8-11, iv. 11 f.). But, in the first place, Paul does so also, and, in the second place,

James characterises the law he has in mind, in direct contrast to that given by Moses and interpreted by the rabbis, as the law of liberty, the law implanted in Christians in and with the gospel, to be fulfilled by them in kingly freedom (above, p. 115 f.). How could a James, or a pseudo-James, imagine that to demand the fulfilment of such a law was to oppose Paul? To the question at issue between Paul and the Judaisers with regard to the attitude of Gentile Christians toward the Mosaic law, James does not devote a single word, even where he refers to the Gentiles among his readers (ii. 25, above, p. 91). As little does he touch upon the closely related question, how far Jewish Christians were under obligation to observe the Mosaic law, or were justified in so doing. The only passage which could possibly be referred to Jewish ceremonial (i. 26 f., p. 97, n. 3) criticises all overrating of ritual piety. To infer from this that this James, utterly unlike the James of history, was opposed to the continued participation of Jewish Christians in the temple services and to the Mosaic regulation of life, would be as preposterous as to ascribe a like attitude to Jesus on the ground of His denunciations of the Pharisees. Nor does it need to be proved that James could not have directed a polemic against the legal observance of the Jewish Christians in this indirect and casual way. For him and his readers it was a matter of course, and was assailed by no one, not even Paul. A polemic against those δοκούντες θρησκοὶ εἶναι is entirely consistent with legal observance on one's own part, cf. Matt. xxiii. 23, iii. 15. If, as tradition tells us (above, p. 103), James' manner of life was strictly, even exaggeratedly, legal, and he was himself, therefore, a θρησκός, this only gives the more weight to his warning against the over-estimation of θρησκεία, just as Paul's argument against the over-estimation of the gift of tongues is emphasised by the fact of his own facility in that particular (1 Cor. xiv. 18). That the author of James was an enthusiast for the law of the same type as the Judaisers of Galatians, is certainly unthinkable; but neither does the James of history occupy any such position. With regard to his attitude toward missionary work among the Gentiles, Paul (Gal. ii. 4, 9) distinguishes him as clearly from the false brethren whose proceedings made the action of the council necessary, as does the account in Acts xv. 13-29. Any reasonably careful exegesis of Acts xv. 21 shows that James sets aside effort for the extension of the Mosaic law and of the legal manner of life as a task which has no claim upon him and the mother Church. Μωϋσῆς . . . τοὺς κηρύσσοντας αὐτὸν ἔχει does not mean simply κηρύσσεται, but calls for a corresponding clause in contrast, as in John v. 45, ἔστιν ὁ κατηγορῶν ὑμᾶς Μωϋσῆς, cf. John viii. 50. It is as unsafe to conclude from Gal. ii. 12 that James would have disapproved Peter's participation in the meals of Gentile Christians (though Feine, ii. 89, is still of this opinion), as to hold Peter responsible for the conduct of his partisans at Corinth. The disinterested wording of the statement made by the elders gathered with James in Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 20, ὑπάρχουσιν, not ὑπάρχουμεν), suggests that in their judgment the legalistic zeal of Jewish Christians was a one-sidedness which should be treated with forbearance, rather than that the speakers themselves occupied that standpoint. Even in Hegesippus' account there is no hint which might be interpreted as Judaistic in the historic sense of the word.

2. (1 p. 126, 128.) The present writer presupposes as the reading of Rom.

iv. 1 f., τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν; εὐρηκέναι Ἀβραὰμ τὸν προπάτορα ἡμῶν κατὰ σάρκα—εἰ γὰρ Ἀβραὰμ ἐξ ἔργων ἐδικαιώθη, ἔχει καύχημα—ἀλλ' οὐ πρὸς θεόν; with v. Hengel, v. Hofmann, and others, I hold that τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν undoubtedly constitutes an independent question, as in vi. 1, vii. 7, ix. 14 (cf. iii. 5, vi. 15, viii. 31; 1 Cor. x. 19), and that, taken with the following question, which requires a negative answer, it yields this meaning: "Are we, then, compelled by the foregoing discussion to adopt some such conclusion as follows?" The sense is not substantially altered by the omission, with B, of εὐρηκέναι (to which supply "we" as subject). Klostermann, Korrekturen zur bisherigen Erklärung des Römerbriefs, 1881, S. 121, 129, made a decided advance in the interpretation of the passage by pointing out the parenthesis indicated above. But the question whether Paul and his readers who followed him must now admit that Abraham was indeed their physical but not their spiritual ancestor, was possible only in case the readers were, like the writer, actually sons of Abraham κατὰ σάρκα (see § 23 below). I agree with Spitta, 209–217, in the opinion that Paul has James in mind; but I fail to find any satisfactory evidence that Paul could have assumed such an attitude only toward a Jewish writing, and therefore that he knew James as the work not of a Christian, but of a Jew (210, 211, 217). The way in which James is referred to in Rom. iv. 2 presupposes that the readers, or many of them at least, knew and esteemed the authority which had put forward this proposition. How could Paul assume this in the case of an obscure Jew whose private composition had by chance come to his notice? Why does he avoid combating the statement outright as erroneous, and let it stand as in some measure valid, or at least uncontradicted, unsatisfactory as he regards it? In Rom. iii. 28, too, we can find no polemic against James, for James had by no means ascribed justifying efficacy to the ἔργα νόμου with which Paul was dealing. In spite of his acquaintance with James, Paul could, here as in Gal. ii. 15–21, express the conviction that a man becomes just through faith independently of works of law, as the outcome of the common experience of all sincere Christians of Jewish origin. In so doing he by no means asserted that this thesis was continually on the lips of all Jewish Christians, a Peter or a James; in that case he would have had no need to write Romans. He lays down his proposition in Rom. iii. 28 not as a generally recognised Christian doctrine, but as a conclusion reached by elaborate arguments and deductions. It is the conclusion at which he himself has arrived, and every reader who has followed him with assent thus far must finally come to the same. It is the same "we" as in Rom. iii. 9, iv. 1, vi. 1, etc. According to this view, Rom. iv. 2, not iii. 28, is the point at which we may trace Paul's reference to James. In addition to the passages already mentioned, compare Rom. ii. 1, xiv. 4 with Jas. iv. 11 ff.; Rom. ii. 13, 21–29 with Jas. i. 22–25, ii. 9, iii. 1, iv. 11 (ποιητὴς νόμου); Rom. viii. 2 ff., 15 with Jas. i. 25, ii. 12 (law of liberty); Rom. viii. 7, 8 with Jas. iv. 4–7 (ἐχθρα τοῦ θεοῦ . . . τὸ πνεῦμα ὃ κατῴκισεν ἐν ὑμῖν . . . ὑποτάγητε τῷ θεῷ); Rom. xii. 8 (ὁ μεταδίδους ἐν ἀπλότητι) with Jas. i. 5. M. Zimmer (loc. cit.) and Mayor, xcii.–xcv., give more than exhaustive lists of points of contact between James and the Pauline Epistles. Von Soden in his guarded treatment (JhJPT, 1884, S. 163) mentions as indications of the writer's literary acquaintance with the Pauline letters, only Jas. i. 13=1 Cor. x. 13 (where however, ἀνθρώπινος has by no means a contrasted θεῖος), and Jas. ii. 5=

1 Cor. i. 27, in addition to passages from Romans. Spitta, 217–225, concludes that aside from Romans there are but few passages in Paul's letters which could suggest any direct dependence upon James, but does not account for this marked difference between Romans and the other Pauline Epistles.

3. (P. 128.) Spitta (183–202) is the latest writer to maintain the dependence of 1 Peter upon James. Brückner, ZfWTh. 1874, S. 530 ff., Chronol. Reihenfolge, 60–66; Pfeleiderer, 868, and others, have attempted to prove the converse. We may decide confidently for the first-mentioned view, if for no other reason than that the author of 1 Peter, in his attitude toward other N.T. books as well, particularly toward Romans and Ephesians, shows himself as one whose tendency is to appropriate the ideas of others without possessing any marked literary individuality of his own (see § 40 below). No one can deny that James has a consistent style, with a bold and even rugged character of its own. To come to details, a superficial comparison of 1 Pet. i. 6 f. with Jas. i. 2–4 shows unmistakable similarities: 1. ἀγαλλιᾶσθε=πάσαν χαρὰν ἡγήσασθε; 2. λυπηθέντες ἐν ποικίλοις πειρασμοῖς=ὅταν ποικίλοις περιπέσῃτε πειρασμοῖς; 3. τὸ δοκίμιον ὑμῶν τῆς πίστεως. But while James, following Jesus' example (Matt. v. 12; Luke vi. 22 f.), calls upon those who suffer to regard their still continuing trials even now as a matter for rejoicing, 1 Peter, at least in the beginning (for contrast iv. 13a, 16), tones down the thought to this, that, over against the tribulations which seem now to have their right, there will be joy for the Christian at the Parousia. For the connection of ἐν ᾧ with ἐν καιρῷ ἐσχάτῳ, the contrasted ἄρτι, and the comparison of i. 8 and iv. 13b, make it certain that ἀγαλλιᾶσθε, i. 6 and ver. 8, have a future sense, even if it may not be permissible to construe ἀγαλλιᾶσθε directly as an Attic future=ἀγαλλιᾶσεσθε (cf. Schmiedel-Winer, Gramm. § 13, A. 5; but also A. Buttmann, Ntl. Gramm. S. 33 end [Eng. trans. p. 38]). Note, further, the difference in the use of τὸ δοκίμιον. James used it, as Paul also understood him to do (p. 128 above), in the sense of a means of testing (=δοκιμείον, cf. Orig. Exh. ad Mart. 6, ed. Berol. viii. 1, δοκίμιον οὖν καὶ ἐξεταστήριον τῆς πρὸς τὸ θεῖον ἀγάπης νομιστέον ἡμῖν γεγονέναι τὸν ἐστηκότα [αὐ. ἐνεστηκότα] πειρασμόν). In 1 Peter, on the other hand, the word is treated as the neuter of the adjective δοκίμιος=δόκιμος (cf. Deissmann, N. Bibelst. 86–90 [Eng. trans. 259–262]), “the tested, genuine,” and so practically=δοκιμή, “approvedness.” But if 1 Peter is convicted here of dependence upon James, one cannot escape the feeling that James was before the writer's thought from the very beginning. It is not that the word διασπορά, 1 Pet. i. 1, Jas. i. 1 is peculiarly significant, but the constant transfer to the Christian Churches of the characteristics of Israel, and especially of the Jews living in the diaspora (§ 38), seems like an amplification of the thought suggested in three words in Jas. i. 1. The idea of being born of God (Jas. i. 18) reappears in more detail in 1 Pet. i. 23–25, and in addition the passage Isa. xl. 6–8, which is only hinted at in Jas. i. 10 f., is utilised here in more extended quotation. As Jas. (i. 19 ff.) follows the mention of new birth with the exhortation to attend repeatedly to the word whose quickening power has been thus experienced, so we find in 1 Peter. Cf. Jas. i. 21, διὸ ἀποθέμενοι πᾶσαν . . . τὸν δυνάμενον σῶσαι with 1 Pet. ii. 1, ἀποθέμενοι οὖν πᾶσαν . . . εἰς σωτηρίαν. While James speaks of this constant need of receiving the word in terms which would apply equally well to the first acceptance of the gospel,

Peter takes pains to bring out the distinction by adding to James' figure of birth through the word a reference to the readers as newborn babes. Even the admonition to put in practice that which has been heard (Jas. i. 22-25) follows soon enough, in 1 Pet. ii. 11 ff. It is applied by Peter in substance only, with entire independence and in a way adapted to the circumstances of his Gentile readers, but there are echoes of James even here: 1 Pet. ii. 16, ἐλεύθεροι = Jas. i. 25, τῆς ἐλευθερίας; 1 Pet. ii. 11, ἀπέχεσθαι τῶν σαρκικῶν ἐπιθυμιῶν αἵτινες στρατεύονται κατὰ τῆς ψυχῆς = Jas. iv. 1, ἐκ τῶν ἡδονῶν ὑμῶν τῶν στρατευομένων ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν ὑμῶν. Prov. iii. 34 is cited in 1 Pet. v. 5 precisely as it is in Jas. iv. 6 (ὁ θεός instead of κύριος, LXX); with it is connected (1 Pet. v. 6) the admonition to humility which follows more briefly in Jas. iv. 10, and finally in 1 Pet. v. 8, 9 the exhortation to resistance of the devil, which Jas. iv. 7 inserts between the quotation and the admonition just mentioned. Thus we have again quite a complex of ideas and expressions in which the two Epistles coincide. If Jas. v. 20 follows in the main the Hebrew text without regard to the LXX (above, p. 120), the similarity of 1 Pet. iv. 8 cannot be accidental. 1 Peter, however, which adopts from the original the ἀγάπη omitted by James, has again (as in i. 24) gone back directly to the O.T. passage suggested by James' reference, and thus given a different turn to the thought. It is plain that the author of 1 Peter was well acquainted with James, and had read the letter reflectively. The fact that he often alters its antiquated—strictly speaking, its primitive Christian—style to the more developed modes of expression current in the Churches founded, and thus far trained, by Paul and his associates, does not justify Spitta's argument (201) that he knew James only as a Jewish, not as a Christian, writing. The absence of all allusion to the section Jas. ii. 14-26 no more calls for explanation than does the fact that 1 Peter has no echo of the thundering rebukes addressed to the merchants (Jas. iv. 13-17) and the landowners (Jas. v. 1-6). It is perfectly evident that not everything that James had to say to believers of his own race (e.g. v. 12) would apply to the Gentile Christians of Asia Minor. For these the section ii. 14-26 was quite useless; it could not be transformed into the language of the Pauline Churches without perverting it to its opposite, while the appropriation of it but in part could only have confused such readers, and frustrated the main object of the Epistle as set forth in 1 Pet. v. 12.

4. (P. 128.) Clem. 1 Cor. x. 1, Ἀβραὰμ ὁ φίλος προσαγορευθεὶς πιστὸς εὐρέθη ἐν τῷ αὐτὸν ὑπήκουον γενέσθαι τοῖς ῥήμασιν τοῦ θεοῦ. 17. 2, ἐμαρτυρήθη δὲ μεγάλως Ἀβραὰμ καὶ φίλος προσηγορεύθη τοῦ θεοῦ. The mere designation of Abraham as a "lover of God" would not show that Clement had read Jas. ii. 23 (above, p. 120 f.); but, like James, he speaks (twice, indeed) of the bestowment of this title as an historical event, and emphasises the proof of Abraham's faith through acts of obedience (x. 1), while in the same connection (x. 7) he cites Gen. xv. 6 quite as it appears in Jas. ii. 23, and recalls similarly the offering of Isaac (x. 6). When Clem. xxx. 2, like Jas. iv. 6 and 1 Pet. v. 5, quotes Prov. iii. 34 with ὁ θεός, instead of κύριος as in the LXX, there is, besides a dependence on James or 1 Peter, still a third possibility, namely, that in early times there may have been a text of the LXX with ὁ θεός. That in reality Clement followed James appears from the fact that immediately afterward in xxx. 3 he writes ἔργοις δικαιοῦμενοι, καὶ μὴ λόγοις; and it is the more certain that this goes back to Jas. ii. 21, 24, since there, too, works are contrasted with a λέγειν, Jas. ii. 14, 16. The same contrast is drawn in Clem. xxxviii. 2 (ὁ σοφὸς ἐνδεικνύσθω τὴν σοφίαν αὐτοῦ μὴ ἐν λόγοις, ἀλλ' ἐν ἔργοις ἀγαθοῖς) in a way which reminds us of Jas. iii. 13, cf. iii. 1 ff. That an admirer of Paul acquainted with his Epistles should venture at all to speak of justification through works, could hardly be explained unless he were emboldened by another authority. Clement was aware, too, of the difference between Paul's type of teaching and James', for it cannot but appear that he was undertaking to reconcile the two when, shortly after the reference to James (xxx. 3), he attributes Abraham's blessing to the fact that he exercised righteousness and fidelity through faith (xxxi. 2, cf. Jas. ii. 22, ἡ πίστις συνήργει τοῖς ἔργοις αὐτοῦ), then maintains that the devout of all ages have been justified not of themselves, but by the will of God; not through their works, but through faith (xxxii. 3 f.); and, finally, in setting forth the necessity of works arrives at the formula (xxxiv. 4): προτρέπεται οὖν ἡμᾶς πιστεύοντας ἐξ ὅλης τῆς καρδίας ἐπ' αὐτῷ, μὴ ἀργοὺς μηδὲ παρειμένους εἶναι ἐπὶ πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθόν. Cf. Lightfoot, St. Clement, ii. 100. Similarly Clement combines the πίστει of Heb. xi. 31 with the ἐξ ἔργων of Jas. ii. 25 when he writes (xii. 1), διὰ πίστιν καὶ φιλοξενίαν ἐσώθη Ῥαὰβ ἡ πόρνη. The like could be said of Clem. xlix. 5 (ἀγάπη καλύπτει πλῆθος ἁμαρτιῶν, ἀγάπη πάντα ἀνέχεται, πάντα μακροθυμεῖ κτλ.) as compared with Jas. v. 20 and 1 Cor. xiii. 4, 7, were it not that the word ἀγάπη points primarily to 1 Pet. iv. 8 (p. 134 above). But it is highly probable that Clement was influenced at the same time by Jas. v. 20 also, since in l. 5 he mentions love, as James does, as a means of obtaining forgiveness of sins for oneself.

5. (P. 129.) On Hermas and James, cf. Schwegler, Nachapost. Zeitalter, i. 339; the writer's Hirt des Hermas, 396–409; GK, i. 962; Hofmann, vii. 3. 175 f.; Taylor, JPh. xviii. 297 ff. As early as in one of the Greek catenæ (Cramer, viii. 4), Herm. Mand. ix. is quoted in connection with Jas. i. 6. The assertion often heard, that the proofs of the dependence of Hermas upon James are not forthcoming, is valueless so long as one will not take the trouble to refute the thorough presentation of the actual facts, which cannot well be repeated here, and whose place, moreover, cannot be supplied by a table of citations (like that in Feine, 137). In answer to Pfeiderer's verdict (868) that Hermas is the earlier of the two, it is quite sufficient to remark with Mayor (cxliii. f.) that one might with as good right declare Quintus Smyrnaeus older than Homer, or any present-day sermon older than its text.

6. (P. 129.) We are probably to assume that James was known to Irenæus (GK, i. 325); the Marcosians (Iren. i. 13. 6), whose leader belonged in Syria, and was principally active in Asia Minor (GK, i. 729, 759); Justin (GK, i. 576; Mayor, lxi.), who became a Christian in Ephesus and wrote in Rome. It is possible, too, that the echoes of James found in the old sermon known as Clem. 2 Cor. are not all to be accounted for by the large dependence of the preacher on Clem. 1 Cor. and on Hermas, but are derived from an independent acquaintance with James. Clem. 2 Cor. iii. 4–iv. 3 is quite in James' spirit. Further, cf. Clem. 2 Cor. xv. 1, xvi. 4, and ii. 5–7 with Jas. v. 19 f. In the case of xvi. 4, however, 1 Pet. iv. 8 and Clem. 1 Cor. xlix. 5 (see above, n. 4) come still closer. Cf. also Clem. 2 Cor. xx. 3 with Jas. v. 7. Mayor, liv.–lvi., gives a long list of correspondences between Test. XII Patr. and James. Nothing is absolutely conclusive, and until greater certainty is attained with regard to the time and place of this book in its present form, more definite testimony, even, would be of little value. In the pseudo-Clementine literature, which esteems the bishop James so highly (above, pp. 103, 108 f. n. 5), we look for more points of contact with James than we find. Kern, 56-60, and Schwegler, i. 413, 424, have decidedly exaggerated the kinship of ideas which they maintain. Even Feine, too (81 f.), adduces parallels, which on closer examination show only the radical difference between James' thinking and this Ebionitic tendency (see also § 8, n. 4). The chief points deserving consideration would perhaps be these: the modification of Matt. v. 37 in conformity with Jas. v. 12 in Clem. Hom. iii. 55, xix. 2—especially iii. 55 (cf. xvi. 13), the mention of those who say ὅτι ὁ θεὸς πειράζει, and appeal to the Bible for support, with which cf. Jas. i. 13. Further, in Hom. v. 5 it is said of the demons, that they, when exorcised by the names of the higher angels, φρίττοντες εἰκονοῦν; cf. Jas. ii. 19 and p. 121, n. 10. Reminders of Jas. i. 18 may perhaps be found in Hom. ii. 52; iii. 17, of Adam, ὁ ὑπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ κειρὼν κυφορῇ θεῖς.

§ 8. DIVERGENT VIEWS.

Of those who accept this as the letter of James the Just, there are always some who hold that he wrote it toward the end of his life, somewhere about the time of Paul's imprisonment in Rome (n. 1). But the chief ground on which this assumption rests, namely, James' supposed polemic against Paul, or against an abuse of Pauline doctrine, is itself an untenable hypothesis (above, p. 125 f.); while, if it be held that the letter was addressed to the entire Church at a time when the Church was still almost entirely Jewish (above, p. 92), it is absolutely necessary to give up the hypothesis with the dating of the Epistle that it involves. Even granting that it is possible exegetically to take Jas. i. 1 as an address to Jewish Christians outside of Palestine, there is no reasonable explanation of the entire absence of reference in the letter to the relation which in the year 60 many, in fact most, of these Jewish Christians sustained to their more numerous Gentile Christian neighbours and to their Gentile surroundings. Equally inexplicable is the letter's entire silence about the significance of the Mosaic law, a question which, if the testimony of the times can be trusted, was still agitating the minds of all affected by it

(n. 2). That all these great questions should be passed over in a letter written in the year 60, particularly in a letter in which the fulfilling of the law, and of the entire law, is repeatedly spoken of, and the proposition polemically maintained that men are justified by works and not by faith alone, in which, moreover, there is shown a grasp of the readers' practical situation, is historically impossible, to say nothing of the cowardice it would evidence on James' part to ignore so completely the well-known author of the principles which he combats. In fact, it is impossible to explain how such Pauline watch-words and interpretations of particular passages of Scripture (Gen. xv. 6) could come to exert such a dangerous influence among James' immediate associates, among men who were zealous for the law (Acts xxi. 20; Gal. ii. 12), and in circles which mistrusted Paul, and sought everywhere to arouse the same mistrust in others. If, on the other hand, contrary to his agreement with Paul (Gal. ii. 9), James presumed to warn Gentile Christian Churches quite outside his own acknowledged sphere of influence against misunderstanding or abuse of Pauline formulæ, he must at least have done so directly by a fundamental setting forth of the true doctrine, and not by a few incidental, furtive hints.

Such a halting, weak, and cowardly polemic would be more comprehensible if it had come from someone who, unwilling in his own name to vouch for his convictions, preferred to assume deceptively the mask of James, long since dead. For this reason the majority of those who hold James to be the product of the post-Pauline development of the Church, admit frankly that it is pseud-epigraphic. The earlier Tübingen school found in this letter a presentation of a toned-down Jewish Christianity, tending toward the Catholic Christianity of about 150. This presentation they understood to have grown out of the opposition to Paul's doctrine of justification conceived as detrimental to practical Christianity (n. 3). But a Jewish Christianity of this sort is a phenomenon, the reality of which cannot be proved historically; it is wholly imaginary, constructed from writings declared to be pseudonymous without any careful investigation of their historical character. The real Jewish Christianity of the post-apostolic age, the Jewish Christianity which, according to the testimony alike of Ignatius, Barnabas, and Justin, and of the Ebionitic literature, concerned itself about Paul and the general progress of the Church, never ceased to insist that Gentiles should observe the Jewish law, with allowances, to be sure, but always this particular law, and the Jewish manner of life determined by it. Nor did this Jewish Christianity ever cease to hate and to persecute Paul on the ground of his hostility to Jewish institutions, and on the ground that he taught men to disregard the law, at the same time ignoring his doctrine of justification, which was looked upon as a harmless theory. These objections hold also against the theory of Weizsäcker, who dates the letter after the death of James, assigning it to the time when the Church was leaving Jerusalem. He regards it as a product of Palestinian Jewish Christianity at the time when this had begun to develop in the direction of Ebionitism; Jewish Christianity, "shut up against Gentile Christians," "with no course open but that of resignation," takes up Paul's teaching, adopts very essential ideas from it, and at the same time subjects its principal doctrine to "a mild, almost conciliatory criticism," but nevertheless rejects it most decisively (n. 4). According to Pfleiderer (865-880), James has very close affinities with the Shepherd of Hermas, both being products of the "practical catholicism" of the post-Hadrianic age; it combats the intellectualism of the Gnostics or Pneumatics (Jas. iii. 5), the antinomianism of Marcion (iv. 11), and the tendency to worldliness on the part of the more well-to-do Christians. In view of the situation in the Roman Church, the condition of which he had primarily in view, but in view also of the general situation in the Church at large, to which the letter was addressed, the author condemns Paul himself with those who had fallen into all sorts of errors, ostensibly because of the emphasis they put upon the idea of faith and upon Paul's doctrine of justification (above, p. 125 f.). While Pfleiderer very quietly passes over all those facts, which, as we saw, point to the Church of Palestine and the adjoining regions as the home of author and readers, von Soden (HK, iii. 2. 160 ff.) contends there are things in the letter which indicate the Jewish origin of author or readers.

There is thus great diversity of opinion as to the conditions actually presupposed by the letter; but all who believe that it could not have been written by the distinguished James of Jerusalem are very generally agreed that it was meant to pass as his work. The perfectly artless way, however, in which the author introduces himself is very much against this assumption that the letter is a literary fiction. A later writer, passing himself off for James the Just, if he were like other writers of this kind whose work is preserved in literature, would certainly have called himself the brother of the Lord, or the head of the Jerusalem Church, or have indicated in some way that he was the great contemporary of the apostles. He would have been all the more likely to do so, because there was more than one James of distinction in the early Church (n. 5). Such a writer would never have begun his letter with an address so simple and so nearly like those used in secular literature, when he had before him apostolic writings of earlier date in which was a fixed model for the sort of greeting which might be appropriately used by an apostle or by one of apostolic rank. In keeping also with the simple dignity of its beginning is the entire literary character of the letter, the peculiarity of its style, and the clear impression which it gives of the character of the writer. In the literature of the early Church, admitted to be pseudepigraphic, there is nothing that can be even remotely compared with James. And in cases where opinion is divided as to whether a writing is spurious or genuine, the characteristics mentioned always argue strongly in favour of genuineness. A class of pseudo-writers possessing originality and genius, and able to write in a dignified, crisp, and pithy style, has never existed. Nor, as a rule—certainly not in the literature of the early Church—are these pseudo-writings without some discernible purpose, which explains why a particular rôle is assumed. If, for the purpose of teaching or rebuking his contemporaries, someone found it advantageous to pass himself off as the distinguished James, then the end which he had in view must have been such that the personality of James, as the recollection was retained in the tradition, would have lent especial weight to what he said. But the contents of the Epistle are absolutely against this presupposition. It does not bring out a single one of those characteristics by which James is distinguished in history and legend; there is nothing to suggest the brother of the Lord, the first bishop of Jerusalem, the Israelite clinging with tenacious love to his people and to the temple, the strict observer of the law who was in high favour with the Judaistic party, and the ascetic, severe beyond what the law required of him. All that does appear is the strong personality of an earnest Christian who might have had these peculiarities. Moreover, ancient pseudepigraphic writings are never free from tell-tale anachronisms, things which can be avoided only through the aid of archæological science, which at that time was unknown. No anachronisms have been discovered in James (n. 6). The thing which strikes one as peculiar about the Epistle is not the evidence of its late date, but the absence of clear indication that the author and readers had drunk of the new wine of the gospel at all.

This impression is at the basis of the hypothesis recently advanced by Spitta, which he thinks solves all the difficulties. According to Spitta's theory, James is a purely Jewish writing, dating from either the first century after or the first century before Christ, and given the superficial appearance of a Christian writing simply by the later addition of the phrases καὶ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (i. 1) and ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (ii. 1, n. 7). This letter has come down to us only through Christian channels, and in Christian circles has always passed as the work of a distinguished Christian of the apostolic age. Moreover, according to the text of the letter as we have it, the author calls himself a servant of the Lord Jesus Christ, indicating also that a belief in the same Lord Jesus or in His glorification is an essential part of his readers' faith. For these reasons it has always been regarded as a product of Christian thought. If Spitta is right, it simply shows how little real progress the art of criticism has made in spite of its long history; but when he (p. 8) calls the opinion which heretofore has prevailed a hypothesis built upon rotten foundations, it only goes to show how far he himself is from standing upon the foundation of a criticism that is sound and just. Anyone trying to judge from the point of view of sound criticism can readily see that this new hypothesis, supported as it is by exegesis for which the word bold is mild, has not been worked out by its author into a clear, historically grounded view. If it were, how possibly could Spitta compare the work of this supposed Christian interpolator with the interpolations and verbal changes in Jewish writings known to have been introduced by Christian hands (p. 56)! Books like the Jewish Sibyllines, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Ascension of Isaiah, and many others which have been handled in this way, were originally written with a view to deceiving the credulous. It was the honourable names of remote antiquity and of Israel's past that made these works interesting, and made them seem credible, first to Jews and then to Christians; and it was this that brought about their adaptation to the changed conditions and the different religious point of view of the Christian reader. No attempt was made to give them the appearance of Christian writings, but the design was, rather to make these supposed representatives of bygone ages and of different stages of religious development prophets of Christian truth. Or, take the case of a work by an author of distinguished name, such as the author of the Jewish James is supposed to have been. The person who changed Josephus' Antiquities so as to make it a witness for Christ, apparently inserting also the remark about the death of James, the brother of Jesus, was not foolhardy enough to attempt the making of the Jew Josephus over into a Christian. On the contrary, everything depended upon Josephus' remaining a Jewish historian of the time of Jesus, whom by his insertion the interpolator designs to make an impartial witness of the wonderful greatness of Jesus. The interpolator was careful to make Josephus retain his historical Jewish character. This manifest intention on his part is not affected in the least by the fact that he did not understand that character better, and that he was not able permanently to deceive persons trained in methods of historical criticism. The Latin writer who slipped the name Jesus into the place of the original Christ in the Jewish apocalypse known as the Fourth Book of Ezra (vii. 28), had no idea of making this alleged Ezra a disciple of Jesus in spite of the distinguished name which he bore, and in spite of the chronology; he simply meant to make a work which passed for that of the original Ezra still more beautiful and still more edifying to Christian readers, by putting into Ezra's mouth an unmistakable prophecy concerning the Jesus whom the Christians accepted as Messiah. The procedure of the Christian interpolator of James would, however, have been just the reverse. For by the insertion of seven words he is assumed to have deceived the Christian world in all ages, learned as well as unlearned, concerning the religious character of James. Taking the work of a Jew named James, a person entirely undistinguished in history, and inserting these seven words, but leaving it otherwise unchanged, the interpolator leads every unsuspecting reader to say at once, as a matter of course, "This was written by a Christian." If the writing seemed to him to be good reading for Christians, as it was, why did he treat it in a manner different from the way in which the Proverbs of Jesus Sirach or the Wisdom of Solomon were treated in the early Church? If he felt it necessary to subject it to a Christian revision, why did he content himself with adding to it two Christian confessions which only serve to make its pre-Christian or un-Christian character all the more glaring? The work of this supposed interpolator is as inconceivable as it is unparalleled. Indeed, the character of the entire hypothesis may be judged from the fact that its author does not feel under any necessity whatever to tell us the motives for the interpolation, nor to indicate the conditions under which it was made.

If Paul was acquainted with James when he wrote Romans in Corinth at the beginning of the year 58, and if Peter was familiar with the work when he wrote from Rome to Christians in Asia Minor in 63 or 64, at that time the letter must have been already widely circulated in the Church. But this makes it extremely improbable that a Christian interpolation made subsequently should have had the general acceptance in the Church which, from all we know of the history of James in the Church, must have been accorded it. Moreover, the manner in which Paul refers to James shows that it was known by him and by the Roman Christians of that time to be the work of a distinguished Christian teacher (above, p. 126 f.). But the assumption that this Christian interpolation was made as early as 50–60, during the lifetime of James of Jerusalem, and the supposition that even Paul was deceived by it, hardly requires refutation. Furthermore, the impression which we get of the Jewish writing and of its author after these seven words are stricken out, is in the highest degree fantastical. Without any apparent authority for doing so, a Jew addresses the entire Jewish nation, or, as Spitta understands the “address,” all the Jews in the dispersion, in the superior tones of fatherly advice and of prophetic condemnation. Possibly before the destruction of the temple this might have been done by a high priest in Jerusalem, or, after the year 70, by the recognised head of one of the schools, as Gamaliel the younger. Earlier than this, such a letter might have been sent in the name of the whole body of Jews in Palestine, represented by the Sanhedrin, through the autocratic head of this body (n. 8). But for a Jew named James, with no other credentials than the claim to be the servant of God, to have written such a letter, would have been to expose himself to ridicule. Generally, persons not in any recognised position of authority who felt called upon to preach to their fellow-countrymen in this way, preferred to suppress their own names entirely, and to write in the name of Solomon, or Enoch, or Ezra, or Baruch, or even of the Sibyl or Hystaspes. Moreover, it is an error to suppose that a letter with these contents could have been addressed by a Jew to his countrymen. To begin with, there were no twelve tribes in the dispersion, so that the words ταῖς ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ (i. 1) must also be a Christian interpolation (above, pp. 74 f., 79). The idea of divine birth through the word of truth, i.e. through the soul-saving word of divine revelation read and preached in religious services (i. 18–21, n. 7), made its first appearance upon Christian soil. So also did the conception of a moral law, which, as distinguished from the imperfect law that had been in force heretofore, is perfect; and in contrast to a law which compels and enslaves, is a law of liberty; which, finally, in view especially of its principal commandment—love for one's neighbour, is called a law for kings (i. 25, ii. 8, 12; above, p. 115 f.). Although it is true that quite independently of Christianity the Jews esteemed faith very highly, the thought that one may be rich in such faith even in this world, and an heir through faith of the promised kingdom of God, is a Christian thought (ii. 5). It needs also to be proved that, before Jesus' time (Matt. v. 12), and independently of Him, a Jew could have exhorted his readers not only to endure suffering and temptation with patience and hope, but to discover in them as well a source of pure and proud rejoicing (Jas. i. 2, 9). But, what is most significant, the folly combated in Jas. ii. 14–26 of supposing that faith of itself, without being manifested or proved by works, can save, is a possibility only as the preaching of Jesus is presupposed; while the careful proof of the proposition that a man is justified in consequence of works and not of faith alone, by which this folly is combated, would have been superfluous for Jewish readers. So, then, the entire result of this bold attempt to interpret James as the product of Judaism before it came into contact with the gospel, is simply to re-emphasize the thought how deeply this first piece of Christian literature is rooted in the soil out of which it sprang originally, namely, the Jewish Christian Church of Palestine. Its genuinely Israelitish character, and the absence from it of that ecclesiastical language with which we are so familiar, and which was a development out of the Pauline gospel, are the strongest possible proofs of the correctness of the interpretation which led us to assign the letter to a time prior to the apostolic council, and of the truthfulness of the tradition which ascribes its composition to James of Jerusalem.

It was at the suggestion of this same James that the apostles and elders of the mother Church, gathered in Jerusalem in the winter of 51-52, sent the communication preserved in Acts xv. 23-29 to the Gentile Christians in and about Antioch. It is of interest to note that the discourse of James, preserved in this passage, which resulted in the communication to the Churches, shows very striking resemblances to the letter which James had written in his own name only a few years—perhaps only a single year—before (above, p. 119, n. 7). Regarding the genuineness of this document, it will be necessary to inquire in connection with the question about the sources of Acts. All the other writings originating in the Palestinian Church and meant for this Church belong to a date considerably later, and take for granted the independent development of the Gentile Christian Church concerning which we get our information from the letters of the great apostle to the Gentiles (n. 9).

1. (P. 136.) For example, Kern, Kommentar, 65 ff., 82 ff.; Wiesinger, 36 ff.; Feine, 57 ff., 89 f. The last named, without entering on a discussion of the idea and wording of the salutation, claims that the Epistle was originally a discourse addressed by James to "the Palestinian Church" (the local Church of Jerusalem, more properly), a homily which he afterwards allowed to circulate in the form of a letter among "the believing Jews of the dispersion," or also among the mixed congregations, in Syria probably, composed of both Gentile and Jewish Christians (95, 97, 99). The local colour would thus be explained by the original destination of the document, and the alleged inappropriateness of its "address" by its subsequent use. But how shall we explain the thoughtless indolence which led James to set down his opinions in a form quite unsuited to the wider audience, or, if the homily was already in writing, to have it copied mechanically without adding a few words at least to indicate to the new readers that he was submitting to their consideration a discourse originally intended for quite different people? Other letters, indeed, were soon enough current beyond the circle to which they were first addressed, without the addition of a new heading (cf. Col. iv. 16; Polyc. ad Phil. xiii. 2). But in this case we are asked to suppose that James confined his efforts in a new edition to the preparation of an address which, in its general terms, as Feine himself holds (97), did not correspond at all to the actual destination of the Epistle now in view. Compared with this it would be almost preferable to accept Harnack's bold hypothesis (TU, ii. 2. 106-109), that in this, as in other general Epistles, the salutation is a false heading attached later, because the authority of the old writing could be maintained only by connecting it with the name of an apostle. Apart from the absence of positive proof of such a state of affairs, this conjecture must be set aside, first, because the celebrated James was not considered an apostle in the second century or for some time thereafter. In the second place, whoever sought to preserve or heighten the dignity of the Epistle by attaching the false heading, would either have pointed to the well-known James by describing him as the brother of the Lord, or bishop of Jerusalem, or the like, or else have assigned the authorship to one of the two apostles of that name, in which case he would have had to designate him as such. In the third place, the connection between χαίρειν, Jas. i. 1, and πᾶσαν χάριν, i. 2 (see p. 117, n. 3 above), shows that both greeting and text are from the same hand; cf. Spitta, Der zweite Brief d. Petrus, 26-30, 475. The attempt to evade this difficulty by declaring (Harnack, 108) that in this instance only the words Ἰάκωβος . . . δούλος are a later insertion, and what follows is genuine, cannot be justified by the bold assertion that a greeting which does not mention the writer's name is just as complete as the opening of the Epistle of Barnabas or the Didache, which have no greeting at all. Harnack has recently (Chron. 485-491) declared the entire greeting to be a label attached towards the close of the second century, and the whole letter a compilation, prepared probably before 150, from various discourses of an unknown but "vigorous" teacher.

2. (P. 137.) From the period following the apostolic council and the heated controversy in Galatia, indications of the continued friction between Jewish and Gentile Christianity in many various forms are to be found in such passages as 1 Cor. xvi. 22 (i. 12, iii. 16-23, ix. 1 f., xv. 11; cf. § 18); 2 Cor. ii. 17-iv. 6, v. 11-16, xi. 1-xii. 13; Rom. ii. 11-iii. 8, iii. 29-viii. 17, xiv. 1-xv. 13, xv. 25-33, xvi. 4; Col. ii. 6-iii. 11, iv. 10 f.; Phil. i. 14-18, iii. 2 ff.; 1 Tim. i. 3-11; Tit. i. 10, 14, iii. 9.—Acts xxi. 18-26.—Ign. Magn. viii-x; Philad. vi-ix; Smyrn. i (cf. the writer's Ignatius v. Ant. 359 ff.); Barn. iii. 6, iv. 6, ix.-x. 15; Just. Dial. xlvii-xlviii (GK, ii. 671); the Anabathmoi of James, Epiph. Hær. xxx. 16=Clem. Recogn. i. 55-71, and the whole pseudo-Clementine literature.

3. (P. 138.) Baur, Paulus,² ii. 322-340 (all thought of genuineness already set aside on account of the writer's familiarity with the Greek language and modes of thought, 335); Christentum der drei ersten Jahrh. 122 f. (somewhat earlier than the Pastoral Epistles). Schwegler, i. 418: "In any case it was not written earlier than the Clementine homilies" [which cannot be shown to have existed before the third century]. Schwegler's remark (i. 437), that the view that James was not opposing Paul directly, but a misconception of the Pauline doctrine, was "in itself a most absurd hypothesis," did not deter Baur from adopting that view in his presentation of the subject.

4. (P. 138.) A more definite impression than that outlined above cannot be gained from Weizsacker's shifting and altogether inconclusive reasonings (Apost. Zeitalter, 364-369, 671). When we read that Jas. iii. 6 shows the writer's acquaintance with Greek literature, and that iii. 1 ff. warns "against all sorts of wisdom-teaching" (366), Hilgenfeld's treatment of the passage (Einh. 535 f., 539, n. 2, see p. 121 f. above) seems to be regarded as an adequate exegetical foundation. Yet Weizsäcker goes even beyond Hilgenfeld, in his claim (368) that not merely false wisdom is combated in Jas. iii. 1-13, but all striving after wisdom of any sort. It would be folly to argue against such wisdom as this, and useless to point to Jas. i. 5, iii. 17. It is alleged further (367), that James' attitude toward rich and poor is Ebionitic, and presupposes that Ebionite modification of the first part of the Sermon on the Mount which, we are told, appears in Luke. Now the cardinal principle of Ebionism is (Clem. Hom. xv. 9) πᾶσι τὰ κτήματα ἁμαρτήματα, whereas James follows Jesus (Matt. xiii. 22) in considering the cares of poverty no less a temptation than the deceitfulness of riches, and urges the wealthy Christian not to dispose of his goods, but to make his boast of lowliness (i. 2-11, see p. 86). In Jesus' usage the conception of πτωχοί is derived, as we know, from Isa. lxi. 1; cf. Luke iv. 18, vii. 22; Matt. xi. 5; also Matt. v. 3; Luke vi. 20, and accordingly, even without the explanatory τῷ πνεύματι, Matt. v. 3, it corresponds to the Hebrew עניים, cf. *ZKom. Matt.*² 177 ff. Those who cannot see this should at least take account of the fact that the Ebionites saw fit to substitute πένητες, a word of quite different signification, for the scriptural πτωχοί, and then again, afterward, were obliged to guard by arbitrary additions against too gross a misconception (Clem. Hom. xv. 10, ὁ διδάσκαλος ἡμῶν πιστοὺς πένητας ἐμακάρισεν). Again, we are told (366) that the Epistle has no "dedication,"—in spite of the opening greeting,—because "the address mentions only an ideal body like the one hundred and forty and four thousand of Rev."! In this way the "address," which may not be counted a "dedication," is left without any explanation whatever; and, further, Weizsäcker overlooks the fundamental difference, that James addresses the twelve tribes of his people as his brethren, and discusses with no little thoroughness their social, moral, and religious condition, with which, of course, Rev. vii. 1-8 has nothing to do. Neither Weizsäcker nor Hilgenfeld, whose view is that the letter was written by an Eastern Jewish Christian in the reign of Domitian (540 f.), explains why the "facile" use of Greek (which, in their judgment, makes the composition of the letter by James impossible) should be more conceivable in the case of a Jewish Christian of Palestine in the episcopate of Simeon than it would be some twenty to forty years earlier, circa 45-50 A.D.

5. (P. 139.) We have a spurious letter of James (translated from the Armenian by Vetter, LR, 1896, S. 259), which begins, "James, bishop of Jerusalem, to Quadratus," etc.; cf. also Clement, ed. Lagarde, 3, Πέτρος Ἰακώβῳ τῷ κυρίῳ καὶ ἐπισκόπῳ τῆς ἁγίας ἐκκλησίας κτλ.; 6, Κλήμης Ἰακώβῳ τῷ κυρίῳ καὶ ἐπισκόπων ἐπισκόπῳ, διέποντι δὲ τὴν [ἐν (?)] Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἁγίαν Ἑβραίων ἐκκλησίαν κτλ., and the other recension (Patr. Ap., ed. Cotelierus-Clericus, 1724, i. 617), "Clemens Jacobo, fratri Domini et episcopo episcoporum," etc. Cf. also the spurious letters of Paul, GK, ii. 584, 600, and the letter of John in the writer's Acta Jo. lxiii. 2. On the curious self-concealment of the author of Protevang. Jac. see GK, ii. 775.

6. (P. 140.) It is hardly necessary to say anything about the comfortably arranged meeting-places (ii. 2) and the Church organisation (v. 14) which, we are sometimes told, shows an advanced stage of development; see Hofmann's brief and excellent remarks, vii. 3. 157 f. In particular, the confidence with which healing efficacy is attributed to prayer, without leaving a place for the physician, as in the parallel passage Sir. xxxviii. 9-15, points to high antiquity. As to the use of oil, above, p. 122, n. 11. The opinion repeatedly expressed that such distressing conditions as James censures might indeed appear in Christian communities thirty, sixty, or one hundred, but not twenty years after Jesus' death, cannot be historically substantiated. We have no right to think of the Jewish Christians, among whom even before 35 there were such murmurings as are reported in Acts vi. 1, and such occurrences as that described in Acts v. 1-11, as above all need of serious reproof. Certainly not, when perhaps only a few months after the composition of this letter, men among them were asserting themselves to whom Paul denied all right to be in the Church (Gal. ii. 4), and whom James disowned as unwarranted disturbers (Acts xv. 19, 24). If the errors which James rebukes are thoroughly Jewish (p. 90 f.), then, as uneradicated vestiges of pre-Christian thinking, they are most comprehensible at an early period. Paul found more practical heathenism to correct in the newly founded Church at Corinth than the leaders of the post-apostolic time found in their Churches. The historical picture of the early Churches, whether of Jewish or of Gentile origin, becomes unintelligible only when the rebukes administered to individuals and for individual misdeeds are generalised, and we assume in preachers of such deep moral earnestness as James or Paul, Isaiah or Jesus, the equanimity of an ethical statistician.

7. (P. 141.) Spitta supports his hypothesis in a commentary on James (14-155), the value of which lies in its citation of parallels from Jewish, especially Jewish-Greek, literature, not in its interpretation of the text. The latter can be illustrated here in a few examples only, but in passages which are fundamental to the conception of the book as a Jewish product. With regard to the "address," see above, pp. 73, 80, n. 8. Spitta understands i. 18 not of the new birth of the Christian, but of the creation of mankind (45). But that the creative word of God should be referred to as "a word of truth" instead of being characterised in accordance with the power which is shown in creation (cf. Heb. i. 3; Wis. xviii. 15; Clem. 1 Cor. xxvii. 4; Herm. Vis. i. 3. 4), is hardly credible in itself, and is contrary to the usage both of the Old Testament, where the "word of truth" signifies the revelation given to Israel (Ps. cxix. 43, cf. vv. 30, 86, 138, 142, 160), and of the New (Eph. i. 13; 2 Tim. ii. 15; John xvii. 17; cf. Clem. Hom. Epist. Petri, ii.). The impossibility of this interpretation appears from the context, since the word spoken of in i. 18 must be identical, as Spitta himself recognises (48, 50), with that which is read and heard in public worship, i. 19-25. But the assertion that James tacitly identified this soul-saving word with the word of creation, is one which the exegete should not venture, unless the text somehow indicated this mistaken conception; and even then the choice of phrase in i. 18 would be as unmeaning as it is unparalleled. In order to make it possible to refer ii. 14-26 to controversies within Judaism, and to prepare for that conception of πίστις as Jewish orthodoxy, which in commenting on ii. 14 (72) is put forward as a matter of course, we are asked to understand the word in the same sense in i. 6, where it plainly denotes the spiritual attitude of the worshipper (cf. v. 15), against whose lack of childlike trust in God even i. 5 is directed. For proof of the incredible we are pointed to i. 7, according to which the doubter also expects to receive something from God,—as if one who was certain that he should obtain nothing from God by prayer could be called a doubting petitioner, or would still pray at all. The very fact that he wavers between fear and hope, between desire and distrust, makes him a διακρινόμενος. With regard to ii. 14–26, exegetical agreement is practically out of the question, as Spitta (79) without sufficient reason assumes a lacuna at an important point (see p. 98 above). But he has not succeeded in finding in Jewish literature a single example of the view opposed by James, that faith saves of itself apart from works. Even in the passages from 4 Esdr. which he cites (75), which indeed have sometimes been taken as showing traces of contact with Christian thought, there is nothing in the least similar—not so much as an antithesis between works and faith. While Spitta (54) explains τέλειος as an attribute of the law, i. 25, in contrast with the laws of heathen nations, he overlooks the contrast much more sharply emphasised by the very wording of the passage, which calls this law the law of freedom, and thinks he has accounted for this Christian idea as Jewish by referring to the well-known Stoic phrases about the wise and virtuous which are found in Philo, and to the saying of a certain rabbi Joshua of the third century after Christ in the Appendix to the Pirke Aboth vi. 2: “No one is free but him who devotes himself to the study of the Thorah.” So also does he fail to comprehend the use of the same term in ii. 12; for the idea that the law is there spoken of as a law of liberty because it puts forward no impossible requirements, and in order to represent the judgment as reasonable or lenient (70), is plainly at variance with the phraseology of ii. 13 (ἡ γὰρ κρίσις ἀνέλκος κτλ., not ἡ δέ, or, better, ἀλλά). Then, too, aside from the possibility of explaining the contents of James from the Jewish standpoint which he claims to have established in his commentary, Spitta holds that the seven words which mark the writer as a Christian may be recognised as disturbing interpolations. Though Christians are often enough referred to in the N.T. now as servants of God (1 Pet. ii. 16; Tit. i. 1; Rev. xix. 2) and now as servants of Christ (Gal. i. 10; 1 Cor. vii. 22; Rom. i. 1; Phil. i. 1; Rev. i. 1, ii. 20), the combination of the two terms in Jas. i. 1, being a solitary instance, is said to be suspicious. But if Paul and the author of Revelation used the two conceptions interchangeably, why might not James combine them, just as in 2 Pet. i. 1 we find the two titles servant and apostle of Christ united? These latter Paul commonly uses by turns (Gal. i. 1, 1 Cor. i. 1 on the one hand, Phil. i. 1, Tit. i. 1 on the other), in combination but once (Rom. i. 1), and even then in a form unlike that of 2 Peter. We see from 1 Cor. viii. 6 and Eph. iv. 5 f. how little fear the early Christians had that they might appear either to be serving two masters or obliged to choose between two, God and Christ. In faith, in worship, and in service, God and Christ for them were one. This finds striking grammatical illustration in 1 Thess. iii. 11; Rev. xxii. 3; and for the same reason ὁ κύριος is not infrequently a title which stands above the distinction between God and Christ, 1 Thess. iii. 12; Rom. x. 9–15. Until examples are brought forward, we cannot believe that a Jew without office or honours would have introduced himself to his readers as a “servant of God”; and no one will find passages like Ezra v. 11, or the use of the formula "thy servant" in prayer, Ps. xix. 12, Luke ii. 29, at all comparable. In Spitta's opinion (4 f., cf. Vorrede, iv), the difficulty which ii. 1 has presented to expositors arises from the fact that the original text τὴν πίστιν τοῦ κυρίου τῆς δόξης (to be understood of God) has been obscured by the interpolation of ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (in the sense of 1 Cor. ii. 8). But how are we to conceive that an interpolator, whose important object was to make a Christian book out of a Jewish writing, which, according to Spitta, had already been read and highly esteemed by Paul and Peter, should have used no other means to that end than the introduction at one point of four words which make the passage "unique" in early Christian literature, and at the other point of three words which constitute a crux interpretum, when it would have been child's play to avoid both? Here, too, the difficulty of the text is an indication of its originality. Moreover, we cannot see why the words should not be translated, as by the Peshito, Grotius, and Hofmann, "the faith in the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ." For the order of words, cf. Jas. iii. 3 (τῶν ἱππῶν . . . στόματα); Acts iv. 33 (according to B and Chrysost., ἀπεδίδουν τὸ μαρτύριον οἱ ἀπόστολοι τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ [Χριστοῦ] τῆς ἀναστάσεως); and for πίστις τῆς δόξης, cf. εὐαγγέλιον τῆς δόξης, 2 Cor. iv. 4; 1 Tim. i. 11; ἐλπίς τῆς δόξης, Col. i. 27.

8. (P. 144.) In addition to the writings of Gamaliel, which have been mentioned several times (p. 33, n. 18), cf. 2 Macc. i. 1 and 10; also a communication which the Jews of Jerusalem at the time of Simon ben Shetach and king Alexander Jannai (104–78 B.C.) addressed to the Jewish community of Alexandria in order to bring about the return of Judah ben Tabai (reputed to be the Nasi of that period) who had fled thither, Jer. Chagigah, 77d; Sanhedrin, 23c; and in the same connection Joël Müller, Briefe u. Responen in der vorgeonäischen jüdischen Literatur, Berlin, 1886, S. 7, 21—a book in general well worth reading. See above also, p. 106, n. 1.

9. (P. 146.) The letters of recommendation, by means of which the Petrine party introduced themselves in Corinth (2 Cor. iii. 1), would be properly considered, if they were extant, among the literary products of Jewish Christianity. Of the documents which have been preserved, 2 Pet., Jude, and Matt. belong here, but probably not Heb.

III.

THE THREE OLDEST EPISTLES OF PAUL

§ 9. PRELIMINARY CRITICAL REMARKS.

IT is impossible to investigate the letters commonly attributed to Paul without discussing a great many different opinions. It seems best, therefore, in order to avoid repetition, to preface the investigation proper by a general survey of the history of the various attempts which have been made to criticise the Pauline letters (n. 1).

As early as the year 150, Marcion (GK, i. 585–718, ii. 409–529), who held that Paul was the only one of those called apostles who really preached an uncorrupted gospel, found the collection of Pauline letters in use by the Church at that time to be in need of a thoroughgoing criticism. There is no hint, however, that Marcion's view regarding the origin of any one of these letters differed from that of the Church, or that he regarded any one of them as wrongly attributed to Paul, or as an intentional forgery in Paul's name. Besides the nine letters addressed to Churches, he included in his Apostolicon, or collection of Pauline letters, designed for use in the independent Church which he organised, the Epistle to Philemon. The Epistles to Timothy and to Titus were not in this collection. Whether Marcion was familiar with them, and for some reason rejected them, is a disputed question. But we do know, from the form which he gave the ten letters that he did accept, as well as from the statements of his opponents, that he held the form of the Pauline letters current in the Church at that time and later to be the result of a systematic interpolation, Jewish in spirit, and made after the Church had been degenerated by Jewish influences. He undertook to restore the genuine text by cutting out a number of longer sections and shorter paragraphs, by the addition of a few sentences and words, most of which were taken from other passages of Paul's letters, and by slightly emending the text in numerous places. Marcion was in possession neither of the sources nor of the historical information necessary for such a critical operation; nor did he profess to be. The only criterion which he used, and which sufficed for his Church several centuries afterwards, was his preconception of what was genuinely Christian and so genuinely Pauline.

It is readily seen how it was easier for the Church to refute Marcion's criticism of the Pauline documents, lacking as it did all historical basis, than it was for it to get rid of the fundamental idea upon which this criticism was based, namely, the irreconcilable contradiction between Christianity and Judaism,—an idea which has since come to the front more than once in a variety of forms. What critical investigations of Paul's letters were made by the early Church was not the result of historical or linguistic inquiry into the letters themselves, but simply of the fact that the differences in tradition and opinion which had long existed in different parts of the Church entered gradually into the consciousness of the Church at large. Thus from the third century we have such a process taking place with reference to the Epistle to the Hebrews, which was regarded as Pauline and canonical in some sections, but not by any means in all. So also in the fourth century a similar process took place with reference to Philemon, which was not included in the collection of Pauline letters used by the Syrian Church (GK, ii. 997–1006). Whether or not the appearance of spurious

Pauline letters, two of which are mentioned in the Muratori Canon, particularly whether the acceptance and subsequent rejection of an apocryphal Third Epistle to the Corinthians in the Syrian Canon, occasioned critical discussion, we do not know. Though in discussions of this kind occasional reference was made to the style and contents of the questionable letters, the discussion of such references belongs rather in the history of the Canon than in a history of the theological investigation of the Pauline letters; still more so the statement of the conclusion with which the entire Church was finally satisfied.

The tradition regarding the Pauline letters, which in its essential points existed even before Marcion's time, which was substantially accepted by him, and which, after some question had been raised with reference to a few points, finally prevailed through the entire Church, remained practically unquestioned up to the beginning of the last century. The question of the origin, sources, and trustworthiness of the Gospels had been heatedly discussed for decades before there was the least question about the genuineness of any of the Pauline Epistles. Doubts expressed by Evanson in his critique of the Gospels in 1792 made little impression (n. 2). When, in 1807, Schleiermacher asserted with great positiveness that 1 Tim. was spurious, serious-minded people asked "whether perhaps the whole was not a mere lusus ingenii, a game of wit and ingenuity, just to see how far critical Pyrrhonism could be carried and still retain a semblance of truth" (n. 3). When, however, F. Chr. Baur, a man whom no one could suspect of joking about things scientific, subjected all the extant Pauline letters to criticism in the light of his new and comprehensive theory about the development of Christianity in the apostolic age, concluding that only Gal., 1 and 2 Cor., and Rom. (excepting chaps. xv. and xvi.) were genuine, the whole Pauline question became one of the utmost importance (n. 4). It was a great mistake on the part of those who found that they could not follow Baur in his rejection of Pauline Epistles, or who could not accept his results regarding them all, that they raised no question about the genuineness of the Epistles which Baur did accept, although Baur and his followers never attempted any proof for their positive critical conclusions. Since no effort was made by critics to set forth the reasons which compelled historical investigators to accept some of Paul's letters as genuine historical documents, or to show the scope of these reasons, we are not surprised when Bruno Bauer declares that all the Pauline Epistles are spurious, written between the years 130 and 170; and when a later school of Dutch critics, working independently of Bauer, question and finally deny the genuineness of all the Pauline writings (n. 5). The position of the critic is not an enviable one, who, by denying the genuineness of all the documents associated with a distinguished name, and the essential trustworthiness of all the early traditions concerning these documents, deprives himself of a fixed and common standard by which he may test what seems doubtful. What is spurious can be tested only with reference to what is acknowledged to be authentic, and if criticism is to obtain any positive results, it must be based upon historical data acknowledged to be trustworthy. We need not inquire whether it is from this consideration primarily, or because of the irresistible impression that the character of the life portrayed in the Pauline letters is such as could not have been produced second-hand, that criticism of the sort which simply denies everything is not making headway at the present time.

Consequently, at the present time all the more attention is being paid to that type of criticism of which Marcion is still the best example. When in doubt about any point, the critic satisfies his own mind by assuming an interpolation, and so avoids depriving himself of the necessary basis for the critical process, as he would do if he denied the genuineness of all his traditional sources and facts. Attempts in this direction were made by Herm. Weisse and F. Hitzig in Germany. More recently this method has been pursued chiefly in Holland (n. 6).

Another method followed by many is that suggested first by J. S. Semler. Certain inequalities which are thought to exist between different parts of the same letter, it is assumed, can be explained by supposing that when the separate letters were first copied, or when they were gathered into a collection, either by oversight or intention, parts became dislocated and confused, so that sections were united in a single document which originally did not belong together. Inasmuch as we have not the means at our command for restoring the text of Paul's letters, and the N.T. text generally, so that every sentence and every word is established beyond all doubt, the process of text criticism is largely identical with the process of the higher, literary, and historical criticism.

The more important of the critical attempts made along these various lines we shall have occasion to notice in connection with the investigation of the separate Epistles. Here a few considerations of a more general character may be stated briefly.

1. The early date of all Paul's Epistles, except that of the Epistles to Timothy and Titus, is comprehensively and strongly attested by Marcion's Apostolicon. That Marcion, who withdrew from the Roman Church and became the head of a separate organisation, probably in the year 144, did not himself write any one of the Pauline letters in his collection, is clear from the fact that, in the year 180, the Catholic Church accepted all the ten documents in Marcion's Apostolicon as Pauline, and used them in their religious services. Now it is simply impossible to suppose that any of these could have been borrowed from this "firstborn son of Satan" by a Church whose bishops and their faithful followers summarily rejected Marcion's teaching and treatment of the apostolic writings. The probability is that Marcion accepted these ten letters as Pauline from the Church in which he grew up, and, after making some changes in them, adopted them in his own Church. His acceptance of the Pauline origin of these letters, his criticism of single points in the tradition regarding them, e.g. regarding the traditional address of the Ephesian letter (§ 28), the belief which led him to make a new recension of the text, namely, that all the copies of the Pauline letters extant in his time contained a text which had been corrupted by the Church, finally his abandonment of the attempt to base his text recension on old and uncorrupted documents, all go to show that in 140–150 there was no suspicion in the Church of the recent date or sudden appearance of any of the Pauline letters. That these Epistles should have been written during Marcion's lifetime, or after the year 110, is therefore out of the question.

2. A comparison of Marcion's text of the Pauline letters with the text used in the Church, shows that Marcion found a number of readings which, in the course of the transmission of the text in the Church, have been replaced by other readings. But, leaving this difference out of account, it is clear that in plan, general contents and compass, the Pauline letters which Marcion had before him were substantially the same as the letters which have come down to us. He found chaps. xv. and xvi. already a part of Rom., and chaps. i.–xiii. of 2 Cor. forming a single letter. Hence it follows that all important changes in the order and structure of the letters must have been made before the year 110.

3. Difference of opinion still exists regarding the date of a great many early Christian writings, e.g., that of the letters of Ignatius, the Epistle of Polycarp, the Epistle of Barnabas, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Didache. Even a work which is so thoroughly attested, and which can be so definitely dated as Clement's so-called First Epistle to the Corinthians, is sometimes brought down to a later period. But, allowing for this uncertainty, we have still a sufficiently large number of Christian writings, admittedly belonging in the period between 90 and 170, from which to form a definite idea as to the thoughts which were uppermost in the mind of the Church during this period, and the spiritual forces which were at work. Perhaps it would be too much to say that this literature shows a general decline from the high standard of apostolic Christianity, especially from the strikingly original teachings of Paul. But so much is clear, that there is nothing in the literature of 90-170 comparable in character to what we find in the letters of Paul accepted by Marcion, or to the ideas which these letters were meant to refute. How little this age was in a position even to understand Paul's thoughts, is quite as evident in the case of Marcion and of the school of Valentinus as in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers and the earlier apologists, such as Aristides and Justin. It is absurd to suppose that a Christian living in the year 100 or 130, with interests so different from those of his age, and so superior to his contemporaries in the compass and depth of his thought, should have given no expression to his ideas except under a false name, and in letters dated back into the past. The Pauline letters must therefore have been written prior to the period of transition between the first and second centuries.

4. Before a denial of the genuineness of this collection of letters, or of separate parts of the same, can command general assent, it must be shown to be made in agreement with the principles derived from a careful study of the literature of the early Christian Church, which is acknowledged to be pseudepigraphic. Here we have, besides the apocryphal letters of Paul already mentioned, some other letters (n. 7), some fragments of the ancient "Preaching of Peter," the apostolic legends of the second and third centuries, and the pseudo-Clementine literature. All these are similar in character to the pseudo-Pauline literature. The conclusion of an unbiassed comparison must always be, that even the least important and the most suspected of Paul's letters show characteristics altogether the opposite of those in this literature, which leave no intelligent reader in doubt as to its fictitious character.

5. It has not always been clearly realised what difficulties are in the way, not so much of the composition of letters of this kind, as of their successful forgery and circulation. From 2 Thess. ii. 2, iii. 17, it may be inferred that even in Paul's lifetime letters were put into circulation which were falsely attributed to him; but it is to be remembered at the same time that the forgery was almost immediately detected (§ 15). Then, as now, spurious letters, if written with any expectation of permanently deceiving people, could not be put into circulation until after the death of the alleged author and readers. With the exception of Philem., 1 and 2 Tim., and Tit., however, Paul's letters are addressed to Churches which had a continuous life. Though there is proof enough of the fact, if it were necessary to adduce it (n. 8), it goes without saying that up to the close of the first century there were Christians living in Corinth and elsewhere who had been members of the Church during Paul's lifetime. I confess that I cannot conceive how a letter, purporting to be Paul's, and addressed to the Corinthians, the Thessalonians, the Philippians, or the Colossians, could have been actually written and put into circulation between the year 80 and the year 100, and yet have been received and accepted in these various localities. Then the older members of these Churches must have made themselves believe that the letter, which now came to light, had been sent to them by the apostle himself thirty or forty years before, and yet had been entirely lost sight of up to this time.

Special difficulties arise from the occurrence in many of these letters of a great many significant personal references (1 Cor. i. 14–16, xvi. 15–17 ; Col. iv. 9–17 ; Philem. 1 f., 10 ; Phil. ii. 25–30, iv. 2 f., 18 ; Rom. xvi. 1–23). Even if, as is extremely improbable and contrary to what is usual in pseudepigraphic literature, the forger was well enough acquainted with conditions in the several Churches to employ only names of persons who were actually members of these Churches during Paul's lifetime, and to assign them their proper rôles, such very personal remarks, greetings, warning exhortations, and injunctions of the apostle, which never reached the persons for whom they were intended, must have been read by these persons, or if they were dead, then by their relatives, with the greatest interest and with no little astonishment. Every mistake which the writer made in these matters—and a person writing thus in Paul's name could hardly have avoided making some—tended during the generation after Paul's death to make the forged letter appear in the highest degree ridiculous, at least in the Church to which it was addressed, and so absolutely to preclude its acceptance by such a Church. And as a matter of fact, so far as we know, this was actually the fate of the spurious letters put out in Paul's name. And these spurious letters were certainly written later than the canonical letters of Paul, even assuming that the latter are spurious, at a time when one might expect the Churches to which these letters are alleged to have been sent by Paul to be more easily deceived. The third letter to the Corinthians never found acceptance in Corinth, but only in the far East, among the Syrians and Armenians. Early Christians in Alexandria and Asia Minor seem never to have known anything about the spurious letters to the Laodiceans and Alexandrians. The first mention made of them is by a Roman writer, and in the case of the letter to the Alexandrians this is the only mention. Such compilations could never be widely accepted, for the reason that the Churches to which they are alleged to have been sent, and from which alone they could be successfully circulated, never did and never could accept them.

6. The same reasons which make it improbable that the spurious letters to the Churches purporting to be from Paul were put into circulation between the time of the apostle's death and the time of Marcion, argue just as strongly against the assumption that the letters which Paul did write to the Churches were materially altered during the same period. Such alterations are usually associated with the gathering up of Paul's letters into a collection, and changes generally supposed to have been made in the text are explained as due to the fact that the letters were circulated only in the form of a collection. Such a hypothesis presupposes that up to the time when the letters were collected, and so passed into general circulation, they remained quite unnoticed and were not much copied. But this in turn, an assumption of itself, is improbable, and contrary to plain facts. That Paul's letters made a profound impression at the time when they were written, and did not remain without influence until they were accepted by the Church as Holy Scripture, is clear from the N.T. itself. Besides Paul's own hints (2 Cor. x. 9-11) and that of 2 Pet. iii. 15 f.,—a passage generally assigned to a much later date (§§ 42, 44),—we have as proof the fact that the author of 1 Peter, which was written in Rome, certainly before the close of the first century and probably in 63 or 64, had read Ephesians and Romans, and was influenced by them in the composition of his own letter (§ 40). What is expressly enjoined in one case in Col. iv. 16 must have happened in other cases where there was no express direction, and Churches which were in communication with one another must have exchanged the apostle's letters very soon after they were received. It is hardly likely that Paul's letters created less interest than the hastily written Epistles of Ignatius to the Churches in Asia Minor, for which request was made of the bishop of Smyrna by the Church in Philippi shortly after the martyr passed through that city (Pol. ad Phil. 13). Moreover, we know that in the post-apostolic age Churches made a great deal of any special relations they had had with particular apostles, and letters addressed to them were regarded as being of special importance (n. 8). An idea like this, which determined the whole development of the Church, could not have grown up suddenly, nor could it have been the immediate effect of the introduction of a collection of the letters of Paul or of any apostolic writings. If, as is more probable, the making and general circulating of such collections presuppose an interest in the apostles and the writings they left behind them, then there is no reason to doubt that before the collection was made, which Marcion found in existence, Paul's letters to the Churches had been much copied and circulated. In particular, there is no reason to doubt that in the Churches which could boast that they had been the first to receive them, such letters were not forgotten. But in that case it is next to impossible that in the process of gathering Paul's letters to Churches into a collection, which afterwards passed into general circulation, material changes should have been made in the text. Such alterations must have been made before the letters began to be copied and circulated in this way; but at that stage in their history such alterations are not at all likely to have been made.

In making these general statements, the purpose has been to establish a certain degree of confidence in the tradition according to which nine of the N.T. writings are letters of Paul addressed to different churches, and to create a general mistrust of attempts of one sort and another to replace this tradition by theories which do not themselves hang together.

1. (P. 152.) The present writer has discussed several aspects of the matter more fully in the ZfKWuKL, 1889, S. 451-466, "Die Briefe des Paulus seit fünfzig Jahren im Feuer der Kritik."

2. (P. 154.) E. EVANSON (The Dissonance of the Four Generally Received Evangelists and the Evidence of their Authenticity Examined, Ipswich, 1792,—a work not to be found in Erlangen or Munich, but cited on the authority of Hessedamm,—cf. n. 6, p. 1) accepted of the Gospels only Luke, omitting chaps. i. and ii.; and of Paul's letters rejected Rom., Eph., Col. as spurious, questioning also Titus, Phil., Philem.

3. (P. 154.) With regard to SCHLEIERMACHER, see below, § 37, n. 1. The opinion quoted in the text was expressed by H. PLANCK (and in the name of other scholars also), Bemerkungen über den ersten paulin. Brief an Tim., Göttingen 1808, S. 256.

4. (P. 154.) F. CHR. BAUR (1792-1860) began his critical work on the N.T. with an essay on the Christ party in Corinth (TZfTh. 1831, S. 61 ff.). A criticism of the Pastoral Epistles followed (1835, see § 37, n. 1), and various essays which are to be regarded as preliminary studies for his Paulus (1845, 2nd ed. in 2 volumes, published by Zeller, 1866-1867). H. THIERSCH in his Versuch zur Herstellung des histor. Standpunkts für die Kritik der ntl. Schriften, 1845, a work issued at about the same time, and still worth reading, could not, of course, take Baur's Paulus into consideration, and touched upon the criticism of the Pauline Epistles only in his chapters on the heresies mentioned in the N.T. and on the Canon. J. CHR. K. v. HOFMANN, however (1810-1877), in his last and unfinished work, Die heilige Schrift NT's zusammenhängend untersucht (i.-ii. 3, 1862-1866, 2nd ed. 1869-1877; iii.-viii. 1868-1878; ix.-xi. published by Volck, 1881-1886), chose as the starting-point in his historical and exegetical investigations of the N.T., primarily the Pauline Epistles, in opposition to Baur (i.² 60).

5. (P. 155.) BR. BAUER, Kritik der paul. Briefe, 3 parts, 1850-1852; Christus u. die Cäsaren, der Ursprung des Christentums aus dem römischen Griechentum, 1877, S. 371 ff. Doubts of the authenticity of Galatians were expressed by A. PIERSON in Holland, De Bergrede, etc., 1878, p. 99 ff. A. D. LOMAN, Quæstiones Paulinæ in ThTjd. 1882 ff., and R. STECK, Der Gal. nach seiner Echtheit untersucht nebst krit. Bemerkungen zur den paul. Hauptbriefen, 1888, followed with greater confidence and more detailed argument, with some dependence also on Bauer. In opposition to Steck, cf. J. GLOËL, Die jüngste Kritik des Gal. auf ihre Berechtigung geprüft, 1890, and the writer's essay (S. 462-466), mentioned in n. 1 above.

6. (P. 156.) CHR. H. WEISSE, Beiträge zur Kritik der paul. Briefe an die Gal., Röm., Phil., Kol., published by Sulze, 1867. F. HITZIG, Zur Kritik paul. Briefe, 1870, belongs here also, on account of his hypothesis with regard to Col. and Eph. (S. 11-33, see § 29 below). The same PIERSON who gave the first impulse in Holland to the denial of the genuineness of all the Pauline Epistles (n. 5), had at the time remarked on the possibility that their difficulties were to be ascribed to an interpolator. While LOMAN went further in the first-named path, PIERSON, in collaboration with the philologist NABER, pursued the second: Verisimilia. Laceram conditionem NTi exemplis illustrarunt et ab origine repetierunt A. Pierson et S. A. Naber, 1886. The obscurities and contradictions of this account of the origin of the Epistles, as based upon able Jewish writings appropriated and redacted by an ignorant Churchman, may be due in part to the fact that two different minds were at work in this critical effort, as well as (supposedly) in the writings with which it deals. Cf in opposition KUENEN, Verisimilia? ThTjd. 1886, S. 491-536, and the present writer's essay (S. 458 ff.) mentioned in n. 1 above. Another work to be mentioned here is D. VÖLTER'S Die Komposition der paul. Hauptbriefe, I. Röm. u. Gal., 1890, in which a genuine Romans (i. 1a, 7, v. 6, 8-17, v. and vi., xii. and xiii., xv. 14-32, xvi. 21-23) is extracted from the shell of the traditional Epistle, which is held to have acquired its present form by a fivefold interpolation and the addition of a letter addressed to Ephesus, Rom. xvi. 1-20. Galatians, according to this critic, has suffered only minor interpolations; but even so is the work not of Paul himself, but of a Paulinist of a later period. On Völter's treatment of Philippians see § 32. C. CLEMEN, Die Einheitlichkeit der paul. Briefe an der Hand der bisher mit bezug auf sie aufgestellten Interpolations- und Kompilationshypothesen, 1894, gives an outline of all attempts in this direction. Worth reading, also, is the pseudonymous essay of an American theologian, Der Röm. beurteilt u. gevierteilt, eine krit. Untersuchung von CARL HESDAMM, 1890 [Romans Dissected, by E. D. M'Realsham=Charles M. Mead].

7. (P. 158.) With regard to spurious letters by James and to James, see above, p. 148, n. 5; spurious Pauline Epistles, GK, ii. 565-621. The principles referred to above the present writer has already developed, and supported by examples, in his Ignatius, 529 ff., especially 537-541; and to some extent, indeed, in his Hirt des Hermas, 70-93.

8. (Pp. 159, 162.) Clem. 1 Cor. xlv. 3-6, the presbyters appointed by the apostles at Corinth, some of them still living. Fortunatus, chap. lxxv.=1 Cor. xvi. 17, see § 18, seems to have been one of these. On the relations of the several Churches to the apostles and on apostolic letters, see Clem. 1 Cor. xlvii.; and on chap. v. see § 36 below; also Ign. Eph. xi. 2, xii. 2; Rom. iv. 3; Polyc. ad Phil. iii. 2, xi. 3; cf. GK, i. 807, 811 ff., 839.

§ 10. THE HISTORICAL PRESUPPOSITIONS AND THE OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

Since it is impossible to determine beforehand what is understood by Γαλατία, to the Churches of which the letter is addressed (i. 2, iii. 1), the only thing to do is to gather from the letter itself what historical information it has to give with reference to the origin and early development of the Churches to which it was sent, the relation Paul sustained to these Churches, and the occasion which led to the composition of the letter.

These Churches had been established by Paul's own preaching (i. 8). From him they received the gospel

(i. 9). He recalls now with sorrow the labour he had bestowed upon them (iv. 11), and remembers with a feeling of sadness the joyful reception he had had among them when for the first time he came to them with the preaching of the gospel (iv. 13-15). He calls them his own children, with whom he is again, like a mother, in travail (iv. 19); speaking manifestly in the same sense in which, addressing another Church, he speaks of himself as their father who had begotten them (1 Cor. iv. 15). This does not, of course, preclude the possibility of Paul's having had the support of one or more helpers in his work among the Galatians (cf. 2 Cor. i. 19). That this was actually the case is proved by the plural εὐηγγελισάμεθα (i. 8, n. 1). When in iv. 13 f. Paul says that it was on account of physical illness that he first preached the gospel among the Galatians,—an illness that might have made him repulsive to those who heard his preaching,—of course he does not mean to say that this was the primary motive of his preaching, but only that it was this circumstance that kept him in this region for a sufficient length of time to preach the gospel to these particular persons (n. 2). From this same passage we learn also that Paul afterwards revisited the Galatian region and preached the gospel there a second time. In those instances where Paul reminds the Galatians of something that he had said to them previously, there is no way of determining absolutely whether it is to be referred to the first or to the second visit. On the first visit he must certainly have declared that scandalous living excluded one from the kingdom of God (v. 21, cf. 1 Cor. vi. 9; 1 Thess. iv. 2, 11; 2 Thess. iii. 10). But he preached the gospel also on his second visit, and so had occasion to re-emphasise this primary rule. It may not have been until his second visit to the Galatians that he had occasion to warn them against permitting themselves to be circumcised, and against preachers of a false gospel (n. 3). Even if he did warn them on the second visit, the occasion for it could not have been the condition of the Galatian Churches, still less so if the warnings are to be referred back to the earlier visit; for the letter begins with a strong expression of surprise that the Galatians had turned away so quickly from the real and the only gospel of Christ, and had suffered themselves to be persuaded by certain troublesome preachers to accept a caricature of the gospel. This introduction and the tone of the Epistle throughout show that shortly before writing Paul had been surprised by the report of the first appearance of these teachers, and of the rapid success of their work. Consequently they must have come among the Galatians in the interval between Paul's second visit and the writing of this letter, and they must have been still at work when he wrote. This latter point is proved by the use of present tenses in i. 6, 7, v. 10-12, vi. 12 f. Throughout the letter these false teachers are distinguished from the members of the Churches addressed, and charged with being their seducers (i. 7, iii. 1, iv. 17, 29-31, v. 7, 10, 12, vi. 12 f.). There is no hint anywhere that they belonged in the Galatian Churches (for this distinction cf. 1 Cor. xv. 12; Acts xx. 30 with Acts xx. 29). Paul does not resist them as if they were settled teachers, who as members of the Churches were doing things which to him seemed injurious, but he treats them as if they were preachers of a false gospel, i.e. missionary preachers who dogged his steps and invaded the Churches which he founded. In the Galatian Churches, as in all the Pauline Churches of which we know anything, there were some native Jews, a necessary assumption if Gal. iii. 26-29 is to have a natural explanation. But he is writing with the large majority of the members in view, and with reference to the character which he himself had impressed upon them, so that he treats them throughout as Gentile Christians. Not only is this clear from single passages such as iv. 8 f., ii. 5 (πρὸς ὑμᾶς, cf. ii. 2, ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν; ii. 8, εἰς τὰ ἔθνη), iii. 29, v. 2, vi. 12, but it appears also from the character of the questions discussed throughout the letter. On the other hand, the preachers of what can only falsely be called a gospel are Jews, by birth, through circumcision, and in spirit (iv. 29–31, v. 12, vi. 12–17). The comparison which Paul makes in iv. 21–31 between his opponents and himself by contrasting the spiritual with the fleshly descendants of Abraham, referring to the earthly Jerusalem as the home or mother of the latter, and to the heavenly Jerusalem as the home or mother of the former, is very far-fetched, unless these Jewish Christian missionaries had come into Galatia from this earthly Jerusalem. This supposition is favoured by what we know of similar disturbances in the Gentile Christian Churches (Acts xv. 1, 24; Gal. ii. 12; 2 Cor. iii. 1, § 18). As indicated by the plurals in i. 7, iv. 17, v. 12, vi. 12 f., there were certainly a number of these missionaries who came to the Galatians, so that in all probability they had a prearranged plan, entering the various Churches simultaneously, and doing their work in concert. That one of their number acted as a leader is not unlikely; but there is no hint of it in the letter, and it certainly cannot be inferred from the one singular ὁ ταράσσων ὑμᾶς in v. 10, much less from the form of the questions in iii. 1, v. 7.

From the first main division of the Epistle, i. 11–ii. 14, which is principally historical and apologetic in character, we learn that these Jewish missionaries had criticised in an unkindly manner his missionary work and his life history since his conversion, hoping thereby to undermine the confidence of the Galatian Churches in their founder, and so to gain foothold for their own teaching, which they represented as a more perfect form of the gospel. They must have made it appear that immediately after his conversion Paul accepted a position quite subordinate, and entirely dependent upon the earlier apostles, and also that at the so-called apostolic council he submitted to the decision of his superiors in Jerusalem. So, they argued, the independence with which Paul worked among the Gentiles was an unjustifiable pretension on his part, while the radical departure from the practices of Jewish Christians in Palestine, which Paul not only permitted in the Churches under his influence, but for which he himself was directly responsible, was nothing less than a degeneracy from Christianity as originally taught. It is implied in i. 10 that in his effort to please men, i.e. to make the gospel palatable to the Gentiles, and to make as many converts as he could in his missionary work, Paul abridged the gospel in some of its essential points, and preached it to the Gentiles only in a mutilated form.

What it was that Paul's opponents wanted to substitute for his presentation of the gospel, essential parts of which they claimed Paul had left out, we learn from the second main division of the letter (ii. 15–iv. 11), in which Paul develops his own doctrine, and from certain portions of the third main division (iv. 12–vi. 18), which is largely hortatory. They insisted that the Mosaic law, which they regarded as God's chief revelation, was to be for all time the rule of faith and practice in the Church of God. Therefore, if they were to be saved, Gentile Christians must submit to its demands. First of all they must be circumcised (v. 2, vi. 12 f.); and, in order to become real Christians, sanctified and fully qualified members of the Church of Jesus, they must become proselytes of righteousness and accept Judaism. This was the position taken by those Pharisaic Jewish Christians from Palestine, the coming of whom to Antioch made necessary the apostolic council (Acts xv. 1, 5; Gal. ii. 4). At the time when this letter was written, the persons holding similar views who had gone among the Galatians do not seem to have succeeded in inducing a single Gentile Christian to accept circumcision, though they had made a deep impression. All the Churches seem to Paul to have been bewitched (iii. 1), and their prosperous growth interfered with (v. 7). All the Galatians have suffered themselves to be disturbed (i. 7, v. 10), and are even on the point of turning away from the only gospel of Christ (i. 6, iii. 3). Their confidence in Paul is shaken (iv. 12-20). The observance of Jewish holy days and feasts seems to have become quite general (iv. 9 f.). Many, at least, were contemplating further steps in the same direction (iv. 21). Although these foreign Judaisers were wise enough to assume a certain appearance of liberality by not demanding at once from the Gentile Christians a complete observance of the law, so that Paul himself was compelled to call attention to this inevitable consequence (v. 3), yet with regard to one point, namely, the necessity of being circumcised, they made no concessions. The worst was to be feared.

Since Paul does not seem anywhere to be uncertain with regard to the facts and conditions among the Galatians which are presupposed and discussed by him, it is hardly possible that his information was derived solely from private sources, letters and oral statements of individual Christians (cf. 1 Cor. i. 11, xi. 18). On the other hand, also, nothing in the letter gives evidence that it is an answer to a writing sent to Paul in the name and by direction of the Churches, cf. ZKom. Gal. 8. It is much more probable that accredited representatives of the Galatian Churches had come to Paul to obtain a decision on the question, which had not yet been decided. Of them he could have inquired also concerning everything which they had not reported to him of their own accord. Otherwise he could not have written this Epistle without first asking for an explanation of the surprising things that were going on, or without expressing doubt as to the truthfulness of the reports that had come to him. The quæstio facti between him and his readers is settled. Therefore, assuming the facts, he proceeds at once (i. 6) to pass judgment upon them, beginning with a passionate remonstrance in which attack and defence are almost inseparably blended. Although, as we learn in this Epistle, he was even at that time in the habit of dictating his letters, this one was written entirely by his own hand, a fact to which he calls his readers' attention (vi. 11, n. 4). On this occasion, when he needed to throw the entire weight of his personality into the wavering balance, to address them through another seemed like erecting a barrier between himself and the hearts of the children for whom he had been in travail. And even when he wrote himself, words seemed wooden and unsuited to his purpose. Best of all would it be if he could be present in person and with the emotion of his voice win their half-estranged hearts back again to himself and to the truth for which he stood (iv. 20). It is necessary to assume that he was at such a distance from the Galatians that a journey to them in the near future was out of the question. Otherwise in this passage he must have stated in so many words that at the time a journey was out of the question, with the reasons why it was impossible. From what is said in other letters, one would at least expect him to say something about coming to them in the more remote future (1 Thess. ii. 17–iii. 11; 1 Cor. iv. 18–21, xi. 34, xvi. 2–7; 2 Cor. ix. 4, x. 2–16, xii. 20–xiii. 10; Phil. ii. 24). How long a period had elapsed since his last visit we are not able to determine from the letter (n. 5), nor is there any indication as to the place where it was written, except that from i. 2 f., and the entire absence of special greetings, it may be inferred that no one of the persons who assisted in the organisation of the Galatian Churches was with Paul at the time. In this letter his position is that of an advocate in a process affecting his own person and moving him deeply, and the fact that

Paul represents the letter as being from all those about him (i. 2) does no more than produce the impression that what he writes is correctly stated, according to the unanimous judgment of all available persons capable of judging the matter.

1. (P. 165.) That "we," i. 8 and i. 9 (where reference is had probably to two distinct incidents, § 11), is to be taken literally, follows from the otherwise constant use of "I" throughout the Epistle. Special proof of this interpretation is afforded by ἄρτι πάλιν λέγω, which stands in immediate sequence to the plural in i. 9. In spite of the inclusion with him in the address of all the brethren in his company (i. 2),—which cannot be looked upon as a joint authorship,—Paul is the sole speaker throughout the Epistle, as in 1 Cor., in spite of the mention of Sosthenes, 1 Cor. i. 1.

2. (P. 165.) It is not necessary to prove that δι' ἀσθένειαν τῆς σαρκός (iv. 13) cannot designate merely an accompanying situation, as though it read either δι' ἀσθενείας or ἐν ἀσθενείᾳ σαρκός. The text will hardly support the hypothesis of Ramsay (The Church in the Roman Empire, 2nd ed. 1893, pp. 62–65; St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen, 1896, pp. 92–97) that the apostle is here referring to an attack of fever to which he fell a victim in the heated regions of Pamphylia, and on account of which he felt constrained to travel northward to the cooler mountain region of Pisidian Antioch. An attack of malaria must certainly incapacitate one for strenuous exertions of any sort. But when one has recuperated to such a degree as to enable him to preach successfully as Paul did among the Galatians, his convalescence cannot make him an object of aversion, either natural or religious, as was the case with Paul in his first preaching in Galatia (iv. 13 f.). The reference here, as in 2 Cor. xii. 7–9, is rather to another malady, incurable in its nature, and reappearing from time to time. Against Ramsay, but especially in opposition to Krenkel's assumption (epilepsy), see the medical opinion of Professor W. Herzog (RKZ, 1899, Nos. 10, 11), who thinks it most likely to have been "neurasthenic conditions in consequence of repeated over-exertions and an excessive strain upon the nerve system, combined with periodic nervous pains." τὸ πρότερον (iv. 13), used as it is with a verb expressing definite action (aorist), cannot designate simply the past, as in John vi. 62, ix. 8, but involves, by way of comparison, a πάλιν or τὸ δεύτερον εὐαγγελίζεσθαι. At the same time, however, it can have no reference to the composition of Galatians so long as εὐαγγελίζεσθαι retains the meaning which it has throughout the N.T., namely, "to bring the message of salvation to those who do not yet know it, or have not yet received it." The objection that εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, in the strict sense of the term, could not be directed twice to the same persons, is without point, since Paul in Galatia addressed a number of persons, or rather of congregations—a large circle, in which some heard the gospel during his first and others during his second visit to the province. Even in a local congregation like that at Corinth, we find some who were brought to the faith by Paul and others after Paul's departure by Apollos (1 Cor. iii. 5).

3. (P. 165.) πάλιν in v. 3 implies contrast to a declaration of the truth here expressed made before the writing of the Epistle; for in the Epistle itself there is no expression of this truth before this passage. This is even clearer in the case of ἄρτι πάλιν of i. 9, especially since we find the plural προειρήκαμεν displaced by the immediately following singular λέγω. Whom Paul includes with himself in i. 8, 9 depends upon a determination of the exact meaning of Γαλατία (see § 11). It has been incorrectly inferred from iv. 16 (Wieseler, Sieffert, ad loc.; Godet, Introd. i. 270) that Paul was compelled to utter bitter truths or earnest warnings as early as his second visit to the Galatians,—a conclusion which led to the further assumption that by that time the Judaistic movement had already taken root among the Galatians. In iv. 15–20 Paul sketches his present relationship to the Galatians as contrasted with his first contact with them described in vv. 13, 14, and again alluded to in the intermediate sentence of ver. 15. In reviewing the letter, which at this point would seem to have reached its conclusion, he discusses the existing state of affairs. The Galatians have forgotten with what enthusiasm they received him when he first came to them (ver. 15a), and how earnest was the expression of mutual love between himself and them as long and as often as he was in their midst (ver. 18). Instead of this now, they permit his opponents to court their favour (ver. 17). Paul, who as he writes feels again the birth throes which the conversion of the Galatians had cost him, stands pen in hand at a loss what to advise them, since he cannot now realise his desire to treat with them in person (vv. 19, 20). He seems now to be their enemy, because he writes them the truth. It is not to the point to say that the Galatians knew nothing of this enmity before reading the Epistle; for with ἐχθρὸς ὑμῶν γέγονα—ὠδίνω—ἀποροῦμαι Paul describes his present relation to them, as he himself feels it at this particular moment, and not as they look at it. ὥστε refers back beyond the parenthesis to the question: “Where is then that gratulation of yourselves?” The question has the force of a demonstrative referring to ὥστε (Kühner-Gerth, ii. 502). So thoroughly has their relationship to Paul been disturbed, that his fearless declaration of the truth in this letter has made him seem their enemy. This is the picture he presents to himself, while at the same time he is conscious of striving for their spiritual life with a maternal love. Cf. 2 Cor. xii. 11, γέγονα ἄφρων. The present ἀληθεύων cannot possibly refer to the past of his second visit, as if Paul meant to say that he became their enemy on account of the censures uttered at that time; for it is connected with the present perfect, and follows the question ver. 15a, also in the present, upon which the clause introduced by ὥστε is dependent. Such reference Paul must have expressed by ἐγενόμην or ἐγενήθην (cf. Isa. lxiii. 10, ἐστράφη αὐτοῖς εἰς ἐχθραν,—a passage which otherwise perhaps he had in mind). It would have been also necessary for him to distinguish this second sojourn from the first (τὸ πρότερον, ver. 13). Instead of this, he passes from the first visit (vv. 13, 14) directly to the present moment of his writing (vv. 15–20).

4. (P. 170.) The ἴδετε πηλίκους ὑμῖν γράμμασιν ἔγραψα τῇ ἐμῇ χειρὶ of vi. 11 is certainly not, with Jerome (Vallarsi, vii. 529) and Theodore (Swete, i. 107), to be confined in its reference to the immediately following conclusion of the Epistle which Paul is supposed to have written in larger characters on account of its importance, or in order to show the fearless spirit with which it was written. Such a limitation would have been expressed as in 1 Cor. xvi. 21; 2 Thess. iii. 17; Col. iv. 18. Moreover, the aorist ἔγραψα is never employed—at least in the N.T.—to refer to something which the author is about to write; rather does Paul look back upon the entire letter which is just being closed, cf. Rom. xv. 15, xvi. 22. In the same way we conclude from Philem. 19 that the apostle wrote all of this short letter with his own hand. Anyone accustomed to dictate, and not hindered from so doing by external circumstances, when he deviates from this course, does so because he desires to give to his writing the highest possible personal character. Cf. Ambrosius, Ep. i. 3 (ed. Ben. ii. 753 to the Emperor Gratian): “Scripsisti tua totam epistolam manu, ut ipsi apices fidem tuam pietatemque loquerentur.” Herein lies the explanation of the πηλίκους γράμμασιν in this instance. Hofmann, i. 2. 205, has not succeeded in justifying, from linguistic usage, his translation: “Such a large, explicit Epistle I have written to you.” Cf. per contra Acts xxiii. 25; 2 Pet. iii. 1, ἐπιστολὴν; Eph. iii. 3, ἐν ὀλίγῳ; 1 Pet. v. 12, δι’ ὀλίγων; Heb. xiii. 22, διὰ βραχείων ἐπέστειλα; Eus. H. E. i. 7. 1, δι’ ἐπιστολῆς Ἀριστείδη γράφων περὶ κτλ.; Ign. Rom. viii. 2, δι’ ὀλίγων γραμμάτων αἰτοῦμαι ὑμᾶς, likewise ad Polyc. vii. 3 with παρεκάλεσα. In case the helplessness of the writer, which showed itself in the unusually large characters of his writing, was caused by Paul’s constant manual labour, or by his continuous bodily suffering, or by a recent injury, the reference to the roughly formed large letters, supplemented by τῇ ἐμῇ χειρί, was, at the same time, a proof of the self-sacrificing labour it had cost him to approach as near and as personally as possible to the readers, cf. ZKom. Gal. 277.

5. (P. 170.) It cannot by any means be inferred from i. 6 that only a brief period had elapsed since Paul’s last visit to Galatia—certainly not since the founding of the Galatian Churches, for only when a distinct point of time, from which the rapid introduction of an event is measured, is either distinctly expressed or implied in the statement, does ταχέως acquire the meaning “soon,” e.g. with ἔρχομαι, ἐλεύσομαι, in which the present moment of the statement is the point of time after which the coming is to follow promptly, without delay and at once (1 Cor. iv. 19; Phil. ii. 19, 24). It would not indeed be specially strange if Churches just established and consequently immature, or if Churches that had just been visited by their founder, allowed themselves to be estranged by false teachers; but such a situation would become intelligible only if we were here reminded of the apostle’s last visit, and of the favourable state of affairs which he found. As a matter of fact, however, Paul represents himself as astonished and incensed at the situation, and says merely that the Galatians have so impulsively allowed themselves to be turned in a false direction, and that the Judaizers have needed but little time to secure such a dangerous influence over them. The original sense of ταχύς, ταχέως, ταχινός is frequently preserved, e.g. 2 Thess. ii. 2; Jas. i. 19; Mark ix. 39; John xx. 4; 2 Pet. ii. 1.

§ 11. GALATIA AND THE GALATIANS (N. 1).

In order to connect the statements and intimations of Galatians with what is said elsewhere about Paul, it is necessary to decide what is meant by ἡ Γαλατία in i. 2 (cf. iii. 1), a question which comes up again in connection with 1 Cor. xvi. 1 and 1 Pet. i. 1 (n. 2). According to the older view, which distinguished scholars still hold, Galatia means the region about Ancyra, Pessinus, and Tavium, which, after the incursions of Celtic warriors in the third century B.C., was called Γαλατία. By others, Γαλατία, in i. 2, is understood as referring to the Roman province of that name, which was organised in 25 B.C., after the death of Amyntus, the last king of the Galatians. From the time of its establishment, the province, the boundaries of which fluctuated greatly, included besides the Galatian region the greater part of the region of Pisidia, Isauria, and Lycaonia, also a portion of eastern Phrygia, though the greater part of Phrygia belonged to the province of Asia. In Asia Minor, as elsewhere, the organisation and marking out of Roman provinces, though furnishing new names, did not by any means displace the old territorial designations. Roman writers, such as the elder Pliny (died 79) and Tacitus (circa 115), also the geographer Ptolemy (circa 150), understood by Galatia the entire Roman province, which, besides other districts, included Galatia proper (n. 3). The question as to which usage is followed by Paul would not for so long a time have been given such conflicting answers, were it not for a tendency, on the one hand, to let Paul's usage be determined by that of Acts, and, on the other, to interpret the statements of Acts in the light of the Pauline usage. There is all the less excuse for this confusion, since the name Γαλατία does not occur in Acts at all, while the meaning of the peculiar expression (ἡ) Γαλατικὴ χώρα, which is twice used by Luke (Acts xvi. 6, xviii. 23), can be determined only from the context of these passages and from Luke's usage elsewhere. Now it is clear that, when speaking of Asia Minor and other districts, Luke employs the old territorial names, which do not correspond at all with the divisions and names of the Roman provinces, whereas Paul never uses any but the provincial name for districts under Roman rule, and never employs territorial names which are not also names of Roman provinces (n. 4). So that the natural supposition is that ἡ Γαλατία in Gal. i. 2, 1 Cor. xvi. 1, means the Roman province of Galatia. And this judgment is but confirmed by the fact that in an Epistle written in Rome (§ 39), in 1 Pet. i. 1, the name Galatia occurs in a list of names which otherwise consists entirely of names of Roman provinces (n. 3, end). Even admitting that by Galatia Paul could have meant the entire province of that name, some have had difficulty in understanding how the readers could be addressed as Galatians in iii. 1 when the majority of them were not Galatians at all, i.e. of Celtic stock. But it is to be noticed that both Paul and Luke speak elsewhere of all the inhabitants of a given city or district without making ethnographical distinctions, e.g. between Jews and Greeks, Romans and non-Romans; thus, Corinthians (2 Cor. vi. 11), Philippians (Phil. iv. 15), Macedonians (2 Cor. ix. 2, 4; Acts xix. 29), Pontians (Acts xviii. 2), Asians (Acts xx. 4), Alexandrians (Acts xviii. 24), Romans (Acts ii. 10). To take a modern example, no one hesitates at all to call the inhabitants of the regions about Nuremberg and Würzburg Bavarians, although the original stock was Frankish, and although the political union of these people with peoples of Bavarian stock is not much older than the political union of Lycaonians and Galatians in the province of Galatia at the time when this letter was written. The greater the diversity of nationality in a Christian community, the more natural it was in addressing them to designate them by the customary name of the political division where they lived, which was a neutral term.

The question, what is meant by the name Galatia in Gal. i. 2? must be decided ultimately by a comparison of the historical facts involved in each of these views with the text of the letter itself. If by Galatia the Roman province is meant, then, of those addressed, the most important, if not the only, Churches are the four which were founded by Paul and Barnabas on Paul's first missionary journey, at Antioch in Pisidia, at Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe (n. 5). Concerning the first preaching among the readers, mentioned in Gal. iv. 13, we should have a more detailed account in Acts xiii. 14–xiv. 23, and the second preaching of the gospel in Galatia, indirectly but certainly attested by Gal. iv. 13, would be evidenced in reference to these Churches by Acts xvi. 5. For as a result of the visit of Paul and Silas to the Churches founded in South Galatia during the first missionary journey (xvi. 1–5), these Churches were not only confirmed in the faith, but their membership was also increased. With these Churches Paul (Gal. i. 2) must have included also the other Churches which had been organised in other parts of the province in the interval preceding the writing of the letter; provided there were such Churches in existence at that time, and provided they were established by his preaching. But both are very doubtful. Certainly the second visit to South Galatia was followed at once by a tour through the regions of Phrygia and Galatia, which Paul had not succeeded in reaching on his first journey (Acts xvi. 6); and when it is said that this route was chosen because the Spirit forbade them to preach in Asia, this command did not hold for the regions through which in obedience to this direction they actually passed. It could be taken for granted, therefore, in spite of the silence of Acts, which in xvi. 6 mentions merely a journey of the missionaries through these regions, that Paul and Silas on this occasion preached in Phrygia and a portion of North Galatia; and that the disciples (not Churches, as in xv. 41, xvi. 5, cf. xiv. 23) whom Paul met on the third missionary journey to several places of the same regions (Acts xviii. 23) had been converted by the preaching of Paul and Silas on the second journey. But everyone feels the uncertainty of these combinations.

And yet, if one connects the name Galatia with the northern portion of the province, the region inhabited by the Celtic tribes, the account of the founding of all the Churches addressed in Galatians must be read between the lines of Acts xvi. 6, and the second visit must be identified with that mentioned in Acts xviii. 23. But this in itself is a serious objection to the latter hypothesis. We do not lay great stress upon the fact that Gal. iv. 13 presupposes not only a second visit, but also a second preaching of the gospel in Galatia, and that, on the contrary, in Acts xviii. 23 there is no more reference to a second than in xvi. 6 to a first preaching in those regions. The thing that makes the hypothesis improbable is especially the fact that, assuming it, the Churches in Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch in Pisidia, whose importance is evidenced by the account of their organisation (Acts xiii. 14-xiv. 23; 2 Tim. iii. 11), and by the fact that from them come several of Paul's helpers (Acts xvi. 1, xx. 4), would be left with scarcely a trace of their subsequent development in the N.T. On the other hand, the Churches in the northern part of the province of Galatia, of whose founding we can read something between the lines of Acts, would have in Galatians, in the greeting of 1 Peter, and in the mention of 1 Cor. xvi. 1, witnesses of an ecclesiastical importance, of which the author of Acts could have had no idea whatever. Furthermore, it would be strange if Jewish teachers from Palestine passed by such important cities as Iconium and Antioch, where there were Jewish synagogues (n. 6), and where there would certainly be some native Jews in the local Christian Churches, without starting a movement considerable enough to leave some traces of itself in our sources, and still more strange if they made their way to the more remote Galatian region, the Churches of which, according to intimations of Acts, were not important, in order to oppose Paul's gospel and influence. This hypothesis also involves difficulties as to the time and place of the composition of Galatians, which disappear when the other hypothesis is accepted (§ 12). Besides, it has against it Paul's assurance (Gal. ii. 5) that, in the transactions of the so-called apostolic council in Jerusalem, he had in mind the readers addressed in Galatians, endeavouring to retain for them the truth and freedom of the gospel (n. 7); moreover, at the time when the events described in Acts xv. took place, the winter of 51-52, Paul as yet had not even visited Galatia proper, the first indication of such a visit being that in Acts xvi. 6. This of itself is sufficient proof that the "Churches of Galatia," to which the letter is addressed, were primarily at least the Churches of the southern part of the province of Galatia, which were organised prior to the apostolic council on the first missionary journey.

This hypothesis (§ 12) gets positive confirmation from a comparison of Galatians with the accounts in Acts, which under this presupposition are to be taken into consideration. If without question in Gal. i. 8 Paul is speaking primarily of the preaching of the gospel which led to the organisation of the Churches of Galatia, i.e. to the εὐαγγ-ελίζεσθαι τὸ πρότερον of iv. 13, then the helper to whose assistance he refers is Barnabas. In so far, however, as there is a reference to the second visit, on which occasion also the gospel was preached with good success, Silas is to be thought of as the fellow-worker (Acts xv. 40-xvi. 6). Only Silas is referred to in Gal. i. 9, since on the first missionary journey which Paul made in company with Barnabas there would hardly have been as yet any occasion for warnings against a false gospel, particularly against a gospel distorted by requirements of a legalistic kind (cf. Gal. v. 3). The condition of the Churches in the early stages of their development furnished no occasion for such warnings (above, p. 171 f. n. 3); while, on the other hand, it was perfectly natural that on the second journey, which he made in company with Silas, after the experiences which he had had in Jerusalem and Antioch (Acts xv. 1-29; Gal. ii. 1-10) in the interval between the first and second visit to the province of Galatia, Paul should warn the newly organised Churches in Lycaonia against the false brethren and their legalistic Christianity. According to Acts xvi. 4, the missionaries communicated to the Churches of Lycaonia also the decisions of the apostolic council which were intended only for the Christians in Antioch in Syria and the neighbouring regions, who had been disturbed by the Judaisers (Acts xv. 23). In this way they were prepared for the attacks of the Judaisers, xvi. 5, which were to be expected. Similarly, the repeated reference to Barnabas by name (ii. 1, 9, 13) is especially appropriate if Paul is here writing to Churches the most important of which were organised with Barnabas' help. While, to be sure, it does appear from 1 Cor. ix. 6, Col. iv. 10, that Barnabas was known as a distinguished missionary even in Churches which he had not visited in person, in both these cases there were special reasons for the mention of his name. In 1 Cor. ix. 6 he is mentioned because Paul wants to say that from the beginning of his missionary work, when he was associated with Barnabas, he had followed the principle under discussion; while in Col. iv. 10 it is necessary because in commending Mark, who was entirely unknown to his readers, to the kindly reception of the Church, he has occasion to say that he is a relative of a distinguished missionary. In Gal. ii. no special reasons of this character are discernible, and if the threefold mention of Barnabas is to be explained naturally, it must be assumed that Barnabas assisted in the organisation of the most important of the Churches which he was addressing. That in thinking over his first and second visits in Galatia, Paul should occasionally at least think of his helpers Barnabas and Silas (i. 8 f.), and at the same time consistently represent himself to be the organizer and head of the Galatian Churches (iv. 11–20, v. 2 f., 21), is consistent with the accounts in Acts. Even on the first missionary journey which was made in company with Barnabas, Paul was the spokesman and principal preacher (Acts xiii. 16, xiv. 9, 12). In this connection attention is called to the noteworthy incident in Lystra (Acts xiv. 11–14), of which there is a reflection in Gal. iv. 14. While in their excitement at the case of miraculous healing, the Lycaonians thought they recognised in Barnabas Zeus; they took Paul, to whose preaching they listened, to be Hermes, the messenger and interpreter of the gods; so it is with deep emotion that Paul looks back to the day when they received him as “a messenger of God”; indeed, as the son of God. This was, to be sure, only an outburst of naïve popular superstition, which the missionaries repudiated with indignation; but in the case of those who were afterwards taught and converted, this heathen superstition, in which their enthusiasm found expression at first, gave place to a feeling of grateful joy that not the gods of Olympus, but “the living God, who made heaven and earth,” had sent His “messenger” to them, and that Christ Himself had visited them in the gospel which Paul preached. If Acts xvii. 16–34 gives an historical picture of the apostle to the Gentiles, which statement no one has as yet disproved, it is perfectly conceivable that Paul should see a connection between the worship which the Gentiles rendered to the unknown gods and their enthusiastic love for the God whom he preached (Acts xvii. 23), and for God’s messenger. Unless this coincidence between the hints in the letter and the account in Acts is a tantalising accident, it must be admitted that there is an echo of this same event also in Gal. i. 8, where likewise Paul is looking back to the first preaching in Galatia, and where we have the strange combination of two ideas, in themselves quite foreign to each other,—“we or an angel from heaven.” In the ancient legend of Thecla, which begins with the flight from Antioch in Pisidia (Acts xiii. 50–xiv. 1; Acta Theclæ, i.), the impression which Paul made at that time upon the impressionable mind of one of the citizens of Iconium is thus described, evidently with the words of Galatians in mind: “Now he seemed like a man, and again he had the face of an angel” (chap. 3; GK, ii. 904).

Regarding the illness of Paul, which was the occasion of his first sojourn and so of his first preaching among the Galatians (iv. 13, above, p. 171, n. 2), there is no direct information in Acts. Perhaps, however, Paul’s statement offers some explanation of the unusual route chosen by the missionaries. The direction which they took from Perga to Antioch (Acts xiii. 14) would seem to indicate their intention of pressing their way from Antioch northward or westward into the valleys of the Lycus and of the Meander, where there were numerous cities, and of making their way thence to the large cities on the western coast of Asia Minor. When, instead of following out this plan, the missionaries turn toward the south-east from Antioch, returning shortly from this same point by the route over which they had come, though no statement is made as to the reasons for the change (cf. Acts xvi. 6–10), it may have been an attack of his malady that led Paul for the time being to give up the carrying out of this more extended plan.

Naturally, to us, who are able only to infer the facts presupposed in the letter from allusions which Paul makes for the benefit of those who were already acquainted with them, much must remain obscure. But this itself is the very strongest proof that we are not dealing with a literary fiction, but with a genuine letter, which had its occasion in circumstances connected with real life. One of the most obscure of these passages is v. 11, and obscure it will remain unless we are allowed to explain the letters of Paul from Acts. It appears that the opponents of Paul had called the attention of the Galatians to the fact that even Paul, the man of progress, could, like the older apostles, when occasion demanded, preach circumcision. So, they argued, it would be no serious rupture with their past Christian experience, which had been formed under Paul's influence, if now the Galatians permitted themselves to be circumcised. Basing their argument on Paul's conduct, the errorists could make it appear to the Galatians that Paul might be easily convinced, and in the end allow the Galatians to be Judaised. How untrue this representation of his attitude was, Paul shows by pointing out that it was just because he was so unyielding of this point that he was hated and persecuted by the Judaisers (διώκομαι, v. 11, to be understood in the same sense in which the word is used in iv. 29). It was in opposition to insinuations of this character that in v. 2-4 he solemnly avowed that his judgment regarding the unreasonable demands of the Judaisers was unalterable. It must have been some recent event, which had come within the observation of the Galatians, which enabled the Judaisers to represent with some show of plausibility that Paul could περιτομήν ἔτι κηρύσσειν. This event is the one recorded in Acts xvi. 1-3, none other than the circumcision, at Paul's suggestion, of Timothy, a native of Lystra in the province of Galatia, whose father was a Gentile and whose mother was a Jewess. Soon after this event the Judaisers came to Galatia, and the Epistle is addressed to the churches named and intended in Acts xvi. 1-6.

Assuming that this is the right reconstruction of the facts, the appearance of the Judaisers at this time is most natural. Their defeat at the apostolic council did not discourage them permanently. It was only in Antioch and the Churches of which Antioch was the centre (Acts xv. 23) that they seem not to have ventured a second attack; for what is narrated in Gal. ii. 11-14 probably took place earlier (§ xi.). When they learned that Paul had gone over to Europe on his second missionary journey, and was kept there by the success of his work, they thought it an opportune time to attack the Churches in Galatia, which had been founded before the apostolic council, and in the absence of their founder to induce them to accept a legalistic form of Christianity. As soon as Paul heard of their move, he hastened to meet the threatening danger by sending this letter.

1. (P. 173.) On Galatia, cf. PERROT, De Galatia provincia Romana, 1867; also his Exploration de la Galatie, 1872, pp. 173-206; SIEFFERT, Galatien und seine ersten Christengemeinden, 1871; MARQUARDT, Röm. Staatsverwaltung,² i. 358-365; RAMSAY, Historical Geography of Asia Minor, 1890, pp. 252 ff., 375, 463, and his Church in the Roman Empire, 2nd ed. 1893, pp. 8-15, 25-111; see also n. 2. The view the present writer has taken of the destination of the Epistle would justify him, if such justification were necessary, in leaving out of consideration the question, in any case so unimportant for the understanding of the letter, as to the nationality of the tribes which gave the district of Galatia its name, the Tectosages, Trocmi, and Tolistobogii. Their Germanic origin has been argued with unwearied zeal by WIESELER in his Komm. zum Gal. S. 521-528, and in special monographs: Die deutsche Nationalität der kleinasiatischen Galater, 1877; Zur Geschichte der kleinasiat. Gal. 1879; Untersuch. zur Geschichte und Religion der alten Germanen, 1881, S. 1-51. Among those who have combated his theory are W. GRIMM, ThStKr. 1876, S. 199-221, and HERTSBERG, ibid. 1878, S. 525-541.

2. (P. 174.) According to J. D. Michaelis, Einkl., 4te Aufl. 1199, the view which is adopted above was first put forward by J. J. SCHMIDT, rector of Ilfeld, and was afterward defended by him against the criticisms of Michaelis. The contributions made to the subject by MYNSTER, Kleinere Schriften, 1825, and WÖTTER, Beiträge, 1837, pt. iii. 1-5, and Suppl. 32-47, produced no particular impression, nor did the agreement with the view by THIERSCH, Die Kirche im apost. Zeitalter (1te Aufl. 1852, 3te Aufl. 1879), 123. It was not till after the appearance of Perrot's works (see n. 1) that this view began to win more numerous adherents, as RENAN, St. Paul, 1869, pp. 47-53, and HAUSRATH, Ntl. Zeitsch. ii. (1872) 528 ff. In more recent times its most prominent advocate has been RAMSAY, Church in the Roman Empire, 8-15, 59-111; Stud. Bibl. et Eccl. iv. (Oxford, 1896) 15-57, and A historical comm. on St. Paul's Ep. to the Galatians, 1899. Cf. also V. Weber, Die Adressaten des Gal. Beweis der rein südgal. Theorie, 1900; J. Weiss, PRE,³ x. 554 ff., and others. Of the representatives of the older view, according to which "Galatia" in the N.T. always denotes the country of the Galatæ, we may mention WIESELER, Komm. zum Gal. 530 ff.; LIGHTFOOT, Galatians (4th ed.), 19; HOFMANN, i. 149; SIEFFERT (see n. 1), also in the revision of Meyer's Commentary, 9th ed. 1899, S. 6-15; SCHÜRER, JhJPTH. 1892, S. 460-474; ZÜCKLER, ThStKr. 1895, S. 51-102.

3. (Pp. 174, 175.) Pliny understands by "Galatia" the whole Roman province, when he refers (Hist. Nat. v. 95) to Idē (Ἰδὴ), a city of eastern Lycaonia, as lying "in confinio Galatiæ atque Cappadociæ"; again, when in v. 147 he assigns the Lycaonian cities, Lystra and Thebasa (cf. v. 27. 95), to Galatia; and when in the same passage he speaks of Galatia as bordering on the districts of Cabalia and Milyas, which at that time belonged to the province of Pamphylia. These were separated by some distance from the country of the Galatæ, whereas Galatia, in the meaning of Pliny and the Romans generally, and Pamphylia were actually adjoining provinces. To them Tacitus refers, Hist. ii. 9, "Galatiam ac Pamphyliam provincias Calpurnio Asprenati regendas permiserat Galba." That Galatia here does not mean the country of the Galatæ proper, but the whole of the province organised c. 25 B.C., appears not merely from the fact that only on this assumption should we have a connected administrative district, but even from the word provincias itself, for the several districts of which provinces were composed were not themselves called provinces. The same usage, therefore, must underlie Ann. xiii. 35, "habiti per Galatiam Cappadociamque dilectus"; xv. 6, "Galatarum Cappadocumque auxilia." The assertion, repeated with strange persistency, that only those of Celtic birth, or residents of Galatia proper, could be termed Galatæ, and not all the inhabitants of the province called Galatia by Pliny and Tacitus, has already been refuted from the N.T., p. 175 above; cf. ZKom. Gal. 11. Ramsay discusses this point fully and conclusively, Stud. Bibl. et Eccl., Oxford, 1896, pp. 26–38, and in his Hist. Comm. Ptolemy describes Asia Minor essentially and at the outset quite clearly in accordance with the Roman provincial divisions: (a) v. 1. 1, Pontus-Bithynia (in viii. 17. 1, Bithynia for brevity); (b) v. 2. 1, ἡ ἰδία or ἡ ἰδίως καλουμένη or ἡ ἰδίως Ἀσία (cf. viii. 17. 1, 8), to which belonged Greater Phrygia, with Eumeneia, Philomelion, and Hierapolis (v. 2. 22–26); (c) v. 3, Lycia; (d) v. 4, Galatia, with which he reckons parts of Lycaonia, Pisidia, and Isauria, and among other cities Pisidian Antioch, § 11, and Lystra, § 12. Following another authority, he assigns the Antioch situated "in Pisidian Phrygia" to the province of Pamphylia, v. 5. 4, and Iconium and Derbe to Cappadocia, v. 6. 16 ff. The latter agrees with his statement regarding the στρατηγία of Cappadocia, which is somewhat obscure and at all events depends on antiquated sources; cf. Ramsay, Hist. Geog. 283 f., 310, 336. Furthermore, the inscriptions, rightly understood, confirm the usage of Pliny, Tacitus, and Ptolemy. An honorary inscription set up in Iconium, to an imperial administrator of domains or revenue officer (ἐπίτροπος καὶ ἀγρός) of the time of Claudius and Nero (C. I. Gr. 3991) designates his administrative district as Γαλατικῆς ἐπαρχίας. The city of Iconium, which, having been made a Roman colony under Claudius (see below, n. 5), honoured this official as its founder and benefactor, belonged to what they called simply the Galatic province (cf. Ramsay, Church, etc. 56; Marquardt, i. 364, n. 11). Provinces formed by the union of two districts originally separate might bear a double name, like Bithynia-Pontus (see the reference to Ptolemy above, and Marquardt, i. 351), as we have in Bavaria "Schwaben and Neuburg." But, on the other hand, it is quite incredible that the name commonly applied in official business to the great province which was erected out of the kingdom of Amyntas should have consisted of an enumeration of all the districts which composed it. Even if one concluded from a few inscriptions dealing with Galatia, that official usage described the united province thus circumstantially and reserved the term Galatia for the region of the Galatæ proper, that would be, in the first place, of no consequence to our inquiry; for Paul had even less occasion than Pliny, Tacitus, Ptolemy, and the municipality of Iconium in its inscription, to employ the legal style. And, in the second place, the reasoning itself is as incorrect as if we should undertake to determine our own official usage from the so-called great titles of our German rulers, which even in the official publication of laws are usually omitted altogether or abbreviated by an "etc." An inscription (found in Pisidian Antioch and dating from the end of the first century) in honour of a certain Sospes—not Sollers—governor of Galatia (C. I. L. iii. No. 291, corrected Suppl. No. 6818), designates his administrative territory by nine names, beginning provinc. Gal. Pisid. Phryg. etc. (similarly in Suppl. No. 6819, except that Phryg. precedes Pisid.). If we read provinc(iarum), then Pisidia, Phrygia, and the rest, which at that time were not separate provinces, are inaccurately so called, and this Sospes is represented as in charge of nine provinces at once. More probably we are to read in this as in similar inscriptions provinc(iæ), which applies only to Galatiæ, while the eight following names are connected with it by apposition, to describe the great province as impressively as possible. In other inscriptions in which we are really to read provinciarum, e.g. on two milestones from Ancyra from the years 80 and 82 (C. I. L. Nos. 312, 318), the names of actual provinces come first, Galatiæ, Cappadociæ, and not till afterward such districts as Pisidia and Lycaonia, which are already involved in the larger titles. We have further to consider those enumerations which would be unintelligible if we could not assume that by the term Galatia, as by Asia, all the sections belonging to these provinces were intended. When we read in C. I. L. iii. No. 249 (Ancyra), the following, inter al., "proc. fam. glad. per Asiam. Bithyn. Galat. Cappad. Lyciam. Pamphyl. Cil. Cyprum. Pontum. Paflag.," we are taken the rounds of all Asia Minor together with Cyprus. Consequently Lycaonia and Pisidia, which are not mentioned, must be included in Galatia, and Phrygia, also not mentioned, partly with Galatia and partly with Asia. This is true also in 1 Pet. i. 1. There all the Roman provinces of Asia Minor are enumerated with the exception of Lycia-Pamphylia, where there can hardly have been any Christians (Acts xiii. 13, xiv. 25), and of Cilicia, where Christianity seems to have been introduced not by Paul and his helpers, but from Antioch, so that from the beginning the Cilician Churches were grouped ecclesiastically with those of Syria (Acts xv. 23, 41). As Phrygia and Mysia are not explicitly named, the Phrygian Churches, Colossæ, Laodicea, Hierapolis (Col. i. 1, ii. 1), the Church at Troas (Acts xx. 6-12), and the six Churches besides Laodicea mentioned in Rev. i. 11, so far as they were in existence at the time of 1 Peter, were evidently included in Asia; that is, the name was used in its Roman sense. The like holds true, then, of the word Galatia in the same passage (1 Pet. i. 1); the term includes Lycaonia and Pisidia also. Indeed, it would be impossible to conceive why Peter should exclude from his greeting the Churches of that region, belonging historically with the Churches of the province Asia, and take up instead of them the much less important Churches in Galatia proper.

4. (P. 175.) Paul uses Ἀχαΐα, Rom. xv. 26; 1 Cor. xvi. 15; 2 Cor. i. 1, ix. 2.

xi. 10; 1 Thess. i. 7, 8, and Μακεδονία, 1 Cor. xvi. 5; 2 Cor. i. 16, ii. 13, vii. 5, viii. 1, xi. 9; Rom. xv. 26; 1 Thess. i. 7 f., iv. 10; Phil. iv. 15, evidently in the sense of the Roman provincial divisions. Along with τὸ Ἰλλυρικόν, Rom. xv. 19, we find in 2 Tim. iv. 10 the term Δαλματία also used by the Romans of that time; cf. Marquardt, i. 299. Ἰουδαία, Gal. i. 22; 1 Thess. ii. 14; 2 Cor. i. 16; Rom. xv. 31, is not used, as the first-named passages show, in contradistinction to Galilee, Samaria, and Perea, for there were Christians in these districts also (Acts viii. 5–25, ix. 31–xi. 1) whom Paul could not exclude in this connection; but he uses the term in the Roman sense = Palestine, cf. Tac. Hist. v. 9; Ptol. v. 16. 1 on the one hand, and v. 16. 6–9 on the other. Ἀραβία, Gal. i. 17, iv. 25, is a political term; it stands for the Nabatean kingdom of Aretas (2 Cor. xi. 32), which at that time was still independent of Rome. Syria and Cilicia, Gal. i. 21, were then politically united; cf. Marquardt, i. 387. Of the divisions of Asia Minor, Paul names only Ἀσία, 1 Cor. xvi. 19; 2 Cor. i. 8; Rom. xvi. 5; 2 Tim. i. 15; and Γαλατία, Gal. i. 2; 1 Cor. xvi. 1; and it is unlikely that he meant by these anything else than the Roman provinces so called, for the very reason that he mentions no districts of Asia Minor whose names do not at the same time denote such provinces. This corresponds with the terminology of 1 Pet. i. 1 (see the preceding note) and of Revelation; for all the seven Churches of Asia (Rev. i. 4, 11), even the Phrygian city of Laodicea on the Lycus, were in the province of Asia. In the same way Polycrates of Ephesus in his letter to Victor of Rome (Eus. H. E. v. 24. 2–5) uses Ἀσία of the whole extent of the Roman province, including Hierapolis, Eumeneia, and Laodicea. Luke, however, as a rule expresses himself differently. Of course the Roman nomenclature is not unknown to him, and he uses it where it seems to him necessary or appropriate; but usually in his geographical references he follows the other usage, and employs the names of the several sections. So Ἰουδαία stands (a) in Luke i. 5 for the whole country of the Jews, or Palestine, even without the πᾶσα, ὅλη, which he adds elsewhere to make sure that the term shall have its widest significance (Luke vi. 17, vii. 17, xxiii. 5; Acts x. 37); (b) in Luke iii. 1 for the territory governed by the Roman procurator, which in addition to Judea proper included Samaria and the coast district to Caesarea and beyond; (c) but otherwise regularly for Judea proper as distinguished from Galilee and Samaria, Luke ii. 4; Acts i. 8, viii. 1, ix. 31, xi. 1, xii. 19. Luke knows Ἀχαία, and uses the term to denote the Roman province where reference is made to its prefect, Acts xviii. 12, and twice besides, xviii. 27, xix. 21, where he mentions journeys to Corinth, its capital city. But he uses Ἑλλάς in xx. 2, and, according to the more ancient text of xvii. 15, probably Θεσσαλία also, both of them names which have no place in Paul's nomenclature. It is just so with regard to his references to Asia Minor. True, it is of no moment that after Pamphylia he mentions Lycia also (xxvii. 5, cf. ii. 10, xiii. 13, xiv. 24, xv. 38), and Pontus (ii. 9, cf. xviii. 2) as well as Bithynia (xvi. 7), for in each of these instances the official usage of the Romans also retained the names of the two sections which were united to form the province. But Luke also uses the names of smaller districts in Asia Minor which at that time did not constitute provinces, but were distributed among various Roman provinces of other names, namely, Lycaonia (xiv. 6, cf. xiv. 11), Pisidia (xiv. 24, cf. xiii. 14), Mysia (xvi. 7, 8), and Phrygia (ii. 10, xvi.

6, xviii. 23). Since he also speaks of Asia (ii. 9f., xvi. 6-8) along with Phrygia, Mysia, and Troas, and in the same connection, it follows that Asia, too, does not mean for him the whole Roman province of that name, cf. Winer, RW,³ i. 97; Wieseler, Chronol. 34. For at that time Mysia and the greater part of Phrygia belonged to the province of Asia, and the city of Troas was also situated in it. For the boundaries of the province of Asia, the Asia propria of Ptolemy (above, p. 184), see Waddington, Fastes des prov. Asiat. 25; Ramsay, Hist. geogr. 172, and the map in his Church in the Roman Empire. We are not dealing here, however, with a peculiarity of Luke. The Church at Lyons, intimately connected with the Churches of Asia Minor, writes in the year 177 (Eus. H. E. v. 1. 3), τοῖς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν καὶ Φρυγίαν . . . ἀδελφοῖς. So Tertullian, c. Praxean, i, "ecclesiis Asiæ et Phrygiæ." Asia and Phrygia are here, as with Luke, mutually exclusive or supplementary terms, and Asia has a narrower meaning than in Roman official usage. It is the same region which Irenæus (Epist. ad Flor. in Eus. H. E. v. 20. 5, cf. Pausanias, i. 4. 6) calls ἡ κάτω Ἀσία, that part of the province Asia which lay nearer the coast, in distinction from the parts which lay farther inland (Acts xix. 1, τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη; cf. Acts xviii. 23; Clearchus in Jos. c. Ap. i. 22. 180, Niese; Epiph. Hær. xlv. 4, ἐν τοῖς ἀνωτάτω μέρεσιν). This more restricted use of the name corresponds to some extent with older boundaries (Marquardt, i. 334) and divisions (Plin. H. N. v. 27. 102), and to some extent also with Diocletian's arrangement, which returned in so many particulars to older groupings (Marquardt, i. 348). Luke appears, however, to use the term consistently in its narrowest sense. At least there is no necessity of supposing that in Acts xix. 10 the Phrygian cities, Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colossæ (Col. ii. 1, iv. 13) are also intended, or of thinking of the entire province in Acts vi. 9, xix. 22, xx. 4, 16, 18, xxi. 27, xxiv. 18, xxvii. 2. Only in the mouth of Demetrius (xix. 26, 27) is it likely that the term, which is strengthened, moreover, by the addition of ὅλη and πᾶσα (cf. Judea above), is used in its wider application. In Acts xvi. 6 this is quite excluded by the accompanying and contrasted Φρυγία. Both recensions (NABCE and D with the old versions against HLP) agree on the main point in the reading of xvi. 6f.: διῆλθον δὲ τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν . . . ἐλθόντες (or γενόμενοι) δὲ κατὰ τὴν Μυσίαν. The article before Γαλ. (EHLP) is to be suspected as a simplification, and the reading Galatie (sic) regiones (cf. Acts viii. 1), preserved only in one Latin authority (Blass, ed. min. 53), seems to be an arbitrary substitution for an unusual expression. If we compare xviii. 23, διερχόμενος καθέξῃς τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν, it would seem that the construction of Φρυγίαν as an adjective (Lightfoot, Galatians, 22; Ramsay, Church in Roman Empire, 78 ff.), which is quite impossible there, is out of the question in xvi. 6. If the analogy of xv. 41, where the article before Κιλικίαν is of very doubtful authenticity to say the least, or of Luke v. 17; Acts i. 8, ix. 31, or (to meet perfectly Ramsay's requirement, Stud. Bibl. et Eccl., Oxford, 1896, p. 57) Luke iii. 1 (τῆς Ἰουδαίας καὶ Τραχωνίτιδος χώρας; cf. also Winer, Gr. § 19. 3-5 [Eng. trans. pp. 126-130]; A. Buttmann, Gr. 85 ff. [Eng. trans. p. 97 ff.]; Blass, *Gr.*² § 46. 11 [Eng. trans.² § 46. 11]), did not suffice to excuse the anarthrous Γαλ. χ. in xvi. 6, one might find in it an expression of the idea that this through-journey did not touch everything that fell within the term Γαλ. χ. from beginning to end (καθεξῆς, xviii. 23), but only some "Galatian country" among other regions. But the choice of the unusual geographical term can itself be explained naturally only on the ground that Luke, in deliberate consideration of the usage by which the whole great province, including the Lycaonian cities, and the so-called Pisidian Antioch and other Phrygian cities, was styled ἡ Γαλατία or ἡ Γαλατικὴ ἐπαρχία, meant by Γαλατικὴ χώρα to indicate the country of the actual Galatæ, which was absolutely distinct from the districts of Phrygia and Lycaonia from which Paul came to it. The attempt of Renan, St. Paul, 52, and the still more ingenious attempt of Ramsay, Church in Roman Empire, 77 ff., to interpret Luke's Γαλ. χ. as also referring to the Roman province, go to pieces first of all on the connection of the narrative. The journey was from Syrian Antioch first through Syrian and Cilician territory (xv. 41), but this only in passing. According to xv. 36 the first object was to visit the four Churches which had been founded in the three Lycaonian cities and Pisidian Antioch on the first missionary journey (xiii. 14-xiv. 23). This visit is reported xvi. 1-5. The journey, proceeding from south-east to north-west, brought Paul first to Derbe and then to Lystra. Here the narrative pauses in order to relate something of Timothy, who lived there. That the journey was continued to Iconium and Antioch is not expressly stated, not even with regard to Iconium, which is mentioned in xvi. 2 for an incidental reason only. But in view of xv. 36 it goes without saying that Iconium and Antioch were not omitted, and that xvi. 4, 5 refers to all four cities and their Churches. Not till the missionaries had reached Antioch, a meeting-place of the roads leading west and north, did the question arise whether they should continue their journey in a westerly direction, i.e. to Asia, or northward. A revelation from "the Spirit" decided the question. The negative expression employed by the narrator shows that the intention and inclination of the missionaries themselves had been to proceed, after the visitation of the four Churches, to "Asia," to the large cities on the coast,—Ephesus, Smyrna, etc.,—and to preach there. In this, however, they were hindered by the Spirit; and this decision, according to the clear construction of the best-attested text, gives the reason why the missionaries now, instead of journeying westward from Antioch toward Asia, turned northward rather, and proceeded through Phrygian territory, on which they had already entered just before reaching Antioch, and then through a part of Galatia proper, until they reached the borders of Bithynia. Thus the order of events and of the geographical terms shows clearly that by Γαλ. χώρα Luke did not mean the province of Galatia, within which the missionaries already were during their stay in Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, but the country of the Galatæ. It is in vain that Ramsay (77 f.) undertakes to persuade us that xvi. 6a is to be carried back to the journey already described by its content, and to be understood in some such way as this: "On the tour of visitation described in xvi. 4 f. they traversed a region which, with respect to its population, may be called Phrygian, and with respect to the Roman provincial divisions, Galatian." In the first place, the account of the tour of visitation is entirely finished in xvi. 1-5. In the second place, διῆλθον has for its temporal and logical presupposition the decision of the Spirit, which would be communicated only at the close of the visitation and as they were on the point of departure from Pisidian Antioch, i.e. δῆλον can only refer to a farther journey which followed the completed tour of visitation. In the third place, as has been shown, we are to understand by the cities of xvi. 4, 5 not only Iconium and Antioch, to which if necessary Ramsay's elaborate paraphrase of the simple words might be applied (see n. 5), but Lystra and Derbe as well. These, however, were not Phrygian but Lycaonian cities—particularly according to Luke's own usage, Acts xiv. 6, 11. Further, according to Ramsay (76) we are to understand Acts xvi. 6*b*, 7*a* as stating: "The Spirit forbade their preaching in Asia, but by no means forbade travelling through; accordingly they proceeded through a part of the province of Asia also as far as Bithynia, but without preaching." But, in the first place, it follows from Acts xx. 18, (cf. xix. 8-10, xx. 31) that before Paul's first arrival in Ephesus (xviii. 19), and therefore before his first activity in Macedonia and Greece (xvi. 11-xviii. 17), he had not been in the region which Luke calls Asia at all. Furthermore, the unprejudiced reader finds in the text no suggestion of an antithesis between "preaching" and "travelling," or of a journey through part of "Asia," but sees only the contrast between the mutually exclusive geographical references. Because they may not preach, and consequently may not travel, in Asia, where they wished to go as missionaries, they go through Phrygia and through Galatian country, not forgetting, of course, that preaching was their commission. Since an intelligent narrator in such a connection would have made explicit reference to the contrary condition, we must assume that the missionaries, as they continued their journey from Antioch, tried to apply themselves to their vocation. The difficulties which Ramsay (81 ff.) urges against what is shown by Acts xvi. 6*a* to be the fact, namely, that Paul then passed through a part of the Galatian region preaching, rest upon the arbitrary assumption that when he set out from Pisidian Antioch or from Iconium he already had Bithynia in view as his objective, and that until he reached this goal he wished to refrain from preaching (84). In that case, certainly, he would have had no occasion to touch Galatian cities like Pessinus, the capital of the Tolistobogii, or the colony Germa. He would have gone more directly to Nicæa and Nicomedia by way of Cotiæum or by Nacoleia and Dorylæum. But the second assumption has no foundation in the text, and the first contradicts the text. But the purpose to push forward into Bithynia was first conceived when Paul stood not far from its border, and at the same time at a point where another road struck off toward Mysia (xvi. 7). The phrase ἐπεύραζον εἰς τὴν Βιθυνίαν πορεύεσθαι does not at all suggest that the missionaries had now attained a long-sought-for goal, but, on the contrary, rather that, having arrived at this point, they were trying to decide in which direction they should turn next. We do not know their route in detail; it may have been a zigzag course, as the hope of finding somewhere a favourable soil for their preaching drew them now this way and now that. A side trip into Galatia proper may have ended with a return to Phrygia, as on the first journey the side trip from Antioch (which was not originally intended) returned to that city (xiv. 21). The summary account in xvi. 6-8, especially the union of Phrygia and the Galatian country under one article, leaves the utmost freedom to fancy. The present writer does not know what objection there would be to supposing that the missionaries, setting out from Amorium, say, undertook to preach in Pessinus and Germa, and finding the conditions there unfavourable or their success small, turned to Dorylæum, where, then, it was necessary to decide whether they should proceed to Bithynia or to Mysia. Again, Acts xviii. 23 raises difficulties not for us, but for Ramsay. Though he claims that in Acts xvi. 6 the vicinity of Iconium and Antioch is styled "the Phrygian and at the same time Galatian country," he interprets (93) quite differently the double term in xviii. 23, which except for the relative position of the two members is precisely similar. Here, he tells us, τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν by itself denotes the district so enigmatically referred to in xvi. 6, but with the addition of Derbe and Lystra; and Φρυγίαν, beside it, denotes the region usually so called, to which Paul betook himself after visiting the Churches which had been organised on the first journey. This of itself is a good deal to ask the exegete to believe; but it ought besides to be shown, by examples or credible conjectures, that the southern part of the province of Galatia may conceivably have been called ἡ Γαλ. χ. (note the article), or why Luke, if he merely wished to say that at some point Paul passed through the province, did not write τὴν Γαλατίαν, to be sure, leaving the reader to guess what route he followed. Differing from his earlier view, Ramsay (Historical Comm. 209) finds the expression xviii. 23 only shorter than that in xvi. 6, and in spite of the arrangement of the words assures us that in xviii. 23 "the Phrygian region" is mentioned. But if, on the contrary, Luke here, too, meant by ἡ Γαλ. χ. the northern part of the province, the country of the Galatæ,—Galatia, strictly speaking,—then it follows first from the order of the districts named that Paul on this occasion, as compared with xvi. 6, was travelling in quite a different direction, not from the south toward the north and north-east, but from east to west. Further, καθεξῆς indicates that he did not visit merely individual towns in the two districts as on the former journey, but that he traversed both quite extensively. Also the fact that there is no mention here of Churches, but only of disciples (see above, p. 176), does not agree well with the opinion that it has to do with a visit to the great Churches which Paul himself had established in the Southern part of the province. The expression πάντας τοὺς μαθητάς does not at all allow one to think of a great number, but is to be explained by the number of the places where Paul met disciples. The route this time may have been from the Cilician Gates by way of Tyana, Archelaïs, Ancyra, Pessinus, and on through northern Phrygia to Ephesus. The journey did not bring him (cf. Col. ii. 1) to the valley of the Lycus and the Meander, which would have been the natural way if he had occasion to go from Iconium and Antioch to Ephesus. The support which Ramsay (Stud. Bibl. et Eccl., Oxford, 16 ff.) finds for his view of Acts xviii. 23 in a homily of Asterius (Migne, xl. 294), which he claims as evidence of an old tradition, appears weak. Asterius' homily, like an essay on Paul's journeys falsely ascribed to Euthalius (Zacagni, Coll. mon. 426), took the Antioch of Acts xviii. 22 to be the Pisidian Antioch. Asterius, sharing this undoubtedly traditional error, is reminded, probably without looking up the references, of the narrative, Acts xiii. 14–xiv. 7, and then tacitly assumes Λυκαονίαν instead of Γαλατικὴν χώραν as the text of xviii. 23. Since Ramsay also (Historical Comm. 209 f., 314 ff.) is unable to adduce one satisfactory proof for his ever varying in-interpretation of (ἡ) Γαλατικὴ χώρα, he has deprived himself of all right to lay stress upon the lack of examples elsewhere of this designation of the Galatian country proper, as a determining reason against this interpretation (namely, the country inhabited by Galatians). In itself, indeed, the expression is anything but striking. Cf. e.g. 1 Macc. viii. 8 (χώραν τὴν Ἰνδικήν), x. 38, xii. 25; Jos. Bell. iii. 3. 4 (ἡ Σαμαρεΐτις χώρα), and the innumerable instances, where an adjective formed from the name of a people with the ending -ικος in the feminine, designates the country inhabited by the people concerned, also without χώρα which is to be understood, as ἡ Κελτική, Ἰστανρική, Ἰνδική, Περσική.

5. (Pp. 176, 177.) ANTIOCH, on Phrygian soil, near the border of Pisidia, hence Ἀντιόχεια πρὸς Πισιδίαν, Strabo, 557, 569, 577, less exactly Ἀντ. Πισιδίας, Ptol. v. 4. 11, or Ἀντ. ἡ Πισιδία (v.l. τῆς Πισιδίας), Acts xiii. 14, now Yalowadi, the most important military colony of Augustus in that region, founded probably in 6 B.C. (Marquardt, i. 365; Ramsay, Hist. Geogr. 398, 396, 391; Church in Roman Empire, 25-27). ICONIUM, the most south-easterly city of Phrygia (Xen. Anab. i. 2. 19), still called a Phrygian city about 160 by a Christian who was born there (Acta Justinī, chap. iv. ed. Otto, ii. 3. 274), and again a century later by bishop Firmilianus, who attended a synod there (Cyprian, Ep. lxxv. 7), and distinguished from the Lycaonian cities in Acts xiv. 1, 6 also (cf. Ramsay, Church in Roman Empire, 37 ff.), was nevertheless commonly reckoned with Lycaonia (Cic. Ep. xv. 4. 2; Strabo, 568; Plin. Hist. Nat. v. 95), in fact was considered its chief city, a Roman colony under the emperor Claudius (contrary to Ramsay, Hist. Comm. 123, who disputes this, see ZKom. Cal. 13), and at that time attached to the province of Galatia (C. I. Gr. 3991, see p. 184 above). LYSTRA, a colony of Augustus, see Sterrett, The Wolfe Expedition, p. 142, No. 242 (by which the situation is determined also), p. 219, No. 352; Ramsay, Hist. Geogr. 332, 390, 398; Church in Roman Empire, 48. DERBE, probably near the modern Gudellissia, between one and two days' journey from Lystra, farther west and nearer the Isaurian mountains than was formerly supposed, probably made a colony under Claudius, and named Claudio-Derbe, cf. Sterrett, 20 ff.; Ramsay, Hist. Geogr. 336; Church in Roman Empire, 54, 69. All four of the cities, then, in which we are to look primarily for "the Churches of Galatia," were half Roman cities like Philippi and Corinth. The more natural is it therefore that the "Roman" Paul (Acts xvi. 37) should address these Christians not as Lycaonians and Phrygians, but as Galatians, from the province to which they belonged. When we come to inquire whether these four Churches or the Christians of Galatia proper, who are not so much as called Churches in Acts xviii. 23, are the ἐκκλησίαι τῆς Γαλατίας referred to in Gal. i. 2; 1 Cor. xvi. 1; 1 Pet. i. 1, we must further take into consideration the fact that in the post-canonical literature, also, the Lycaonian Churches occupy a much more prominent place than the north Galatian. In the Thecla legend we find Iconium, Lystra, Antioch, and perhaps, in the perverted form Daphne, Derbe as well, GK, ii. 908. In the passage already mentioned, Cyprian, Ep. lxxv. 7, Firmilian says: "Quod totum nos iam pridem in Iconio, qui Phrygiæ locus est, collecti in unum convenientibus ex Galatia et Cilicia et ceteris proximis regionibus confirmavimus," etc. As the reporter himself was bishop of Caesarea, Cappadocia was also represented in the synod in addition to the districts mentioned by name. Iconium was a centre of ecclesiastical life. Contemporaries of Origen speak of a bishop Celsus of Iconium and a bishop Neon of Laranda (in Eus. H. E. vi. 19. 18); a little later Nicomas of Iconium is mentioned as a noted bishop, Eus. vii. 29. 2. On the other hand, Church history has little to say of the cities in the Galatian region. We know from Eus. H. E. v. 16. 4 that there was a Christian Church in Ancyra about 192 A.D. The next witness is the Synod of Ancyra in 314, at which Marcellus of Ancyra probably presided; cf. the writer's essay on Marcellus, 8 f.; Hefele, *Konziliengesch.*² i. 221; Stud. Bibl. et Eccl., Oxford, iii. 197, 211. Lequien, Oriens Christ. i. 489 f., could not discover any bishop of Pessinus earlier than the fifth century.

6. (P. 177.) Furthermore, if the appearance of Judaisers in Galatia presupposes the presence of Jews and Jewish Christians as a natural point of connection, we know from Acts xiii. 14-51, xiv. 19, that Antioch had to all appearances a prominent and influential body of Jews. In Iconium, too, there was a synagogue largely attended by Jews and God-fearing Gentiles (xiv. 1), and in Lystra, the home of Timothy, who was of Jewish descent on his mother's side, there were at least individual Jews (xvi. 1-3; 2 Tim. i. 5, iii. 15). On the other hand, even in rhetorical accounts like that of Philo, Leg. ad Cai. xxxvi, one hears nothing of Jews in the Galatian country. In Acts ii. 9-11, Galatia is not included. That Jews had gone to Ancyra is a pure conjecture of Scaliger's in connection with Jos. Ant. xvi. 6. 2; and even if the conjecture were right, it would point to the Ancyra in the province of Asia, and not to the Galatian city of that name; cf. Mommsen, Res. Gestæ D. Aug. ed. 2, p. x; Waddington, Fustes des prov. Asiat. 102, whose conjecture is Pergamus. An epitaph (C. I. Gr. No. 4129), which is possibly Jewish, and which was not found in the Galatian region, but near its western boundary, and another, discovered on the road between Germa and Pessinus, and probably from a somewhat later period (Bull. de Corresp. hellén. 1883, p. 24), do not prove that there were Jews in the Galatian region in the first century. Cf. ZKom. Gal. 13, A. 12. We are by no means to infer from Acts xiii. 43 that any considerable number of Jews in Antioch became adherents to Christianity, for it is not said that the admonitions of the missionaries were accepted by the Jews, who were at first favourably inclined toward them. According to xiii. 45-51, for which we are already prepared by xiii. 41, the contrary is more probable. In xiii. 48 f. it is only said of a number of Gentiles in and about Antioch that they really became believers and so continued. In Iconium it seems not to have been very different (xiv. 1-7), even if the success among the Jews was perhaps somewhat greater there than in Antioch. From the reports concerning Lystra and Derbe, aside from the supplementary notice of Timothy's Jewish mother (xvi. 1), and the intimation of an influence exercised upon the citizens of Lystra and Derbe by the Jews of Antioch and Iconium (xiv. 19), one receives nothing more than the impression that the missionaries were dealing with Gentiles, xiv. 6-18. The fact that Paul constantly deals with the readers of Galatians as Gentile Christians (see p. 166 f. above) is consequently no obstacle to the assumption that it was primarily these four Churches for which Galatians was intended. It is impossible to say with Wieseler (Komm. 533) that Paul in ii. 15 ff., iii. 13, 23-25, iv. 3 groups himself and his readers together as Jewish Christians. The readers, the great majority of whom were of Gentile origin, understood readily enough that in these passages Paul was associating with himself in a "we" not themselves, but others who like him were of Jewish birth. In ii. 15 this is perfectly clear from the context, ii. 11-14, even if one does not take ii. 15 ff. as a continuation of the address to Peter. In iii. 13, 14 the distinction between ἡμᾶς, to whom Paul belongs, and τὰ ἔθνη, to whom the readers belong, is unmistakable. So is the transition from the Jewish Christians in whose name Paul speaks to the Gentile Christians whom he addresses, iii. 23-25 to iii. 26-29, and iv. 1-7 to iv. 8-11. Only it follows from the otherwise superfluous πάντες, iii. 26, and ὅσοι, iii. 27, and especially from iii. 28, that there were also some of Jewish birth among the readers themselves; for only on this supposition could the idea that in Christianity distinctions between Jew and Gentile, like those between man and woman, or between slave and freeman, are ideally abolished, be expressed in the form of the direct address, "you all" (instead of, we all, i.e. we Jews and you Gentiles) "are one in Christ." These four Churches were composed of a few full-born Jews, a number of proselytes of different grades (Acts xiii. 43, xiv. 1, xvi. 1), and a much larger number of Gentiles, and they received through Paul the stamp of law-free Gentile Churches (cf. Acts xvi. 4). According to Galatians, the same was true of the Churches of Galatia. The two groups are identical.

7. (P. 178.) Hofmann, i. 93, thought it permissible to interpret ἡμᾶς, Gal. ii. 5, of the Gentile world not yet affected by the gospel; Sieffert, finding this at variance with the text, understood Gentile Christians at large. But comparison with Eph. ii. 11 or Eph. iii. 1 f., by which one or the other view is to be supported, shows that Paul would have indicated it by an appositional phrase like τὰ ἔθνη if he meant to take the readers as representatives either of Gentile Christians at large or of the Gentile world. In the latter case one ought also to expect that he would have referred to the former status of his readers as a condition now past, as in Eph. ii. 11 f. (παρὲν . . . τῷ καιρῷ ἐκείνῳ); 1 Cor. xii. 2. Moreover, the translation "for you" cannot be defended; the phrase presupposes, rather, that the readers had already received "the truth of the gospel." The use of πρὸς is not more remarkable than in ἐπιμένειν πρὸς τινα, Gal. i. 18; 1 Cor. xvi. 7, cf. Buttmann, Gram. 292 [Eng. trans. 339 f.]. διαμένειν in such a connection only intimates with especial emphasis that the relation in which the true gospel had already stood to the Galatians was to continue uninterrupted for all time.

§ 12. TIME AND PLACE OF THE COMPOSITION OF THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

On the supposition that the Galatians addressed in this letter are to be sought in the northern part of the province of that name and only there, the terminus a quo of the Epistle is fixed as the settlement of Paul in Ephesus at the beginning of the year 55 (Acts xix. 1). The second visit implied in Gal. iv. 13 will then be the one referred to in Acts xviii. 23; and even when the error is avoided of supposing that ταχέως in Gal. i. 6 implies that the danger which was threatening the Galatian Churches at the hands of the Judaisers, and which occasioned this letter, arose immediately after this second visit of Paul, much less immediately after the conversion of the Galatians, the advocate of this theory will be inclined to place the composition of the letter in the period of $2\frac{1}{4}$ years ending at Pentecost 57 (n. 1), during which Paul was at work in Ephesus (Acts xix. 8–10). But this time and place seem to be ruled out by the fact that in Gal. iv. 20 it is taken for granted that Paul is at such a distance from the readers that it is impossible for him to make a journey to them in the near future (above, p. 170). Yet at any time during the year it was quite possible to make the journey from Ephesus to Pessinus or Ancyra. Furthermore, if the letter was written in Ephesus, the expression in Gal. iv. 20, of a desire to visit them which could not be fulfilled, is very strange, in view of the fact that during this period Paul did visit the Church in Corinth (§ 17).

If, on the other hand, it be accepted as proved that the letter was meant for the Churches in South Galatia which were founded on the first missionary journey, every reason for supposing that the letter was written in Ephesus between the beginning of the year 55 and Pentecost 57 disappears. Then the terminus a quo is the second visit to the Churches in Lycaonia (Acts xvi. 1–5) in the spring of 52. Any reference of the letter to an earlier date (n. 2) is at once precluded by the chronological and historical data of Gal. i. 15–ii. 10. The apostolic council, to which reference is made in Gal. ii. 1–10 (cf. Acts xv. 1–29), took place during the winter of 51–52. It was not until after this council that Paul and Silas set out upon the second missionary journey, and visited the Churches in Lycaonia a second time. Similarly the terminus ad quem of Galatians is the beginning of Paul's two imprisonments in Cæsarea and Rome (Pentecost 58), which together lasted for at least five years. The hypothesis that Galatians was written while Paul was a prisoner in Rome is of long standing (n. 3), but quite untenable. All the letters which Paul wrote while in prison, or which he is supposed to have written in prison, disclose this fact unmistakably and in various ways (Col. iv. 3, 10, 18, cf. i. 24; Eph. iii. 1, iv. 1, vi. 20; Philem. 1, 9, 10, 13, 22, 23; Phil. i. 7, 12-17, cf. ii. 23, iv. 10-18; 2 Tim. i. 8, 16, ii. 9, cf. i. 12, ii. 10, iv. 6-18). But in Galatians there is no hint that at the time of writing Paul's free movements were hindered, or that he was being persecuted by the civil authorities on account of his missionary activity. If he had been in prison at the time, he could hardly have failed to make some reference to the fact in the passage where he expresses his earnest wish, impossible of fulfilment, that he might be present among the Galatian Churches in person, and that they might hear his trembling voice (iv. 20). Nor, when speaking of his preaching as still being carried on, ii. 2, v. 11, also i. 8, 16, could he have remained entirely silent about his captivity had he been a prisoner. While, to be sure, he is being opposed, iv. 29, v. 11, his persecutors are legal-minded Jewish Christians, and the means employed are not violence, but slanders and insinuations. When he does speak of bodily injuries inflicted upon him on account of his Christian faith or on account of his missionary activity (vi. 17), they are not referred to, as in the letters of his imprisonment, as something being endured at the time; he simply mentions the marks of injuries received some time before, which he still bore and could show. In view of the infrequency of references of this kind in Paul's letters, it is very improbable that he is referring to the marks of ill-treatment which he had borne for years, such as an ineffaceable scar on his forehead, or the maiming of a limb caused by a stone thrown at the time when he was organising the Church in Galatia (Acts xiv. 19, cf. xiv. 5), or on some other occasion about which we are not definitely informed (2 Cor. xi. 23-25; 1 Cor. xv. 32?). The mention of the fact, τὰ στίγματα τοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἐν τῷ σώματί μου βαστάζω, and the peculiar expression used, are natural here only if the wounds, marks of which were still visible when Galatians was written, had been inflicted not very long before. They are the same as those clearly referred to in 1 Thess. ii. 2 (προπαθόντες καὶ ὑβρισθέντες ἐν Φιλίπποις). That on this occasion Paul and Silas were not only insulted, but also roughly handled, is clear from Acts xvi. 22-24, 33, 37-38.

But this evidence may be left quite out of account; for if, as has been shown, dates previous to the spring of 52 (Acts xvi. 1-5), and subsequent to Pentecost 58 (Acts xx. 16 ff.), are precluded, and if the letter could not have been written during the $2\frac{1}{4}$ or, reckoned from the first arrival of Paul in Ephesus, the three years' stay in that city, i.e. between Pentecost 54 and Pentecost 57 (Acts xviii. 19, xix. 1, 8-10, xx. 18, 31), then it must have been written shortly after the events described in Acts xvi. 22 ff. After Paul's second visit to the Churches in Lycaonia during the summer of 52, and his preaching tour through several parts of the province of Galatia, where he had not been before (Acts xvi. 1-6, cf. second preaching presupposed in Gal. iv. 13), at least several months must have elapsed before Galatians was written. Besides, it required time for the Judaisers to reach Galatia, as they did in the interval, and for them to secure the wide influence which they contrived to win, and for this state of affairs to be reported to Paul, who had gone over to Europe. Before the close of the year 52, Paul had settled in Corinth for a stay of eighteen months (Acts xviii. 11), lasting up to the summer of 54. Galatians was written during this time, and more probably in the first half of the period than in the second. A company of believers was already gathered about Paul in the place where he was staying (Gal. i. 2), but no one of these appears to have been closely associated with the Galatian Churches. If we were right in concluding (above, p. 170) that Paul could not have addressed a letter to Churches in Timothy's home (Acts xvi. 1), and to Churches which he had visited in company with Silas some time before, and warned against the Judaistic propaganda (Gal. v. 3, i. 9), without sending greetings from both these persons, so well known among the Galatians, if they were with him at the time, then it follows that Galatians could not have been written when Silas and Timothy were with Paul in Corinth, when the two letters to the Thessalonians were written in his own name and theirs. The letter must be dated either before or after this time, either while he was waiting for them in Corinth (Acts xviii. 1-5), or after the two helpers had left Corinth again, a period the length of which cannot be definitely determined. The former is the more probable. At the time of the first letter to the Thessalonians, shortly after Timothy's arrival in Corinth (1 Thess. iii. 6), he had already had occasion to learn from Christians, who did not belong in Macedonia or Achaia, or anywhere in Europe, that they were familiar with the organisation of the Church in Thessalonica (1 Thess. i. 8 f.; see below, § 13). When Paul had been on the point of informing them of the cheering successes in Macedonia, they had replied that this was no news to them, or they had anticipated his account by expressions of joy at the triumph of the gospel in Macedonia. The persons referred to must have been Christians, who came to Paul in Corinth from Asia, before the time indicated in Acts xviii. 5 and 1 Thess. iii. 6. And they must have come directly by sea; for if they had come by the land route through Macedonia, visiting the Churches in Philippi and Thessalonica which lay on their way, Paul could not have related to the Thessa-lonian Church what these Christians from abroad had said to him, in the manner that he does in 1 Thess. i. 8 f. If, now, we ask where these Christians from Asia got their information about the circumstances under which the Church in Thessalonica was organised, the source could not possibly have been any written communication of Paul's; on the contrary, Paul is agreeably surprised by their voluntary expression of gratification at the entrance of the gospel into Thessalonica, and tells the Christians there about it in order to encourage them. So it must have been another Christian who had witnessed the progress of the gospel in Macedonia, and who at the same time was intimately associated with the Churches in Asia from which these Christians had come to Paul, who had sent reports of the missionary work in Macedonia to these Churches or to individual members of the same. What more natural than to suppose that this person was Timothy, who could hardly have failed to inform his mother, in Lystra, and through her the Churches in Galatia, what happened to him and his companions on their missionary journey through Macedonia? So these Christians from outside of Europe, who, according to 1 Thess. i. 8 f., did not need to be informed by Paul about the organisation of the Church in Thessalonica, because they had already heard about it in detail, were none other than the representatives of the Galatian Churches who brought the report of the incursion of the Judaisers in Galatia to Paul in Corinth (above, p. 169). In view of the condition of things in Galatia, Paul did not dare wait, so he sent the messengers from the Galatians home again as quickly as he could with a letter written by his own hand. When Silas and Timothy arrived, Galatians was already written and sent.

If this putting together of very simple exegetical observations is not altogether wrong, Galatians is the earliest of Paul's letters that has come down to us. At the time when it was written the marks of the blows which he had received in Philippi, possibly some eight or nine months before (Gal. vi. 17 ; 1 Thess. ii. 2), could very well have been still visible. If the intercourse between the Galatian Churches and Paul in Corinth took place by sea, as seems to be the case, Galatians was written some time after the opening of navigation, i.e. after March in the year 53, not very long before the arrival of Silas and Timothy in Corinth and the writing of 1 Thessalonians.

1. (P. 193.) As early as 370, Victorinus (Mai, Script. vet. n. Coll. iii. 2. 1) mentions as traditional the view that Galatians was written in Ephesus at the time of Paul's ministry there. The old prologues affirm the same (Cod. Fuld. 248 ; Amiatin. 296 ; Card. Thomasius, Opp. i. 402, 421, 433, 451). In more recent times this has been the prevailing view among those who understand by Galatia the country of Galatæ, e.g. Hug, *Einkl.*³ ii. 351 ; Wieseler, Chronol. des apost. Zeitalters, 285 ; Komm. zum Gal. 541 ; Hofmann, ii. 1. 1 ; Meyer-Sieffert, 24 ; Godet, Introd. i. 269. Confirmatory evidence has been sought in the fact that, according to Jewish tradition, the year from the autumn of 68 to the autumn of 69, and therefore also the year 54-55, were Sabbatical years (Anger, Ratio Temporum, 38 ; Wieseler, Chronol. Synopse, 204 ; Komm. zum Gal. 356, 542, cf. the summary in Schürer, i. 35 ff. [Eng. trans. i. i. 41-43]), and it has further been supposed that this was referred to in Gal. iv. 10 (ἐναυρούς). But if this, the last of the seasons there enumerated, had an actual significance for the readers at that time, we should expect a more explicit emphasis upon it. Chronologically, too, this supposition, if all its premises were valid, would still be highly improbable. If the two and a quarter years, Acts xix. 8-10, ended with Pentecost 57, Paul must have begun his stay in Ephesus somewhere near the last of February 55. But since several months must have elapsed between his arrival there (which followed directly upon his second visit to the Galatian region, Acts xviii. 23) and the writing of Galatians, it appears that the Sabbatical year ending in the autumn of 55 was already past when the Epistle was sent. Moreover, it was half gone when Paul last visited the Galatians without his noticing then any signs of Judaistic tendencies (see p. 165 f. above). But it is exceedingly improbable that the Judaisers from Jerusalem, arriving among the Galatians in the latter half of the Sabbatical year, should have come out at once with the recommendation of the legal provisions in this particular, and have succeeded with them before the expiration of the year. We must note, besides, that the Sabbatical year in any case was observed only in Palestine and the neighbouring districts, and then not with the same exactness in all parts of the Holy Land (Mishnah, Shebiith vi. 1, ix. 2 ; cf. A. Geiger, Lesestücke aus der Mischna, 75 f., 78 f.), a fact which Clemen, Chronol. der paulin. Briefe, 204, presents with quite arbitrary inadequacy. Of the representatives of the old idea of "Galatia,

Gal. i. 2, Bleek (Wint. 1862, S. 418) and Lightfoot (Galatians, 36-56) assigned the Epistle to a period between 2 Cor. and Rom., both on account of the affinity in thought between Gal. and Rom., and because of the great difference between Gal. and 1 and 2 Thess.; Gal., then, would have been written in the three months Acts xx. 3, or on the journey through Macedonia just before. Some, too, who have cut loose from the old assumption with regard to the persons to whom the letter was sent, have been so impressed with the idea of the development of Pauline thought as reflected in the succession of the Epistles, as to suppose that they must even put Galatians later than Romans. So, for example, Kühn, NKZ, 1895, S. 156-162, who thinks that Galatians was sent to the Lycæonian Churches during the apostle's imprisonment in Caesarea. Clemen, too, in his all-confusing Chronologic (205), puts Galatians after Romans, though he cannot tell us where it was written (203). Kuhn (159) and Clemen (200 ff.) see confirmation in Gal. ii. 10, which they understand as a reference to the great collection which Paul was only just ready to take to Jerusalem when Romans was written (Rom. xv. 25 ff.). But as little as the obligation which Paul assumed in the apostolic council, according to the tenor of Gal. ii. 10, looked merely to the gathering of a single money collection in specified parts of the Gentile Church, just so little did he appeal to one such collection as the fulfilment of it. He can testify, rather, that he has been zealous and diligent to meet the obligation assumed at the council, and this he could not say unless immediately upon his return from Jerusalem, in Antioch, Syria, Cilicia, and on his second missionary journey (Acts xv. 30-xvi. 5), he had stirred up the existing Gentile Christian Churches to make these collections and gifts. On the other hand, Gal. ii. 10 would be empty talk, if the contribution which he took to Jerusalem about Pentecost 58 were the first fruit of his ostensibly so zealous endeavour to carry out a pledge made some six and a half years before. We need not here concern ourselves with the question whether the Galatian and Asiatic Churches had any part in the great collection of 58, which would seem from Rom. xv. 26, 2 Cor. viii.-ix., not to have been the case, and which cannot be inferred from 1 Cor. xvi. 1; Acts xx. 4. Between 52 and 58 three or six contributions may have been sent to Jerusalem from the Galatian Churches and others founded and guided by Paul, just as gifts had already been sent before (Acts xi. 30). From Gal. ii. 10 we must conclude that a beginning had been made within the first year after the apostolic council. Even Ramsay (Church in Roman Empire, 101) seems to have been influenced to some extent by Lightfoot's discussion to put Galatians as late as his historical and geographical data would permit, and holds that the Epistle was written from Antioch in 55, at the beginning of the third missionary journey (p. 168; Acts xviii. 22 f.). I merely ask how Paul, who, according to Ramsay's interpretation of Acts xviii. 23 (see p. 190 above), was then on the point of visiting the Galatian Churches for the third time, could have written iv. 20, or the letter as a whole, without alluding to his impending visit. We shall never reach a chronological arrangement of Paul's Epistles which will do justice to the indications of the letters themselves and to the notices in Acts, if we assume as our underlying premise that Paul was a theological thinker and writer, who derived the essential impulse to the composition of his letters, the choice of his teaching material, and the particular manner of its treatment in the several Epistles, from the progress of his investigations. Rather was he a missionary, who was determined not only in the composition of Epistles, but in the choice of themes and treatment, by the aims of this his calling, and the requirements of the Churches which he had founded and which were under his care. Through long preparation, and longer missionary experience, he had arrived at fixed and basal principles before he wrote the first of the letters which have come down to us. The ideas of Galatians which reappear in Romans must have become perfectly clear to him, at the latest, at the time of the controversies described in Acts xv. and Gal. ii. 1-10. According to Gal. ii. 15-21, cf. i. 12-16; 2 Cor. iv. 6, v. 16 f.; Rom. vii. 6-viii. 2; Phil. iii. 5-12, they were rooted in the very experiences which made him a Christian. But in that conflict he must not only have become conscious of the contradiction between his Christianity and that of the Pharisaic Christians, he must also have learned even then to develop from Scripture and from Christian experience the arguments for his gospel and against legalistic Christianity, and to use them as weapons in the debate. That he so uses them in Galatians requires no explanation beyond the fact that these controversies in Antioch and in Jerusalem already lay behind him, and that he was now confronted by substantially the same opponents in Galatia. The fact, too, that the ideas of justification by and through faith, together with their contraries, drop into the background in Thessalonians and Corinthians, and appear more prominently again in Romans and Philippians, shows simply that Paul was not a stupid schoolmaster repeating his monotonous formulas in season and out of season. The reason why the weapons, which had already been tested more than once in combat, were brought out again from his armoury when he wrote the letter to Rome, will become clear enough in our examination of that Epistle. Occasional expressions like 1 Cor. xv. 56 or 2 Cor. v. 21 show that the whole circle of thought which meets us first in Galatians did not become unfamiliar to the apostle in the interim. If it were admissible to interpret and explain the differences in teaching in the several Epistles from the order of their composition instead of from the variety of conditions in the Churches and in the historical occasion of the letters, one might infer from a comparison of Gal. iv. 10 with Rom. xiv. 5 f. that several years of inner development lay between Galatians and Romans, and Col. ii. 16 would have to be set near Galatians in time but as far as possible from Romans. Halmel, Über röm. Recht im Gal. 1895, concludes from the observation expressed in the title, together with the affinity between the theological conceptions of Galatians and Romans, "that Galatians must have been written in Rome or Italy, and in any case, therefore (sic), was not far removed from Romans in point of time" (S. v and 30). Now, there was an interval of more than three years between Romans, which was written from Corinth at the beginning of the year 58, and Paul's arrival at the capital in the spring of 61. As Halmel, further, does not insist on Rome at all, and consequently, it would seem, does not insist that the letter was written during Paul's two years' imprisonment there (Acts xxviii. 30), the possible interval between Galatians and Romans seems to stretch out to five years or more, that is, to some period after the expiration of the two years mentioned in Acts xxviii. 30, when Paul no longer sojourned as a prisoner in Rome, but somewhere in Italy in freedom. And this, we are told, is proximity in point of time! If the introduction of provisions of Roman law "as things quite well known" were really inconceivable outside of Rome and Italy, it would not suffice to remove the author thither; but, assuming that he wished to be understood, it would be necessary first of all to look for the readers also in Italy, instead of in Galatia. If, again, we are really to presuppose in Galatians an acquaintance with Roman law specifically (cf. ZKom. Gal. 160 ff., 191 ff.), it is a sufficient explanation that Paul, according to the tradition of Acts, which has never been assailed with any sound objection, was born a civis Romanus, and that the principal Churches of Galatia were located in Roman colonies (p. 191 above). Roman citizens, who claimed the privileges of Roman law, were found everywhere in the empire; cf., for example, Berl. äg. griech. Urk. Nos. 96, 15; 113. 3, 6; 327. 2; 361. ii. 19; and, moreover, Roman law had had everywhere a transforming influence on the legal procedure of the ἔθνη; cf. Strabo, x. p. 484.

2. (P. 194.) Calvin, who reckoned the fourteen years of Gal. ii. 1 from Paul's conversion, and identified the visit to Jerusalem there mentioned with that of Acts xi. 30, assigned the composition of Galatians to a date before the apostolic council (Com. in Gal. ii. 1-5, ed. Tholuck, 546). This presupposes—what Calvin does not expressly say, however—that the Galatian Churches were those situated in Lycaonia.

3. (P. 195.) The view that Galatians was written by Paul during his Roman imprisonment first gained currency, somewhat late, in the Eastern Churches. In the West, before Jerome's day, a very different view prevailed (above, p. 199, note 1). Among the expositors of Galatians, Ambrosiaster, Pelagius, Ephrem Syrus, and Theodore of Mopsuestia nowhere express themselves, to the present writer's knowledge, with regard to the time and place of the Epistle. Chrysostom, not in his commentary on Galatians but in the introduction to Romans, gives his opinion that Paul wrote Galatians before Romans, that is, of course, like Romans, before his imprisonment (Montfaucon, ix. 427). Eusebius of Emesa (Cramer, Cat. vi. 67) seems to have been the first to find in Gal. iv. 20 an indication of imprisonment. Jerome, who in the preparation of his own commentary on Galatians made free use of Eusebius' and many others (Præf., Vall. vii. 370), borrowed from him this interpretation of iv. 20 (468), and again, on vi. 11 (529), alludes to the imprisonment of Paul at the time of the Epistle, whereas on vi. 17 (534) he contents himself with a vague reference to the recital of his sufferings, 2 Cor. xi. 23 ff. Galatians was first assigned to the Roman imprisonment by the pseudo-Euthalius (Zacagni, 624), Theodoret (Noesselt, 4), Œcumenius (Hentenius, i. 713), and a number of Greek, Syriac, and Coptic Bible MSS. Possibly the fact that Galatians was not infrequently placed after Ephesians, that is, among the Epistles of the imprisonment (GK, ii. 351, 358, 360), contributed to the perpetuation of the error. Thus we see to what extent Halmel (30) is justified in calling this the general opinion of the early Church, and that we are not dealing with a historical tradition, but with the spread of an error which arose from a careless reading of the Epistle.

§ 13. THE ORIGIN OF THE CHURCH IN THESSALONICA, AND THE COURSE OF ITS HISTORY UNTIL THE COMPOSITION OF PAUL'S FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CHURCH THERE.

It must have been somewhere about September 52 when Paul, driven from Philippi, came directly to Thessalonica (1 Thess. ii. 2; Acts xvi. 19–xvii. 1) along with Silvanus or Silas (n. 1), without stopping in Amphipolis and Apollonia, which were situated upon the great military road by which he travelled (Via Egnatia). His younger helper, Timothy, who had been with him only during the journey from Lystra (n. 2), and the author of the account, who by the use of “we” in Acts xvi. 16–17 indicates his presence, and in Acts xvi. 13 his participation in the teaching activity of the missionaries, seem for the time being to have been left behind in Philippi. Although Timothy is not mentioned in connection with the flight of Paul and Silvanus from Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 10), and does not appear again until after Paul's departure from Berea (Acts xvii. 14), it is not to be inferred that Timothy had no share in Paul's work at Thessalonica, nor is it to be supposed that he journeyed from Philippi to Berea (or Berrhœa) without stopping on the way to visit the newly made converts in Thessalonica. If it may be regarded as certain that the “we” which runs through both letters includes both the helpers mentioned in the greeting with Paul as joint writers with him of the Epistle, then Timothy is to be considered one of the organisers of this Church (n. 3). After Paul's departure from Philippi, he very soon followed him to Thessalonica and thence to Berea.

Before Byzantium became Constantinople, Thessalonica was the largest city on the Balkan peninsula (n. 4), which, together with the fact that it had a numerous Jewish population, made it a suitable station for Paul's work; and, had it not been that he was compelled to go, he would not have left it so soon as he did. As it was, after three weeks' preaching in the synagogue (n. 5), the Jewish majority succeeded in stirring up the populace against the missionaries to such an extent, that the latter were compelled to conceal themselves; and, after their host Jason and several of the converts were brought before the city authorities in their stead, and released only on bail, the missionaries fled for refuge to Berea.

The original Church in Thessalonica consisted of a few Jews and a large number of Greeks, some of whom, before they became Christians, had been adherents of the synagogue. Among them were several women belonging to the upper classes. Subsequent additions to the Church seem to have been made exclusively from the Gentile population (n. 6). That the attack upon the missionaries and the persecution of the new converts immediately following (Acts xvii. 5-9; 1 Thess. i. 6) emanated from the Jews, is clear from 1 Thess. ii. 15; since, inasmuch as Paul speaks here not of himself alone, but also of Silvanus and Timothy, the reference is not to the threatening of his life in Jerusalem (Acts ix. 29), but to his expulsion from Thessalonica and Berea. But inasmuch as the Jews succeeded at once in arousing the populace against the missionaries by charging them with teaching doctrines contrary to the State, which led the politarchs to take precautionary measures oppressive to the Christians (Acts xvii. 5-9), it is not surprising that Paul, in speaking of the persecution which the Church had endured earlier, and was still enduring (1 Thess. i. 6, ii. 14, iii. 3; 2 Thess. i. 4), does not make special mention of the fact that the persecution was begun by the Jews. This oppressed condition of the infant Church in Thessalonica made the missionaries desirous of turning back immediately after their departure (1 Thess. ii. 17 f.), i.e. while they were still in Berea. Speaking for himself, Paul assures them that he had made still a second attempt to carry out this intention, but had been hindered as before by Satan. This effort Paul must have made at the time when he was alone in Athens, waiting for Silvanus and Timothy (Acts xvii. 16). Here, however, the accounts in Acts do not correspond entirely with Paul's statements. Although Acts xvii. 15 gives the impression that Silvanus and Timothy were to follow Paul to Athens as soon as they could, there is no report of their arrival, which omission, together with what is said in Acts xviii. 5, forces one to the conclusion that these helpers remained for a considerable time longer in Macedonia, and did not join Paul again until he had been at work in Corinth for some time (n. 7). On the other hand, according to 1 Thess. iii. 1-6, Silvanus and Timothy actually came to Athens as Paul had instructed them to do (Acts xvii. 15), from which point Paul and Silvanus sent Timothy back to Macedonia, in particular to Thessalonica (n. 3). Shortly before the composition of this letter, Timothy returned with cheering news to Paul, or rather, since the "we" is retained in 1 Thess. iii. 6 f., to Paul and Silvanus, whereupon this letter was sent to the Church in Thessalonica in the name of all three.

The letter must have been written in Corinth. Had it been written in Athens, there would be something strange even about the ἐν Ἀθήναις of iii. 1 (but cf. 1 Cor. xv. 32, xvi. 8). Moreover, in i. 7 f. it seems to be presupposed that the gospel had been preached with good success, not in Athens alone, but in several places in Achaia, as it had been preached earlier in Macedonia. But we have definite proof for a later date, and so for Corinth as the place of composition in the statement (i. 8 f.) that the conversion of the Thessalonians was known not only in Macedonia (Beroea and possibly also Philippi) and Achaia (Athens and Corinth), whither the news was brought by those who preached the gospel in this region, but everywhere (ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ, cf. Rom. i. 8), so that it was unnecessary for Paul to tell the story of the founding of the Thessalonian Church, but was able to listen to expressions of praise and joy at the entrance of the gospel into Thessalonica (above, p. 197 f.). Since the contrast to Macedonia and Achaia implies that the persons in question must have been Christians from Asia, not only is it necessary to suppose that the news of the successful preaching of the gospel in Thessalonica had reached the Christian Churches in Asia, but it must also be assumed that Paul had had occasion shortly before to converse with Christians from Asia, and to learn from them the joy which had been awakened in their home by his successes in Macedonia. If Paul had received his information about the joyful interest with which his missionary work in Macedonia was followed only through letters from Galatia or Antioch in Syria, he could not have written the words, οὐ μόνον ἐν τῇ Μακεδονίᾳ καὶ ἐν τῇ Ἀχαΐᾳ ἀλλὰ ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ ἡ πίστις ὑμῶν ἡ πρὸς τὸν θεὸν ἐξελήλυθεν. The expressions which follow (λαλεῖν, ἀπαγγέλλουσιν) prove that the intercourse between Paul and the representatives of the Churches outside of Europe had been rather of the nature of a conversation, in the course of which the latter had shown that they were familiar with the story of the founding of the Church in Thessalonica in all its details. We have seen above, p. 197 f., that in all probability these persons were the ambassadors of the Galatian Churches. But whether this was so or not, unless the most extraordinary circumstances be assumed, the spread of the news of the organisation of the Churches in Macedonia as far as the Churches in Galatia or Syria, and the reporting of the impression which this news made there back to Paul, who was travelling in Europe, requires an interval of several months between Paul's flight from Thessalonica and the composition of 1 Thessalonians. If, therefore, for chronological reasons, we conclude that the letter was written in Corinth and not in Athens, the use of the three names in the greeting (i. 1) would indicate a time subsequent to the event described in Acts xviii. 5, while 1 Thess. iii. 6, shows that it was written immediately after this event. Paul wrote Galatians before the arrival of the helpers in Corinth, possibly in April or May '53 (above, p. 198); 1 Thessalonians after the reunion, possibly in June of the same year.

1. (P. 203.) The identity of Silas, Acts xv. 22, 27, 32 (34), 40, xvi. 19, 25, 29, xvii. 4, 10, 14, 15, xviii. 5, and Silvanus, 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1; 2 Cor. i. 19; 1 Pet. v. 12, appears from the statements made by Paul, and in Acts with regard to the second missionary journey. As to his double name, above, p. 31 f. As Acts xvi. 37 presupposes that he, like Paul, possessed Roman citizenship, he may have been one of the "Libertines" spoken of in Acts vi. 9, above, p. 60 f. As a man of prominence in the Jerusalem Church (xv. 22), of mature years, therefore, and besides prophetically gifted (xv. 32), he was sent together with Judas Barsabbas to accompany Paul and Barnabas to Antioch, in order to explain and confirm the decision of the apostolic council by word of mouth (xv. 27, 32). This implies that Silas was, on the one hand, a man who enjoyed the confidence of the mother Church; and, on the other hand, that he was also in sympathy with the progress of the Gentile mission up to that time. Both things were important for Paul, and probably decided him, after his break with Barnabas, to choose Silas of Jerusalem as his companion on the second missionary journey (xv. 40), instead of some one of the other teachers at Antioch (xiii. 1). Let it be noted here that what is said of the dissuasion of the Spirit, Acts xvi. 6, 7 (also xvii. 15, according to Cod. D), is not to be referred to Paul as the medium, for he used rather to receive such instructions in visions at night (xvi. 9, xviii. 9, xxiii. 11, xxvii. 23, cf. xxii. 17; 2 Cor. xii. 1-4), but to Silas (xv. 32, where καὶ αὐτοί, like καὶ αὐτοὺς, xv. 27, is to be taken by itself, and separated from προφῆται ὄντες by the punctuation—so Blass; only Judas and Silas were prophets, not Barnabas and Paul). The account in Acts xv. 30-34, partly because of the uncertainty of the text, is by no means as clear as one could wish. First, the clause xv. 34a is to be recognised as part of the earlier text, in the form ἔδοξε δὲ τῷ Σιλᾷ ἐπιμένειν αὐτοὺς (CD*) and πρὸς αὐτοὺς (correction in D), αὐτοῦ (min. 13=ev. 33, Gregory, Prol. 469, 618), αὐτόθι (3 min.), ibi (many MSS. of the Lat. Vulg. and Copt., Sah. and margin of S³) are to be regarded as alterations with a view to an easier reading. The opinion given by the prophet Silas, in such a way as not to exclude the action of the πνεῦμα, but rather to include it (cf. xv. 28), was that Judas and Silas should remain still longer in Antioch. The clause μόνος δὲ Ἰούδας ἐπορεύθη, vouched for only by D and some Latin MSS., is then an amplifying gloss, to explain the fact that in what follows there is mention only of Silas, and nothing of Judas remaining there, whereas the ἔδοξε applied to both men. The gloss, moreover, is clumsy enough, as it should either have said, "Judas returned to Jerusalem notwithstanding," or else, "Silas alone, however, really remained in Antioch." On the contrary, the stubborn clause 34*a*, so original in form and substance, which had a widespread and significant currency without the addition of 34*b*, is not to be understood as a gloss, reconciling the apparent contradiction between vv. 33 and 40. An emendator with this in view would have written simply, "But Silas preferred (perhaps at Paul's request) to remain longer in Antioch." 34*a*, probably the original in both recensions, was in the one so amplified by the addition of 34*b* that the reader learned to a certainty what became of Judas and Silas, while in the other it was struck out on account of the apparent contradiction between it and 33. It is possible, again, that a slip of the eye from αὐτοῦς, 33, to αὐτοῦς, 34*a*, was responsible for the omission, and this Blass considers probable in spite of his preference for αὐτοῦ in the second passage. D illustrates the case with which the omission might occur, for there the clause in question forms a complete line, which ends in αὐτοῦς, like the line preceding. If we admit 34*a* to the text, we have an account which is not exactly connected, but which involves no contradictions. xv. 33 does not say that Judas and Silas for their part took leave of the brethren in Antioch and set out for Jerusalem, a statement which Luke would have made outright (Luke viii. 38, 39; Acts iv. 21, 23, v. 40, 41, xiii. 3, 4, xv. 30) and without ἀπὸ τῶν ἀδελφῶν (xxviii. 25, xv. 30), but only that the Antiochians said they would not detain them longer. Silas gave a decisive reply to the effect that he and Judas ought still to remain in Antioch, and in consequence they did so remain, as Barnabas did in his time (xi. 22 ff.). Thus the way is sufficiently paved for xv. 40, whereas if 34*a* were rejected it would be hard to understand how the man who had just returned to Jerusalem should suddenly reappear at Antioch. The narrator could not have omitted to state that Paul summoned him from Jerusalem. Even in that case, to be sure, Luke would have left no room to doubt the identity of Silas, xv. 40, with the Silas of xv. 22, 27, 32, 34. Zimmer's attempt (ZfKW, 1881, S. 169-174, cf., per contra, Jülicher, JhfPTh. 1882, S. 538-552) to distinguish the Silas who assisted Paul on the second missionary journey from the Jerusalem envoy of the same name, has no support whatever in the only account we have of the latter. The hypothesis that Silas (=Silvanus) is to be identified with Titus, suggested in the first instance by Märcker (Titus Silvanus, 1864) and championed by Graf (Vierteljahrsschr. f. englisch-theol. Forschung, ii. 1865, S. 373-394), cannot be rescued in this fashion. Originating in a needless astonishment that Titus is not mentioned in Acts, and an effort to justify Acts in the matter, the hypothesis has simply created contradictions between Acts and Paul. Titus was an uncircumcised Gentile, whom Paul took with him from Antioch to the apostolic council (Gal. ii. 1, 3, cf. Acts xv. 2), and, of course, took back to Antioch again. Silas, on the other hand, was sent to Antioch on the same occasion by the mother Church. At that time, as for some time before, he belonged to the Church in Jerusalem, for ἐξ αὐτῶν and ἐν τοῖς ἀδελφαῖς, Acts xv. 22, have no other antecedent than the immediately preceding mention of those who sent him as "the apostles and the elders, with the whole Church," cf. xv. 4. He was a Jew, therefore, or at least a circumcised proselyte, cf. Acts vi. 5. This is true also of Paul's helper, Silas=Silvanus, according to Acts xvi. 3 (for otherwise his subsequent circumcision would have been noticed as well as Timothy's) and xvi. 20. Silvanus, Paul's colleague in the organisation of the Achaian Churches (2 Cor. i. 19, cf. Acts xviii. 5), cannot be identical with the man who in the same Epistle is constantly and exclusively spoken of as Titus (2 Cor. ii. 13, vii. 6-14, viii. 6, 16, 23, xii. 18), who first became a co-labourer with Paul in his work with the Corinthians (2 Cor. viii. 23), by his successful execution of the errand on which Paul had sent him to Corinth in the interval between the first and second Epistles, up to that time having known the Church only from Paul's laudatory accounts of it (2 Cor. vii. 14).

2. (P. 203.) From Acts xvi. 1, Timothy's home seems to have been not at Derbe, but at Lystra, the town last mentioned, and in RAB introduced with a second αἰς. It would be strange, too, if the name of his own home Church were omitted from those in xvi. 2, or, if peculiar importance were attached to the testimony of neighbouring Churches, that it should not be brought in as a more emphatic confirmation of the opinion of the home Church. The idea that he was from Derbe arose from the unnatural supposition that in Acts xx. 4 Δερβανός καὶ was to be attached to the name after it, like Θεσσαλονικέων δέ and Ἀσιανοὶ δέ, instead of to the one preceding, like Βερουαῖος, the only parallel term (Wieseler, Chron. 26, "a Derbean also, Timothy"; for "there was also a Derbean with them, namely, Timothy"; K. Schmidt, Apostelgeschichte, i. 42, "from Derbe; Timothy besides," which in the first place is linguistically inadmissible; and, secondly, would tell us, contrary to the translator's intent, that Gaius also was from Derbe). For this interpretation one ought really to conjecture Δερβανός δέ, as does Blass, following an earlier precedent, so that Gaius would appear as a third Thessalonian with Aristarchus and Secundus, and be identical with the Gaius of Acts xix. 29. The present writer sees no necessity for this. It is true we have no right to consider Paul's companions named in Acts xx. 4 as being, all of them, representatives of the Churches which had taken part in the collection for Jerusalem (2 Cor. viii. 19, 23; 1 Cor. xvi. 4). Aside from the fact that the provinces of Asia and Galatia, which are represented in xx. 4, do not seem to have had any part in this collection (above, p. 200 f.), it would be strange that no Corinthian is mentioned here. But, apart from that supposition, we can easily conceive that Luke meant that the men in whose company Paul was travelling to Jerusalem should be viewed as representatives of the cities and districts from which they came, and that he arranged their names and described them accordingly. There were: 1. Sopater from Beroea (minusc. Sosipatros = Rom. xvi. 21, both names found in Thessalonian inscriptions, Le Bas, ii., Nos. 1356, 1357); 2. Aristarchus and Secundus from Thessalonica; 3. Gaius from Derbe (a different person, therefore, from the Macedonian of Acts xix. 29, as well as from the Corinthian of 1 Cor. i. 14 and Rom. xvi. 23, but perhaps the same as the Gaius addressed in 3 John 1) and Timothy (whose Lystran extraction had been mentioned in xvi. 1, and is recalled here also by S¹),—both these men representing the province of Galatia (1 Cor. xvi. 1, above, p. 191); 4. Tychicus and Trophimus from the province of Asia (according to D and Sah., and also S³ margin, both from Ephesus, as appears in Trophimus' case at least from Acts xxi. 29).

3. (Pp. 203, 205.) Although expositors down to Hofmann for the most part paid little attention to the "we" in the Pauline Epistles, Laurent (ThStKr, 1868, S. 159 ff., cf. his Neutest. Stud. 117) tried to maintain that in 1 and 2 Thess. Paul referred to himself as "we" only when speaking in the consciousness of his official position; but as "I," on the other hand, when he spoke "more personally, confidentially, as it were." On the contrary, we must assert that there is not a passage in the Epistles where Paul uses this "we" = "I" (least of all Rom. i. 5). As Paul in 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1, introduces Silas and Timothy, co-founders of the Church, as joint authors with himself of the Epistles, it goes without saying that when he proceeds to the letter itself with "we," and not with "I," as in 1 Cor. i. 4; Gal. i. 6; Phil. i. 3, he means that the two join with him in everything that he puts in this form. If this holds true without question of the thanksgivings with which both Epistles open, it is equally impossible to draw a line further on beyond which the "we" is shrunk to an "I." So, too, an express explanation of the "we" in 2 Cor. i. 19 would have been needless if Silas as well as Timothy had been included in the "we" of vv. 1-14. On the other hand, it was unnecessary in 1 Thess. iii. 1 f. to explain that the "we" was confined to Paul and Silas, because it was plain from the statement itself that when Timothy was to be sent away, Paul and Silas were the senders. That the "we" is seriously meant becomes obvious in 1 Thess. ii. 18. Paul can say of the three missionaries that after their departure from Thessalonica it was their strong desire and earnest purpose to visit the city again: he interrupts the plural with an ἐγὼ μὲν Παῦλος, because it is only of himself that he can say that the purpose was entertained, not merely once but twice. Putting forward the three missionaries as a single τύπος, 2 Thess. iii. 9 (cf. Phil. iii. 17, i. 1, ii. 20), is as natural as the similar reference to the many Thessalonians, 1 Thess. i. 7, according to the correct reading (cf. John xx. 25, and παράδειγμα, Thuc. iii. 57). Since the Church is represented as a single family made up of many children, the corresponding relation of the three missionaries to the Church can be compared to that of a nurse and again to that of a father, 1 Thess. ii. 7, 11; but in this very passage we are reminded by ὡς Χριστοῦ ἀπόστολοι, ii. 7, that it is more than one person whose attitude is described. That this title (ἀπόστολοι) was applicable also to Silas and Timothy is unquestionable, see p. 107, n. 3. Moreover, it accords with the nature of such descriptions of the attitude of a number of persons, that not every individual statement is equally applicable to them all. It is of no consequence, therefore, that we do not know whether Timothy and Silas shared Paul's manual labour, or to what extent they did (1 Thess. ii. 9; 2 Thess. iii. 8). On the other hand, if one is speaking for others also, but is himself the principal person, it is still permissible to let his own "I" take the place now and then of the "we" (1 Thess. iii. 5, v. 27). Hofmann, NT, i. 205 ff., and Spitta, Z. Gesch. des Urchr. i. 115, 121, are hardly correct in inferring from 1 Thess. iii. 5 that, after Paul and Silas together had despatched Timothy from Athens to Thessalonica (iii. 2), Paul alone sent still another messenger thither. To explain the singular in iii. 5, it is assumed that in the meantime Silas also had left Paul; but to what place was this helper, who worked with Paul in Macedonia, in Athens, and afterward in and about Corinth, likely to have gone from Athens at this time? One could only conjecture a return to Macedonia, like Timothy's. In this case there would be a double sending in addition to the mission of Timothy

(iii. 2),—the sending of Silas, which is nowhere mentioned, and that of an unnamed person supposedly referred to in iii. 5. But how could Paul have been silent here regarding Silas' absence, even if the journey—no one knows in what direction—had been one of indifference to the Thessalonians? His absence would in any case have accentuated the painful sense of loneliness (iii. 1), and in that very fact would have been an accentuation of the feeling expressed in μηκέτι στέγων, iii. 1, 5, and consequently a motive for the despatch of still another messenger. And why should not Paul have named the messenger, whether it were Silas, which would be the easiest supposition, or some "quite subordinate person" (Spitta, 122)? As he was plainly careful to recount every expression of his anxious love for the Thessalonians since his departure from them, he would not only have mentioned Silas by name, if he were the messenger intended in iii. 5, but, in view of his prominence, would have referred to him at least as particularly as to Timothy (iii. 2). In the other event, however, the messenger could only have been the bearer of a letter, and the failure to mention the letter thus sent by him would be incomprehensible. The omission of the object of ἔπεμψα, iii. 5, has no justification, unless it is to be supplied from iii. 1 f. (to which the repetition of μηκέτι στέγων points every reader), and both places refer to the same occurrence; cf. 2 Cor. ix. 3 and viii. 18, 22. Otherwise a πάλιν could hardly be omitted (Gal. i. 9), and Paul would have marked the contrast with the unemphatic "we" of iii. 1 f., not with καγώ, but with ἐγὼ Παῦλος (1 Thess. ii. 18; Col. i. 23, as opposed to the plural, Col. i. 1-9, cf. 2 Cor. x. 1; Gal. v. 2; Philem. 19). καγώ finds its natural explanation in a contrast with the persons addressed (cf. Phil. ii. 19, 28; Eph. i. 15). Paul, as is said plainly enough in iii. 2 f., was greatly troubled for fear that the Church in its distressed condition might not hold out longer without the personal encouragement of its founders, and for that very reason (iii. 5, διὰ τοῦτο) he himself could not endure it longer, and, as remarked, sent Timothy to Thessalonica, in order not only to guard the Church from the shaking of its faith, and of its confidence in its organisers (iii. 2 f.), but also to obtain for his own part the satisfying assurance that the Church had not succumbed to its temptations. This also opposed to view of Wohlenberg, ZKom. 1 & 2 Thess. 73.

4. (P. 203.) Tafel, De Thess. eiusque Agro Dissertatio Geographica, Berlin, 1839, in which the writer's earlier program, Historia Thessalonica, Tübingen, 1835, is incorporated; Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, pp. 253-269. Formerly Θέρμη (Herod. vii. 123-128; Thuc. i. 61), or Θέρμα (Æschines, De Falsa Legatione, 31. 36), rebuilt by Cassander about 315 B.C., and named Θεσσαλονίκη, for his wife (also Θεσσαλονίκη, Strabo, pp. 106, 330, Fragg. 21), after the battle of Philippi civitas libera (Pliny, H. N. iv. 10. 36; for the coinage cf. Tafel, p. xxix), hence βουλὴ καὶ δῆμος (Le Bas, Inscr. 1359) and προάγειν εἰς τὸν δῆμον, Acts xvii. 5, cf. xix. 30, 33, residence of the governor of the province of Macedonia, which after 44 A.D. was again separated from Achaia and administered as a senatorial province by proprætors with the title of proconsul (Marquardt,² i. 319). The title πολιάρχαι, Acts xvii. 6, 8, though otherwise unknown in literature, is splendidly attested for just this part of Macedonia and especially for Thessalonica. The inscriptions bearing on the matter have been very fully collated and thoroughly discussed by

E. De Witt Burton, AJTh. 1898, vol. ii. 598-632. Of the seventeen inscriptions in which the term occurs, and two others in which it is restored conjecturally, five or six are from Thessalonica, seven or eight from other Macedonian cities, two from Philippopolis, one from Bithynia, one from Bosphorus, and one from Egypt (=nineteen in all). In addition, Oxyr. Papyri, iv. 225, No. 745, of about the year 1 A.D. Of the inscriptions from Thessalonica, one from the time of Augustus (Duchesne et Bayet, Mission au Mont Athos, 1876—separate reprint from Arch. des Miss. Sc., Ser. iii. vol. iii. p. 11, No. 1) names five politarchs; one of 143 A.D. (Le Bas, iii., No. 1359, cf. Burton, 605-608) and one not dated (C. I. Gr. 1967, cf. Addenda, p. 990=Le Bas, No. 1357; Burton, 600, 607) mention six. Another of the year 46, which mentions but two politarchs, probably belongs to Pella (Burton, 611-613). With regard to the population we have only general statements, Strabo, 323; Lucian, Assin. 46; Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 17. In the time of the first emperors it surely cannot have been less than at present. About 1835 it was estimated at 80,000; Leake, Travels in Northern Greece, iii. 248, considered 65,000 more exact. According to Th. Fischer in Kirchhof's Länderkunde von Europa, ii. 2. 180 (1893), estimates vary from 100,000 to 135,000, and the proportion of Jews is said to be nearly two-thirds. Cf. Meyer's guide-book, Türkei und Griechenland (1888), 357, "population 100,000; 60,000 Jews." The unusual reading, ἡ συναγωγή, Acts xvii. 1, would indicate that the Jews of the whole district, perhaps even those at Amphipolis and Apollonia, made the synagogue at Thessalonica their place of worship, and maintained their connection with it. According to NABD, however (omitting the article), it is merely stated that there was a Jewish synagogue at Thessalonica, as at Berea (xvii. 10), unlike Philippi (xvi. 13), Apollonia, and Amphipolis. But, aside from this, the prominence of the Jews at Thessalonica is clear from Acts xvii. 4-9, 13.

5. (P. 204.) Acts xvii. 2, ἐπὶ σάββατα τρία, cannot mean "on three Sabbaths," as one might infer from the deceptive analogy of Acts iii. 1, iv. 5; Luke x. 35, but "for three weeks," as Luke iv. 25; Acts xiii. 31, xvi. 18, xviii. 20, xix. 8, 10, 34, xxvii. 20. For σάββατον and σάββατα=week, cf. Luke xviii. 12, xxiv. 1; Acts xx. 7, and p. 19 above. If Paul's discourses were confined to the Sabbaths, as at the beginning in Corinth (Acts xviii. 4, cf. xiii. 42, 44), the statement would have had to be made more explicitly. Meetings were also held in the synagogue on Monday and Thursday, the usual fast-days (Schürer, ii. 458, 490 [Eng. trans. ii. ii. 83, 118]; Forsch. iii. 317). The synagogue was open at other times as well (Matt. vi. 2, 5), and served as a meeting-place for unusual gatherings (Jos. Vita, 54). Nothing is said here of any other hall to which Paul removed his lectures in consequence of the opposition of the Jews (contrast Acts xviii. 7, xix. 9); so we are not to suppose that his stay in Thessalonica was much extended beyond these three weeks. The first remittance of money from Philippi to Thessalonica (Phil. iv. 16) may have followed immediately upon Paul's enforced departure from the former city, and the second two weeks later.

6. (P. 204.) Acts xvii. 4. According to D (πολλοὶ τῶν σεβομένων καὶ Ἑλλήνων πλῆθος πολὺ καὶ γυναῖκες τῶν πρώτων οὐκ ὀλίγαι—a reading which, as regards the καὶ before Ἑλλ., is confirmed by A, Copt. Vulg.), the actual Gentiles, who visited the synagogue only in exceptional circumstances and without breaking with their heathen worship, would be distinguished from the σεβόμενοι (Acts xiii. 50, xvi. 14, xvii. 17, xviii. 7; cf. φοβούμενοι τὸν θεόν, Acts x. 2, 22, xiii. 16, 26), the Gentiles who, as "proselytes of the gate," regularly attached themselves to the Jewish worship. The common text, τῶν τε σεβομένων Ἑλλήνων, would be analogous to σεβομένων προσηλύτων, xiii. 43, without, however, being quite synonymous. In any case, it is clear that among the converts a small minority were Jews, and a large majority of Gentile birth. Even more, therefore, than in the case of the Galatians (above, p. 166), Paul was justified in regarding the Christians of Thessalonica as Gentile Christians; cf. 1 Thess. i. 9. We must, nevertheless, notice here that along with the contrast with former heathenism there appears also (i. 10) a contrast with Judaism. If Jason (Acts xvii. 5-9) is the same as the Jason of Rom. xvi. 21, which seems at once probable from the fact that Sosipater (= Sopater, Acts xx. 4), another Macedonian Christian, is there mentioned with him, he too was of Jewish birth (οἱ συγγενεῖς μου). According to Clement of Alexandria, he was identical with the Jason who represents Christianity over against the Jew Papisceus in the dialogue of Ariston of Pella (Forsch. iii. 74, iv. 309). Secundus and Aristarchus of Thessalonica were probably Gentiles (Acts xx. 4, xix. 29, xxvii. 2; Philem. 24; Col. iv. 10); for Col. iv. 11 refers only to Mark and Jesus Justus, not to Aristarchus; cf. § 27. The name Secundus (Acts xx. 4) is abundantly attested in Thessalonica (C. I. Gr. 1967, 1969; JHSt. 1887, p. 367, No. 10; Heuzey et Daumet, Macédoine, p. 280, No. 113, Σεκοῦνδα). The occurrence of the name Γάιος Ἰουδαῖος Σεκοῦνδος in Thessalonica (Duchesne et Bayet, Mission au mont Athos, p. 50, No. 78) gives ground for the conjecture that the Secundus of Acts xx. 4 may be identified with the Macedonian Gaius, who in Acts xix. 29 is similarly associated with Aristarchus, and that in distinction from (Gaius) Secundus of Thessalonica the other Gaius is designated as from Derbe (Col. A, ὁ Δερβαῖος). Origen's observation on Rom. xvi. 23 (Del. iv. 686): "Fertur sane traditione maiorum, quod hic Gaius (Rom. xvi. 23) primus episcopus fuerit Thessalonicensis ecclesiae," is probably an addition of the translator, Rufinus. It rests upon an arbitrary identification of Gaius, Rom. xvi. 23, with the Macedonian Gaius, Acts xix. 29, whereas Origen himself more correctly compares Rom. xvi. 23 and 1 Cor. i. 14. Demas also (2 Tim. iv. 10; Col. iv. 14; Philem. 24) was probably from Thessalonica. If Demas = Demetrius, we may note that the name Demetrius frequently occurs in Thessalonica: C. I. Gr. 1967 (bis); JHSt. 1887, p. 360, No. 2; E. D. Burton, op. cit. 608, No. iv. Demetrius the martyr (c. 304) became patron of the city; cf. Acta SS., Oct., iv. 50-209, and also Laurent in BZ, 1895, S. 420 ff. The continued existence of a Thessalonian Church is evidenced by the edict of Antoninus Pius of which Melito speaks (Eus. H. E. iv. 26. 10). A certain Paraskeue, who erected a monument to her daughter Phœbe (cf. Rom. xvi. 1) at Thessalonica in 156, was probably, to judge from her name, either Jewish or Christian; cf. Duchesne et Bayet, op. cit. 46, No. 65. Tertullian, Præscr. xxxvi, mentions Thessalonica among the cities in which, as he was convinced, the apostles' letters to the respective Churches were still read from the autograph originals, and their "cathedræ" were yet in use (IK, i. 652). A large stone pulpit (ἄμβων, βῆμα), half of which stands in the court of the Church of St. George and half in the court of St. Panteleemon's, is known to this day as

"St. Paul's pulpit," Bayet, op. cit. 249 ff.; in Leake, iii. 243; and Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, 269, other accounts which do not altogether agree. The work in question is of the early Byzantine period. The name στοὺς ἀποστόλους, at the site of the ancient Pella, might more readily embody a genuine reminiscence; that is, in case "the apostles" (1 Thess. ii. 6) went on from Thessalonica, not by the direct road to Berea, which runs through swampy country at the outset, but first by the Via Egnatia to Pella, whence a road branches off to Berea.

7. (P. 205.) The reading ἕως ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν, Acts xvii. 14 (cf. Luke xxiv. 50), cannot, of course, mean "they brought him clear to the sea" (Weiss, Textkrit. Unters. d. Apostelgesch. 210), for the sentence says nothing about "bringing," and those who accompanied Paul from Berea brought him rather as far as Athens (xvii. 15). We are probably to read ὡς with HLP. Luke might also have written ὡς ἐπὶ τῆς θαλάσσης (cf. Polyb. v. 70. 3 and 12, and Kühner-Gerth. i. 496), but it was not necessary if he really wrote ὡς. Still uncertain which way he should turn, or perhaps, too, with the idea of evading possible pursuers, Paul and his companions set out at first as if they meant to go directly to the coast and take ship somewhere in the neighbourhood of Methone. He went on by land, however, either to Dinium to take ship there, or all the way to Athens. The other recension, too, which gives us ἀπελθεῖν ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν, does not exclude the meaning which the insertion of ὡς expresses even more clearly; for even this says only that the Christians of Berea dismissed Paul and the companions they had provided for him (xvii. 15), with the intent and expectation that he would go to the coast. But ver. 15 shows that the decision as to the route, and even as to the destination, was reached not in Berea, but only after the travellers were on their way; for otherwise there would have been no need of new instructions to Timothy and Silas. This appears even more certainly from the original reading, παρήλθεν δὲ τὴν Θεσσαλίαν ἐκωλύθη γὰρ εἰς αὐτοὺς κηρύξαι τὸν λόγον; cf. xvi. 6, 7. Paul, then, originally intended to preach in Thessaly also, and undertook to do so (cf. xvi. 7), a thing he could not have thought of at all if he had gone from Berea to Methone, and thence by sea to Athens, without even approaching the Thessalian border. This word παρελθεῖν (not παραπλευσαι, xx. 16) seems rather to point to a land journey, which avoided the larger places of Thessaly, or in the course of which, at all events, there was no preaching in that region. The statement made by the bishop of Servia to the traveller Leake (iii. 330), as an undoubted fact, that Paul passed through there, is not altogether improbable. The adjustment of the account in Acts to that in 1 Thess. may be variously conceived. If Paul came alone from Athens to Corinth (Acts xviii. 1), and Silas and Timothy came together from Macedonia to Corinth (Acts xviii. 5; 2 Cor. xi. 9), then Paul must have left Silas behind at Athens, as previously at Berea, and Silas, waiting in vain for Timothy, may on his own motion have gone to Macedonia to meet him, and then, without having gone as far as Thessalonica himself, have proceeded with Timothy to Corinth. Even if Timothy had been alone in Macedonia, had returned from there to Athens and found Silas waiting, and then had gone on with him to Corinth, there would be no serious inaccuracy in Acts xviii. 5. In that case, what Timothy told to Silas in Athens and to Paul in Corinth would be summed up together in

1 Thess. iii. 6. Ephrem Syrus (according to an Armenian catena on Acts, Venice, 1839, p. 310; cf. Harris, Four Lectures on the Western Text, 25, 47) had a text of Acts xvii. 15 which made it possible for him to understand the words πρὸς αὐτὸν ἐξέειπεν (which in D form a line by themselves, and so are taken together) as referring to a journey made by Timothy and Silas to Athens.

§ 14. THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

The Epistle was written shortly after the arrival of Timothy and Silvanus in Corinth (iii. 6), under the stimulus of the good news which Timothy brought back from Macedonia. The principal occasion of the letter and its purpose we learn from its first division, which forms a complete unit, concluded by a solemn benediction (iii. 11–13). As indicated by the introductory λοιπὸν (iv. 1), the discussions which follow, and which are not very closely connected in thought, constitute a series of more incidental concluding remarks.

In the first division we have a review of the founding of the Church by the preaching of the writers (i. 2–ii. 16), and of everything which since their departure from Thessalonica had manifested their loving interest in the growth of the Church and in the continuance of its pleasant relations with its founders (ii. 17–iii. 5). In this review a prominent place is given to statements about the persecutions which the readers had endured at the beginning, and in the face of which they had since maintained their faith (n. 1). It was mainly this that made the missionaries solicitous and anxious to return to Thessalonica (ii. 17 f.), and which led, finally, to the sending of Timothy thither (iii. 2 f.). Now the tone which pervades these statements is not predominantly that of consolation and encouragement, but of apology. Of course it is for the sake of encouraging the readers that attention is called to the fact that their brave endurance of persecution has become an example to later converts in Macedonia and Achaia (i. 7); and this same purpose is in view when it is said that in so doing they have followed the example of the Christians in Judea (ii. 14), on which account the missionaries are proud of them, and filled with grateful joy at their conduct (ii. 19 f., i. 2 f.). In the same way the reminder that there is no reasonable hope of improvement in the situation (iii. 4), might be understood as an attempt to keep the readers from growing impatient. Taken, however, in connection with other statements, its purpose seems rather to be that of self-defence on the part of the writers. For example, in i. 5 f., practically at the beginning of the letter, they appeal in the same way to their readers' knowledge of the manner in which they had come among them, reminding them that, like the Lord Himself, they had furnished the readers an example of patience in enduring persecution. Especial attention is called (ii. 2) to the insulting treatment to which they had been subjected in Philippi, just before they came to Thessalonica, and to the feeling of anxiety with which they had to do their work even in Thessalonica (ἐν πολλῷ ἀγῶνι). So that, if subsequently the readers had to endure much at the hands of their fellow-citizens, they certainly ought not to forget that the Jews, with whom the chief responsibility for the unfortunate condition of affairs in Thessalonica rested, had first driven the missionaries themselves from Thessalonica, and had persecuted them to Berea (ii. 14-16, cf. p. 204, line 22). This same hostility on the part of the Jews to the preaching of the gospel among the Gentiles, which was prompted by their hatred, the missionaries were now encountering in Corinth, as is shown by the change to the present tense in ii. 15 f., in the light of which passage also iii. 7 is to be understood. As a further indication of the apologetic purpose of the Epistle, we have the statements about the preaching and general conduct of the missionaries in Thessalonica, which manifestly are made in the light of a different representation regarding that ministry

They did not preach with empty words (i. 5), they did not set forth mere human doctrine, but they preached the word of God and the gospel of Christ (ii. 2, 9, 13, iii. 2), and did it with the power, and confidence, and openness which that word inspires in its true preachers (i. 5, ii. 2). It is true that their preaching made certain demands of the hearers (ii. 3, ἡ παράκλησις ἡμῶν, cf. ii. 11), but they were not those of the deceiver who flatters his hearers in order that he may make himself personally acceptable to them. They were not actuated by ambition, nor by any other unworthy motive which might have led them to employ improper means; above everything else, they had not been covetous (ii. 3-6). With the utmost effort they had supported themselves by toiling with their own hands (ii. 9), and their entire conduct had shown their complete devotion to the work with which they had been intrusted by God, and proved their unselfish, even tender love for those who heard their preaching (ii. 7-12). God as well as the Church is witness to their blameless behaviour (ii. 10, 5, cf. i. 4).

Now the Thessalonian Christians to whom Paul makes this vigorous defence of himself and of his helpers, could not have been the accusers in the case. The feeling which the authors have concerning them is uniformly that of gratitude (i. 2); and one of the items of good news which Timothy had brought back a little while before, was the information that the Thessalonians held those who had laboured among them always in kindly remembrance, and were just as anxious to see Paul and Silvanus as the latter were to see them (iii. 6). On the other hand, there is not the slightest indication that these persons who were slandering Paul and opposing his gospel were Christians from abroad like those who had appeared in Galatia shortly before. The accusations, therefore, must have been made by the non-Christian neighbours of the Thessalonian Christians. The husbands of the women converts belonging to the upper classes, who remained heathen (Acts xvii. 4), and the relatives and former friends of the new converts generally, may have represented to them that they had been misled into a foolish superstition by self-seeking and covetous adventurers, and in consequence were compelled to encounter the ill-will of their neighbours with all the unpleasant things that this involved, while the men who had got them into this trouble had disappeared at the right time to avoid all such consequences. It is easy to see how the flight of the missionaries from Thessalonica, the placing of Jason and other Christians under bail (Acts xvii. 9), the sending of money from Philippi to Thessalonica (Phil. iv. 16), and the hostility to the Christians on the part of their fellow-citizens (1 Thess. ii. 14), might all be used to give colour to such a representation of matters. That this was actually the case is directly indicated in iii. 3; for the anxiety which led to the sending of Timothy was not caused so much by the fear that the faith of the Church might be shaken by persecution, as that individuals under the stress of persecution might be coaxed away, i.e. led to speak disparagingly of their own conversion (n. 2). This, of course, must result in the shaking of their faith; for if the organisers of the Church were deceivers, then the faith of the Thessalonians was vain. The tempter, who was threatening to destroy the apostle's entire work in Thessalonica (iii. 5), assumed not only the form of a roaring lion (1 Pet. v. 8), but also that of a fawning dog (Phil. iii. 2) and a hissing serpent (1 Cor. xi. 3). So also iii. 6 shows that until Timothy's return Paul and Silvanus were very anxious for fear lest the Church had lost confidence in its founders, and lest its love for them had grown cold. Perhaps it may seem strange that, after having been thus reassured by Timothy on these and other points,—indeed, after having had his feeling changed to one of joy,—Paul should now review the entire previous history of his relations to the Church so earnestly, in such detail, and withal in a manner so apologetic. But, in the first place, we know from experience that when one has been weighed down for months by some great care, how difficult it is to speak of it, particularly if it be a delicate matter; but once let the burden of anxiety be relieved, and there comes a very strong desire to give vent to one's pent-up feelings, and the recollections of the agony through which one has passed are apt to be mingled with expressions of joyful gratitude. In the second place, it was not until Timothy's return that Paul knew how much pressure was being brought to bear upon the Thessalonian Christians, and how seriously he was being slandered by their neighbours, so that up to this time he had not been in a position to set the facts in a clear light with definite reference to such slanders. In the third place, the grateful joy and the profound satisfaction for the present condition of the Church, so strongly expressed in iii. 6 f. (i. 2, ii. 19 f.), do not imply that there was nothing more to be desired. The desire to return to Thessalonica, which from the first had been prompted by a feeling of solicitude for the Church, was just as strong as ever (iii. 10, 11, cf. iii. 6). There were still defects in their faith which Paul felt could not be remedied except by his personal presence (iii. 10). In the second division of the letter there are references to moral deficiencies which from the coldly scholastic point of view may seem inconsistent with the expressions of exuberant joy which we find in the first division (i. 2, ii. 19 f., iii. 6, 9). But even in this first division the steadfastness of the Church, which is the occasion of the apostle's rejoicing, seems to be in need of fuller demonstration in the future (iii. 8), and, as indicated by the elliptical καθάπερ καὶ ἡμεῖς εἰς ὑμᾶς (iii. 12, cf. iii. 6), the desire expressed that the Lord may make the Christians in Thessalonica abound yet more in love toward one another and toward all men, has some reference to the relation between the Church and its founders. The Church had proved itself much more steadfast than Paul had dared to hope while he was waiting for news, though the whispering of their neighbours had not left them entirely unaffected; Timothy had discovered more than one shadow. It was not yet possible for Paul to say definitely when he could return to Thessalonica, as the Church and as he himself desired (iii. 6, 10 f.). In the meantime, how much could happen in Thessalonica! In fact, was it not possible that this continued absence of the person who had been chiefly instrumental in organising the Church might be the very thing calculated to arouse further suspicions? In view of all this, it is entirely comprehensible that along with the exalted expressions of joy in i. 2-iii. 13 there should appear signs not only of the anxiety of the past months just relieved, but also of solicitation for the future welfare of the Church. The perfectly spontaneous expression of this mingled feeling of joy and of anxiety was one of the best means for strengthening any good tendencies in the Church and for averting future danger. Certain specific defects in religious thought and moral conduct about which he had been informed by Timothy, Paul attempts to remedy by the suggestions of chaps. iv., v. While on the whole their conduct is recognised as altogether praiseworthy (iv. 1, 9 f., v. 11), there are a number of points in which he urges progress, referring the readers repeatedly to the instructions he had given them at the very first (iv. 1, 2, 6, 11). Warning against unchastity, which was so common among their heathen neighbours (iv. 3-5), is followed immediately by a similar warning against covetousness and dishonesty in business, to which persons living in a great commercial centre were particularly apt to be tempted (iv. 6). The commendation of their generous brotherly love prepares the way for an exhortation to improve their condition in money matters, by living a quiet, thrifty life, which will not only enable them to give more liberally (Eph. iv. 28), but which will also make them more independent of their non-Christian neighbours (iv. 9-12).

Now, inasmuch as the idleness against which these exhortations are directed is a manifestation of a general state of unrest (iv. 11, cf. 2 Thess. iii. 11 f.), and inasmuch as this warning is followed immediately by eschatological teachings (iv. 13-v. 11), we assume that under the influence of the idea that the end of the world was at hand many were neglecting their daily duties (n. 3). Another evidence of the expectancy with which the return of Jesus was awaited, is seen in the peculiar way in which the Church mourned for its departed members. This was due to the opinion that those who had died before the parousia would not immediately share the glory of the kingdom as would those who lived to witness the Lord's return. Although, the apostle argues, they should have been saved from this error by their faith in the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, because it was not possible that death should separate the Christian from Christ (iv. 14), all anxiety concerning the participation in the parousia of those who have died in the faith he sets at rest by a word of the Lord, i.e. a specific teaching consciously based upon one of Jesus' prophetic utterances (iv. 15, n. 4). In this definite form such teaching could not have been a part of the missionary preaching. While on this point Paul is inclined to enlarge upon what he had said before, another question which was occupying attention in Thessalonica, namely, as to when the end should come, and the length of time that must elapse before that event, he holds to be superfluous (v. 1, cf. Acts i. 6 f.) and without practical value. For, he argues, it is one of the simplest elements of the Christian preaching, that for those absorbed in a worldly life the coming of the day of the Lord will be unexpected and sudden; while, on the other hand, the Christian, who lives in constant expectation of the parousia, the time of which it was impossible to determine by natural reckoning, will be always ready, living always the kind of a life that is in keeping with this future day of the Lord (v. 2-10). With the exhortation to mutual helpfulness in regard to this matter of the parousia (v. 11), we have the transition to exhortations relating to the general life of the Church, for which its officers are primarily responsible (v. 12 f.). There seems to have been some insubordination, especially on the part of those inclined to be idle (v. 14, τοὺς ἀτάκτους, cf. iv. 8). That there was not complete harmony among all the members, seems to be implied by Paul's injunction that all the brethren salute one another, and with a fraternal kiss, and by his solemn command in the name of the Lord that the letter be read to all the brethren (v. 26, 27).

1. (P. 215.) It is wrong to assume (as does Klöpper, for example, in Der Zweite Thess.-brief 14, 15) that the θλίψεις spoken of in 1 Thess. belong simply to the past, and, specifically, to the time of the founding of the Church, and that a new outbreak of the once ended persecution constitutes the background of 2 Thess. The emphasis upon the sufferings endured at the first acceptance of the gospel (i. 6, ii. 13 f.) was a necessary consequence of the fact that just these beginnings of the Church demanded an apologetic interpretation. That the oppressed condition of the Church still continued after the departure of the missionaries and at the time Timothy was sent, appears from the connection of ii. 17 f. with what precedes and from iii. 3. An improvement in this condition would hardly have been passed over in silence among the good tidings which Timothy brought (iii. 6), nor would the receipt of news of renewed persecution have been similarly ignored in 2 Thess. The way in which the ἐπομοιή of the Church is recalled, 1 Thess. i. 3, the occurrence of the present ἐνεργεῖται, ii. 13, among the aorists both before and after, the ταύταις in iii. 3, the summing up of all the trials of the Church hitherto in the present αἵ ἀνέχεσθε and πάσχετε, 2 Thess. i. 4 f.,—all this shows, rather, that the outward circumstances of the Church from its organisation to the sending of the second Epistle were essentially unchanged. From the altered tone in which they are spoken of in 2 Thess. i. 3-12, we can only, perhaps, infer that they were growing worse from day to day.

2. (P. 218.) If the reading μηδένα σάλευσθαι is beyond question in iii. 3, there is also no occasion to abandon the oldest meaning of the word σάλευαι, in current use from Homer's time down to the empire, namely, "to wag the tail (of dogs)," with accusative of the person. The fawning upon one, thus indi-eated, is often in contrast with barking and biting. For this usage, as well as for the transference of it to human beings as subjects, cf. especially Polyb. xvi. 24. 6; Artemid. Oneirocr. ii. 11; Hercher, p. 99. 12-20. It also means "to move," "to cause to yield," but not "to frighten" or "startle," but rather "to entice to sin" (Leont. Neapol. Vita Sym. Sali, Migne, 93, col. 1724). The better Greek commentators (Chrys., Montfaucou, xi. 445; Sever. Gabal. in Cramer, Cat. vi. 353; Theodorus, ed. Swete, ii. 17) all felt the necessity of explaining the word, which seemed strange to them here, but they missed the simple solution because they did not understand the historical situation indicated in chap. ii. What is meant is illustrated to some degree by passages like Acta Theclæ, x; Mart. Polyc. ix; Passio Perpet. v; Acta Carpi, 43, except that in these instances we are dealing with more or less genuine expressions of natural sympathy, whereas σαίναν denotes insidious and crafty wheedling. Artemidorus, loc. cit., explains: ἀλλότριοι δὲ κύνες σαίνοντες μὲν δόλους καὶ ἐνέδρας ὑπὸ πονηρῶν ἀνδρῶν ἢ γυναικῶν σημαίνουσιν.

3. (P. 221.) Hofmann, i. 230 f., rightly warns against exaggerations of this matter of indolence. Spitta, Zur Gesch. des Urchr. i. 131 f., exaggerating this in turn, rejects the explanation altogether, and infers from the connection of iv. 11 f. with what precedes, that "fraternal fellowship, where those who had property gladly shared of their means with those who had none, became to not a few a temptation to an indolent, unoccupied life." Such a remark, however, could not have been connected with the last preceding admonition by καί, but would have been introduced in sharp antithesis to it: "Abound still more in active brotherly love, but not so as to foster thereby the lazy man's aversion to labour"; or, "on the other hand, everyone who can work must do his part, so as not to become a burden on the generosity of the brethren." Certainly we must not conceive a fanatically excited expectation of the approaching end of the world as the prevailing temper of the whole local Church. The admonitions, iv. 3-7, v. 4-10, point to the existence of a very different attitude toward the present world. Paul even has to warn them against despising prophesyings and suppressing the prophetic spirit which stirs within the Church (v. 19 f.). But in immediate proximity there is also the caution not to accept such prophetic utterances without examination (v. 21).

4. (P. 221.) 1 Thess. iv. 15, ἐν λόγῳ κυρίου, is to be understood, as regards the significance of λέγειν or λαλεῖν ἔν τινι, in accordance with 1 Cor. ii. 7, xiv. 6; Matt. xiii. 34; and for content, in accordance with 1 Cor. vii. 10, 12, 25, ix. 14, xi. 23. The teaching thus introduced need not, therefore, be a verbal citation. If ὅτι in iv. 15 is a "because," as it probably is, the prophecy ascribed to the Lord does not come till iv. 16. And if this saying goes beyond the words of Jesus handed down to us in the Gospels, we recall that in other particulars also, Paul's information was not confined within those limits (Acts xx. 35; 1 Cor. xv. 5-7). We need not do more than mention the fact that Steck, ThPTh. 1883, S. 509-524, claimed to find the λόγος κυρίου in what the angel Uriel says to Ezra (4 Esdr. iv. 1, v. 42) in answer to his question regarding the fate of those that do not live to see the end: "Coronæ assimilabo iudicium meum; sicut non novissimorum tarditas, sic nec priorum velocitas." If we bring the eschatological statements of 1 Thess. together, we shall find their essential elements, and in part their phraseology, reappearing in the Gospels and Acts. With v. 1 cf. Acts i. 7 (χρόνοι καὶ καιροί) ; Matt. xxiv. 36 ; Mark xiii. 32. With v. 2 cf. ὡς κλέπτῃς ἐν νυκτί, Matt. xxiv. 43 ; Luke xii. 39 f. ; and for the expression in v. 4 cf. John xii. 35 also. With the description of false security before the parousia and the surprise of it to most, v. 3, cf. Matt. xxiv. 37–51 ; Luke xvii. 26–36. With αἰφνίδιος . . . ἐκφύγωσιν, cf. Luke xxi. 34–36, ἐπιστῇ ἐφ’ ὑμᾶς αἰφνίδιος . . . ἐκφυγεῖν ταῦτα πάντα. With ἡ ὥδιν cf. Matt. xxiv. 8, 19 ; Mark xiii. 8, 17. With the figurative representation of readiness and its opposite, v. 6 f., cf. Matt. xxiv. 42, 49 (μετὰ τῶν μεθυόντων), xxv. 13 ; Mark xiii. 33–37 ; Luke xii. 35, 37, 45 (μεθύσκεσθαι), xxi. 34, 36. With iv. 14–17 cf. the return of the Lord from heaven, or in the clouds of heaven, and in the company of the angels, Matt. xvi. 27, xxiv. 30, xxvi. 64 ; Mark viii. 38, xiii. 26, xiv. 62 ; Luke ix. 26, xxi. 27 ; Acts i. 11 ; the gathering of the elect by angels with the loud sound of the trumpet, Matt. xxiv. 31 ; Mark xiii. 27 (ἐπισυνάξει, cf. 1 Thess. iv. 17 ; 2 Thess. ii. 1 [τῆς] ἡμῶν ἐπισυναγωγῆς ἐπ’ αὐτόν). This is the presupposition also of 1 Thess. iv. 14 (ἄξει σὺν αὐτῷ). Matt. xxiv. 31 ; Mark xiii. 27 refer to those members of the Church who at the time of the parousia are living scattered about upon earth (cf. Matt. xxiv. 22, 24 ; Mark xiii. 20, 22). That the departed members, also, would share in the glory of the kingdom as it should then be realised, is not, indeed, handed down to us in the immediate context of these eschatological discourses, but is elsewhere abundantly attested as Jesus’ promise. When He intimated that some of His disciples would witness His return (Matt. xvi. 28 ; Mark ix. 1 ; Luke ix. 27), it was also implied that others of them would die before that time (cf. also Matt. xx. 23 ; Mark x. 39 ; John xiii. 36, xxi. 18 f.). But all are to share in the kingdom which appears in glory (Matt. xxvi. 29 ; Mark xiv. 25 ; Luke xxii. 30),—all who have not despised its invitation, or by their conduct subsequently become unworthy of it (Matt. xxii. 9–14 ; Luke xiv. 12–24 ; John xii. 26), and the O.T. righteous as well (Matt. viii. 11 ; Luke xiii. 28). That the dead must be awakened at the end is self-evident, and is shown in many ways (Matt. xxii. 23–32 ; Mark xii. 18–27 ; Luke xx. 27–38 ; John v. 25–29, vi. 39, 40, 44, 54, xi. 24). Only, if the resurrection of the righteous dead is generally set at the end of time, without being put, like the gathering of the living on earth, in a closer connection with the parousia, it must still be conceived as simultaneous with the parousia, since it is the condition of participation in the kingdom. Of the distinction in time between the resurrection of believers and the general resurrection, which is attested in apostolic literature as a general Christian belief (1 Cor. xv. 23–28 ; Rev. xx. 4–6), and which appears also in 1 Thess. iv. 16, we have at least a hint in Luke xiv. 14.

§ 15. THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

This briefer letter, which, like the longer one that stands just before it in the Canon, is addressed to the Church in Thessalonica not in Paul’s name alone, but in the name also of Silvanus and Timothy (n. 1), shows striking resemblance to the other in its general plan. Here, as in the first letter, there is one principal section (chaps. i., ii.) concluding with a solemn benediction (ii. 16 f.). To this is attached a shorter section, which, as indicated by the introductory τὸ λοιπὸν (iii. 1, cf. I. iv. 1), is made up of a series of more incidental remarks. In this case the letter does not begin with a joyful expression of thanks for the Church, but with the assurance that the writers feel under obligation at all times to render such thanks to God, even at times when, if they followed their inclinations, they might express other emotions (i. 3). How indicative this is of the situation of the writers when they wrote, and of their feelings at the time, is shown by the recurrence of the phrase at the end of the first section, ii. 13. For the attentive reader the impression made by this expression is still further strengthened by the explanatory statement (i. 3, καθὼς ἄξιόν ἐστιν) that such constant thanksgiving on the part of the writers is only appropriate in view of the growth of the Church in faith and love, especially in view of the patience they had shown in all their persecutions and afflictions. About this patience the writers do not need to be informed by others; but, having themselves been the founders of the Church, they take occasion of their own accord, in their intercourse with other Churches, to point with joyful pride to this Church (i. 4). This patience, which the readers have shown in enduring such constant sufferings, ought to be a source of comfort also to themselves, inasmuch as it is at once the token and the warrant that as believers they shall have part in the glory of the kingdom of God at the righteous judgment to be established at the return of Christ, when their persecutors shall be given over to eternal destruction (i. 5-10). That the readers may be made more and more ready for the decision of that great day, is the constant prayer of the founders of the Church (i. 11, 12).

With these verses we have the transition to the teachings of chap. ii., for the development of which the letter seems mainly to have been written. The Church needed to be warned against the error of supposing that the day of the Lord had already come or appeared. The disturbance which existed in the Church was due partly to prophetic utterances by its own members, partly to oral and written statements in which this opinion had been falsely represented as that of Paul and his helpers (ii. 2, n. 2). Further deceptions in the same direction were to be feared (ii. 3). This error Paul meets not by proclaiming a new revelation, but by reminding his readers of the things they had heard him say when he first preached the gospel to them,—things which, therefore, they ought not only to know, but also to use as a means of defence against such a misleading claim as this (ii. 5, 6, n. 3). This explains why, in what is said later about the forms which the unfolding of the closing events of the present age is to assume, as also about the parousia of Christ and the union of Christians with Him, the definite article is used (ii. 1, cf. I. iv. 14–18), it being assumed that these terms were familiar to the readers. “The Day of the Lord,” Paul argues, cannot have come already; for, according to what he had said earlier, it could not come before “the falling away” and the revelation of “the man of lawlessness,” whom Christ is to destroy at His second coming. Similarly, the readers must have known what the power was which for the present was restraining the “man of lawlessness,” which power had to be set aside before the “man of lawlessness” could appear. Although Paul does not use these particular words, this “man of lawlessness” is described, on the one hand, as an ἀντίθεος whose hostility to all that is called God, and to the worship of God, will reach the point where he will declare himself to be God and take his place in the temple of God, i.e. in the place where the true God is worshipped, demanding such worship for himself (ver. 4). He is described, on the other hand, as ἀντίχριστος. That this man of lawlessness was to be a Satanic caricature of Christ, one infers from the occurrence three times of the word ἀποκαλυφθῆναι (vv. 3, 6, 8), from the description of his coming as a παρουσία (ver. 9), and from the contrast between his deceiving and destroying activity, which is to be promoted by Satanic wonders, and the saving power of the gospel (vv. 9–14). Very essential elements in this picture, which is so clearly outlined, are to be found in the prophecies of the Book of Daniel, in the descriptions in 1 Maccabees of the attack made by Antiochus Epiphanes upon the religion of the Jews and upon their temple, and in the prophetic discourses of Jesus (n. 4). But these sources could hardly have supplied those teachings about the end of the world which, as we have seen, Paul presented in essentially the same form as that in which they are written here, when he first preached the gospel in Thessalonica. Still less can we suppose that this Christian statement of the doctrine which goes back through the prophecy and life of Jesus to Daniel, first appeared essentially as we have it here in some Jewish apocalypse now lost, which Paul had read and believed (n. 5). Only single features of the same could have been derived from such a source. The combination of these various elements, some of which may be found here and there in earlier sources, into a new and vivid picture, and the confidence with which the whole is presented, are quite incomprehensible—all the more so if it is Paul who is speaking—unless it be assumed that what was found in the sources mentioned had been further developed by Christian prophecy, and that Paul, who entertained a high opinion of such prophecy, made use of it, and, after testing it, adopted such parts of it into his preaching as seemed to him to be of value (cf. 1 Thess. v. 21, n. 6). In order, therefore, to comprehend Paul's words historically, and so to understand them clearly, we need to know what was spoken in the Churches by Silvanus, the prophet who accompanied Paul on his journeys, and what generally was said by Christian prophets in the Churches during the reign of the emperor Caligula (37–41) and Claudius (41–54). For to this source is to be traced back Paul's firm conviction that the last potentate hostile to God was not only to desecrate the temple of God, but also to establish himself there as the one to be worshipped. Events which took place under Caligula, in whose reign the prophet Agabus from Judea predicted in the Church at Antioch the coming of a general famine, which occurred in the reign of Claudius (§ 11), led almost inevitably to the development of prophecy of this kind (n. 7). Moreover, Jesus had spoken repeatedly of ψευδόχριστοι, although, so far as we know, He kept these predictions distinct from His prophecies about the final affliction to result from the desecration of the holy place, so that nothing was more natural than that the Church should expect the appearance of a single false Christ, and that it should identify this false Christ with a world-ruler hostile to God, who was to desecrate the holy place, and bring the final affliction upon the Church (n. 8). So then, in a word, when Paul describes the ἀντίθεος as being also ἀντίχριστος, this identification is not to be regarded as simply Paul's own opinion, but in the light of 1 John ii. 18, iv. 3 is to be taken as the common belief of the Church; for, in using the name ἀντίχριστος, which occurs here for the first time in the N.T., and only here, John means to describe an individual who was to appear in the future, not only hostile to the true Christ, but also His rival, whose appearance was to mark the beginning of the end of the world. But just as John, speaking with this general expectation of the Church in view, makes mention of a spirit of antichrist which is already at work in the world, which expresses itself through men, and of the numerous forerunners of the antichrist who may also be called antichrists (1 John iv. 3, ii. 18–22;

2 John 7), so Paul speaks of a mystery of lawlessness at work prior to the revelation or appearance of the man of lawlessness (ii. 7). In this way he justifies and explains his statement about the power which as yet restrains the revelation and appearance of the "man of lawlessness." The expression κατέχειν would be inappropriate if the object restrained were simply the lawless person who was to appear in the future, and not rather the principle which this person was eventually to embody, as it already existed and was at work in the world in its impersonal form. While the idea in κατέχον and κατέχων is not without parallel in Daniel (n. 9), here it is so definitely represented as something which was known, consequently as one of the elementary things taught in the early Christian Church, that we must assume that this, too, was a thought that had been developed by the Christian prophets of the time. While the man of lawlessness is described throughout as a person, being only once referred back to the impersonal principle of which eventually he was to become the embodiment, the restraining power is designated first by a neuter form and then by a masculine, both, however, being used to describe an existing thing. The restraining power is an impersonal something, which nevertheless has complete embodiment in personal form. From the contrast with ἀνομία, which is used three times to characterise the "antichrist" (vv. 3, 7, 8), it is clear that this restraining power was the system of laws then in operation in the world, which for the present was repressing the powers of lawlessness that had already begun to work, and was keeping them from manifesting themselves with full force, thus preventing the revelation of the mystery, the appearance of lawlessness in personal form, i.e., the restraining power is the Roman empire. For its system of laws, which, in spite of the unrighteousness and unprincipled character of individual representatives, was magnificent, its strict administration of justice and its broad tolerance made the empire a τὸ κατέχων, and the emperor a ὁ κατέχων (n. 9). If this was really Paul's view, it is a grave error to suppose that ὁ κατέχων is meant to designate a particular emperor, i.e. the reigning emperor, and if the Epistle was written prior to 54, the emperor Claudius; because the setting aside of the κατέχων is the necessary precondition of the revelation of the man of lawlessness only in so far as that involves at the same time the setting aside of the κατέχων. There is no evidence, however, that Paul nor anyone else prominent in the early Church associated the breaking up of the empire and of the entire system of Roman government with the death or deposition of any reigning emperor. And this belief is less probable in view of the fact that neither the personal character nor the government of any of the emperors from Tiberius to Domitian was such as to render them the particular champions of that which made for moral order in the State (n. 10).

The description which follows of the deceiving and destructive influence of the man of lawlessness upon unbelievers (ii. 9-12), determines the manner in which the writers, passing now to the conclusion of the letter, mention again, as they had done in i. 3, the duty which they feel of giving thanks for the condition of the Church, for the grace shown it in the past, and for its hopeful future (ii. 13, 14). This is followed immediately by an exhortation to hold fast the teachings and advice which had been given them by oral instruction and by letter, and by a benediction (ii. 15-17). Here the Epistle might have been concluded, but some supplementary matter is added. On account of the opposition which the writers were encountering at the time from the unbelievers in the place where they were working, more prominence is given in this Epistle (but cf. I. v. 25) to the request for the prayers of the Church, and they are asked for with more feeling (iii. 1, 2). This request replaces for the time being some command which had been given them earlier, and which apparently he was on the point of mentioning in ii. 15. This renders necessary the transition in iii. 4, 5, which would have been unnecessary directly after ii. 15-17. In spite of the opposite example and the express advice of the missionaries, the disposition to unruly idleness (I. iv. 11, v. 14) had developed in the case of many members of the Church into a condition of chronic disorderliness (iii. 6-11). While these individuals are earnestly urged to resume their ordinary occupations (iii. 12), at the same time the Church is advised to mark those who disregard this exhortation of the letter and to break off intercourse with them until they reform, but not to give up the hope of helping them (iii. 14, 15, cf. iii. 6). The special attention which Paul calls in this letter to the fact that he had added the concluding benediction by his own hand, and his affirmation in this connection that the benediction by his own hand was the sign by which the genuineness of every one of his letters might be determined (iii. 17 f.), are explained by the facts hinted at in ii. 2 (n. 2).

Assuming that both the Epistles to the Thessalonians are genuine, there is no doubt (n. 11) that the shorter of the two was written last. In I. i. 2 ff. he gives thanks for the founding of the Church; in II. i. 3 ff. for the entirely gratifying character of its growth. Since there is no indication in 2 Thess. of any intention, nor even of any longing, on Paul's part, to return to Thessalonica, the letter could not have been written in the interval between the flight of the missionaries from Thessalonica and the sending of Timothy back from Athens, nor immediately after the arrival of Timothy in Corinth. The latter date is impossible, because 1 Thess. was written at that time (I. iii. 6); the former, because a letter with the contents and in the spirit of 2 Thess. written at practically the same time as 1 Thess. would prove all the touching expressions in the first letter, I. ii. 17–iii. 5, of desire to visit the Church again, to be insincere. Moreover, if 2 Thess. had been written first, Paul could hardly have failed to mention it in 1 Thess. as a strong proof of the interest which he and his helpers had in the welfare of the Church. Furthermore, the fact that this strong desire to revisit the Thessalonian Church continued, I. iii. 6–11, excludes the possibility of 2 Thess., in which there is no evidence of any such desire, having been written at an interval of only a few weeks from 1 Thess. There was an interval of several months between them. And during this time there seems to have been no direct intercourse, either in person or by letter, between the Church and its founders. II. iii. 14 has reference to I. iv. 11 f., and the more indefinite reference of II. ii. 15 to instructions by letter is based on 1 Thess. (n. 12). Still less probable is it that in the interval Paul or one of his helpers had visited Thessalonica. In ii. 5, iii. 10, Paul speaks of the occasion when he had been with them, but without distinguishing different times when he had been there. Developments had also taken place in the Church which required time. Nothing is said of the slanders which he had found it necessary to refute in 1 Thess., nor is there any reference to the necessity of confirming the confidence of the Church in its founders. There had been time for information, not from Paul, to be sure, but from the vicinity where he was, to reach Thessalonica by letter, and for the news of the injurious effect of these communications to come back to Paul (II. ii. 2, above, p. 226 and n. 2). Furthermore, from some source unknown to us, he had received more recent news concerning the condition of the Church (II. iii. 11). A number of Churches seem already to have been organised in and about Corinth (cf. 2 Cor. i. 1; Rom. xvi. 1), among which it was possible for Paul and for Silvanus and Timothy to spread the good reports about the Church in Thessalonica (II. i. 4). What is suggested with regard to the opposition which was rendering the work in Corinth difficult and hindering its progress (II. iii. 2), is confirmed by Acts xviii. 6–17, in that this opposition is represented as emanating from persons who, having been offered the choice between faith and unbelief, had refused to believe the gospel, and if the hints of 1 Thess. also be taken into account, from Jews (I. ii. 16, iii. 7, above, p. 216, line 31). But it is hardly likely that, after having been so decisively repulsed by the proconsul (Acts xviii. 14–17), the Jews could have interfered further with the growth of the Christian Church in Corinth. The exceptionally favoured situation of the Church, as regards its relation to the authorities, disclosed in the Corinthian letters, was a result of this favourable decision of Gallio; so that 2 Thess. must be dated before Acts xviii. 12. There is no hint of any immediate intention on Paul's part of changing his field of labour. When he went to Ephesus at the beginning of summer 54, after $1\frac{1}{2}$ years of work in Corinth (Acts xviii. 18), Silvanus and Timothy did not go with him,—indeed, they do not seem to have been in Corinth at the time. But when 2 Thess. was written they were still with him (i. 1). Without, of course, attempting to speak with absolute certainty or with perfect accuracy, we shall be in agreement with all the statements and hints of the letters, and with the accounts in Acts, if we distribute the three oldest Epistles of Paul in the period of his residence in Corinth (Acts xviii. 11, approximately from Nov. 52 to May 54) as follows: Gal. somewhere about April 53, 1 Thess. in May or June, 2 Thess. in August or September of the same year.

1. (P. 225.) “I,” designating Paul, is distinguished three times in 1 Thess. from “We,” ii. 18, iii. 5, v. 27. In only one of these cases is the “I” further explained by the addition of the name, ii. 18. The same distinction occurs in 2 Thess., once without, ii. 5, once with the name, iii. 17. While in I. ii. 18, II. iii. 17 the addition of the name is natural because of the character of the statements made, in the three other passages it is assumed that the simple "I" is sufficient to designate Paul, who is named first in both the greetings, and whose importance is far greater than that of his two helpers. Spitta's hypothesis (122 ff.) that Timothy is meant by "I" in II. ii. 5 is untenable, for the reason that this is the only case where "I," which occurs five times altogether,—three times where the proper name is omitted because superfluous,—is made to refer to Timothy. The unnaturalness of the hypothesis is not lessened by assuming that the contents of ii. 5 may have given a clue as to which one of the three writers of the letter it was who thus suddenly spoke in his own name. In that case there was all the more reason why the youngest of them should have added ἐγὼ Τιμόθεος, and if, at the same time, he was acting as Paul's amanuensis, ὁ γράφας τὴν ἐπιστολὴν (Rom. xvi. 22), if he did not want the readers to think that Paul was speaking—or Silvanus, if what was said did not sound like the apostle—until they finally convinced themselves that the youngest of the three missionaries was so stupid as, without previous notice and as a matter of course, to introduce himself in such a way as to make him appear the principal one of the three! Spitta is not justified in supporting this hypothesis (125) by claiming that the readers would distinguish the hand of Timothy, who wrote the letter, from that of Paul in iii. 17 f., because, when this letter was written, Paul was already in the habit of dictating, adding only a farewell greeting in his own hand. Cf. above, p. 170. He does not say in iii. 17 that henceforth he will do this, but that it is his custom in every letter. So, if Paul dictated 1 Thess., and, as is quite likely, dictated it to Timothy, then, according to Spitta's theory, the reader must have concluded from the handwriting that "I" in I. iii. 5, as distinguished from "I" in I. v. 27, referred to Timothy, not to Paul. Similarly, the personal acquaintances of Tertius (Rom. xvi. 22) among the Roman Christians must have concluded from his writing that he was the person designated by "I" in Rom. i. 8–xvi. 21, and the real author of Romans. According to Spitta, Timothy was not only the amanuensis to whom Paul dictated 2 Thess., but the real author of the letter, which he himself composed at the direction of Paul and Silvanus. This, he thinks, enables us to explain its many variations from Paul's style and doctrine, which have caused the letter to be suspected, particularly the Jewish apocalyptic views which Paul did not hold. Without correcting the composition of his follower, or making him responsible for it, or even so much as hinting that Timothy had a large share in its preparation (cf. 1 Pet. v. 12, § 38), the apostle, who was very much preoccupied at the time, subscribed his name to this letter, which varied so much from his own writings both in style and contents, just as if it had been his own (iii. 17)! That was certainly the best way in the world to perpetuate the fraud referred to in ii. 2.

2. (Pp. 226, 231, 232.) If πνεῦμα, ii. 2, means the prophetic spirit uttering itself in human speech (I. v. 19 f.; Acts xiii. 2, 4, xx. 23, xxi. 4, 11; Rev. ii. 7), even then it is not alone διὰ λόγου that stands in contrast to διὰ πνεύματος, but the whole clause taken altogether, μήτε (I)* μηδὲ διὰ λόγου μήτε δι' ἐπιστολῆς ὥς δι' ἡμῶν, so that ὥς δι' ἡμῶν is to be taken with λόγου as well as with ἐπιστολῆς, like ἡμῶν in ii. 15. Oral as well as written reports had come to Thessalonica, which made it appear that Paul and his helpers shared these views. To us, who are not acquainted with the facts in the case, the language of the passage leaves it somewhat doubtful (1) whether actually false appeals to alleged statements of the apostle and to a letter forged in his name are meant; or (2) whether oral and written reports had reached Thessalonica from the region where Paul was, which, because they came from this region and without any fraudulent intention on the part of those who gave them out, gave rise to the erroneous opinion that the view which they represented had the authority of the apostle, or (3) whether actual written and oral statements of Paul were so misinterpreted. In the last mentioned case these statements would naturally be sought in 1 Thess., but this letter does not lend itself to such misinterpretation. It contains no language such as that found in Jas. v. 3, 5, 8, 9; 1 John ii. 18. Moreover, we should expect Paul to correct such misinterpretation (cf. 1 Cor. v. 9-11). Finally, on this view it is impossible to explain iii. 17 as due to what is said in ii. 2. The first of the three possible meanings mentioned explains best the connection between these two passages. But it is to be observed that there is no expression of anger at this insolent deceit. Furthermore, in this case we should expect to read not ὡς δὲ ἡμῶν, but ὡς ἡμετέρων or ὡς παρ' ἡμῶν (Cod. P., cf. Hippol. in Dan. iv. 21, ed. Bonwetsch, 236. 15, ὡς ἐξ ἡμῶν), or, if the reference were to a letter, ὡς ὑφ' ἡμῶν γραφείσης. Moreover, in this passage nothing is said about the origin of the oral and written statements in question, but all we have is a protest against the inference that they express the apostle's views. This agrees only with the second meaning suggested. Since, however, Paul saw that all sorts of such deceptions might develop in the future (ii. 3, κατὰ μηδένα τρόπον), he took occasion to call attention to the fact that only letters coming directly from him and specifically subscribed by his own hand could be regarded as expressions of his opinion (iii. 17). The rendering of ἐνέστηκεν, "is immediately at hand," or "is beginning" (so still Schniedel HK, ad loc.), should be abandoned, because unsupported both by grammar and by usage. As is well known, the present is called by the grammarians ὁ ἐνεστὼς χρόνος, and in business transactions ἡ ἐνεστώσα ἡμέρα was the regular name of "this day," e.g. Berl. äg. Urk. Nos. 394. 19; 415. 18, 30; 536. 6; 883. 3; 891 verso, line 15.

3. (P. 226.) The ἔτι, ii. 5, which does not occur in iii. 10, indicates nothing as to the length of time that had elapsed since the Thessalonians had been reminded of the things in question, cf. Luke xxiv. 6; Rom. v. 8; Heb. vii. 10. It is only intended to emphasise the fact that these teachings were not an afterthought, of which the readers were informed by a subsequent letter from the apostle, or by Timothy at the time when he was sent back to Thessalonica, but a part of the missionary preaching, and so an original part of the Christian message. That the Thessalonians missed entirely the point of these teachings, or immediately forgot them, is unlikely. When, therefore, notwithstanding this message, many had fallen into the error opposed in ii. 2, the natural supposition is that it had been represented to them that the man of lawlessness, who after the casting aside of all restraints was to set himself up as God, had already come, doubtless in the person of Caligula. But if the "anti-christ" made his appearance in Caligula (n. 7), then with Caligula's death (Jan. 24, 41) began "the Day of the Lord," which naturally was not thought of as a day of twelve or twenty-four hours' length, but as the epoch during which constantly—almost hourly—the visible return of Christ was to be expected.

If, now, Christian prophets declared Caligula to be the expected man of lawlessness; if Paul and his helpers saw in this figure of the recent past, whom all remembered, a foreshadowing of the antichrist, and pointed to it as a proof that the μυστήριον τῆς ἀνομίας was already working; and if, as was undoubtedly the case, the missionaries in Thessalonica spoke of the present as the end of the age, as is everywhere done in the N.T. (1 Cor. x. 11; Jas. v. 3, 5, 8, 9; 1 John ii. 18; 1 Pet. i. 20; Heb. i. 1; Acts ii. 16 ff.),—nothing is more natural than the rise of such errors and delusions as Paul here opposes. But there was no event corresponding to the prophesied falling away (below, nn. 4, 9). If, moreover, the readers really knew from the earlier teaching who and what the κατέχων and the κατέχον were, then they must understand that the power which is keeping back the full manifestation of the man of lawlessness is not yet set aside, but is still in active operation, so that the time characterised by the reign of this power (νῦν τὸ κατέχον, ver. 6; ὁ κατέχων ἄρτι, ver. 7) continues, and the time of the “antichrist” has not yet come. Finally, the detailed description of the activity of the lawless one, and, above all, the fact that Paul refers to the destruction of the same by the returning Christ, made it impossible to suppose that the antichrist was Caligula, or any other person who had lived and disappeared. There is no philological reason why νῦν, ii. 6, cannot be connected with κατέχον, cf. John iv. 18; νῦν ὃν ἔχεις, cf. 1 Cor. vii. 29; Xen. Cyrop. i. 4. 3, αὐτὸν τοὺς παρόντας; Hell. ii. 1. 4, ἀεὶ ὁ ἀκούων, especially numerous in designations of time, cf. Kühner-Gerth, i. 617; Winer, 561. 4; but also in numerous other cases, where, for the sake of stronger emphasis, objects and other modifiers precede the participle and its article (Epitaph. Avercii, i. 19, Forsch. v. 71, ταῦθ' ὁ νοῶν) or the conjunction which governs the sentence, cf. A. Buttmann, 333 (Eng. trans. 388). Even if we translate as if the reading were τὰ νῦν, “As for the present, ye know the power restraining,” the logical necessity of connecting νῦν with κατέχον still appears, (1) from the analogy of ὁ κατέχων ἄρτι in ii. 7; (2) from the contrast running through the entire context of the present (νῦν, ἡδη, ἄρτι), not to the past, when Paul was in Thessalonica, but to the future revelation of the man of lawlessness; and, finally, (3) from the fact that the νῦν gives no clear sense when taken with οἶδατε, from which, moreover, it is unnaturally separated.

4. (P. 227.) With ii. 1 (ἐπισυναγωγῆς) cf. Matt. xxiv. 31; Mark xiii. 27; 1 Thess. iv. 14, 17, above, p. 223 f. With ii. 2 cf. Matt. xxiv. 6; Mark xiii. 7 (μὴ θροεῖσθε); Luke xxi. 9. With ii. 3a cf. Matt. xxiv. 4, 23, 26; Mark xiii. 5, 21; Luke xxi. 8, xviii. 23. With ἡ ἀποστασία, which appears partly to precede the appearance of the “antichrist” (ver. 3), and partly to be the result of the same (vv. 9–11), cf. for the first aspect Dan. viii. 12, 23, xi. 30, 32; 1 Macc. i. 15 (ἀπέστησαν ἀπὸ διαθήκης ἁγίας); for the second, 1 Macc. i. 41–53, ii. 15 (οἱ καταναγκάζοντες τὴν ἀποστασίαν). Also for the first aspect, Matt. xxiv. 10–12, and for the second, Matt. xxiv. 21–24; Mark xiii. 19–21. With ὁ ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἀνομίας, ver. 3 (NB, cf. among other authorities also Just. Dial. xxxii; still τῆς ἀμαρτίας has strong support), and ὁ ἄνομος, ver. 8, cf. Dan. vii. 25 (ἀλλοιωῦσαι καιροὺς καὶ νόμον), xi. 37 f.; Matt. xxiv. 12; Diduche, xvi. 4; Barn. xv. 5. With ver. 4a (ὁ ἀντικείμενος—σέβασμα) cf. Dan. vii. 7, 11, 20, 25, xi. 36 (LXX ὑψωθήσεται ἐπὶ πάντα θεόν, καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν θεόν, τῶν θεῶν ἔξαλλα λαλήσει); 1 Macc. i. 24. No entire equivalent to ver. 4b is to be found in Dan. viii.

11-13, ix. 27, xi. 31, xii. 11; 1 Macc. i. 54-61, iv. 38, 43-45, vi. 7; 2 Macc. vi. 1-7; Matt. xxiv. 15, still less Isa. xiv. 13 f.; Ezek. xxviii. 2. In Mark xiii. 14, the only thing that would seem to indicate that the evangelist thought of the "desolating abomination" as a man who set up himself or his image in the holy place, is the grammatically abnormal reading ἐστηκότα (NBL), if indeed this reading be correct. The deification and self-deification of the monarch which reached a high point in Antiochus iv., the θεὸς ἐπιφανής (e.g. Jos. Ant. xii. 5. 5), did not come to the climax which is indicated in 2 Thess. ii. 4 until Caligula; cf. below, n. 7. With ver. 8 cf. Isa. xi. 4 (from which the expression is borrowed); Dan. vii. 11, 26, viii. 25, xi. 45. With ver. 9 cf. Dan. viii. 25; Matt. xxiv. 24; Mark xiii. 22. With ver. 11 cf. Isa. xix. 14; Jer. iv. 11 (especially if the apocryphal form of this verse which Hippol. de Antichr. 57 on Dan. iv. 49, quotes is ancient). In all these parallels it is to be remembered that Paul was not confined to the Sept. version of Daniel, much less to the translation of Daniel by Theodotian which was sometimes used in the Church instead of the LXX. Hence, e.g., he might well have translated נִשְׁבַּע Dan. viii. 12 (ix. 24) by ἀποστασία, and נִשְׁבַּע (viii. 23) by ἀποστάται.

5. (P. 227.) According to Spitta (139), Timothy, the alleged author of 2 Thess., here gives out as his own opinion what he learned from his source, which was a Jewish apocalypse of the time of Caligula, of which apocalypses Spitta has discovered no less than three (137 f., cf. also his Offenb. des Joh. 498). Such an apocalypse, he thinks, was among the "sacred writings," the contents of which Timothy under the direction of Eunice "piously absorbed" from his youth up (129, 139, cf. 2 Tim. i. 5, iii. 15). In this way he came to have eschatological views which Paul did not share (above, n. 1), although later in his life Paul directs him to those (τὰ) ἱερὰ γράμματα which were γραφὴν θεόπνευστος, points out that this is the right source from which Timothy is to draw instruction both for himself and others (2 Tim. iii. 15 f.); and, on the other hand, warns him against unholy and Jewish fables (1 Tim. i. 4, iv. 7; 2 Tim. iv. 4; cf. Tit. i. 14).

6. (P. 227.) Paul never claimed to be a prophet, although he could boast of having received revelations (2 Cor. xii. 1-4; Gal. i. 12-16, ii. 2), and did declare that he had other charismata (1 Cor. xiv. 18; 2 Cor. xii. 12; Rom. xv. 19). But from the very beginning of his ministry he had about him men who in their own circles were regarded as prophets (Acts xi. 27, xiii. 1, 2, 4, xx. 23, xxi. 9-11. Thus, both at the time when the letters to the Thessalonians were written and when the Church in Thessalonica was founded, he had with him the prophet Silas (above, p. 207, n. 1). That in their preaching there Paul and Silas emphasised strongly the kingship of Christ and hence the eschatological elements in the gospel, is attested by Acts xvii. 17. The fact that, so far as we know, none of the discourses of the Christian prophets was written down, does not prove that they had no influence upon the development of the beliefs of the Churches. How highly they were valued by Paul appears from 1 Cor. xii. 10, 28 f., xiv. 1-39; Eph. ii. 20, iii. 5, iv. 11; Rom. xii. 6; 1 Thess. v. 20; 1 Tim. i. 18, iv. 1, 14.

7. (P. 228.) For the decrees of Caligula relating to the Jews, cf. Schürer, i. 495-506 (Eng. trans. i. ii. 90-103); for the Jewish traditions, cf. Derenbourg, Hist. de la Palestine, 207; for its influence in Christian circles, cf. the writer's essay, ZfKW, 1885, S. 511 f., also the writer's Ev. des Petrus, 41 f. The principal event is the decree of Caligula of the winter of 39–40, in which he ordered that a colossal statue of himself be set up in the temple at Jerusalem, which, notwithstanding long preparations, was never accomplished; cf. Philo, Leg. ad Cui. xxx.; Jos. Ant. xviii. 8. 2; Bell. ii. 10. 1. Still this is only the climax—to Jews and to Christians most horrible climax—of this emperor's unlimited contempt for everything moral and religious, and his mad self-deification (Suet. Calig. xxii, "Hactenus quasi de principe, reliqua ut de monstro narranda sunt," which occupies the narrative up to chap. lx.; Dio Cassius, lix. 4, 26–28). H. Grotius (Annot. in NT, ed. Windheim, ii. 715 ff., 721 ff.) was the first definitely to connect this passage with Caius Caligula.

8. (P. 228.) ψευδόχριστοι is used in two senses. For the wider meaning—any assumed authority over Israel—cf. John x. 8 with reference to the past, John v. 43 with reference to the future. For the stricter meaning—any deceptive counterpart of the returning Jesus Christ—cf. Matt. xxiv. 5, 23 f.; Mark xiii. 6, 21 f.; cf. Luke xvii. 23.

9. (Pp. 229, 230.) For the analogues of κατέχων and κατέχον in Dan. x.–xii., cf. Hofmann, i. 319–326, also his Schriftbeweis, i. 330–335, iii. 671. Both the words themselves and Paul's manifest didactic purpose indicate clearly that the reference is not to those preservative forces which lie in the background of national life operating in the spirit world, but to something that is manifest, from the existence of which it is possible to discern that the "antichrist," and so "the day of our Lord," has not yet come. Neither does Hofmann offer any adequate explanation of the interchange between κατέχων and κατέχον (NT, i. 326; Schriftbeweis, iii. 672). It is evident that the view of the emperor and of the empire expressed in these words is in perfect agreement with Rom. xiii. 1–7, and that it had then or afterward the corroboration of Paul's own personal experience, cf. Acts xiii. 7–12, xvi. 35–39, xviii. 12–17, xix. 31 (the asiarchs were the priestly representatives of the imperial idea), xxi. 32–40, xxii. 24–30, xxiii. 16–30, xxiv. 22–26, xxv. 4–12, 16–27, xxvii. 3, xxviii. 16, 30 f.; Phil. i. 13. The general friendly judgment of the Roman State by Clemens Romanus, Melito, Irenæus, and others, does not signify a falling away from Paulinism. This interpretation of 2 Thess. ii. 6 f. is the oldest that we have. We do not find it definitely stated by Irenæus,—indeed, not until Hippol. in Dan. iv. 22; Tert. Resurr. xxiv. But the general eschatological views of these writers, which agree in their main features and many of their details, are evidence enough that the reference of κατέχον to the Roman empire was from the first common to them. The empire must be rent in pieces before the "antichrist" can come (Iren. v. 26. 1, 30. 2; Hippol. Antichr. 25, 27, 43, in Dan. iv. 5–6, 14; Tert. Resurr. xxiv. Tertullian (loc. cit.) translates 2 Thess. ii. 6 f. "nunc quid teneat" (al. "detineat"), and "qui nunc tenet", which makes it appear as if the reference to the Romans in Irenæus by the phrases "qui nunc tenent" (Iren. v. 30. 3) and "qui nunc regnant" were suggested by 2 Thess. ii. 6 f., if indeed in both passages the original reading was not οἱ νῦν κρατοῦντες, as in Hippol. de Antichr. 28, cf. 43, 50, in Dan. iv. 5, 9, 17 (ed. Bonwetsch, pp. 196. 2, 206. 16, 228. 20 f.). This does not exclude the possibility of a certain connection between the empire of the antichrist and the Roman empire. Irenæus (v. 30. 3) declares it possible that the number 666 may mean Ααρὲβος, and the empire of the antichrist may bear this name, although he prefers the interpretation which makes it mean Teíran, an old discarded name which was borne by none of the Roman emperors. Hippolytus regards the world-empire which had existed since the time of Augustus as a Satanic imitation of the world-rule of Christ (in Dan. iv. 9), and thinks that the antichrist will return to the form of government existing under Augustus (Antichr. 49). Accordingly, in clear distinction from Irenæus, Hippolytus prefers to all others that interpretation of the number 666 which makes it mean Ααρτίνος (Antichr. 50). On the other hand, Hippolytus agrees with his master Irenæus in the opinion, which is certainly much older than either of these writers, that the antichrist is to be a Jewish pseudo-Messiah of the tribe of Dan (Iren. v. 30. 2, cf. v. 25. 4; Hippol. Antichr. 6, 14-15, 54-58, in Dan. iv. 49; Theophil. Lat. in Evv. i. 29, iii. 7; Forsch. ii. 58, 71; ZfKW, 1885, S. 570). It is probable that even Marcion interpreted 2 Thess. ii. as referring to a pseudo-Messiah of the God of the Jews (Tert. c. Marc. v. 16; GK, i. 589). In a peculiar form this idea is to be found in Ephrem (Comm. in Epist. Pauli, 193 f.). The man of sin is a circumcised Jew of the tribe of Judah, who sends his apostles or false prophets before him who bring about a "falling away" (2 Thess. ii. 3), but when the man of sin himself comes he does not connect himself with a sect, but appears in the holy Church, declaring himself to be God. According to this interpretation, the power which at the time of Paul was restraining his appearance was the continuance of the Jewish temple and worship, and the fact that the conversion of the Gentiles was not yet complete. The theory of a Jewish anti-Messiah, which, mutatis mutandis, has been advocated even in modern times by many (e.g. Schneckenburger, published by Böhmer, JbDTh. 1859, S. 405 ff.; B. Weiss, ThStKr. 1869, S. 22 ff.; Spitta, Z. Gesch. d. Urchr. i. 140 ff.), is as difficult to maintain as the theory that the man of lawlessness was a Roman emperor. The latter theory does not agree with the opinion mentioned above held by Paul and the ancient Church concerning the emperor and the empire. Neither can it be maintained on the ground that the insane acts of the emperor Caligula were really due to the conception which Paul and his contemporaries had of the man of lawlessness. Still less does it follow from the fact that in the conception of the man of lawlessness there are certain parallelisms with Christ which were afterwards stereotyped in the expression ἀντίχριστος (not ψευδόχριστος), that Paul thought of him as a ψευδόχριστος of Jewish origin. Against this view (1) argues the fact that the lawless one, following in the footsteps of Antiochus and Caligula, is to desecrate the temple of God by idolatrous deification of himself. Even assuming that "temple" is here used in a figurative sense, there is nothing which connects this picture with the Christ-hostile Judaism of the apostolic and post-apostolic periods. In general, it may be said that the antichrist as here described by Paul, and the unbelieving Judaism as elsewhere depicted by him, have no points in common. (2) According to Paul's view, the opposition of the majority of his nation to Christ had already reached its climax. The wrath of God, which was to visit upon them outward punishment, had already attained its object and would soon abate (1 Thess. ii. 16; see below, § 16, n. 4). That inward judgment to which they are now exposed, namely, the hardening of heart against the gospel, makes the Jewish nation during the whole period of the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles a fossil capable of practically no change. This state of things is to be ended not by the revival and increase of hostility to Christ, but by the conversion of Israel to Christ. This is not a passing fancy of Paul's in some moment when his feelings were conciliatory, but is stated by him as a truth of revelation in line with the prophecies of Jesus and based upon the O.T. as he understood it (Rom. xi. 25-32). (3) The term ἀντίχριστος, which is not used by Paul, although in content its meaning corresponds to Paul's description, does not by any means justify the conception of a Jewish pseudo-Messiah; for, in the thought of the apostle, Christ is not simply a Jewish Messiah, but also the second Adam, who unites the whole world under His headship as its Lord and King because He is the incarnation of that human righteousness which comes from God. For that reason the man who represents the incarnation of all human lawlessness and of all human opposition to God, and who with Satanic power subjects mankind under his sway, is a caricature of Christ, an "antichrist," whatever his origin may be. The ἀνωμία, from which his name is derived, exists naturally wherever sin exists (1 John iii. 4), and so even among the Jews (Rom. ii. 23-27; Acts xxiii. 3; Matt. xxiii. 28). But the characteristic of Jewish hostility to God and Christ is neither lawlessness, nor idolatry, nor self-deification, but false zeal for God and His law (Rom. ix. 31-x. 3; Gal. i. 13 f.; Phil. iii. 6). On the other hand, ἀνωμία is such a characteristic feature of heathen life and of sin in the heathen world (Rom. ii. 12; 1 Cor. ix. 21; 2 Cor. vi. 14), that it is necessary to think of the lawless one as springing out of the heathen world. When in ii. 4 he is declared to be the foe of all religion, it does not follow that he might not assume the forms of existing religions. On the contrary, Caligula's attempt at self-deification connected itself with the emperor cult, that of Antiochus with the worship of Zeus, and both these forerunners of the antichrist undertook by force to identify these heathen cults with that of the Jews, thereby destroying the latter. But even Christianity is not free from lawlessness. Just as the confessors of Christ are not free from ἀνωμία (1 Cor. vi. 7-20; 2 Cor. xii. 20-xiii. 2; Matt. vii. 23, xiii. 38-42), so there are points of connection between the lawless one and the Church. On the basis of the prophecies of Jesus (Matt. xxiv. 10-12, 24; cf. Luke xviii. 8), and following the prophecies in Dan. and the history of Antiochus (above, p. 236, n. 4), the Christian prophets announced a falling away within the Church as one of the characteristics of the last days (1 Tim. iv. 1-4; 2 Tim. iii. 1-5; Acts xx. 29-31; 2 Pet. ii. 1, iii. 4; Didache, xvi. 4), and both Paul and John directed attention to the signs of the same in their own time (1 Tim. i. 19, vi. 5; 2 Tim. ii. 16-18, iii. 5-9; 1 Cor. xi. 19; 1 John ii. 18-23, iv. 1-3). Of this character must be the falling away which in 2 Thess. ii. 3 is referred to as something specifically known. It could not be some sort of a political revolution, a revolt against the Roman authority established by God, or a falling away on the part of the Jews from the law of their fathers, since for Paul and the Christians of that age and of the ages following, the holy people, who at the end of the days will have to endure in increased measure what Israel suffered at the time of Antiochus, are not the Jewish people who owed their obligations to Moses, but the Church of Jesus. To what extent this falling away conditions the appearance of the antichrist it is not possible to determine from Paul's brief reference to what had been said about it in his earlier preaching. In view of the ἐκ μέρους προφητεύομεν in 1 Cor. xiii. 9, we have no right to assume that the elements and fragments of Christian prophecy that here come to view formed in Paul's mind a finished and completed picture.

10. (P. 230.) It is a noteworthy fact that, with the exception of Luke ii. 1, iii. 1, Acts xi. 28, where mention of the emperor could not be avoided, no name of an emperor is to be found in the N.T. Very little thought was devoted to Tiberias or Caligula, Claudius or Nero, reference being made simply to the emperor who was reigning at the time (Matt. xxii. 17-21; Mark xii. 14-17; Luke xx. 22-25, xxiii. 2; John xix. 12, 15; Acts xvii. 7, xxv. 8-12, xxvi. 34, xxvii. 24, xxviii. 19; Phil. iv. 22; 1 Pet. ii. 13, 17). So are mentioned the government of the empire and its agents (Rom. xiii. 1-7; 1 Pet. ii. 13, 17) or different classes of kings (Matt. x. 18, xvii. 25; Luke xxii. 25; Acts iv. 26, ix. 15; 1 Tim. ii. 2, vi. 15; Rev. i. 5, vi. 15).

11. (P. 231.) Grotius (Ann. in NT, ed. Windheim, ii. 715 ff.), Ewald (Sendschreiben des Pl. 17 f.), Laurent (Ntl. Studien, 49 ff.), on the presupposition that both Epistles are genuine, declare 2 Thess. to be the older of the two. Baur reaches the same conclusion, on the assumption that both are spurious (Paulus, ii. 368 f.). Grotius thinks that 2 Thess. was written as early as 38 A.D., before Paul visited Thessalonica, to certain Jewish Christians there. Ewald and Laurent make Berea the place of composition (Acts xvii. 10), and think that it was written during the weeks immediately following the founding of the Church. Here again reference must be made to II. i. 4 in addition to what has been said above, p. 231. It is not a question here as in I. i. 8 f. of personal contact of Paul and his helpers with Christians from outside of Europe (above, p. 205 f.), but of reports spread by the missionaries in a number of Churches where they had sojourned since their flight from Thessalonica, or where they were sojourning at the time when the letter was written. Hence they must have gone at least as far as Berea and Athens and Corinth. The language used would still seem unnatural if it referred simply to reports made in the preaching that gathered congregations in Berea, Athens, and Corinth. The reference is to conditions in Churches already existing. During the eighteen months of continuous "residence" in Corinth (Acts xviii. 11), Paul may have made an occasional visit to other Churches, but only to such as that in the port town of Cenchrea (Rom. xvi. 1). This is not the case, however, with Silvanus, and Timothy, in whose name II. i. 4 is also written. The latter, upon his return from his mission in Thessalonica, certainly stopped in Berea and probably also in Athens, and so had opportunity to do what in II. i. 4 is declared to have been done by all three missionaries. From II. iii. 17 it is not to be inferred that the Church had never before received a letter signed by Paul's own hand. Notwithstanding the fact that the Corinthians had previously received a letter from him (1 Cor. v. 9), he calls attention to the concluding greeting in his own hand (xvi. 21); while the fact that in 2 Thess. iii. 17 he calls attention even more expressly to the form of his own handwriting, stating in addition that it is the same in every letter, is fully explained by the circumstance that henceforth the ending of the letter in his own hand is to be regarded by the Church as a proof of genuineness. A point in the tradition which tends to confirm the priority of 1 Thess. is the fact that the two letters were not arranged in the Canon according to the principle which came into use comparatively late and which is still in vogue, namely, the determining of the order of the writings in accordance with their respective lengths. They had their present order as early as the Canon of Marcion, who knew nothing of the later principle of arrangement, from which we may assume that they were always circulated in their present order.

12. (P. 232.) If II. iii. 14 stated simply the possibility that someone might disregard the exhortation of iii. 6-13, the language would be different, reading somewhat as follows : ἐὰν δέ τις οὐχ ὑπακούσῃ τοῖς λόγοις ἡμῶν ; while, apart from its character as a conditional sentence, it would be compared not with I. v. 27, but with I. iv. 18. Paul refers to a definite passage in an earlier letter (cf. 1 Cor. v. 9), I. iv. 11 f., and on the basis of reports received (II. iii. 11), declares that the exhortation of the letter is now actually being disregarded. The language in II. ii. 15 is less definite : "oral or written." Hence it may refer to something in the letter in which it occurs. Since, however, there are to be found in this letter no new instructions and directions supplementing the missionary preaching, such as I. iv. 13-18 certainly is, and possibly also such detached sentences as I. iv. 1-8, 11 f. ; v. 12-22 (cf. per contra I. iv. 9, v. 1), II. ii. 15 also is to be taken as a reference to 1 Thess. In particular does II. ii. 1, ὑπὲρ τῆς . . . ἡμῶν ἐπισυναγωγῆς ἐπ' αὐτόν, sound like a recollection of I. iv. 14, 17.

§ 16. THE GENUINENESS OF THE FIRST THREE EPISTLES.

These three Epistles, which, if written by Paul at all, were all composed within a single year at intervals of from one to three months (above, p. 233), are all entitled to the benefit of the critical principles laid down above (pp. 156-162). The difficulties which are always in the way of getting forged letters of apostles into circulation in Christian Churches (p. 159, paragr. 5) are enormously increased in the case of 2 Thess., the genuineness of which has been far more seriously questioned than that of the other two letters, because of what is said in the Epistle itself about possible or actual forgeries (ii. 2, iii. 17). Remarks of this kind would at once call for criticism on the part of the original readers, and it is difficult to see how within thirty or forty years after Paul's death the Thessalonian Church could have been made to believe that this Epistle had been received from Paul during his lifetime, unless it contained at least a fragment that looked like an original document, and unless it were signed in a peculiar hand in characters distinctly different from those appearing in the body of the letter. In view of what is said in 2 Thess. ii. 2, iii. 17, it is quite out of the question, not only for us modern readers, but all the more for those readers from whom the letter passed into circulation and for whom it was intended originally, to suppose that 2 Thess. is a more or less harmless fiction "in the spirit of Paul"; simply because this passage raises the question in the mind of every reader, no matter how unsophisticated, whether it is a genuine writing of Paul's that he has before him, or some document that has been forged in a manner the boldness of which is unparalleled (n. 1). In addition to this, more traces are to be found of 2 Thess. than of either 1 Thess. or Gal. in the Church prior to the time of Marcion and outside of his Apostolicon (n. 2).

The questions discussed in Galatians had less general interest for the Church of the second century than had the statements of eschatological doctrine and the practical advice of 1 and 2 Thess. Only Marcion is an exception. After his fashion he values Galatians very highly, and in testimony of this esteem places it first in his collection of Pauline letters, calling it principialem adversus Judaismum epistolam, and making it the starting-point for his criticism of the entire tradition (Tert. c. Marc. iv. 3, v. 2). So also the comprehensive critique of the Pauline Epistles and of the entire N.T., begun by Baur, started by assuming that Gal. was a source the genuineness of which did not need to be proved in order to show, on the basis of the clear and fundamental opposition between Jewish and Pauline Christianity which comes out in this Epistle, that Acts and most of the Epistles which bear Paul's name are the product of a biassed (tendenziös) attempt to tone down this opposition, and are consequently spurious. Perhaps this is the chief reason why, by the latest critical method popular in Holland, it is customary to begin with the discussion of Gal. (n. 3).

The arguments advanced by these critics against the genuineness of Gal., and by the critics of the older school against that of 1 Thess. (n. 4), have made a lasting impression only upon very few. Not so, however, in the case of 2 Thess. Assuming the genuineness of both Gal. and 1 Thess., it must be admitted that Paul was able, as occasion demanded, in the course of a single year to write letters very different both in thought and spirit. This renders all the more striking the resemblance in plan (above, p. 224 f.), thought, and language of 1 and 2 Thess., which were written with scarcely a longer interval than that between Gal. and 1 Thess. There is only one very obvious difference, namely, 2 Thess. is far inferior to 1 Thess. in freshness of emotion, in vividness of language, and in the winsome expression of friendly fellow-feeling. It is this difference principally, taken along with the fact of the great similarity of the letters in plan and language, that has given rise to the suspicion that someone familiar with 1 Thess. used it as a model by which to compose 2 Thess. Still this observation has less weight critically than the similarity of the two letters. What contrasts of feeling and expression do we find, for example, in a single letter of Paul's like 2 Cor. ! 1 Thess. was written under the immediate stimulus of the extremely gratifying news brought by Timothy, which had revived the apostle's spirits that had been so long depressed by heavy cares. The news which led to the writing of 2 Thess. was less cheering. The exhortations of 1 Thess. had been entirely disregarded by some, and had to be repeated with severity (iii. 6-16). The teachings about the parousia of Christ and the events connected with it (ii. 5, 15), which he had recalled to their minds and enlarged upon in 1 Thess., had not been effective in putting a stop to certain misleading reports. Moreover, means were being used for the circulation of these reports which, to say the least, were hardly honourable (ii. 2, cf. iii. 17). Of course, the steadfastness of the Church, in spite of constant suffering (i. 3 f.), was something to be thankful for, though for Paul there was something depressing in the thought that the only prospect of a change in this condition of affairs was that offered by the hope of the judgment connected with the return of Christ. When one takes into consideration also the opposition with which Paul had to contend in the place where he was (iii. 2), and the missionary work in Corinth which claimed his entire attention (iii. 1; Acts xviii. 5-17), it is quite easy to understand the spirit and tone of this letter. On the other hand, it is hardly likely that a person forging such a letter would have put into Paul's mouth twice a sentence like this: "We are under obligation at all times to give thanks to God for you" (i. 3, ii. 13, above, p. 225), which is not to be found elsewhere in Paul's letters, genuine or spurious (n. 5), instead of imitating 1 Thess. i. 2 and other similar sentences at the beginning of Paul's letters (Rom. i. 8; 1 Cor. i. 4; 2 Cor. i. 3; Eph. i. 3, 15 f.; Col. i. 3; Phil. i. 3; Philem. 4; 2 Tim. i. 3). On the other hand, the similarity of the two letters is quite natural in view of the fact that they were written within a comparatively short time of each other to the same Church, that conditions were such that it was necessary in part to write about the same things (the sufferings of the Church, eschatological questions, and unruly idleness), and, finally, that there were definite reasons for back references in 2 Thess. to the former letter (ii. 15, iii. 14). If the claim was being made in Thessalonica on the basis of oral and written communications from the vicinity where Paul was, that Paul himself held the opinion which in this letter he feels called upon to pronounce absurd (ii. 2, above, p. 226), it is perfect!

natural that he should recall what he had written to the Church a few months before, and that in dictating 2 Thess. he should have in mind the argument and the language of the former letter (n. 6).

Of course, 2 Thess. could not have been written by Paul if 2 Thess. ii. 3-12 is based upon the legend of the return of Nero as antichrist from Parthia or from the dead, still less if it presupposes the description of antichrist in Rev. xiii. and xvii. 8 (n. 7). The latter assumption is purely arbitrary, because the most distinctive feature in Paul's description, which it is impossible to derive from Dan. or 1 Macc., and which certainly cannot be referred to Matt. xxiv. 15, Mark xiii. 14, namely, that the antichrist is to set himself up in the temple of God and demand that he be worshipped, is not to be found at all in Rev. On the contrary, it is to be explained as a prophetic reflection of historical events which took place in the reign of Caligula (above, pp. 228, 237, n. 7). There is not the slightest suggestion in ii. 3-12 of Nero's conduct nor attitude toward the Roman Christians. If, as is at least doubtful, we really have here a description of the miraculous return to life of some historical personage (n. 8), this personage cannot be Nero. For, so far as our knowledge goes, the idea that Nero was to come back from the dead could not and did not originate until through the lapse of time it was no longer possible to retain the older notion that he was hidden somewhere among the Parthians, i.e. the idea did not originate until the beginning of the second century. As a matter of fact, we know that it was not until 150 that the legend was adopted from the Jewish into the Christian Sibyllines with some other material taken from the Johannine apocalypse, and that it was not until the third century that the legend secured wide circulation in the Church (n. 9). But there is absolutely no trace in 2 Thess. of this older view, that Nero, who was still living in the far East, was to reascend the imperial throne by the help of the Parthians and by the general aid of the powers of this world. Least probable of all is the supposition that the rise of some pseudo-Nero, due to the influence of this superstition, furnished the motive for the writing of 2 Thess. (n. 10). The fact that elsewhere in his letters Paul does not refer to the man of lawlessness, is no reason for suspecting 2 Thess., unless a passage can be pointed out elsewhere where he had the same occasion to refer to him which according to 2 Thess. ii. 2 he has here. No inconsistencies between the eschatological views set forth here and those developed elsewhere in Paul's writings, and no peculiarities of style, can be pointed out which make improbable the identity of the authorship of this Epistle and of the other Epistles of Paul (n. 11).

1. (P. 243.) While the majority of critics up to the time of Schmiedel, HK, ii. 1, 12, are content merely to cite imperfect analogies, Weizsäcker, 251, admits that it "really is not easy to get over" 2 Thess. iii. 17, but makes not the slightest attempt to remove the difficulties suggested above. As even Baur admits, ii. 105, these words are of just the character to betray a forgery, not only because so manifestly designed, but also because the motive for the subscription in Paul's own hand is different from that in 1 Cor. xvi. 21; Gal. vi. 11 (not really a comparable case, see above, p. 170; per contra, Col. iv. 18). It is wrong to say that Paul did this always "in order to give his readers direct proof of his affection for them" (Baur, ii. 105); in 1 Cor. xvi. 21 it is used to introduce an anathema. Even more arbitrary is the claim that 2 Thess. iii. 17 is meant to explain this custom of Paul's. Confessedly in all the realms of nature and of art, where distinctions are possible, a phenomenon which recurs regularly under given conditions is a characteristic, even when no reason is given for the distinction and no explanation of its origin offered. Even if, as Weizsäcker suggests, II. ii. 2 be a "hypothetical explanation of the meaning of this genuine Epistle" (i.e. of 2 Thess.), that does not make it any more credible that an interpolator should be so utterly shortsighted as to lay himself open to criticism by referring so blindly to alleged utterances of Paul's without any indication of their historical setting. Hilgenfeld's theory, Eint. 646, that II. ii. 2 was written in order to cast suspicion upon 1 Thess., which is genuine, while not so meaningless as Weizsäcker's statement, is not more credible. For (1) there is no reference here to a spurious Pauline Epistle (above, p. 235); (2) this theory does not harmonise with the fact that in II. ii. 15, iii. 14 (above, p. 232), 1 Thess. is referred to as a genuine Epistle; (3) to cast suspicion upon a recognised work of Paul's was the worst possible way in which to introduce a forgery which had to establish its own claims.

2. (P. 243.) For traces of Gal. in Clemens Rom. (?), Ignatius (?), Polycarp, Justin, cf. GK, i. 573 f., 828, n. 2. For traces of 2 Thess. and fainter traces of 1 Thess. in the same authors, cf. GK, i. 575, 815, 826, n. 1.

3. (P. 244.) The attacks made heretofore on Gal. are of so little significance that it is sufficient in a handbook like this merely to mention them, above, p. 163, notes 5 and 6.

4. (P. 224.) Baur, ii. 94, in proof of his contention that in the originality and importance of its contents 1 Thess. is inferior to all the other Pauline letters, makes the statement that with the exception of iv. 13-18 "it does not contain even a single dogmatic idea of special importance." But what dogmatic idea of special importance is to be found in 1 Cor. i.-xiv., xvi., or 2 Cor. i., ii., vi.-xiii.? Only when the apologetic purpose of the first main section of the letter is denied (above, p. 215 f.), and the strong emotion which it reveals ignored, is it found to contain simply superfluous reminders of things already known. It is also wrong to affirm that the historical material is taken from Acts (Baur, ii. 95, 97). On the contrary, the facts that come to light in 1 Thess. ii. 17-iii. 5 are new, and not always easy to reconcile with Acts (above, pp. 204 f., 214 f.). Where their agreement is apparent (ii. 2 = Acts xvi. 22-40), there is no trace of the dependence of the one upon the other. Resemblances between 1 Thess. and 1 and 2 Cor. Baur felt to be particularly open to suspicion (95 f., 342 ff.). So long as barren and ineffective words continue to exist in the world, the contrast between λόγος and δύναμις is natural (1 Thess. i. 5, cf. 1 Cor. ii. 4, iv. 20); its occurrence in 1 Thess. is certainly very inadequate proof for the statement that 1 Thess. "emphasises the more general ideas that are to be found specifically applied in 1 Cor." (343). This is not the case, for 1 Thess. i. 5 has reference only to the preaching in Thessalonica, while in 1 Cor. iv. 20 (cf. i. 18; Rom. i. 16) a general proposition is in mind, and even in 1 Cor. ii. 4f. the method of preaching in Corinth is brought under a general principle. The expressions ἐν βάρει εἶναι (1 Thess. ii. 7), ἐπιβαρῆσαι (ii. 9, cf. II. iii. 8), suggest 2 Cor. xi. 9, xii. 16; but the resemblance is not verbal, consequently the words are not copied from 2 Cor. Baur contends (345) that what we have here is only a generalisation of what is said in 1 and 2 Cor. with reference to special conditions in the Corinthian Church. But here again it is to be observed that in 1 Cor. ix. 6-18 Paul speaks of his refusal to avail himself of that right of the evangelist, of which he and Barnabas had regularly availed themselves ever since the beginning of the first missionary journey; whereas in 1 Thess. ii. 7, 9; 2 Thess. iii. 7-9, reference is had only to his conduct in Thessalonica. Of like value with these observations are those of Holsten (JbPTh. 1877, S. 731), that in 1 Thess. i. 3 the Pauline trilogy "faith, hope, and love" (1 Cor. xiii. 13) is confused with the trilogy of the Jewish Apocalypse, ἔργα, κόπος, ὑπομονή (ii. 2), and that the pseudo-Paul, who wrote this letter, like the one who wrote Phil., did not venture to speak of Paul in the greeting as an apostle. As if a forger, who depended for the acceptance of his work upon readers who held the apostle and the genuine Epistles in high regard, would not be tempted to imitate, even to outdo, the genuine letters (Gal. i. 1; 1 and 2 Cor. i. 1; Rom. i. 1) in emphasising as strongly as possible Paul's apostleship. Then this theory overlooks the emphatic Χριστοῦ ἀπόστολοι in 1 Thess. ii. 7. Baur thought the chief objection to the letter lay in its recognition of the Christian Church in Judea (ii. 14), notwithstanding the fact that their Christian standing is fully admitted in Gal. i. 22-24 (cf. 2 Cor. viii. 13 f.; Rom. xv. 27; indirectly also 1 Cor. xiv. 36). Had Paul in this passage, as Baur thinks he ought to have done (97), said something about his participation in the persecution of the Jewish Christians on the part of the Jews, it would be a stronger reason than anything Baur has suggested for suspecting an imitation of 1 Cor. xv. 9; Gal. i. 13; since such a reference would have been out of place in this connection, where the point of comparison between the persecution of the Thessalonians and of the Jewish Christians was the fact that by their Christian confession both had incurred the bitter hatred of their own countrymen. It is possible to speak of the vague polemic against the Jews (Baur, 97, 347) only when the fact is overlooked that the persecution of the Thessalonians began with the attack of the Jews upon the missionaries (above, p. 203 f.), and that shortly after the arrival of Timothy and Silas in Corinth, i.e. about the time 1 Thess. was written, Paul was compelled by the opposition of the Jews to separate himself from the synagogue (Acts xviii. 5 f.). Of course, the letter is spurious if ii. 16 refers to the destruction of Jerusalem as already past. But this is so evident a blunder that even Baur (97, 369) does not venture to make the forger directly responsible for it. The avenging wrath of God has reached the rebellious nation, but the cloud has not yet broken. Having rejected both the testimony of Jesus and of the apostles, Israel is fallen and rejected (Rom. xi. 11-15), and the judgment of hardening has already been visited upon them, which must and will soon show itself in judgment of a more external character (Rom. xi. 7-10, cf. ix. 32 f.). There is no reference to present internal conditions in Palestine, nor any indication of the banishment of the Jews from Rome by the emperor Claudius (as held by Paul Schmidt, Der Erste Thessaloniker-Brief, 87; cf. below, XI. [Chron. Survey]). Only in a very young Church could the deaths which thinned their ranks be felt to be irreconcilable with the word of life received by faith; presumably this would be felt most strongly in the case of the first deaths, cf. also 1 Cor. xi. 30. Positive proof of the genuineness of the Epistle is to be found in iv. 15-17; for no one ascribing a letter to Paul after his death could have made him say—more definitely here than in any passage in the unquestioned letters of Paul—that he himself expected to experience the parousia. Moreover, the particular kind of grief for the dead which appears in iv. 13 ff. is inconceivable in a Church which for decades had been losing its members by death one after the other. Consequently Baur (99, cf. 94) is wrong when, in the eschatological teaching of the Epistle, iv. 13 ff., which has not even first place among the discussions in the passage appended to the main section of the Epistle, beginning with λοιπόν, iv. 1 (above, p. 220 f.), he discovers the purpose which, after Paul's death, led to the composition of the entire letter.

5. (P. 245.) Even the apocryphal Epistle to the Laodiceans, ver. 3, reproduces the usual Pauline formula, GK, ii. 584; while the Third Epistle to the Corinthians, ver. 2, ed. Vetter, p. 54, is dependent upon Gal. i. 6. On the other hand, the καθὼς ἄξιόν ἐστιν of 2 Thess. i. 3 has a parallel in Phil. i. 7.

6. (P. 246.) Ability to reproduce from memory what has been written or spoken earlier, naturally varies greatly with different individuals. The question recurs in connection with 1 Cor. v. 9-11; 2 Cor. i. 13, and all the references of 2 Cor. to 1 Cor. But to the author it seems unlikely that the letters of Paul were sent to the Churches in the form in which they were written down by the amanuensis from dictation. Generally it would be necessary to revise the letter after it was dictated, and to prepare a new copy. This was sent to its destination, while the original copy might remain for some time in the hands of Paul or of his amanuensis. Cicero usually treated his letters in this manner; cf. H. Peter, "Der Brief in der röm. Literatur," 1901 (Abh. der Sächs. Ges. d. Wiss. phil. hist. Kl. xx. 30), S. 29 f., 35. Now, busy as Paul was, and knowing as he did his emotional temperament, nothing was more natural in the circumstances than for him to read over again the original copy of 1 Thess., if he still had it, before dictating 2 Thess.

7. (P. 246.) Since Kern, TZfTh. 1839, ii. 145-214, and Baur, ii. 351-364 (Baur asserts more positively than Kern the dependence of 2 Thess. on Rev., which has since been generally accepted; cf. Weizsäcker, 503, and Hilgenfeld, 647, who holds an entirely different view regarding the date and purpose of 2 Thess. Schmiedel, however, HK, ii. 143, holds that literary dependence cannot be proved),—since Kern and Baur, many have been inclined to regard 2 Thess. ii. 3-12 as a reproduction of the popular superstition concerning Nero redivivus. Nero is held to be the "mystery of lawlessness," active in the present, secretly preparing for his own return (Baur, 354, and Kern, 205, "the continued longing for this prince after his downfall," cf. Tac. Hist. i. 78). The κατέχων, on the other hand, is Vespasian (Kern, 200, "with his son Titus"), or Otho, or even Galba (Schmiedel, 43); in any case "the emperor reigning at the time when the letter was written" (Baur, 355). This is the πρωτον ψευδος held in common by these critics and numerous defenders of the Epistle's genuineness (e.g. Döllinger, Christent. u. Kirche zur Zeit der Grundlegung, 2te Aufl. 288). Since, in ii. 4, the existence of the Temple at Jerusalem seems to be presupposed (Kern, 157, 207; P. Schmidt, 119; Baur undecided on this point, 358), on this view 2 Thess. must have been written between June 68 and August 70. According to Baur (356), the occasion for the forgery was the appearance of the first pseudo-Nero in 69 A.D. (see below, nn. 9, 10). In order to explain the address of the forgery, Baur (357) assumes gratuitously that not only the provinces of Achaia and Asia (Tac. Hist. ii. 8), but also Macedonia, were set in commotion by this adventurer. Furthermore, the champions of this so-called historical interpretation, which, according to Schmiedel (39), is the only scientific one, pass over very lightly the fact that the pre-existence of the expected antichrist is not by any means so clearly affirmed as in Rev. xvii. 8, 11. It is impossible to find in 2 Thess. a single characteristic feature of the brief history of the pseudo-Nero in question, nor of the real Nero (comparison of Suet. Nero, lvi, with 2 Thess. ii. 4, only serves to reveal the extremity to which this theory is reduced), nor of the representative of the Nero redivivus (n. 9) in the Sibylline books. It has not been shown how, after the pseudo-Neronic movements were passed and before 120,—to judge from the literature of the time,—when Gentiles and Jews alike looked only for a restoration of the Neronic rule through political means, a Christian could have formed the conceptions which are to be found in 2 Thess. This difficulty is somewhat lessened by Hilgenfeld's suggestion that "in the end 2 Thess. proves to be a short Pauline apocalypse written in the last years of Trojan's reign" (Einl.

642, old paragraphs). But this hypothesis is not advanced save as a conjecture (650). It is difficult to understand how Christians who, with the emperor's approbation, were condemned to execution, and, according to Hilgenfeld, led, by this constant persecution, to entertain false hopes concerning the parousia, could come to regard Trajan not as the Nero redivivus, but as the κατέχων (651); particularly so if, as is suggested by Hilgenfeld, the Nero redivivus of this apocalypse is not the historical matricide or the persecutor of the Christians, but the leader of the falling away of which there were already signs in the Church in the current Gnosticism. With this interpretation of the mystery of lawlessness is severed the one slender thread by which 2 Thess. ii. 3-12 can possibly be connected with the legends concerning Nero. Bahnsen (JhfPTh. 1880, S. 681-705) still feels it necessary to retain the connection, although he too understands by the mystery of lawlessness the rising Gnosticism as he finds it described in the Pastoral Epistles. He, however, interprets the κατέχων as the spiritual office, and makes the κατέχων refer either to one distinguished ἐπίσκοπος, or the ἐπίσκοπος of the Ignatian Epistles, who occupied a position of authority over the other ἐπίσκοποι=πρεσβύτεροι. To such vagaries the theory of Kern is preferable. P. Schmidt (127) endeavours to relieve the theory of a number of fatal objections by assuming—but without giving his reasons—that ii. 2b-12 and several expressions in chap. i. were introduced into the Epistle, which is otherwise genuine, sometime between 68 and 70. Klöpper justly remarks (56) that nothing has caused more confusion in connection with the question regarding the origin of 2 Thess. than its association with the person of Nero.

8. (P. 246.) With praiseworthy impartiality, Hofmann (i. 331-334, cf. Schriftbeweis, ii. 2. 674) admits that, strange as it may seem to us, Paul does conceive of the entrance of the lawless one into the world after the analogy of the return of Christ from the other world, as a return from the dead. And certainly the threefold occurrence of ἀποκαλύπτεσθαι (iii. 6, 8, cf. i. 7), followed immediately by παρουσία (viii. 9), used of the coming of Jesus and of the lawless one, does give the coming of the antichrist the appearance of a caricature of the parousia of Christ, preceding this latter event. But it is to be observed that the meaning of μυστήριον (7) is the same here as in other passages (1 Cor. ii. 7, 10, xiv. 2, 6; Rom. xvi. 25; Eph. iii. 3-12; Col. i. 26 f.; 1 Tim. iii. 16), there being an implied contrast to the ἀποκαλύπτεσθαι which precedes and follows, and that the "mystery of lawlessness" means—admitted even by Hofmann (i. 329, 331)—not the person of the lawless one, but the increased spirit of lawlessness which is an active force even in the present. Consequently it would seem as if it were this impersonal power which is now concealed, but is to be revealed in the person of the lawless one. That the passage speaks not of the revealing of this impersonal power, but of the man of lawlessness, is sufficiently explained: (1) by the fact that the latter is presented as a caricature of the returning Christ; (2) by the fact that the spirit of lawlessness assumed personal form for the first time not in the "antichrist," but in all his forerunners (Antiochus, Caligula). In this way the conception was reached of a pre-existence of the lawless one not purely ideal. He, i.e. the personal ἀνομία, has existed again and again, but, before the complete development and revelation of his character, he is to be set aside, that he may operate for a time only as an impersonal power, eventually finding his complete personal manifestation, and so, his revelation in the man of lawlessness whose appearance immediately precedes the parousia of Christ. A partial analogy is to be found in the sayings about the coming Elias, Matt. xi. 14, xvii. 10-13, not all of which, however, indicate a personal return (cf. Matt. xiv. 2, xvi. 14, but are to be understood in the sense of John i. 21; Luke i. 17).

9. (P. 246.) Cf. the present writer's essay, Nero der Antichrist, ZfKIV, 1886, S. 337-352, 393-405. Nero (born December 5, 37; died June 9, 68) himself believed, because of certain predictions, that he would lose his throne, but rise to power again in the East, and live until his seventy-third year, i.e. until 110 A.D. (Suet. Nero, xl). Up to about this time the popular belief seems to have survived that he was still alive, and would regain his power (Dio Chrys. Or. 21). This led to the rise of a pseudo-Nero, who established himself on the island of Cythnus in 69 A.D., but was soon easily overpowered and beheaded by Asprenas, who had been appointed governor of Galatia, and stopped at the island on his way thither (Tac. Hist. ii. 8. 9; Dio Cass. lxiv. 9; Zonaras, xi. 15). A second pretender, Terentius Maximus by name, appeared under Titus (79-81 Zonaras, 11. 18), if, indeed, he be not identical with a third, who in 88 came near causing a Parthian war (Suet. Nero, lvii; Tac. Hist. i. 2). The spread of this belief, which led to these political uprisings among Hellenistic Jews of the time, is indicated by Sibyll. v. 137-178, 361-385 (71 A.D.) and Sibyll. iv. 117-139 (80 A.D.). It is not until we come to the Sibyllines written between 120-125 (v. 28-34, 93-110, 214-227) that we find the return of Nero represented as supernatural in character, and himself described as an ἀντίθεος whom the Messiah is to destroy. About 150 this last prophecy was worked over in connection with others of earlier date in Sibyll. v. by a Christian. About the same time, either by this Christian, or by one of kindred mind (Sibyll. viii. 1-216), these conceptions were fused with important features of the Johannine Apocalypse. Cf. also the picture of the Antichrist, supplied with the features of Nero, Ascensio Isaie, chap. iv. 2. The Sibyllines, which date from the first century, and with which alone 2 Thess. can be compared in point of time, reproduce simply the historical picture of Nero, the matricide, the stage-hero who celebrated his own burning of Rome, and the builder of a canal through the isthmus of Corinth. Though, in punishment of his own misdeeds, compelled to flee beyond the Euphrates, the missing one is to return from Parthia with a great army as a scourge to Rome. The Jewish conception of Nero during the first decades after his death shows no trace of an antichrist and of a mysterious supernatural being.

10. (P. 247.) Assuming that the Christians in Thessalonica were stirred up by the appearance in 69 A.D. of the pseudo-Nero whom they regarded as the antichrist,—though 2 Thess. ii. 2 assigns an entirely different reason,—this excitement must have been thoroughly allayed by his immediate downfall. The opinion that the day of the Lord had already come because the antichrist had appeared, would then have disappeared of itself, for the reason that the pretender perished miserably before he was able to extend his authority over the little island of Cythnus, and to do anything that could establish his character as the antichrist. The only conceivable effect of disillusionment would be doubt as to the nearness of the parousia, or as to the truth of the prophecies concerning the event. Furthermore, an author, sharing all the essential presuppositions of his deluded readers, who desired to prevent a recurrence of such deceptions and disillusionments, must have indicated the signs by which a false Nero, or antichrist, might be distinguished from the true one. But there is no trace of this antithesis in the letter. On these presuppositions reference to the κατέχων would be without point; for, as each new pseudo-Nero appeared, there was nothing to prevent the expectation that he would replace the reigning emperor and remove all other hindrances to his power.

11. (P. 247.) For example, P. Schmidt (111) and Schmiedel (HK, ii. 1. 9) find a contradiction in the fact that in I. v. 1 the time of the parousia can not be determined, the Lord coming as a thief in the night; whereas, according to II. ii. 1-12, the approach of the parousia is indicated by numerous signs, many of which are to be observed even in the present. But the same contradiction can be said to exist between Matt. xxiv. 7-33 (Mark xiii. 9-29; Luke xxi. 10-31) and Matt. xxiv. 35-44 (Matt. xiii. 32-37; Luke xvii. 20-30, xxi. 34-36; Acts i. 7), or between Rev. iii. 3, xvi. 15, and other parts of Rev. In reality there is no contradiction, only the same difference that existed between Noah and the men of his time. To those absorbed in the present earthly life the day of the Lord will come as a snare and the Lord as a thief; the disciples of Jesus are to watch, be sober and ready in order that He may not so come to them. They are to give heed to the signs of the times which portend the end; not to pay overmuch attention to those that are remote from the event, but not to overlook those that are near. If they are to avoid the latter mistake, they must know what those signs are to be; if the former, they must have a general idea of what is to happen before they appear. But since it is fundamentally impossible to know when the end will come and when the signs immediately preceding will appear, it is the part of wisdom as well as the natural impulse of love to live in constant readiness for the approaching end. The genuine prophecy of the apostolic age retains these fundamental features of the eschatological teaching of Jesus (cf. Rev. xix. 10). So does Paul. The impossibility of determining when the end would come (I. v. 1-3), and the knowledge that the man of lawlessness had not yet appeared, and could not appear until the existing government, the Roman empire, had given place to a different order of things (II. ii. 3-7), did not prevent him from believing that the parousia was near (I. iv. 17; cf., however, II. i. 5 ff.), though he does not assert this belief dogmatically (I. v. 10; cf. Rom. xiii. 11-14, xiv. 7-9; 1 Cor. xv. 51 f.). On the other hand, his attention to existing signs of the coming end (II. i. 5, ἐνδεύμα, ii. 7a, ἡδὴ ἐνεργεῖται), and to the events which had happened since he had become a Christian (above, p. 237, n. 7), saved him from an error such as he opposes in II. ii. 2, and from making a prophecy which would be proved false by the next succession to the throne at Rome. 2 Thess. i. 5-10 has been proved un-Pauline; indeed, it is said to breathe a spirit of revenge quite unchristian (Kern, 211, cautiously; more strongly stated, e.g., by Schmiedel). But of the general principle of the retributive righteousness of God (Rom. ii. 2-10), Paul very often makes severe application (Rom. iii. 8, xi. 9 f., xvi. 20; 1 Cor. iii. 17, xvi. 22; 2 Cor. xi. 15; Gal. i. 8, v. 10, 12; Phil. iii. 18 f.; 2 Tim. iv. 14; 1 Thess. ii. 16), and in addressing those who were afflicted, with whom he does not identify himself, he could without objection say things which would be more objectionable if said by themselves. Without parallel in Paul's other writings is the use of κλησις, in i. 11, in the sense not of a call to martyrdom (Hilgenfeld, 647), nor of the future glory (Klöpper, 23), but probably of a forthcoming invitation to enter into the possession and enjoyment of the promised glory. This meaning is particularly clear, if we follow Hofmann's suggestion and connect ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ with ἀξίωση. But Paul uses κλησις only once (Rom. xi. 29) of the call of the Israelitish nation which was involved in the call of Abraham. In the first passage the meaning approaches that of οἱ κεκλημένοι in Matt. xxii. 3, 4, 8; Luke xiv. 17, 24; in the latter, that of καλέσαι, Matt. xxii. 3, the object of the verb being those long since called (cf. Matt. xxv. 34; Rev. xix. 9). The usage in Rom. xi. 29 departs much farther from Paul's customary usage than 2 Thess. i. 11; since the call of the gospel has much more direct reference to the future glory of Christians (1 Thess. ii. 12, v. 23f.; 2 Thess. ii. 14; Eph. i. 18, iv. 4; Phil. iii. 14) than to the call of Abraham and of Israel. It is claimed that the use of κύριος for God instead of Christ (Hilgenfeld, 646),—a use which occurs only in quotations from the O.T. (1 Cor. i. 31), and in passages suggested by the O.T. (2 Cor. viii. 21 = Prov. iii. 4),—that this use is un-Pauline. But in I. iii. 12, ὁ κύριος, which occurs in a context where the distinction is twice made between God the Father and "our Lord Jesus" (I. iii. 11, 13), cannot mean Jesus in distinction from the Father, but only the Lord who, according to the Christian conception, has been revealed as "God and Father" and "our Lord Jesus." Hofmann (i. 214) compares Rom. xiv. 1-12 (3 ὁ θεός, 4-8 ὁ κύριος, 9 Χριστός), and the usage is to be constantly observed where Paul makes O.T. passages refer to Christ, when he knows as well as we do that the anarthrous κύριος means Jahveh and not Jesus, e.g. Rom. x. 9-15. Why should ὁ κύριος be understood differently in II. iii. 3, 5 and I. iii. 12, especially in view of the numerous resemblances between these passages, e.g. αὐτὸς δέ, I. iii. 11, II. ii. 16; κατεθνῆναι, I. iii. 11, II. iii. 5; στηρίξαι, I. iii. 13, II. ii. 17, iii. 3? It is true that Paul, who in II. i. 7-ii. 14 has constantly before him the Christ who is to return in glory, when he comes to speak of God and Christ together in II. ii. 16, places Christ's name first (in contrast to I. iii. 11), and that in II. i. 12 he calls Christ "our Lord and God" (cf. Rom. ix. 5; Tit. i. 3). It is also true that in this Epistle ὁ κύριος occurs in combinations where analogy might lead one to expect ὁ θεός (πιστὸς . . . ὁ κύριος, II. iii. 3, cf. per contra, I. v. 24; 1 Cor. i. 9, x. 13; 2 Cor. i. 18; ἡγαπημένοι ὑπὸ κυρίου (αὐ. τοῦ κυρίου and θεοῦ), II. ii. 13, cf. per contra, I. i. 4; ὁ κύριος τῆς εἰρήνης, II. iii. 16, cf. per contra, I. v. 23; Rom. xv. 33, xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; Phil. iv. 9; also Heb. xiii. 20; 1 Cor. xiv. 33). This usage can be considered un-Pauline only if, in striking contrast to other Christians of his time, Paul did not recognise Christ as the Faithful One (2 Tim. ii. 13), the Redeemer through His love (Gal. ii. 20; Rom. viii. 37; Eph. v. 2, 25), the Bringer of Peace (Eph. ii. 14-18; Col. iii. 15, with Phil. iv. 7; "peace from God and Christ" in the greetings). It is evident, on the other hand, that a forger would not have replaced an expression like "The God of Peace," which occurs so frequently in Paul's writings, by the unusual "The Lord of Peace." The same is true of the use of ἐγκαινᾶσθαι between two ἐν's, in II. i. 4, instead of the single verb which occurs more than thirty times in Paul's writings, and which a copyist

of an early date thought ought to be inserted here. It is asserted also that having used ἐξέλεξατο in two passages of his letters (1 Cor. i. 27 f. ; Eph. i. 4), Paul could not have written εἶλατο in a third, II. ii. 13, although naturally he is familiar with the word (Phil. i. 22), and although the word is excellently chosen in this passage, where there is a contrast implied to the destruction of unbelievers over whom the Christians have the advantage. ἡ ἐπιφάνεια, which is not at all superfluous, along with τῆς παρουσίας, but, like the expression, "the breath of his mouth," indicates the outward manifestation of the coming of Christ (II. ii. 8, cf. i. 7-10), cannot be considered un-Pauline simply because it is used in a similar connection in Tit. ii. 13 and elsewhere with reference to the return of Christ, 1 Tim. vi. 14 ; 2 Tim. iv. 1, 8. It is quite without point to reject as un-Pauline the phrase ἀπὸ τῆς δόξης τῆς ἰσχύος αὐτοῦ, II. i. 9, from Isa. ii. 10, because used instead of δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ, which it is alleged is the only expression Paul uses (cf. per contra, Eph. i. 19, vi. 10), and the word ἐπίσυναγωγή, II. ii. 1 (cf. I. iv. 14, 17 ; Mark xiii. 27), for which no genuine Pauline equivalent can be named. The difficult construction of sentences in the first main division of the letter, amounting in several passages (i. 10-12, ii. 3-9) to anacolutha, and the succession of short sentences at the end (iii. 2*b*, with the contrast in iii. 3 ; the sentence, iii. 10 ; antithesis, ii. 11*b* ; all from iii. 13 on), are signs of genuineness.

IV.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF PAUL WITH THE CORINTHIAN CHURCH.

§ 17. THE EARLY HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

THE city of Corinth, which was destroyed and depopulated by Mummius in the year 146 B.C., and rebuilt by Cæsar and made a Roman colony ("Laus Julia Corinthus"), was the capital of the province of Achaia, which since the year 27 B.C. had been separate from Macedonia, and which in size corresponded practically to the modern kingdom of Greece. Here resided regularly the proprætor, who had the rank of proconsul. After its restoration Corinth developed rapidly into a flourishing city, and at this time was the principal city in the province in point of population, industry, and commerce. The celebration there of the Isthmian games made it a centre of Greek life in spite of the mixed character of its population, though after its restoration, as before, Corinth was a "city of Aphrodite" (n. 1).

Paul came to Corinth from Athens in November 52 (Acts xviii. 1). As the result of eighteen months of labour there, the Corinthian Church was organised. Of this Church Paul declares himself to have been the sole founder with an exclusiveness and an emphasis which would have been out of place in the case of the Thessalonians, and there is nothing in Acts nor in Paul's own writings which calls for any dispute of his right to this position (n. 2). If, as seems to be the case, there were already in existence at this time a number of small Churches in the vicinity of Corinth, there is no necessity for assuming that Paul himself had taken an active part in their organisation. More probably the same plan was adopted that was followed later in Ephesus. While the apostle remained in the capital and bent all his energies to kindle a central flame of Christian life, sparks from this fire were scattered in every direction through the province. In Corinth, as in Ephesus, Paul's helpers did valiant service in spreading the gospel in localities which the apostle did not visit in person.

The circumstances under which Paul came to Corinth were peculiar. For whatever cause, whether on account of the experience which he had had in Athens, or on account of continued anxiety about the Thessalonian Church, he was in an unusually discouraged state of mind when he began his Corinthian work. As he himself intimates, it was for this reason that in Corinth he confined himself so strictly to the simple preaching of the cross, refusing more than at other times and in other places to make the foolishness of the gospel attractive to his hearers by the use of rhetorical art and of learning (1 Cor. ii. 1-5; cf. Acts xviii. 9). The manner in which he lived in Corinth was also such as to foster this feeling. While in Athens, he made no attempt to earn his living by working with his own hands, a course of action which was natural in those surroundings, and quite possible on account of contributions sent by the Macedonian Churches (Phil. iv. 15; 2 Cor. xi. 8 f.). As a result, he not only preached on the Sabbath in the synagogue of the Jews and proselytes, but also sought opportunities on week days to converse in the public places with those who resorted thither. In Corinth, on the other hand, after he obtained quarters in the house of Aquila and Priscilla, the Jewish couple who from this time on were associated with him closely and constantly, he worked for wages during the week in their tent shop, so that his religious activity was confined to the Sabbath and the synagogue (n. 3). The relief which came with the good news brought by Timothy from Thessalonica (1 Thess. iii. 6), and the encouragement which naturally resulted from reunion with his two trusted helpers, stimulated him to preach with greater energy, in consequence of which the opposition of the Jews became more pronounced, and Christian preaching was forbidden in the synagogue (Acts xviii. 5-7). It was a triumph for Paul when Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, and his entire family were baptized by him, an example which was followed at once by a considerable number of the Corinthians. In this manner originated the Church, which continued to assemble in the house of an uncircumcised proselyte adjoining the synagogue. During the succeeding months its membership was materially increased by the addition of Gentiles from all classes (n. 4).

Having now succeeded in establishing a Church separate from the synagogue, Paul might have considered his work in Corinth at an end. And he seems actually to have had it in mind to leave Corinth at this time, lest the continuation of the preaching should lead to further outbreaks of fanaticism on the part of the Jews. But, encouraged by a vision, he remained at this post longer than at any of the mission stations where he had worked heretofore. This period was not altogether without opposition (2 Thess. iii. 2); but an attempt on the part of the Jews to charge the apostle, before the proconsul Gallio, with teaching a religion contrary to the laws of the State, was frustrated by this statesman's ability to see at once that it was a question of differences about Jewish doctrine, and by his determination to have nothing to do with such matters (n. 5). The Jews gave vent at once to the indignation which they felt at this miscarriage of their plans upon Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue, before the tribunal from which the accusers were driven by Gallio, i.e. as the accusing party were leaving the judgment-hall, doubtless because, as their spokesman, he had not shown positiveness nor tact enough in presenting their case. If this is the same Sosthenes who is mentioned in 1 Cor. i. 1, this painful experience probably helped him to decide fully in favour of a cause which previously he had not had the requisite hostility and decision to prosecute (n. 6). As will be presently shown, the development of the relation between the synagogue and the Church was not yet at an end when Paul left Corinth, at Pentecost 54, and went to Ephesus.

With this departure begins a period of three years devoted mainly to the spread of Christianity in Ephesus and the province of Asia (Acts xx. 31). It was toward the end of this period that the first of the Corinthian letters preserved to us was written. Plans had been under consideration for some time for making a journey in the near future to Corinth. This purpose was now on the point of being carried out, since the route, by way of Macedonia, and the time of departure, Pentecost, had been already determined upon (1 Cor. iv. 18-21, xi. 34, xvi. 2-9). Timothy and, according to Acts xix. 22, a certain Erastus, who apparently was the treasurer of the city of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23, cf. 2 Tim. iv. 20), had been sent on by the same indirect route which Paul intended to take (1 Cor. iv. 17, xvi. 10). It is assumed that on account of the indirectness of the route through Macedonia and the commissions to the Churches there which they had to fulfil, Timothy will arrive in Corinth somewhat later than the letter, which has been sent directly by the sea route. He therefore gives the Church certain instructions as to how Timothy is to be received when he arrives (1 Cor. xvi. 10). At the same time he makes request that Timothy be sent back at once from Corinth to Ephesus, where he plans to await his arrival. When the cause which was keeping Paul in Ephesus until Pentecost (xvi.

9) is also taken into account, we must assume that the letter was written from four to eight weeks before this date. This makes it very probable that the figurative language used in 1 Cor. v. 7 f. was suggested by the Jewish passover, which was being celebrated about the time when the letter was written (n. 7).

Of the things affecting the relation of the Church to Paul which happened between his departure from Corinth at Pentecost 54 and the composition of 1 Cor. at Easter 57, there are some which without difficulty may be determined. The immediate presupposition of 1 Cor. is a letter from the Church to Paul (1 Cor. vii. 1). From the apostle's expression of joy in xvi. 17 at the arrival of Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (n. 8), who in large measure made up to him for the deficiencies of the Church toward him, and from the request that the Church recognise these men and follow their advice (xvi. 15-18), we ascertain what did not need to be told the readers, that these three Corinthians had come recently to Ephesus and were now returning to Corinth. It is therefore very probable that they had brought the communication of the Church to Ephesus, and were about to take Paul's answer back with them to Corinth. Assuming that vii. 1 refers expressly to written opinions and questions of the Church, it may be inferred from the formulæ by which the several topics are introduced in vii. 25 (περὶ δὲ τῶν παρθένων), viii. 1 (περὶ δὲ τῶν εἰδωλοθύτων), xii. 1 (περὶ δὲ τῶν πνευματικῶν), xvi. 1 (περὶ δὲ τῆς λογίας), xvi. 12 (περὶ δὲ Ἀπολλῶ), which are similar to the formula of vii. 1, only abbreviated, that all the discussions introduced in this way, namely, chaps. vii., viii.-x., xii.-xiv., xvi. 1-12, are in reply to this communication of the Church. This conclusion is confirmed by the observation that in these connections Paul repeatedly states principles and then proceeds at once to limit their application (vii. 1 f., viii. 1, x. 23; cf. § 18, n. 1). This is true even in the case of the commendation in xi. 2, to which the following context is only a contrast. Paul quotes these statements from the letter of the Church, and appears for the time being to give his assent to them, but only in order at once to qualify them, xi. 16 f. The expression used in xi. 34 is natural only if the Church had asked some questions or expressed some opinions about the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Thus also chap. xi. is in answer to questions asked by the Church in their letter, which does not exclude the possibility of Paul's having taken account here (xi. 18), as in other passages after vii. 1, of separate oral reports. But there are traces of the letter of the Church even before vii. 1. The principle stated in x. 23, of which Paul admits only the general truth, pointing out its limitation as applied to the practical question in hand, is to be found also at the beginning of vi. 12-20. So in v. 9-13 he corrects a misinterpretation of instructions which he had given the Church in an earlier letter, without mentioning the source of his information or without any suggestion of doubt as to the fact of the misinterpretation. Consequently this misinterpretation of his earlier advice must have been found in the letter of the Church. We have therefore to assume that, with the exception of certain chapters and passages, the whole of 1 Cor. is a reply to a letter of the Church which itself in turn had been written with reference to an earlier letter of Paul to the Corinthians, in fact was a direct answer to such a letter. The chapters excepted are i.-iv., the occasion and material for which were supplied by particular information, probably oral, coming to him from the members of the household of a certain Chloë (i. 11); the passages are v. 1-8, possibly also vi. 1-11, and probably chap. xv., in which Paul seems to speak of his own initiative about things that had happened in the Church, with regard to which he had been definitely informed, though not by the Church itself.

While this lost correspondence (n. 9) is to be dated only a few weeks or at most months before the writing of 1 Cor., the coming of Apollos to Ephesus is to be placed a few weeks or a few months after Paul's first departure from Corinth. According to Acts xviii. 24 ff., Apollos (n. 10) was an Alexandrian Jew distinguished for his Greek culture and rhetorical training (λόγιος), as well as for his Jewish learning. Though when he came to Ephesus he had not been baptized and so received into the membership of the Christian Church, he not only possessed a fairly accurate knowledge of the facts about Jesus, but also entered into the synagogue in Ephesus and taught with enthusiasm a form of Christianity which was not current in the Church. This brought him into contact with Aquila and Priscilla, who had come to Ephesus with Paul, and who remained there during the several months while Paul was absent on his journey to Palestine and Antioch, attending the synagogue services as Paul did when he first came to Ephesus (xviii. 19), and for the first months after his return (xix. 8). After Apollos had been instructed by this couple in the form of Christianity taught in the Church, he was all the more anxious to continue his preaching journey. So, when he came to Corinth bearing letters of recommendation from Aquila to the Christians there, it was not primarily in the rôle of a teacher in the Christian Church, but as a missionary preacher among the Jews in Corinth. And it was chiefly through his success among this class that he contributed materially to the growth of the Church (n. 11). This does not, of course, preclude the possibility of Apollos' having been a very acceptable teacher in the Christian gatherings; indeed, it is most natural to assume that it made him more so. How long he remained in Corinth we do not know. When 1 Cor. was written, he had been for some time with Paul in Ephesus. But he had not been forgotten in Corinth. From 1 Cor. xvi. 12

we learn that in their letter the Church had expressed to Paul the desire that Apollos might return to Corinth. Although he was strongly urged by Paul to comply with this request and to go back with the messengers from the Corinthian Church, for the time being Apollos steadfastly refused to do so.

Some time after Apollos' appearance in Corinth, but apparently a considerable time before the correspondence with the Church which took place just before 1 Cor. was written, the apostle himself had made a visit to Corinth. No mention of this visit is made in Acts, which gives very few details of the period of three years when Paul was engaged chiefly in organising the Ephesian Church, and which here as elsewhere omits all reference to the intercourse which took place between Paul and the Churches that had been already organised. Nor is anything said about it in 1 Cor. (n. 12). On the other hand, there are several passages in 2 Cor. where it seems to be presupposed that Paul had been in Corinth twice before the visit that he was now on the eve of making (n. 13). If, now, as will be shown, it is impossible to assume that the second visit took place in the interval between 1 and 2 Cor., we must suppose that prior to the correspondence of which we get information, partly from the remains of it which we have and partly from the testimony of 1 Cor., Paul had interrupted his work in Ephesus by a visit to Corinth, which presumably was short (n. 14). The impressions which he had received on his visit were thoroughly depressing. He had been humiliated to find that not a few of the members of the Church which he had spent so much effort in organising were living as unchastely as their heathen neighbours (2 Cor. xii. 21, ii. 1). He had exhorted them very earnestly, but had refrained from employing disciplinary measures of a severer kind (2 Cor. xiii. 2). He had given them instructions with reference to this matter in the letter of his

mentioned in 1 Cor. v. 9. The communication from the Church, in which, among other things they had replied to this letter of the apostle's, together with the numerous oral reports that had recently come to him concerning the condition of the Church and events that had taken place (n. 15), had pressed the recollection of this short visit into the background, and had created a condition of affairs which called for the writing of 1 Corinthians.

1. (P. 256.) MARQUARDT, *Röm. Staatsverw.*² i. 321-333; MOMMSEN, *Röm. Gesch.*² v. 234 ff.; BRANDIS in Pauly-Wissowa RE, i. 190 ff. From the days of Augustus, Achaia was a senatorial province; and again, after a temporary union with Macedonia under Tiberius and Caius, it held this position at the time of Claudius. It is with the period of Claudius that we are concerned. Regarding Corinth see CURTIS, Peloponnesos, ii. 514-556, 589-598. On account of its former glory it was termed "lumen totius Græciæ" (Cic. pro lege Manil. 5, cf. de Nat. Deor. iii. 38). This "bimaris Corinthus" (Hor. Od. i. 7. 2), on account of its location on the isthmus between the ports of Κεγχρεαί and Σχοινούς on the Saronic Bay and Λέχαιον on the Bay of Corinth, soon reassumed its importance as a commercial centre for the trade between Asia Minor and Italy (Strabo, p. 378 [here also the proverbial οὐ παντὸς ἀνδρὸς ἐς Κόρινθόν ἐσθ' ὁ πλοῦς], 380; Aristides, Or. iii., Dindorf, i. 37). In view of the dangers attending the voyage around Cape Μαλέαι and the difficulties involved in transporting wares and ships via the "Diolkos," which crossed the isthmus from Schœnus (Strabo, 335, 380; Plin. H. Nat. iv. 4. 10), there were repeated attempts to cut a channel through the isthmus, the last of these being made by the emperor Caligula (Suet. Calig. xxi; Plin. i. 1). The channel was not completed until 1893. The management of the Isthmian games (cf. 1 Cor. ix. 24-27), which had been transferred to Sicyon during the time when Corinth was in ruins, was afterwards intrusted again to the latter city (Pausan. ii. 2. 1). Among the sanctuaries in and near the city were those of Isis, Serapis, and Melikertes (Pausan. ii. 1. 3, ii. 3, iv. 7). Like Argos and Athens, Corinth was a residence place of Jews (Philo, Leg. ad Cai. xxxvi, cf. Justin. Dial. i). It was an ambition of students also to see Corinth (Epict. Diss. ii. 16. 32), although as an educational centre it was not to be compared with Athens. Here near together lay the graves of the philosopher Diogenes and of the famous courtesan Lais (Pausan. ii. 2. 4).

2. (P. 256.) Paul was the sole founder of the Corinthian Church, 1 Cor. iii. 6-10, iv. 15, cf. ix. 2, xi. 23, xv. 1 ff. This is not contradicted by 2 Cor. i. 19; for 2 Cor. is not directed exclusively to the Church in Corinth, as in 1 Cor., but to the Christians of all Achaia (2 Cor. i. 1). There is consequently to be considered as included in the address primarily both Corinth and Athens, where Paul had tarried for some time with Timothy, in whose name also 2 Cor. was written, and where he had also spent some time with Silas (1 Thess. iii. 1-5, above, p. 205 f.). The broad term used (πᾶσιν, ὅλην) permits us, however, to include a number of places in the province where there were Christians. According to the reading of Codex D, Acts xviii. 27 would seem to indicate that immediately after the departure of Paul there were several ἐκκλησίαι in and near Corinth. According to 2 Thess. i. 4 (above, p. 241, n. 11), such ἐκκλησίαι existed as early as the middle of Paul's sojourn in the city. But only at a somewhat later date (Rom. xvi. 1) is reference made to a particular ἐκκλησία, namely, that at Cenchrea. From 2 Cor. i. 19 we infer that Timothy and Silas, who, according to 1 Cor., could have had no appreciable share in the founding of the local Corinthian Church, laboured successfully in the vicinity of Corinth. Nor is this assertion contradicted by Acts. Just as Paul had prosecuted his labours at Corinth for some time before his assistants arrived (xviii. 1-4), so when he leaves Corinth nothing is said about them (xviii. 18). Even after their arrival at Corinth, allusion is made only to Paul (xviii. 5-17, cf. per contra, e.g. xvii. 1-15). It does not follow because Timothy and Silas were with Paul when 1 and 2 Thess. were written, that they remained in Corinth continuously even for several months. While Paul "dwelt" in Corinth alone for eighteen months (Acts xviii. 11), Timothy and Silas were probably engaged in missionary activities in the province, working from Corinth as a centre.

3. (P. 258.) Acts xviii. 1-4. Concerning the edict of Claudius, see § 11. The fact that Priscilla, or Prisca (according to the decisive testimony of Rom. xvi. 3; 2 Tim. iv. 19—perhaps also 1 Cor. xvi. 19), is regularly mentioned along with Aquila and more than once before him (Rom. xvi. 3; 2 Tim. iv. 19; Acts xviii. 18, perhaps also xviii. 26), permits the supposition that she was the more important of the two. Because Aquila (Acts xviii. 2) is designated as a certain Jew of this name, and because Paul's introduction into his household is due merely to the fact: ἦσαν γὰρ σκηνοποιοὶ ἡ τέχνη (xviii. 3), we are not to imagine that they were already Christians, or had been previously acquainted with Paul. Paul "found" Aquila in looking for lodgings and opportunity for work. It is easy to understand why in such commercial centres as Thessalonica (1 Thess. ii. 9; 2 Thess. iii. 8) and Corinth (2 Cor. xi. 7-12, xii. 13-18; 1 Cor. iv. 12, ix. 4-18) Paul should not desire his missionary activity to be looked upon as a money-making pursuit. On the other hand, this humble character of his daily work was in keeping with the spirit in which he came to Corinth. His occupation also was an ἐαυτὸν ταπεινῶν, 2 Cor. xi. 7.

4. (P. 258.) Paul himself baptized Crispus (Acts xviii. 8), and also a certain Gaius (1 Cor. i. 14). There is no good reason for doubting that the Crispus mentioned in the two passages is the same person, nor for questioning the accuracy of the statements concerning him (Heinrici, Comm. i. 1880, p. 10; Holsten, Ev. des Pl. i. 186). In 1 Cor. Paul had no occasion to mention his Jewish origin, or the fact that he was a ruler of the synagogue, or even to refer to the time of his baptism. The objection that the representation of Acts xviii. 1-17 is constructed after the model of Rom. i. 16, ii. 9 f. is entirely without foundation. In Thessalonica and Berea, Paul preached, as a rule, only in the synagogue; in Athens, both in the market-place and on the streets; in Corinth, first in the synagogue, then in a private house. In Berea, almost the whole Jewish populace, to which must be added certain proselytes, especially women, seems to have accepted the gospel (Acts xvii. 10-12). On the other hand, in Thessalonica and Corinth the opposition of the Jews was so pronounced that the first converts were almost all Gentiles. Where, then, is the model that Luke is supposed to have followed in composing his narrative? The argument that in Corinth the gospel found its first believers in a Greek home, which Holsten, i. 187, makes from 1 Cor. xvi. 15, is based primarily upon the incredible error that Greek names such as Stephanas were borne by Greeks only and not by Jews (see above, p. 63, n. 10); and, secondly, on the further mistake of supposing that Stephanas was a Corinthian. Since the household of Stephanas is termed ἀπαρχὴ τῆς Ἀχαΐας (1 Cor. xvi. 15), and since Paul before coming to Corinth was not unsuccessful in his preaching at Athens, which belonged to Achaia, Stephanas must have been converted and baptized at Athens. This is not contradicted by the fact that about the time 1 Cor. was written Crispus had come from Corinth to Ephesus (1 Cor. xvi. 17), had won credit for himself by aiding the collections in Corinth and Achaia for the Christians in Jerusalem (1 Cor. xvi. 15, cf. xvi. 1; 2 Cor. ix. 2), and very probably at that time resided in Corinth. The fact that Paul names Stephanas in such incidental way in 1 Cor. i. 14 f.—evidently bethinking himself of one whom he could name in addition to Crispus and Gaius—can be explained only on the ground that Stephanas was not one of the early converts of Corinth, to say nothing of his not being the ἀπαρχὴ Κορίνθου; though at the time the Epistle was written his relationship to the Corinthian Church was such that the failure to mention him in 1 Cor. i. 14 f. would have seemed unbecoming. It is obvious that the agreement reached by the Church at Jerusalem, Gal. ii. 9, did not prevent Paul from beginning his preaching in the synagogues wherever he had an opportunity to do so (cf. Skizzen, 70–76, and NKZ, 1894, S. 441 f.). That this was what he did in Corinth we should infer from 1 Cor. i. 22–24, vii. 18, ix. 20, even were it not reported in Acts xviii. with so many lifelike details, and consequently in a manner so worthy of credence. Whether the Gaius mentioned along with Crispus, who, according to Rom. xvi. 23, was a man of great hospitality, was a Jew or not we do not know. Titus (al. Titius), or Justus, or Titus Justus (Acts xviii. 7), who cannot be identified with the Titus of Gal. ii. 3; 2 Cor. ii. 13, vii. 6–xii. 18 (Wieseler, Chronol. 204), if the correct chronology is followed, was a σεβόμενος, i.e., according to the terminology of Acts (above, p. 212, n. 6), a Gentile holding allegiance to the synagogue, not a circumcised proselyte. Aquila and Priscilla, Paul had no reason to mention in 1 Cor. i. 14 as they had permanently left Corinth, Acts xviii. 26; 1 Cor. xvi. 19; Rom. xvi. 3. They certainly were won to the faith before Crispus, and must have been baptized not later than the formation of the independent Church in Corinth. The “many Corinthians” who were influenced to a decision by the baptism of Crispus, Acts xviii. 8, must for this reason have belonged to those Hellenes who before that time had been more or less closely allied with the synagogue, Acts xviii. 4. This, however, does not hold of the λαὸς πολὺς in ver. 10. At the time when 1 Cor. was written (vi. 11, viii. 7, xii. 2), the congregation was for the most part made up of native Gentiles, although later on Apollos was successful in bringing some Jews into the Church (nn. 6, 11). From 1 Cor. i. 26–31 we may infer that there were in the congregation several persons, though not many, of higher rank and of more thorough education. With regard to Erastus, see above, p. 259 (middle).

5. (P. 258.) Concerning Gallio, see XI. (Chron. Survey). It is not to be assumed that the Jews (Acts xviii. 13) accused Paul as a transgressor of the Mosaic law; for (1) there is wanting here any expression which would indicate such to be the case, as in John xix. 7, xviii. 31; Jos. Ant. xiii. 3, 4 (in the contest between the Jews and the Samaritans before Ptolemy Philometor, κατὰ τοὺς Μωσαϊκούς νόμους). (2) It is self-evident that the law to which the accuser appeals is that by which the judge must decide the case. It was a principle with the Jews that in legal process appeal might be made to Gentile as well as to Jewish laws (Baba Kamma, 113a). (3) It is no objection that Gallio says, ver. 15, περὶ νόμων τοῦ καθ' ἑμᾶς. On the contrary, this pointed expression implies that this was just the opposite of that law according to which Gallio had to judge. In the accusation, which in ver. 13 is naturally presented in a very much abbreviated form, the Jews must have argued that Christianity was not to be identified with Judaism, which was tolerated by the Roman law, but that it was rather to be treated as an apostasy from Jewish law and faith. This was the basis of fact for Gallio's judgment. (4) It would have been folly, of which even blind fanaticism would be incapable (C. Schmidt, Apostelgeschichte, i. 523), to seek the defence of Jewish orthodoxy at the hands of a proconsul, especially outside of Palestine, where the conditions were especially adverse to the success of such a plea. It would have been more clumsy still, before a judge whose religion and worship were opposed to Judaism, to accuse Paul of teaching mankind (not Jews) to honour God in a manner contrary to the Mosaic law. The real accusation of the Corinthian Jews was essentially the same as that in Acts xvii. 7, cf. xvi. 21; Luke xxiii. 2; John xix. 15.

6. (P. 259.) If in Acts xviii. 17, whether we read πάντες (RAB) without οἱ Ἕλληνες (DEHLP), or the very slightly attested οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, we can understand only the Jews who appeared before Gallio in great crowds (ver. 12, ἀποθημαλόν). If the ring of Hellenes on the outside were meant, statement to that effect would be necessary, and even then it would be impossible to exclude the Jews from the πάντες. If, as appears from xviii. 8, 17, and as was customary (Schurer, ii. 439 [Eng. trans. ii. ii. 65]), there was only one ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, then Sosthenes was the successor of Crispus. He is not to be distinguished from the Christian Sosthenes of 1 Cor. i. 1. Paul does not usually mention the amanuensis to whom he dictates,—especially not in such a prominent place as the opening address (cf. Rom. xvi. 22). On the other hand, Sosthenes is not to be looked upon as the joint writer with him of the letter; for, from i. 4 on, Paul speaks only in his own name. The only addresses which are strictly comparable are Phil. i. 1, 3; Philem. 1, 3, and perhaps also Gal. i. 2. If, however, it carried weight with the Corinthians to know that there was with Paul a Sosthenes who agreed with what was said in the letter, this person must have been well known to them and respected by them,—a description which suits the former chief of the synagogue in Corinth. If, later, he became a Christian, and we have no reason to believe he did not, Apollos may have helped him from his attitude of opposition to the gospel, which had already begun to waver, to a condition of actual faith (see n. 11). According to Eus. H. E. i. 12. 1 f., Clement Alex. reckoned this Sosthenes among the seventy disciples. He clearly distinguishes him from the Sosthenes of Acts xviii. 17, just as he attempts to distinguish the Cephas of Gal. ii. 11, and also of 1 Cor. i. 12, from the Apostle Peter. Lipsius (Apocr. Apostelgesch. i. 201; Ergänzungsheft, S. 3) has been misled through the careless reading of Eus. H. E. i. 12 into stating that the author's statement here and in Forsch. iii. 68, 148 is "simply untrue." Eusebius writes: "It is said that to these (seventy disciples) belonged also Sosthenes, who, together with Paul, wrote to the Corinthians. And this narrative is found in the fifth book of the Hypotyposes of Clement, in which he also says that "Cephas," etc. The "also" (ἐν ἧ καὶ Κηφᾶν) proves that this assertion regarding Cephas was not the only thing that Clement said, and that ἡ ἱστορία refers to the preceding remark about Sosthenes (cf. Eus. H. E. ii. 15. 2).

7. (P. 260.) Krenkel, Beiträge zur Gesch. u. den Briefen des Pl. (1890, 1895²), 233 ff., opposes the dating of 1 Cor. at about the end of the Ephesian activity of Paul, on the ground that an inference drawn from the combination of statements in Acts, which he alleges are entirely unreliable, with those of 1 Cor. is not to be trusted. But the route taken by Paul, according to Acts, namely, by way of Macedonia and Corinth to Jerusalem (Acts xix. 21), is identical with that proposed in 1 Cor. xvi. 3-7. Nor is there any contradiction in the fact that, according to Acts xix. 21 (cf. Rom. xv. 25), Paul looks upon Jerusalem quite definitely as his goal, whereas in 1 Cor. xvi. 4 he seems to speak of it hypothetically; for the concluding clause in this latter passage—not σὺν αὐτοῖς πορεύεσθαι, but σὺν ἐμοὶ πορεύονται—shows that it is not a question whether Paul will go to Jerusalem at all with the offering, but whether he will go in company with the delegates of the Corinthians. It is pointed out that in Acts xix. 22 mention is made of Timothy's journey only to Macedonia, not to Corinth, and that, on the other hand, it is not expressly stated in 1 Cor. xvi. 10 that Timothy was to go to Corinth by way of Macedonia. But in the latter passage this is the clear inference (above, p. 259). On the other hand, in Acts, which does not touch at all upon the relations of Paul and the Corinthian Church, there is no occasion to mention the final goal of Timothy's journey. The mention in Acts xix. 22 (cf. Rom. xvi. 23) of the Corinthian Erastus would make it seem, quite apart from 1 Cor., that the journey was to be continued from Macedonia to Corinth. It is true that we are not able to infer from 1 Cor. what actually took place after Timothy was sent, but only Paul's intention at the time of his departure. This intention is not only the same as that which, according to Acts xix. 21 f., xx. 1 f., Paul had had shortly before and at the time of his final departure from Ephesus, but it excludes every thought of a return to his labours at Ephesus after having paid his projected visit to Corinth. Had this been Paul's intention, or had he even thought of it as a serious possibility, consideration of the large opportunity afforded him of spreading the gospel in Ephesus, and the many obstacles with which he had to contend in doing this, would not have been sufficient reason for his remaining in Ephesus at least until Pentecost, instead of leaving at once (xvi. 8, 9). At all events, Paul could not have designated the limit of his stay by ἕως τῆς πεντηκοστῆς, if it had not been self-evident that he was referring to the coming Pentecost. Inasmuch as this reckoning follows the order of the Jewish festivals, he could not have expressed himself very well in this way if the Jewish "Church year," the Pentecost of which year was in question, had not yet begun, i.e. if the first of Nisan were not already past,—which agrees with the apparent suggestion in 1 Cor. v. 8, that this Epistle was written about the time of “unleavened bread” (14–21 Nisan). The period of six to seven weeks until Pentecost was long enough to accomplish what is suggested in 1 Cor. xvi. 9, being twice as long as the period required for the founding of the Church in Thessalonica (above, p. 212, n. 5). If Timothy’s return was delayed (xvi. 11), it is quite possible that the period of Paul’s further activity in Ephesus was extended. All that Paul means to say is, that in view of conditions at Ephesus, he could not bring himself to leave until Pentecost. Then there was before him the journey through Macedonia, which evidently he did not think of as one that would be executed hastily, since he admits that his proposed longer sojourn at Corinth may consume the entire winter (xvi. 6). Not before the following spring, i.e. about a year after the sending of 1 Cor., does he think of travelling to Jerusalem. It is true that his further intention of going from Jerusalem to Rome is mentioned only in Acts xix. 21. But since 1 Cor. contains no contradictory suggestion, it is idle to question the historicity of the expression in direct discourse given in Acts xix. 21. Instead of the inference from 1 Cor. xvi. 19 that all the Christians of Ephesus assembled in the house of Aquila, whereas in a writing alleged to be directed to Ephesus (Rom. xvi. 5, 14 f.) reference is made to three house congregations (Krenkel, 234), the proper conclusion to be drawn from the accompanying greeting from all the brethren is, that the congregation in the house of Aquila formed only a part of the brotherhood at Ephesus, as did the congregation in the house of Philemon (Philem. 2) at Colossæ.

8. (P. 260.) Clem. 1 Cor. 65, τοὺς δὲ ἀπεσταλμένους ἀφ’ ἡμῶν Κλαύδιον Ἐφῆσον καὶ Οὐαλέριον Βίτωνα σὺν καὶ Φορτουνάτῳ ἐν εἰρήνῃ μετὰ χαρᾶς ἐν τάχει ἀναπέψατε πρὸς ἡμᾶς. If we take into consideration the distinct position here accorded to Fortunatus, it becomes evident that he is not one of the representatives of the Romans commissioned to the Corinthians, but merely the one in whose company these are travelling to Corinth, and in all probability a Corinthian who made complaints at Rome concerning the disturbances in the home Church (GGA, 1876, S. 1427 f.; Lightfoot, S. Clem. ii. 187). If the Fortunatus of 1 Cor. xvi. 17 was at that time (57 A.D.) a young man of thirty, he can easily be identical with the Fortunatus of 97 A.D., being one of the presbyters of the Corinthian Church who was installed by the apostles, and who had grown grey in its service (Clem. 1 Cor. xlv. 3–6; xlvii. 6; liv. 2; lvii. 1). If Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus are the bearers, not only of the letter of the Corinthian Church to Paul, but also of 1 Cor., then they are the “brethren” in whose company Apollos might have gone back to Corinth, 1 Cor. xvi. 12. The order of the words does not agree with Hofmann’s interpretation of the verse, according to which the Christians about Paul join with him in urging Apollos to undertake this journey. Assuming, on the other hand, that the order of the words in xvi. 11 does necessitate the reference of μετὰ τῶν ἀδελφῶν to the Christians in whose company Paul will await the return of Timothy at Ephesus, they cannot have been the three Corinthians who were not to await the return of Timothy, but were to journey to Corinth at once (xvi. 12, νῦν) with 1 Cor. in their keeping, and, in case Apollos could be persuaded to go in company with him. Neither can they have been the collective Christian community at Ephesus (xvi. 20); they were rather those who were to travel with Paul via Macedonia to Corinth (see below, § 19, n. 6). The similarity of the expression, μετὰ τῶν ἀδελφῶν, in xvi. 11, 12, does not justify us in identifying the persons referred to in these passages. ὁ ἀδελφός or οἱ ἀδελφοί may designate very different persons, according to the context or conditions previously known to the readers (cf. 2 Cor. viii. 18, 22, ix. 3, 5, xi. 9, xii. 18; Eph. vi. 23).

9. (P. 262.) The references to the two early Epistles of Paul which are not in the collection of his letters, 1 Cor. v. 9–11, vii. 1, led in the second century to the fabrication of an Epistle from the Corinthians to Paul, and an answer from Paul to the Corinthians, both of which were embodied in the Canon of the Church of Edessa in the fourth century, bearing the common title, The Third Epistle to the Corinthians. From the Syrians they reached the Armenians and also some of the Latins. The best texts—Armenian and Latin, the former with a German translation—are those of P. Vetter, Der apokryphe dritte Korintherbrief (Tübinger Programm, Wien, 1894). Originally these pieces were a portion of the old Acta Pauli, as previously conjectured by the present writer (GK, ii. 607, 611, 879), and as is now proved to be the case by the Coptic fragments (C. Schmidt, NHJb. vii. 122; NKZ, 1897, S. 937, n. 2); also Acta Pauli, ed. C. Schmidt, pp. 74–82

10. (P. 262.) Ἀπολλῶς (nominative), 1 Cor. iii. 5, 22 (G incorrectly Ἀπολλω); Acts xviii. 24 (D Ἀπολλώνιος, of which the shorter form is a contraction, Ν Copt. Ἀπελλης); Ἀπολλῶ (genitive), 1 Cor. i. 12, iii. 4, xvi. 12; Berl. äg. Urk. 295. 7; Ἀπολλῶτι (dative), 811. 1, cf. 449. 1 (with a correction see also the address there; on the other hand, Greek Pap. ed. Kenyon, ii. 333, No. 393, Ἀπολλῶ, dat.); Ἀπολλῶ, acc. 1 Cor. iv. 6 (CDGLP, *Ἀπολλων Ν*AB); Acts xix. 1 poorly attested also Ἀπολλων, Ν Copt. Ἀπελλην, D does not here contain the name); Tit. iii. 13 (ΝH have Ἀπολλων, G Ἀπολλωνα). The reading Ἀπελλης seems to be of Egyptian origin (cf. besides Ν Copt., Ammonius in Cramer's Catenæ in Acta, p. 311. 1, 7, 13, apparently also Didymus, ibid. p. 309. 31, 312. 18), and goes back to the modest question of Origen (Delarue, iv. 682), whether Apelles, Rom. xvi. 10, be not identical with Apollos, Acts xviii. 24, as Didymus (loc. cit.) asserts. This was claimed also by those who made Apelles = Apollos, a bishop of Corinth. In commenting upon Acts xviii. 24, Blass suggests the Doric form Ἀπέλλον for Ἀπόλλων. Though not so strongly attested as Ἀπολλώνιος, there is abundant proof of this abbreviated form in Egypt, the home of the Apollos of Acts (see the indices of vols. i. ii. iii. of the Berl. äg. Urk.). We find that even down to the present, German scholars of distinction write the name of the man Apollo. This, as is well known, is the Latin form of the name of the god, Ἀπόλλων, and it is therefore necessary in a text-book to warn against this mistake. Or shall we soon read and hear Mino, rhinocero, etc.?

11. (P. 261.) The scene of the public disputations, Acts xviii. 28 (δημοσίᾳ, to which E alone adds καὶ κατ' οἶκον), was certainly not the assembly of the Christians, nor a public place, but the synagogue, in which Apollos held forth at Corinth as he had done previously at Ephesus (Acts xviii. 26). The connection between Acts xviii. 28 and 27 leaves no doubt that the advantage of which Apollos proved himself to those who were already believers (or, according to another text, to the congregations of Achaia) was due to his frequent triumphs in these disputations with the Jews. The use of the strong word διακατηλέγχετο points likewise to actual results. From 1 Cor. iii. 5 we learn specifically that part of the Christians who composed the Church at the time of 1 Cor. owed their conversion to Apollos (ἐπιστεύσατε). It is therefore wrong to interpret the figure in 1 Cor. iii. 6-8 to mean that the special work of Apollos was the religious or intellectual training of those who had already been converted by Paul. It is not the individual Christians and their spiritual life, but the congregation in general, which constitutes the θεοῦ γεώργιον and θεοῦ οἰκοδομή. According to 1 Cor. iii. 10-15, the activity of those who, like Apollos, continued the work of Paul, consisted in adding further material to the building, i.e. in winning men to the faith and bringing them into the Church (cf. Eph. ii. 20-22; 1 Pet. ii. 5-7). According to the original text of Acts xviii. 27, certain Corinthians stopping in Ephesus heard Apollos preach and invited him to come to Corinth with them. This was the beginning of the "Apollos party" in Corinth.

12. (P. 263.) Hofmann, ii. 2. 396 (comp. also Holsten, 189, 445), was minded to find in 1 Cor. xvi. 7 reference to a former visit to Corinth. Were this the case, however, we should expect not ἄρτι, which does not mean "on this occasion," but rather πάλιν (2 Cor. ii. 1, xii. 21, xiii. 2), or, if it is decided to associate the coming again with the present, ἄρτι πάλιν (Gal. i. 9). Furthermore, the reason for this statement given in 7b would be somewhat tautological. Finally, in its present context ἄρτι must mean "even now" in contrast with a later point of time (John xiii. 7, 33, xvi. 12). There is no force in the objection that Paul could speak in this way only if he were already on the journey (Hofmann, 395), because, even in this case, ἰδεῖν would still refer to the future; while, from the criticisms of the Atticists, we learn that ἄρτι was very commonly employed to designate the immediate future (cf. Lobeck, ad Phryn. 18 f.). What Paul says is this: He does not wish to visit Corinth at once coming directly from Ephesus, which would permit him to stop at Corinth only for a brief stay on his way into Macedonia. Then he gives as his reason for this decision not to come now, his hope of a longer visit, which, nevertheless, will have to be delayed (ver. 5), since, in any case, he must proceed soon to Macedonia.

13. (P. 263.) The testimony of 2 Cor. to a visit not mentioned in Acts is denied by Grotius (ii. 488, 539-541, with the stereotyped evasion est et hic trajectio), Reiche (Comm. Crit. i. 337 f.), Baur (i. 337-343), Hilgenfeld (Einkl. 260, n. 2), Heinrici (ii. 9-13 and elsewhere). But the only possible sense that can be given to 2 Cor. xiii. 1 is that Paul, at the time when he was writing 2 Cor., was on the point of coming to Corinth for the third time. In the light of this verse xiii. 2 must be understood; τὸ δεύτερον is to be taken with παρών, νῦν with ἀπών, so that the προεῖρηκα must have taken place during the second visit. Similarly xii. 14 and xii. 21 must be taken together. There is no grammatical objection to taking τρίτον with ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, and this is the only interpretation that fits the context (cf. Krenkel, Beiträge, 185); for to say that this was the third time that Paul was ready to come to Corinth, even if it were possible, would be without point in connection with xii. 14. In order, with good conscience, to separate ἐν λύπῃ from πάλιν (ii. 1), which Theodoret, contrary to the word arrangement and Paul's linguistic usage (Krenkel, 202), undertook to connect with ἐλθεῖν, making it refer to Paul's return to Corinth, in some cursives the πάλιν was placed after ἐλθεῖν, and in the Coptic, which omits πάλιν, after ἐμᾶς. But in all the other MSS. it is clearly stated that Paul had visited in Corinth once in sorrow, in fact, as the context and the comparison xii. 21, xiii. 2, show, in sorrow for the Church's condition. This can have no reference to the despondency with which Paul appeared for the first time in Corinth (1 Cor. ii. 3), but must refer to the second visit, of which we are speaking. Wrongly assuming that 2 Cor. x. 10 represents the words of one of the Jewish Christians who had come to Corinth from without (see per contra, below, § 18, n. 8), Krenkel (210) finds in this passage also definite reference to the second visit. If, however, the speaker is rather a native Corinthian, his words may well represent the impression which Paul made at the time of his first visit. If the second visit is also included, no conclusion can be drawn regarding the time of the same.

14. (P. 264.) Krenkel, 154–174, thinks he proves that 1 Cor. itself excludes the assumption of a second visit to Corinth prior to the time when 1 Cor. was written. If this visit occurred in the first year of his work in Ephesus—say in the summer or fall of 55 or in the spring of 56—the argumentum e silentio (n. 12) is particularly weak. We are unable to determine all that took place in Corinth in the twelve or twenty months which elapsed between this time and that of the writing of 1 Cor., and all the transactions between Paul and the Church. But the character of the facts that do come to light in 1 Cor., the immediately preceding correspondence which has not been preserved to us, and the reports concerning the factional differences, and various other disorders in the Church (1 Cor. i. 11, xi. 18), make it clear that Paul has no more occasion to speak of that visit. In the letter spoken of in 1 Cor. v. 9, and in numerous other letters of which we know nothing, he may have spoken of it. It is argued that there is no expressly stated distinction in 1 Cor. ii. 1–5, iii. 6–10, xv. 1 ff. between the first and second visits (as in Gal. iv. 13); but this is true also of 2 Cor. i. 19, xi. 8 f. The only inference to be drawn from all these passages is that, on his second visit to Corinth, Paul did not carry on a missionary activity as he had done during his second visit in the province of Galatia (above, p. 171, n. 2). This, however, would need no explanation if Paul interrupted his fruitful missionary activity at Ephesus for only a brief time in order to visit the Corinthian Church. The instructions, exhortations, and discussions with the believers which took place at that time do not come properly under the idea of an ἐποικοδομεῖν (1 Cor. iii. 10–15, above, n. 11). To the view advanced first by Baronius and most recently by Anger, de Temp. in Actis Ratione (73), that the second visit to Corinth was only a return from a short excursion made during the eighteen months of his residence there (Acts xviii. 11), the following objections may be made: (1) the use of the word ἐκάθισεν (see above, p. 263 f., n. 2), to which there is nothing analogous in the report of his stay in Ephesus; (2) such a resumption of labours after a brief interruption could not be classed as a second visit along with his first appearance in Corinth and his last visit, which was months in preparation. Still less, since 2 Cor. is addressed to the Christians of entire Achaia, could it be compared to a journey to that region. Even more questionable is the suggestion of Neander (Pflanzen und Leitung, 5te Auf. 320), that we read into Acts xix. 1 a journey to Achaia.

15. (P. 263.) Since the persons who brought the Epistle of the Corinthians were in entire harmony with Paul, at least at the time when they started back to Corinth (1 Cor. xvi. 17, above, p. 260 f.), there is no doubt that of their own accord, or in response to his questions, they reported many things to him which were not in the communication of the Church. From them he may have learned the facts touched upon in iv. 18, v. 1 ff., vi. 1 ff., xi. 18, xv. 12. Inasmuch, however, as it was not from them but from those of the household of Chloe that Paul learned of the strifes mentioned in i. 11–iv. 6, it is evident that these “members of Chloe’s family” must have reached Ephesus before the bearers of the Epistle from the Church. On the other hand, the information brought by the members of Chloe’s family must have concerned events which had just occurred; for manifestly in i. 11 ff. Paul is speaking of the conditions in question for the first time. This situation must have been as yet unknown to him when he wrote his previous letter (v. 9), for otherwise he would have discussed it, and from the tone of i. 11–iv. 6 it is evident that he did not. Still less, then, could Paul have noticed these discords at the time of his visit to Corinth. The only respect in which he compares the impressions which he received on this second visit with those which he fears he will receive when he comes again, is that of sorrow (2 Cor. ii. 1, xii. 21). He clearly distinguishes, however, between the unchastity which had caused him sorrow then (II. xii. 21, xiii. 2), and the factional strifes which he fears he shall now find (II. xii. 20).

§ 18. THE CONDITION OF THE CORINTHIAN CHURCH AT THE TIME WHEN FIRST CORINTHIANS WAS WRITTEN.

In striking contrast to the situation of the Christians in Thessalonica, the Church in Corinth was enjoying a condition of undisturbed peace. There are a number of things which account for this condition, e.g. the mixed character of the population of a great commercial city, where men are constantly coming and going from all parts of the world, the great number of different religious cults tolerated in Corinth, the impartiality in religious matters of the proconsul in whose term of office the Church became established (above, p. 267, n. 5), the social standing of some of the members of the Church, and the prominent place of others even in the government of the city (above, pp. 258, 265 f., n. 4). But, as indicated by the ironical comparison which the apostle makes between the situation of the Corinthians, who were living in this world as if it were the millennium (iv.8-13), and that of himself and his fellow-missionaries, this condition of peace had been secured at too great cost. The word of the Cross, the sharp contrast which it implies to all natural wisdom with the practical inferences therefrom (i. 17-31; Gal. vi. 14), had not made an impression sufficiently deep. They need to be reawakened to a sense of the fact that they were a body of persons separated by faith and baptism from the world about them, and from their own past (i. 2, iii. 17, vi. 11). Members of the Church were actually bringing suit against each other in heathen courts (vi. 1-8). No scruples were felt about maintaining friendly and social intercourse with the heathen (x. 27). Many even went so far as to take part in festivities connected with idolatrous worship, in the banquets held in heathen temples (viii. 10, x. 21). Although this dangerous approach to the worship of idols which had been so recently abandoned was not approved by all, so that, as may be inferred from the detail with which it was answered (viii. 1-x. 33), the question was submitted to Paul in the communication of the Church whether it was permissible to use meat that had been offered to idols, it was the opinion of the majority, expressed in the communication from the Church, that this liberal attitude toward heathen worship was entirely justifiable. Because every Christian knew that the heathen conception of the gods was entirely false, it was argued, everyone was free to consider everything associated with heathen worship a matter of indifference so long as he did not engage in the worship itself. Indeed, it was said, to act with this freedom was an obligation, in fulfilling which an encouraging example might be given to such of their fellow-Christians as were still undeveloped in knowledge and in the sense of moral freedom. By this it was hoped they might be raised to a level with themselves (n. 1). Without disputing at all the theoretical presupposition of this position, but rather himself affirming repeatedly the nothingness of the gods believed in and worshipped by the heathen (viii. 4, x. 19), Paul combats such an employment of their Christian knowledge and such a use of their Christian liberty. The principle advocated by the Church, πάντα ἔξεστιν (x. 23, cf. vi. 12), he holds, must be limited in two directions. In the first place, not everything permissible is advantageous to one's neighbour. Out of tender regard for a fellow-Christian less developed than himself, particularly for the sake of the conscience of such a person, the Christian must stand ready to give up his undoubted rights and liberties (viii. 1-3, 7-12), an example which had been set by Paul himself in the conduct of his ministry (viii. 13-ix. 22). In the second place, not everything permissible is best for the Christian himself the use of whose freedom is in question. Just as the apostle for his own spiritual good foregoes many things in themselves pleasant (ix. 23-27), so for their own sakes the Corinthians ought to avoid dangerous contact with heathen worship (n. 2). The history of Israel in the wilderness proves by terrible example that wantonly to long after the pleasures enjoyed in the old life before conversion, to incline toward the use of heathen forms of worship, and to indulge in the practice of heathen unchastity, is to tempt God, and to bring down destruction even upon the redeemed (x. 1-11). In order to correct the spirit of false confidence with which many of the Corinthians had been treading upon this slippery ground (x. 12, 22), the apostle insists that, quite apart from the question whether or not there is a Zeus or an Apollo, an Aphrodite or an Isis, there are evil spirits which work in connection with the worship of these so-called gods, to whose influence everyone is exposed who has anything to do with heathen worship, even though so indirectly as was the case among the Corinthians (x. 15-21). From x. 13, taken in connection with x. 14 (διόπερ), it appears that the Church had argued that it was impossible to cut themselves off entirely from contact with heathen life, because it would only be to subject themselves to greater temptations than it was possible for human powers to endure (cf. Hofmann, ii. 2, 207, and the similar line of thought in 2 Cor. vi. 14-18). Similarly, the casuistic questions which Paul was required to answer in x. 25-30 were asked for the purpose of showing that in the intercourse of daily life it was quite impossible to avoid eating εἰδωλόθυστα. This same principle, the necessary limitations of which Paul here points out, the Church had applied also to questions about sexual relations (vi. 12). In view of the manner in which Paul replies, it is very probable that the Church had represented the gratification of sexual desire to be a natural function, like the satisfaction of hunger, although we are no longer able to determine how far the comparison was carried and how much it was made to cover. Certain it is, however, that the Church had not agreed with what Paul had said on this subject. An exhortation in his previous letter to refrain from intercourse with wicked persons, particularly with unchaste persons, had been misunderstood, or, as Paul hints when making his transition to this subject in v. 8, unfairly misconstrued. He was represented as demanding an impossible avoidance of all contact with immoral persons, whereas his exhortation was meant to apply only to immoral members of the Church (v. 9-13). It was the general opinion in Corinth that Paul, being himself unmarried, had been too rigorous in his demands affecting this side of the natural life. So in their letter the Church had taken him to task for holding that entire abstinence from all sexual intercourse was something to be commended. Paul confesses this to be the principle upon which he stands, and makes various applications of it (vii. 1, 8, 26-35, 40), but in such a way as to make it appear that marriage is to be the rule, the right to remain single being conditioned upon personal possession of the charismata requisite thereto (vii. 2, 7, 9). At the same time we learn that there were some in Corinth who were opposed to the position taken by the majority, and treated marriage contemptuously, possibly on the strength of what Paul had said, recommending or even insisting that married persons should refrain altogether from sexual intercourse or even dissolve their marriage relation altogether, particularly in cases where husbands remained non-Christians; also rejecting as sinful marriage subsequent to conversion, particularly the re-marriage of widows (n. 3). Although Paul tells this minority quietly and earnestly that marriage is a natural right (vii. 3-5), reminding them of the command of Jesus by which the marriage bond is declared to be inviolable (vii. 10 ff.), against the majority, whose opinion was expressed in the letter, he defends his point of view not without some show of irritation. Where the case is not covered by an express command of Jesus, while not speaking with apostolic authority, he does speak as one who has been given the grace to become a faithful Christian (vii. 25). He thinks that he has the spirit of God quite as much as this self-sufficient Church (vii. 40).

This feeling on the part of Paul was due as much as anything else to the concrete case with the discussion of which this second section of the letter (chaps. v.-vii.) begins. He does not need to mention the source whence he had derived this information; for this case of one of their own members who was living in incestuous relations, or in relations of concubinage, with his father's wife, i.e. with his step-mother, was talked of quite publicly, more openly than was customary in such cases even among the heathen (n. 4). The haughty manner in which the Church had written the apostle, not about this particular case, to be sure, but about kindred questions (v. 9 ff., vi. 12 ff., vii. 1 ff.), and the general moral condition of the Church (v. 6), show that there was no feeling of shame about the matter, and that nothing had been done to remove the scandal. As shown by the relation of v. 2, 13 to Deut. xvii. 7, 12, xxiv. 7, the only atonement which Paul deemed adequate was the removal of the offender from the Church by official condemnation to death. He had decided at once how this requirement of God's law could be carried out consistently with the nature of the Church of the new covenant; and since he could not, or would not, act alone in the matter, he communicated his view to the Church, with the suggestion that they adopt it and unite with their absent founder in carrying it out. The apostle in Ephesus proposes that the Church in Corinth join with him in the name of Jesus and in the confidence that Jesus' miraculous power will be vouchsafed to them (cf. Matt. xviii. 19 f.), to constitute a court which shall deliver the offender over to Satan in bodily death, in order that his spirit may be saved in the day of judgment. It is not to be an act of excommunication by the Church, but a judgment of God, a miracle in answer to prayer, in which Paul and the Church are to unite, and for which a definite day and hour are to be arranged.

While the two sections chaps. v.—vii. and chaps. viii.—x. show that the moral life and the moral judgment of the Church were imperilled by lack of separation from the customs and ideas of their heathen neighbours, from chap. xv., particularly from the poetical quotation xv. 33, we learn that in the case of some (xv. 12, 34, τινές), things had reached the point where their judgment about matters of faith was being formed under the influence of heathen conceptions. As Paul's argument shows, the contention of some of the Corinthians, "There is no resurrection of the dead," was not intended to refer to the resurrection of Christ. In this case, on account of Christ's exceptional character and the close relation in time between His death and resurrection, those denying the resurrection of the dead would necessarily have had to make an exception of this event of gospel history. What they did mean to deny was only the Christian's hope of a future bodily resurrection. But this denial was so radical in character, and so fundamentally connected with the belief that the bodily resurrection of the dead was impossible and inconceivable, that Paul felt it necessary first of all to show that the resurrection of Christ, denial of which was after all involved in their premises (xv. 13, 16), was a fact amply attested, and an essential element not only in the gospel which Paul preached and upon which the faith of the Corinthians was based, but of all the apostolic preaching (xv. 1-11).

Another source of degeneracy was the unusually rich endowment of the Church with χαρίσματα, especially with various forms of inspired speech (n. 5). Not only did this increase the feeling of self-importance on the part of the Church as a whole, but the pride felt by individuals because of their special gifts, and the preference for one gift above another, produced discord and disorder in public worship. The Church had asked particularly for Paul's opinion about the so-called speaking with tongues (n. 5). Here, too, as in the case of questions about marriage and sacrifices made to idols, there was an opposing minority view, as is evidenced by the two principles which Paul lays down at the beginning of his discussion (chaps. xii.-xiv.). While to some the ecstatic and unintelligible utterances of those who spoke with tongues seemed like the outbursts of enthusiasm heard in heathen worship, and while in general these opposed the use of tongues for fear of the utterances of blasphemies in connection with it, the majority showed an abnormal, or, as Paul expresses it in xiv. 20, a childish preference for tongues, regarding this gift as the strongest possible proof of the overwhelming power of the Spirit in the Church, which feeling on their part was due to the associations of heathen worship quite as much as were the exaggerated fears of the minority (xii. 2). These fears Paul sets at rest by the assurance that no one speaking by the Spirit of God can call Jesus accursed. On the other hand, in order to guard against an over-valuation of the gift of tongues, he lays down the principle that even the simplest confession of Jesus as Lord cannot be made without the Holy Spirit. Exclusive preference for a single charisma, no matter which one it was, and the giving of prominence to those possessing it, is contrary to the divine purpose in bestowing a diversity of gifts, and is inconsistent with the nature of the Church (xii. 4-30). The necessary condition for the proper valuation of the different charismata is the insight that it is in no sense these spiritual endowments and extraordinary powers which in this world bring human and even inanimate nature into the service of the Church, that give men value and insure their salvation, but only conformity of the heart to God, faith in the gospel, and hope in everlasting life, and above everything else love (xii. 31-xiii. 13). But love also teaches the proper valuation and right use of the charismata (xiv. 1-40). Judged by this standard, the prophet who, while speaking to the Church with enthusiasm and in the belief that he has a revelation, yet retains self-consciousness and self-control, who is able also when occasion offers to reach the heart and conscience even of unbelievers who come into the Christian religious services, stands infinitely higher than the person who speaks with tongues, and in a state of ecstasy gives utterance to unintelligible prayers and praise. Because love does not seek its own, but the good of its neighbour and the prosperity of the whole Church, it supplies also the practical rules regulating the use both of tongues and of prophecy in the services of the Church. It was lack of discrimination in the use of this talent which led even women, as the connection shows, especially those who possessed the gift of glossolalia (speaking with tongues) or of prophecy, to speak openly in the public services of the Church (xiv. 33-35). Since Paul discountenances this practice altogether, what is said in xi. 3-16, where prayer and prophecy on the part of women are spoken of as if entirely allowable, objection being made only to the custom that had been introduced in Corinth of allowing the women to remove their veils, must refer to services held in private houses. It is quite easy to see how the woman who was capable and felt called upon to act as priestess or prophetess in her own household, perhaps because her husband was not a Christian or not especially gifted, might feel that she ought to bear witness to this equality between man and woman in the eyes of men and of God, also by appearing in public and speaking (n. 6).

Besides the arguments against this disposition on the part of the women to be independent, suggested by the nature of the subject in hand, Paul reminds the Corinthians twice that in permitting such practices they are acting contrary to the custom of all the other Churches (xi. 16, xiv. 33). Their conduct is such as would become them if they were the oldest Church in existence, when the fact that the gospel had gone out from them might give them a certain authority in matters of custom in the Church; or if they were the only Church in the world, with no need whatever to consult the judgment and practice of other Churches (xiv. 36). This same thought is the conclusion also of the discussion about idolatrous sacrifices. The Corinthians need to be careful, lest in deciding these questions arbitrarily they offend Jews and Gentiles and the Church of God, i.e. the entire community of Christians (x. 32, n. 7). Even more clearly than by the passages cited and other hints less strong (iv. 17, vii. 17), the supreme contempt with which the Church seemed to Paul to treat its relation to all the rest of the Church is brought out in the greeting of the letter, in which at the very start Paul endeavours to bring the readers to the realisation that they constitute a society of persons called to be saints not in and of themselves, but only as they stand related to all other persons in the world who call upon the name of Christ (n. 8). The same exaggerated sense of independence which influenced individuals to assert their personal views or preferences without regard to anyone else, even at the cost of sacrificing order and unity in the life and worship of the Church as a whole, threatened also to sever its connection with all the rest of the Church.

This danger was all the more imminent, because at this time the Church was in peril of losing its respect for the authority of its founder and its reverence for him. This affected their relation to other Churches, because it was Paul's personal influence, with the doctrinal traditions and the rules regulating practical life which they had received from him, that from the beginning constituted the bond of union between them and the rest of the Church (vii. 10, xi. 23, xv. 3, 11), particularly the Churches in the Gentile world, which like themselves had been organised by Paul, and of which also he was the head (iv. 17, vii. 17, xi. 16, xiv. 33, xvi. 1, 19). Consequently, when the apostle, moved by the insolent manner in which he had been talked about and criticised behind his back (iv. 3, 7, 19, ix. 3), and by the way in which the Church had taken him to task in their communication (v. 9 ff., above, p. 276), affirms very positively his general authority as an apostle of recognised position (i. 1, 17, ix. 1, xv. 10), and his special authority as the organiser of the Corinthian Church (iii. 10, iv. 15, ix. 2), far more is involved than his own honour or a specific obligation of reverence on the part of the Church.

The existence of cliques in the Church, of which Paul had learned recently (above, p. 273, n. 15), and on the basis of which information he discusses at length the question of factionalism at the very beginning of the letter (i. 10–iv. 6 ; n. 9), must have imperilled both the pleasant relations between the Church and its founder and its own inner harmony. Nothing could be more erroneous than to suppose that either in Paul's thought, or in fact, the Church was divided into four factions or even sects. One party is not set over against another, e.g. the professed followers of Paul over against the followers of Apollos, and the Cephas party over against the party of Christ. But he is simply speaking of a deep-seated habit which more or less all the Corinthians had, namely, that the individual, without reference to others of like opinion, called himself the personal follower of Paul, i.e. he made Paul his hero, in contrast naturally to others who affected a like relation to Apollos, Cephas, or Christ (i. 12, iii. 4, 22, iv. 6). If a leader is at all essential to a party, then, so far as we are able to ascertain, these alleged parties in Corinth had no leaders. Certainly the men whom individuals in Corinth professed to follow had no purpose of being such leaders. Paul does not simply find fault with those who were using his name as if that which they were doing was only an exaggeration of something in itself justifiable, or an awkward defence of his interests; but, specifically, in connection with his own name, he shows the foolishness and unchristlikeness of such talk, thereby condemning in the severest terms the persons by whom his name was so used (i. 13). That Apollos also condemned the persons in Corinth who were using his name, is very clear from iv. 6, xvi. 12, above, p. 262 f. It is self-evident that Paul assumes that Christ cannot approve what His apostle condemns, along with the other formulæ expressing this folly. The same is true with reference to the relation of Peter to the followers of Cephas, as is especially evidenced by the fact that elsewhere Paul speaks of him only in terms of respect (xv. 5, 11, ix. 5, iii. 22 ;

Gal. ii. 6-9). Consequently the men whose followers the Corinthians were fond of calling themselves had either already disowned their admirers, or, Paul thinks, would have done so had they been asked about the matter. It is impossible, therefore, to suppose that the question here is one with reference to parties which relatively were clearly defined. In this case the difference of opinion which came out in the course of the letter regarding the relation of the sexes, sacrifices to idols, speaking with tongues, and the resurrection, would have to be referred necessarily to one or another of the four alleged parties, something quite impossible to do. If it were a question of distinct parties, it is also hard to understand why, after chap. v., Paul makes not the slightest reference to any of the four watchwords. Still less can we suppose that the reference is to sects which held their own religious services, having separated themselves in this way from the body of the Church. The communication which Paul had received shortly before, to which 1 Cor. is the apostle's answer, had been written, and the messengers bearing it sent not by individual Christians in Corinth, but by all the readers, i.e. by the Corinthian Church (vii. 1, xvi. 17 f., above, p. 261 f.). The whole Church was in the habit of assembling to celebrate the Lord's Supper and for other religious services (x. 17, xi. 17-22, xiv. 4, 5, 19, 23-25, 33 f.). In view of disorders of all kinds, and even of σχίσματα (xi. 18), in connection with these services, it is probable, at least there is nothing in what Paul says which excludes it, though he does not say it in so many words, that those whose views were expressed in the various watchwords sat together in groups. Only upon this supposition—and not by supposing that these groups were formed purely on the basis of kinship or on a social basis (xi. 22, 33)—can we understand how the apostle foresaw that inevitably the outcome of such manifest divisions in the religious service, which was still one, must eventually result in the formation of distinct parties, and the breaking up of the Church into a number of sects (xi. 19, αἱρέσεις).

In a Church which had been founded by Paul there was no occasion for anyone to affirm that he was a follower of Paul with an emphasis implying opposition to someone else, unless some other teacher had made an impression in Corinth by which Paul was likely to be overshadowed. That this teacher was Apollos, and that it was his successful work as a teacher in Corinth (above, p. 262 f.) that gave rise to the use of the two watchwords first mentioned in i. 12, does not require proof. Moreover, from iii. 4-8, iv. 6 it appears that up to iv. 6 the discussion is concerned mainly with the differences between the followers of Paul and of Apollos. What these differences were we ascertain from i. 17b-iii. 2. The purpose of the whole passage is to justify the way in which Paul had preached in Corinth during the eighteen months of his residence there (Acts xviii. 11) in the face of hostile criticism, and to show that his preaching was free from certain pretensions which were contrary to his principles. Paul's statements could not well be more entirely misunderstood than by Hilgenfeld (Einl. 267), when he assumes that Paul is here replying to the criticisms of Jewish Christians, who represented his successes as due to the use which he made of Greek culture, since it is not the fact that he had refrained from the use of these means which Paul proves. On the contrary, always simply stating this fact or assuming it (i. 17, οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ λόγου, i. 23, ii. 1, 4, iii. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 6), he justifies his action at length by setting forth his reasons and objects. Consequently the objection which he is meeting must have been to the effect that his preaching showed a lack of requisite learning and of convincing eloquence. In reply to this criticism, he develops the principles which he regarded as rightly determining the method of preaching the gospel in missionary fields, the method required by the nature of the gospel. Both in its essential content, as presenting the cross of Christ, and in its consequent character, as a foolish preaching, missionary preaching—and that is the only commission that he has received from Christ—is inconsistent with the use of rhetoric and of other forms of learning (i. 17–31). While Paul's refusal to use these means in the presentation of his message, and his strict confinement of himself to the essentials of the gospel, was very natural in view of his state of mind when he came to Corinth, it was nevertheless in keeping with the principles which he regarded as regulative of the missionary preaching (ii. 1–5). Nor does he omit to say that for those whose self-denying faith has led to their salvation through the gospel, this sharp distinction between the foolish gospel and the natural mind both of Jews and of Greeks largely disappears; since for Christians Christ comes to be also the only wisdom (i. 24, 30). He points out also that it is not the office of Christian teachers to be continually repeating the word of the cross to those who have been converted and are of mature spiritual understanding, but also to develop those conceptions of divine truth, which, being fully realised in the glory of the world to come, will bring the reconciliation of all contradictions in the nature of things and of all differences between faith and reason (ii. 6–12). But even if it were untrue that the things which he taught them could not be set forth in the categories of human culture, but from their nature demanded a method all their own (ii. 13), the immaturity of his hearers made it impossible for Paul, while he was engaged in organising the Church, to employ this method of teaching (iii. 1 f.). It is clear, therefore, that the difference between the followers of Paul and of Apollos was not one affecting the essentials of the word of the cross and of the "wisdom of God," any more than the difference between Paul and Apollos themselves, but only involved the question as to how these should be presented, and a difference of opinion as to the value of rhetoric and logic in setting them forth. Many of the Corinthians seem to have been so carried away by the brilliant discourses of the eloquent Alexandrian, that thereafter the unadorned preaching of the "plain" (2 Cor. xi. 6, ιδιώτης) Paul seemed in comparison very deficient. It was not until it had been presented to them by Apollos' logic, so they thought, that they had come to have a true understanding of Christianity. When Apollos was talked about in this way, it is easy to see how some would regard such remarks as disparaging to the founder of the Church, and the less such persons approved of the method of Apollos, the more earnest they would be in their championship of Paul. Instead of all judging these two men at their real value, in the light of what they had actually done for the Church and in accordance with their respective gifts, individuals formed their own estimates in accordance with their own feelings, with the result that they vied with each other in their championship of one or the other of these two men (iv. 6). That they believed such championship gave them a better hold upon Christianity is indicated by Paul's question, whether Christ is divided so that they possess Him in greater or less degree according as they follow one or the other of their teachers (i. 13). Paul condemns their procedure, not only because it involves presumption in the formation of their judgments, but also because, in a manner inconsistent with the dignity of a Christian, it involves submission to men who are no rivals of God and of Christ in the work of redemption and in the bestowment of pardon upon the individual (i. 13b, iii. 4-7, 22).

This condemnation applies also to those who called themselves followers of Cephas. Inasmuch as it is impossible to suppose that at this time Peter had been in Corinth in person (n. 10), we must assume that Christians who had been converted through his influence, perhaps also baptized by him (n. 11), but who in any case had had personal relations with him, had come from their own home to Corinth, and had increased the existing confusion by their ἐγὼ δὲ Κηφᾶ. This is confirmed by the conclusion of the letter. As he is on the point of adding the parting benediction in his own hand, Paul stops suddenly to insert an anathema against everyone who does not love the Lord (xvi. 22), before putting down the benediction which he had already started to write. In this way he means to indicate that the persons referred to are excluded from his greeting to the Church, and so from the Church itself, to which he gives assurance of the grace of Jesus and of his own love (xvi. 23 f.). When to this anathema he adds a significant phrase in the language of the Palestinian Jews, it is clear that the persons whom he has in mind are Christians who had come from Palestine (n. 12). That iii. 16–20 is directed against the followers of Peter, we must infer from the fact that the name of Peter occurs again in iii. 22 along with those of Paul and Apollos, in striking contrast to iii. 4–8, and in seeming contradiction to the reference in iv. 6 to an earlier passage. After speaking in iii. 10–15 of those who, like Apollos, with good intentions, but in a way not altogether skilful, had built upon the foundation of the Church in Corinth laid by Paul, in iii. 16–20 Paul turns to those who, though engaged upon the same structure, had done their work in such a way that, in an outburst of anger, he feels constrained to call it not the building but the destroying of the temple of God. He trusts, however, that God will frustrate their evil designs and overwhelm them with destruction.

It was impossible for anyone to boast with pride that he was a follower of Peter in a Church founded by Paul, without at the same time belittling Paul, the inevitable result of which, especially where opposition already existed between the admirers of Paul and of Apollos, must have been an increase of the confusion and the insubordination to Paul of which there were already tokens enough. These followers of Peter were responsible, at least primarily, for the aspersions against which Paul defends his apostolic dignity, even in i. 1, more clearly in ix. 1-3, and in somewhat different tone in xv. 8-10. It was argued that a man who had never seen the Lord Jesus, the Redeemer, in the flesh, could not rank as an apostle in the full sense in which this title belonged to Peter and to the other disciples whom Jesus Himself had called and trained for their mission. But by placing the appearance of Jesus, to which was due his conversion and call, on the same level with the personal intercourse between Jesus and His disciples (ix. 1), especially with the appearances of the risen Lord to His disciples (xv. 5-8), Paul claims for himself the full apostolic title and all the rights which belonged to the other apostles. Inasmuch, however, as he aims to avoid any protracted argument on this point with these opponents who had come from abroad, simply insisting that the Corinthians shall recognise him as their apostle (ix. 2, cf. iii. 10, iv. 15), he makes in this letter only a few pointed remarks about these followers of Peter. One observes that Paul knows more than he writes, and fears more than he knows. Possibly he found it advisable, before saying any more, to wait until he saw the effect of the threatening hint which he makes in this letter, perhaps also until he was more accurately informed as to what these persons were doing.

He does say more in 2 Cor., and such parts of this letter as bear upon this subject may be discussed here, though there is no doubt that in the meantime not only had Paul learned more about these persons, but also their work in Corinth had assumed larger proportions. If the followers of Peter mentioned in 1 Cor. were Jewish Christians who had come from Palestine, and were exerting a very active and in Paul's judgment destructive influence in and over the Church in Corinth, then they can be no other than the persons against whom Paul directs his attack in 2 Cor. ii. 17 ff., v. 12, xi. 1-12, 18. They had come to Corinth with letters of recommendation from outside authorities (iii. 1), and on the basis of these letters they claimed to possess authority at least equal to that of Paul. They boasted the purity of their Judaism, and made the Gentile Christians in Corinth feel the superiority which this gave them (xi. 18-22); to which Paul objects that the assumption of this air of superiority on their part only shows that the advantages which they claimed were merely external and borrowed, and not based upon their consciousness of personal merit and personal service (v. 12, cf. iii. 2). In preaching the word of God, they employ all the tricks which the salesman uses to get rid of his wares (ii. 17, cf. iv. 2, xi. 13, ἐργάται δόλιοι, cf. Phil. iii. 2). They were travelling preachers, and had therefore the same formal right to call themselves apostles as Barnabas, Silas, and Timothy, and they thought also the same right as Paul (cf. Skizzen, 53-65). They accepted the hospitality of the Corinthian Church, and took advantage of their position as evangelists to claim support from their hearers. Paul's refusal to do so they declared to be proof of lack of faith in his calling and of want of love for the Church; it was only a shrewd device on his part, they said, to get the Church more entirely under his control (xi. 7-12, xii. 13-18). These facts make it very clear why he discusses this topic in 1 Cor. ix. 1-18 with a detail which, considering the particular theme of 1 Cor. viii.-x., is out of all proportion. He does it because even here in the first letter he has in view these followers of Peter who refused to admit that he had the same apostolic rights as the Twelve (1 Cor. ix. 1). It is for this same reason that he makes special mention of Cephas among the brethren and apostles of the Lord in

1 Cor. ix. 5. To a certain extent Paul recognises the formal right of these wandering preachers to call themselves apostles, when with "foolish boasting" he compares himself to them (2 Cor. xi. 21 ff.), and calls them "the very chief apostles" (xi. 5, xii. 11, cf. xi. 23, n. 13). But he does not hesitate at all to express his real opinion of them, comparing them to the serpent who deceived Eve, and calling them false apostles and servants of Satan, who make pretence of being apostles of Christ and servants of righteousness (xi. 3, 13-15). It was because their only purpose was to deceive that they made no direct attack upon the gospel which Paul had brought to Corinth. That they did not is proved absolutely by the fact that, while these persons are condemned in the strongest possible terms by Paul, there is not a single passage in either of the letters in which he opposes or warns his readers against "another gospel" (Gal. i. 6), or even against doctrine inconsistent with the one gospel of Christ (contrast with Col. ii. 6-8, 20-23; Eph. iv. 14; Heb. xiii. 9). It was just because these teachers from abroad had no Jesus and no gospel to preach other than those which Paul had preached before them, and no Holy Spirit to offer their hearers other than the one they had received when the gospel was preached to them for the first time, that it seemed to Paul so incomprehensible and so uncalled for that the Corinthians should receive these intruders, and allow themselves to be alienated from their own apostle by their influence (2 Cor. xi. 4, n. 13). Paul is certainly afraid that they may succeed in accomplishing more, by their cunning devices depriving the Church altogether of its simple and primitive Christian faith (2 Cor. xi. 3). That, of course, would involve subsequent corrupting of the gospel which the Corinthians had believed (1 Cor. xv. 1). There could be no doubt as to the direction which this falsification would take. By boasting the purity of their Judaism (2 Cor. xi. 22), these persons had made an impression upon the Gentile Christians which amounted virtually to moral influence over them, and the Gentile Christians had allowed themselves to be imposed upon by them (cf. 1 Cor. vii. 18 f., above, p. 265 f., n. 4). Hence to the apostle, who saw in the indirectness and deceitfulness of these persons only proof that their false Jewish ways had not been overcome by the life-giving truth of the new covenant and by the liberating spirit of Christ (2 Cor. ii. 14–iv. 6), it must have seemed that the only possible outcome of the unhealthy development of things in Corinth, which he was striving to check, was a form of Christianity corrupted by Jewish influences. But at the time when 2 Cor. was written, and less so when 1 Cor. was written, there were no positive indications that this was to be the outcome.

It is only from the way in which they are contrasted with each other that we are able to understand the three watchwords in which the names of Paul, of Apollos, and of Cephas were misused; the same is true of the fourth, ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ, which Paul condemns quite as much as he does the others (1 Cor. i. 12). Since taken by itself no fault can be found with the expression Χριστοῦ εἶναι, which simply expresses the fact that to be a Christian means to belong to Christ (1 Cor. iii. 23; 2 Cor. x. 7; Rom. viii. 9; Mark ix. 41), what was to be condemned was the way in which individuals claimed this prerogative of belonging to Christ for themselves in opposition to the other members of the Church, instead of endeavouring, as Paul did, to impress upon the mind of the Church, so rent by factions, the fact that they all belonged to Christ, and that it was in the one indivisible Christ that they were to find their own unity and at the same time the bond between themselves and all other Christians (1 Cor. i. 2, 13, iii. 11, 23). Even if the Christ party had opposed their ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ to the other watchwords, thinking that thereby they raised themselves above the petty squabbling of the rest, they could not have expressed it in this way if they were endeavouring to defend the authority which Paul and Apollos possessed through their connection with the history of the Church, against the misuse which was being made of their names and against the despicable criticisms of the followers of Peter, as Paul himself was doing, and as he insisted the Church ought to do (1 Cor. iii. 5–iv. 5, ix. 1–6 ; 2 Cor. iii. 2 f., v. 12, xii. 11). As contrasted with the tendencies represented by the other watchwords, the ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ represents a conscious and studied indifference to all human authority, an insolent ignoring on the part of those who used it of all dependence for their Christian faith upon things historical. If, now, it is clear from the way in which the Church expresses itself in the letter to Paul and from the way in which Paul addresses the Church in his reply, that the Corinthians had an exaggerated sense of their independence of all authority, this watchword which some individuals were using can only be taken as an extreme expression of this feeling of independence to which the Church as a whole was inclined. Just as the self-consciousness of the Church, which was so inconsiderately expressed in their communication to Paul, was based upon the exceptional endowment of its members with natural and Christian gifts, so it is impossible to conceive of anyone as saying ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ unless he were possessed of exceptional ability, or thought that he was. If Paul charges the Church with being conceited (v. 2, cf. viii. 1 f., xiii. 4), even more emphatically does he accuse individuals of so being (iv. 18 f.). It was presumptuous enough for individuals to take sides with Apollos or Cephas against Paul, and vice versâ (iv. 6), but this was not to be compared with the presumption of the individual who, from an exaggerated sense of his own independent knowledge, met these expressions of some particular human authority with the assertion that he belonged to Christ. Consequently Paul endeavours to bring not only the Church in general (xiv. 36), but also the individual who feels himself to be of importance (iv. 7, xiv. 37), to the consciousness that everything of which he boasts has been received from God through other men:

This same relation between the Church as a whole, which Paul addresses in his letter as "you," and the individuals whom he singles out as leaders in this general movement toward independence, we meet again in 2 Cor. x. 1-11. Paul makes the return of the Church to a state of entire obedience (x. 6) the condition of any action on his part against individual revolters or evil-doers; since he cannot and will not proceed to discipline such individuals without the co-operation of the Church. If, now, it be asked why as yet the Church had not resubmitted itself entirely to Paul's authority, we have the following answer:—There was someone in the Church who believed and boasted that he belonged to Christ, as if Paul could not claim this same distinction for himself (x. 7), someone who was bold enough to talk about the apostle's egotistical letters and his unimpressive personal appearance (x. 10 f., cf. x. 1). Just as we are unavoidably reminded by the Χριστοῦ εἶναι (x. 7), for which nothing in this context calls, of the watchword in 1 Cor. i. 12, so we must assume that the strongest expressions of insubordination to Paul came from the Christ party (e.g. 1 Cor. iv. 18; 2 Cor. x. 9-11), and that to them more than to anyone else was due the danger of a rupture between the Church and its apostle, and so between the Corinthian Church and the whole body of Christians.

The fact that there are no long sections in either letter devoted especially to opposing the Christ followers, is explained by the relation, pointed out above, of this movement to the tendency of the Church as a whole. Very probably it was one of the Christ party who was entrusted by the Church with the preparation of the communication sent to Paul. What Paul said in replying to the Church he said primarily for the benefit of those members of the Christ party who were so conscious of their Christian knowledge and discernment with the freedom and independence which these involved.

It was high time that Paul should express his mind. It was impossible for him to leave the settling of matters in Corinth to Timothy, who possibly had left Ephesus before the arrival of the latest oral and written reports from Corinth, and who could not go to Corinth at once on account of his errands in Macedonia (iv. 17, xvi. 10, above, p. 259). Since, moreover, in spite of all possible haste, the summer now beginning (above, p. 259 f.) might end before his own arrival in Corinth (xvi. 5, iv. 19), Paul saw that there was occasion to discuss thoroughly in an extended letter not only the questions that had been asked him by the Church, but also the unfortunate condition of affairs of which he had been informed by members of the household of Chloe and by the three messengers of the Church. In this manner he hoped to prepare the way for the visit which had been announced some time before, and, so far as possible, to keep that visit free from the painful necessity of discussing off-hand and orally the numerous aggravated and threatening questions arising out of the conditions in the Church (cf. also xvi. 2). He presented himself to the Church rod in hand, but at the same time with all the love of a father who would much prefer to forgive than to punish; it is for them to decide how he shall come to them (iv. 21).

The agreement between the letter and the occasion for it indicated in the letter itself is so entire, and, besides this, the letter is so strikingly testified to by the letter of the Romans to the Corinthians, written in the year 96, that no reasonable doubt can be entertained as to the genuineness and unity of the Epistle.

1. (P. 274.) If, with Semler and Hofmann, we read οἶδα μὲν, viii. 1, we have only more definitely expressed what in any case is self-evident, namely, that πάντες γινώσκωμεν ἔχομεν is a proposition which Paul simply accepts—in other words, his statement is nothing more than a quotation from the letter sent him by the Church. Between this preliminary concession and viii. 7 there is no contradiction, particularly since here γινώσκωσι has the article. Even the “liberals,” who boast about their knowledge, lack the right sort of knowledge (viii. 1–3); while, on the other hand, those who are “weak” lack that complete knowledge which everybody assumes they have, and without which action such as theirs seems to be done against conscience. Moreover, the unexampled use of οἰκοδομεῖν, viii. 10, is explained only on the supposition that Paul is ironical, flinging back at the Corinthians their own expression, as if he meant to say: “Fine edification, this!” (cf. above, p. 260 f.). It may be that i. 4–7 also are expressions quoted by Paul from the letter sent by the Church (cf. P. Ewald, NJbDTh. 1894, S. 198–205).

2. (P. 275.) In x. 14 the correct reading is φεύγετε ἀπὸ τῆς εἰδωλολατρείας, not φεύγετε τὴν εἰδωλολατρείαν (cf. vi. 18). The latter, taken literally, would be a superfluous exhortation; and in any case an exaggerated characterisation of what had actually taken place. From x. 15–22 it is clear that Paul had in mind, primarily if not exclusively, participation in the sacred meals connected with the idol sacrifices (cf. viii. 10, x. 7). So also 2 Cor. vi. 16, which refers to nothing more nor less than an approach on the part of the Corinthians toward idolatry occasioned by too intimate social connection with their pagan environment.

3. (P. 277.) In vii. 3–6, 10–14, 27a, 28a, 36, 38a, 39, Paul combats the false ascetic tendency of a minority for whose errors the Church, in its letter, evidently had made the example of Paul and occasional opinions expressed by him responsible. This is proved by vii. 6, which, rightly understood, cannot refer to the positive commands in ver. 2 or vv. 3–5a, but only the concession (εἰ μήτι) in 5b.

4. (P. 277.) The expression γυναῖκα τοῦ πατρός, v. 1, would be inconceivably weak if by it were meant the man's own mother, not his stepmother, cf. Lev. xviii. 8 contrasted with xviii. 7. So also Sanhedr. vii. 4 (cited by Wetstein, ad loc.), where it is likewise stated that it makes no difference whether the father is still living or not. If 2 Cor. vii. 12 deals with the same case, the father was still living. A marriage contracted between a man and his stepmother, whether the father was living or not, was not admitted as legal by Roman law, and so would not be recognised in Corinth. It is clearly not such a marriage as this that is here described by ἔχειν; neither, on the other hand, is it a single lustful transgression, one adulterous act, but the relation is that of concubinage (cf. John iv. 18). The stepmother had evidently left the house of her husband and taken up her residence with her stepson, at his request, who, for this reason, is described in v. 2 as ὁ τὸ ἔργον τοῦτο πράξας; also in v. 3, particularly in view of certain aggravating circumstances unknown to us, as ὁ οὕτως τοῦτο κατεργασάμενος; and, in view of his offence against the father, in vii. 12, as ὁ ἀδικήσας (cf. § 20, n. 6). Since Paul makes no reference whatever to the guilt of the woman, who must also have been involved in the transgression, it is probable that neither she nor her husband were members of the Church. And so Paul follows the rule laid down in 1 Cor. v. 12.

5. (P. 279.) It is a peculiar fact that thanks are given in i. 4-9 not for the religious and moral condition of the Corinthian Christians, nor for the practical proof of their faith in conduct and suffering (cf. per contra, 1 Thess. i. 3; 2 Thess. i. 3, ii. 13; Eph. i. 15; Col. i. 4; Phil. i. 5), but simply for their charismatic gifts, and it is specially worthy of note that in i. 5 speech of every kind is mentioned before knowledge (cf. the order of gifts, xii. 8 ff., xiii. 1, 8, and the opposite order in 2 Cor. xi. 6). If from xiv. 37 it is clear that πνευματικός does not mean simply the person who has a χάρισμα, but, like προφήτης, the one who has a special χάρισμα, and specifically, as the context shows, the person with the gift of tongues who spoke "in the spirit" in a higher degree than did the prophet and the teacher (xiv. 2, 14-19, 23), then the theme περὶ τῶν πνευματικῶν, stated in xii. 1, does not refer to spiritual gifts in general, but either to those who speak with tongues (οἱ πνευματικοί), as in xiv. 37, or, as in xiv. 1, to the gift of tongues itself (τὰ πνευματικά distinguished from προφητεύειν), of which there were several kinds.

6. (P. 281.) The principle advanced in the preaching, that no natural or social distinctions were to be recognised in the Church (xii. 13), seems to have been applied in Corinth to the question of slavery in a way not pleasing to Paul. For it will be observed that in vii. 18-23, where marriage is discussed, the example of slavery is used as well as that of circumcision; but it is highly improbable that Paul would have expressed such decidedly though briefly stated opinions about these two relationships in a purely theoretical way, and without any practical occasion from conditions to be found in Corinth. The slave is not to think his condition inconsistent with his Christianity; on the other hand, he is not to think that in all circumstances he must remain a slave (cf. Skizzen, 145, 348, A. 9-11).

7. (P. 281.) Τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τ. θ., x. 32, does not mean the local Church at Corinth, but, as in xii. 28, the whole body of Christians; for there is no contrast here, as in xi. 22, between the individual members of the Church residing in different homes—some poor, others wealthy—and the assembled Church. Rather, in accordance with the general principle laid down in x. 31, is it the entire body of Corinthian Christians, who, in x. 32, are urged to conduct themselves in such a way as not to offend the non-Christians among whom they live, nor the larger Christian body of which they are only a part. Otherwise we should read not τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τ. θ., but τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς, τοῖς ἀσθενέσιν, ἀλλήλοις, or something of the sort. The correctness of this interpretation is confirmed also by such passages as xi. 16 (αἱ ἐκκλησίαι τ. θ.), iv. 17, vii. 17, xiv. 33, 36.

8. (P. 282.) The placing of ἡγιασμένοις ἐν Χρ. ᾿Ι. right after θεοῦ, i. 2, in BD*G is too original not to be genuine. If, however, we place these words after Κορίνθω, then the immediately following κλητοῖς ἁγίοις seems to be a needless repetition of essentially the same thought of the holiness belonging to the Corinthians as members of the Church, unless the idea of "called saints" goes with the following σὺν πᾶσιν κτλ. by which it is rounded out. In no case can σὺν πᾶσιν κτλ., following the delusive analogy of 2 Cor. i. 1; Phil. i. 1, be joined with τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ . . . Κορίνθω as a completion of the address; for "all who call upon the name of Christ" is the broadest possible designation for all who profess Christianity (Rom. x. 12; 2 Tim. ii. 22; Acts ix. 14, 21). Nor can the necessary restriction be secured by connecting αὐτῶν after τόπω with the remote κλητοῖς ἁγίοις . . . Κορινθίοις instead of with τοῖς ἐπικαλουμένοις and taking σὺν πᾶσιν κτλ. to mean the worshippers in every locality belonging to the Corinthians, i.e. in the cities belonging to Corinth. For τόπος τινός does not mean the region belonging to one, but the place which one occupies; and, besides, the other cities of Achaia where there were Christians (Cenchrea, Athens) did not belong to the Corinthians. Holsten's view (456) that "all the worshippers of Christ in all their places" mean the Christians who had migrated to Corinth from all possible places, requires no refutation. "The Catholic idea" (Holsten, 453), which such distortions as this are intended to explain away, characterises the letter throughout (above, p. 281). To this point of view Paul commits himself personally when he adds καὶ ἡμῶν (without τε, following N*A*BD*G and the earlier translations). If αὐτῶν καὶ ἡμῶν is certainly to be taken with τόπω and is not a supplementary explanation of the preceding ἡμῶν—which no reader could surmise—Paul says, using a not unfamiliar form of expression (Rom. xvi. 13), that every place where there are worshippers of Christ is his own and Sosthenes' place, i.e. they feel themselves at home there. The Corinthians lack this genuinely catholic or ecumenical sense.

9. (P. 283.) Rübiger (Krit. Untersuch. über den Inhalt der beiden Briefe an die kor. Gemeinde, 2te Aufl. 1–50) gives a relatively complete summary of the various views about party conditions in Corinth. Clement's view (1 Cor. xlvii.) of the condition mentioned in 1 Cor. i. 12, διὰ τὸ καὶ τότε προσκλίσεις ὑμᾶς πεποιῆσθαι, and immediately afterwards ἡ πρόσκλισις ἐκείνη . . . προσεκλήθητε γὰρ ἀποστόλοις μεμαρτυρημένοις καὶ ἀνδρὶ δεδοκιμαμένῳ παρ' αὐτοῖς, is more correct than that of the majority of modern critics. Because Clement takes no account of ἐγὼ δὲ Χρ. as occasionally Origen (Hom. ix in Ez., Delarue, iii. 388, but not tom. xiv. 1 in Mt. p. 616) and Adamantius (Dial. in Marc. i., Delarue, 809; Caspari, Anecd. 12) fail to do, Rübiger, 2, ascribes to him the opinion that in Paul's time there were not four but three parties at Corinth, "who, appealing to the respective teachings of Paul and of Peter and of Apollos, opposed one another." In reply, it is to be observed (1) that the opinion that these so-called parties were founded upon special teachings of Paul, Peter, and Apollos is arbitrarily read into Clement's words, while it is just the opposite view that we find in Paul's 1 Corinthians. (2) There is no justification for saying that it would have been inappropriate for Clement, who found no corresponding party in the Corinthian Church of his time, mechanically to have repeated the fourth watchword. Certainly that does not apply to Adamantius, whose purpose was to prove to the Marcionites that men ought not, like them, to bear the name of a man (Marcion), but only the name of Christ. (3) It is taken for granted that πρόσκλισις means "party," which is refuted by the description of all these varied προσκλίσεις by the singular ἡ πρόσκλισις ἐκείνη (see just above). The term means rather an inclination toward, preference for, attachment to individuals (Clement, 1 Cor. xxi. 7, l. 2; 1 Tim. v. 21). In contrast to the careful language of Clement is the manner in which the elder Lightfoot (Horæ hebr. ad 1 Cor. i. 12) and Vitringa (Observ. sacræ, ed. Jenens. 1725, pp. 799–812) and also Baur (i. 292 ff.)

speak of a schisma in the later ecclesiastical sense of the word, and of four sectæ into which the congregation had been divided and which possibly held their religious services in different places (Vitranga, 812). The very first presupposition upon which a correct interpretation rests is the recognition of the fact that the situation as disclosed in i. 12 is not a sort of μετασχηματισμός, iv. 6, as was taught by the Syrian Ephrem (Comm. in ep. Pauli, ed. Mechith. 48), by Chrysost. (Montf. x. 16, iii. 138, 347), by Theodoret and others; in other words, that the names there mentioned are not mere disguises for entirely different persons who were party leaders in Corinth. This is an error which Beza was the first definitely to oppose (NT, 1582, ii. 93). As clearly proved by the λέγω δὲ τοῦτο, which shows that the following words are explanatory, by the earnest defence of Paul's manner of preaching i. 17 ff., and by the statement in iii. 4-8, there is no question that Paul and Apollos, Peter and Christ, were the persons whose names were actually used in Corinth as party watchwords. Furthermore, it is clear beyond question that the term ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ was employed by certain Corinthians to distinguish their point of view from that of other members of the Church. Had Paul desired in this formula to set his own standpoint over against the three other views, and to recommend it to the Corinthians (as the older critics suggested, especially Mayerhoff, Einkl. in die petr. Schriften, 1835, S. 81) in opposition to the ἕκαστος ὑμῶν λέγει, it would have been necessary for him to say, ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι Χριστοῦ εἰμι, or more correctly, ὅτι ὑμεῖς (ἡμεῖς) πάντες Χριστοῦ ἐστε (ἐσμεν), or ἀντὶ τοῦ λέγειν ὑμᾶς (Jas. iv. 15) ὅτι Χριστοῦ ἐσμεν. Still more preposterous is the interpretation of Rübiger (76 f.), according to which ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ is taken with each of the three other watchwords as a sort of supplement: "I belong to Paul, but in belonging to Paul I, for this reason, belong to Christ," etc.; for, apart from the absolute grammatical impossibility of this construction, the opinion that in these sentences we must seek the common confession of movements in all other respects divergent, rests upon a misunderstanding of ἕκαστος ὑμῶν, which here has its ordinary distributive force (1 Cor. iii. 5, 8, 13, vii. 7, 17, xi. 21, xiv. 26, xv. 23, xvi. 2), and is to be contrasted with τὸ αὐτὸ λέγητε πάντες (i. 10). Furthermore, the suggestion that the Christ party might appeal to Paul himself in justification of their watchword is without foundation; for Paul never claimed the Χριστοῦ εἶναι for himself as opposed to other Christians; but, on the contrary, in i. 2-10 he repeatedly speaks of "the name of Our Lord Jesus Christ" as the unifying term which excludes all schism, and gathers together into one all the Churches in the world and all members of the several Churches. This is referred to again in iii. 23 and in 2 Cor. x. 7, where, opposing the Christ party, Paul asserts that the Χριστοῦ εἶναι belongs to him as well as to them; cf. 1 Cor. vii. 40, where there is the same contrast. Nor is any difficulty presented by the first question in i. 13, for it is a question in spite of the absence of μή, which is not absolutely necessary, and which is omitted here because of the repetition of the same sound that would be caused by its insertion. Certainly it is not directed against the Christ followers alone (Baur, i. 326; Hofmann, ii. 1, 18), but to them along with the rest. The members of the Christ party were quite like the representatives of the other movements, who, because of their attachment to Paul or Apollos or Cephas, thought themselves in possession of a better Christianity than the others, possessing as it were a larger portion of Christ; but without denying that the others were Christians. Only the watchword which the Christ party adopted was the most presumptuous of all, and expressed most strongly the opinion that they had an incomparably greater interest in Christ than all the rest. It is exegetically and historically impossible to suppose that the Christ party was composed of Jewish Christians from Palestine, who either boasted that they had heard the preaching of Jesus (Grotius, ii. 366; Thiersch, 141; Hilgenfeld, 265), or who, although essentially identical with the followers of Peter, called themselves the Christ party, because those to whose authority they appealed, namely, the older apostles and brothers of Jesus, had been called and taught by Christ Himself as Paul had not been (Baur, ii. 296 ff.), or because of their attachment to James the brother of the Lord (Weizsäcker, 277). The latter suppositions rest upon the error that Paul is merely contrasting the other party names with his own, and so is able to put side by side all manner of watchwords—even such as are practically synonymous—in order to present the confusion in the Church in a realistic way. But Paul does not say “the one says this and the other that”; on the contrary, he introduces the watchwords in contrast to each other. In the mind of those who are here represented as speaking, the ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ stands in just as sharp contrast to the ἐγὼ δὲ Κηφᾶ as it does to ἐγὼ δὲ Ἀπολλῶ, and as the latter expression does to the ἐγὼ μὲν Παύλου. It is a piece of purely arbitrary criticism to reduce the tendencies expressed in the four watchwords to two fundamental groups, a Gentile Christian and a Jewish Christian, which divisions would again fall into two closely related groups, the followers of Paul and Apollos on the one hand, and of Cephas and of Christ on the other,—particularly in view of the fact that Paul dwells at length only upon the alleged minor contrast between the followers of Paul and Apollos. Furthermore, it is incomprehensible how those who could boast only of their relationship to the personal disciples or relatives of Jesus could on that basis ascribe to themselves a special relationship to Christ. They had no advantages over any of the disciples of the personal disciples of Jesus in the world (Heb. ii. 3; 2 Pet. i. 16; 1 John i. 3), certainly none over the party of Peter, from whom they desired to be distinguished, and whom at least they tried to outdo in boasting. Most fantastic and unhistorical of all is the idea of a Jewish Christian party which refused to acknowledge the authority of Peter—only a party of that character could describe itself as ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ in contrast to ἐγὼ δὲ Κηφᾶ. The Judaisers in Galatia looked upon Peter, John, and James as being equally pillars of the Church (Gal. ii. 9), and in spite of their high estimation of James the pseudo-Clementine literature nevertheless chooses Peter as its hero. Finally, it cannot be denied that the name of the Saviour, personal contact with whom gave Peter and James an advantage over Paul and other preachers, was Ἰησοῦς not Χριστός (1 Cor. ix. 1, xi. 23; 1 John iv. 3). For this reason we are not to imagine that in 2 Cor. v. 16 Paul is referring to personal contact with Jesus. Here, as indeed from ii. 14 onwards, Paul speaks of himself in such a way as to include with himself Timothy (i. 1) and the others who had laboured with him in a true Christian spirit, as opposed to the Petrine followers who had come to Corinth bringing letters of recommendation (ii. 17–iii. 1, v. 12). Not until vii. 3 does the “I” take the place of the “we.” If Paul says of himself and of his fellow-workers, first passionately and then more soberly (v. 13), things that sound like self-praise, the Corinthians must know that the fear of Christ before whose judgment-seat they must give account and the love of Christ who died for all men are the standards by which they judge and act toward all men, both those who are yet to be converted and those who are Christians, and the standards also for their judgment of themselves. To do the opposite would be an εἰδέναι or a γινώσκειν κατὰ σάρκα (v. 16). Both the order of the words and the context make it clear that this latter expression means a human judgment determined by one's inborn nature and natural powers (cf. i. 17, x. 2-4). Before God brought Paul to a recognition and acceptance of the reconciliation in the death of Christ, recreated him in Christ, and committed to him the proclamation of the word of reconciliation, his judgment was the judgment of man, i.e. κατὰ σάρκα, because his estimation of Christ, of whom he had heard and whom he was persecuting, was κατὰ σάρκα. Since his conversion and call his situation has been different. The contrast to the party of Peter again suggested in v. 12 would clearly imply that the manner in which these missionaries judged and treated people, and the manner in which they sought to obtain favour among the Corinthians, proved that their estimation of men was κατὰ σάρκα, which in turn was due to the fact that they did not know Christ as Paul had known Him since his conversion. It may not be possible to identify καυχᾶσθαι ἐν προσώπῳ (v. 12) with ἀνθρώπους εἰδέναι κατὰ σάρκα (v. 16), nor can we assert that Paul makes the foolish affirmation that followers of Peter are fanatical antagonists of Christ and of Christianity, as he himself was before his conversion. Nevertheless, here as in iii. 4 ff., iv. 1 f., 5 f., there comes to light Paul's opinion that the petty, secretive, selfish conduct of these persons was due to the fact that they had not, like the true preachers of the gospel, experienced in themselves the renewing and liberating power of the revelation of God in Christ, but had retained their Jewish nature. The principal source of the confusion which has obtained regarding these parties is the utterly untenable theory that 2 Cor. x. 7 and sentences in the immediate context are connected with the polemic against the false apostles at whom xi. 1-12, 18 and even ii. 17-vi. 10 are directed. The latter were wandering teachers who came to Corinth from abroad, bringing letters of recommendation from the place whence they came, whom Paul everywhere distinguishes from the congregation. In 2 Cor. they are not once included in a single "you" with the Corinthians. If they are identical with the followers of Peter (see above, p. 288 f.), then they are included among the Corinthian Christians addressed in 1 Cor. i. 12, but nevertheless in iii. 16-20 they are distinguished from the congregation which they are represented as making the subject of their harmful work, and in xvi. 22 are expressly excluded from the Church to which Paul sends his greeting. On the other hand, in 2 Cor. x. 1-11 Paul is dealing exclusively with the Church itself, and that, too, in its corporate capacity as it was beginning again to subject itself to his authority, without having gone far enough to lend him full support in the performance of the required act of discipline in the Church (x. 6). It is impossible to assume that the individual to whom λογιζέσθω (x. 7b) refers belonged outside the circle to whom the βλέπετε (x. 7a) applies. Practically the same charge which Paul refutes x. 9-11, in x. 1 is assumed to be generally made throughout the Church. If the ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ in x. 7 refers to 1 Cor.

i. 12, then the members of the Christ party were not travelling teachers from abroad, but had been members of the Corinthian Church ever since conversion. Furthermore, one of the characteristics of a false apostle was lack of genuine self-reliance (v. 12), and of that openness and boldness of which Paul boasts in his own case and in that of all true servants of the new covenant (ii. 17-vi. 10). They make boasts after a fashion, but only superficially and concerning mere externalities (v. 12, xi. 18, 22), especially about the authorities from whom they have letters of introduction (iii. 1). Their weapons are malice and hypocrisy (ii. 17, iv. 2, xi. 3, 13-15, cf. 1 Cor. iii. 19 f., above, p. 288). How is it possible to identify these people with those in x. 7-11, where we have pictured in strong, almost reckless language a self-consciousness very blunt in its expression of itself, relying not upon foreign authorities nor upon external advantages, but upon its own attachment to Christ! At any rate, the contest against these false apostles from abroad does not begin, as in xi. 1, abruptly without any previous word of introduction. In x. 12-18, especially x. 15 (καυχόμενοι ἐν ἀλλοτρίοις κόποις), there is a very clear contrast to other missionaries. The polemic against the teachers from without which extends to xii. 18 begins with the command that the Church pay heed to what is before their eyes (x. 7). Between himself and his opponents the Church shall decide from the known facts in the case, to which he proceeds immediately to call their attention—particularly from xi. 7 on. But before he begins the presentation of these facts, it occurs to him that in the Church itself which he is challenging to an impartial consideration of the respective claims of himself and the followers of Peter, there are persons who boast of their indifference to the distinctions between the followers of Paul, Apollos, and Peter, and treat with contempt any appeal whatever to the authority of these persons, saying ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ (above, p. 292 f.). Even this prevented the proper adjustment of the matter. They accused Paul of defending his personal honour, especially against the followers of Peter, in just as perverted a way as did they, and of constantly sounding his own praises in his Epistles (iii. 1, v. 12, x. 12, 18, xii. 19). For this reason Paul prefaces his polemic against the party of Peter (xi. 1-xii. 18) with his apologetic remarks addressed to the Christ party, x. 7b-18. καυχήσομαι, x. 8, 13, refers to the unavoidable self-praise beginning with xi. 1 (cf. xii. 1, ἐλεύσομαι which follows). The τινὲς τῶν ἐαυτοὺς συνιστανόντων, x. 12, can refer to none other than the followers of Peter; and so throughout the entire polemic against the followers of Peter (xi. 1-xii. 18) there are interspersed apologetic remarks directed to the Christ party (xi. 1, 16-21, 30, xii. 1, 5 f., 11, 19). Hints of a defensive character directed against the Apollos followers occur only incidentally (xi. 6). Inasmuch, however, as only a single πεποιθὼς ἐαυτῷ Χριστοῦ εἶναι is addressed in x. 7-11, whereas elsewhere the Church is addressed in quite the same apologetic tone without any such distinction of individuals, we must conclude that the representatives of ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ, while not numerous, had great influence in determining the attitude of the Church.

10. (P. 287.) The opinion of Dionysius, who was bishop of Corinth about 170 A.D., that Peter as well as Paul had part in the founding of the Churches in Corinth and at Rome (Eus. H. E. ii. 25. 8),—an opinion that may have been shared also by Clement of Rome (GK, i. 806),—probably grew up as an inference out of 1 Cor., from which source also (iii. 6 f.) Dionysius took the expressions φυτεύσαντες, φυτεία. Or it is possible that a later sojourn of Peter at Corinth may have helped to give rise to the tradition. Only at the time when 1 Cor. was written, and even before that time, such a visit would have been impossible, because of the division of fields of labour made between him and Paul (Gal. ii. 7-9; cf. Skizzen, 72 f., 90 f.). Additional evidence is found in the complete silence not only of Acts, but also of 1 and 2 Corinthians.

11. (P. 288.) The question, "Were ye baptized in the name of Paul?" (i. 13) is directed against those who laid great stress upon the importance of being baptized by some one particular individual. In referring to himself as an example in this question and in the discussion that follows, Paul does not have in view particularly the followers of Peter, nor the two or three men in Corinth whom he had actually baptized, e.g. Stephanas (i. 16, xvi. 15), of whom he has nothing but good to say: for if these men had boasted of this fact, Paul could not have expressed his gratification that this talk had no application to himself because of the very few instances in which he had performed the rite of baptism in Corinth. Rather does he complain that his carefulness about this matter has been without effect. It is another case of the ταυτὰ μετεσχημάτισα εἰς ἑμάντον of iv. 6. It is possible that Apollos baptized his own converts (above, p. 270 f., n. 11); but it is not likely that any special importance would have been attached to baptism administered by Apollos. He was a gifted teacher, but could not be considered an important link in the spiritual succession. On the other hand, it goes without saying that a decided impression would have been made at Corinth by a Christian from Palestine who said, "No less a personage than Peter baptized me at Pentecost or later" (cf. Hofmann, ii. 2. 21). The writer surmises that it was with a thrust at Peter and the original apostles generally, whom Jesus had actually sent to baptize (Matt. xxviii. 19; cf. John iv. 2), that Paul disavowed this custom for himself (i. 17). Cf. ZKom. Matt. 716.

12. (P. 288.) If we make the component parts of μαρναθα (xvi. 22), מן and אחא, then the most natural translation is, "Our Lord has come" (not "is coming," or "will come"). Thus: ܣܝ ܐܚܗ ܡܢ (according to the Nestorian pronunciation ܐܚܗ, bibl. Ar. ܐܚܗ Ezra v. 16, or ܐܚܗ Dan. vii. 22), and the interpreters more or less familiar with Syriac: Chrysostom (Montf. x. 410, ὁ κύριος ἡμῶν ἦλθεν); Jerome, Onomast., ed. Lagarde, 75. 24, venit as perfect; and Theodoret (Noesselt, 215), who remarks correctly that this is not Hebrew but Syriac (cf. a scholion in Scrivener, Cod. Augiensis, p. 488), and who, following the ancient Syriac usage, translates ܡܢ, ὁ κύριος, and κύριε (e.g. Matt. vii. 22, Ss), without ἡμῶν, leaving the suffix=ἡμῶν untranslated. Cf. the three scholia in Wetstein, ad loc., ὁ κύριος (with or without ἡμῶν) ἦλθε, al. παραγέγονε, al. ἦκει. Linguistically this translation is entirely correct, and was, moreover, known to a Latin interpreter of about the year 370 A.D., the so-called Ambrosiaster (Ambros. Opp., ed. Ben. ii. App. 170). It is also accepted by Delitzsch (ZfLTh. 1877, S. 215; see also his Hebrew N.T., 11th ed., and Neubauer, Stud. bibl., Oxon. 1885, p. 57). For the incorrect translation, ὁ κ. ἔρχεται, Onomast. sacr., ed. Lagarde, 195. 65, and other impossible interpretations, cf. Klostermann, Probleme im Aposteltext, 224 ff. Klostermann's own interpretation ܐܚܗ ܡܢ "Our Lord is the token," stands or falls with his bold exegesis of ver. 22a, "If one does not kiss the Lord Jesus," i.e. "If anyone refuse the fraternal kiss" (ver. 20), and more than this fails to harmonise with the later liturgical use of this formula (see below). This is true likewise of Hofmann's interpretation מר אנתה "Lord art thou" (cf. Ps. xvi. 2). Moreover, it is doubtful whether in Palestine the original n and the final a in the pronoun were still pronounced. The most probable interpretation is that first suggested by Halévy (REJ, 1884, ix. p. 9), and afterwards accepted by Bickell (ZfKTh. 1884, S. 403) and Nöldeke (GGA, 1884, S. 1023; cf. also Siegfried, ZfWTh. xxviii. 128, and Dalman, *Gr.*² 152), namely, קָרָנָא תָא "(our) Lord, come." The fuller form of the suffix -ana מָרָאנָא to be found in Nabatean inscriptions dating from the reign of Aretas iv. (2 Cor. xi. 32), and so from the time of Paul (C. I. Sem. ii. Nos. 199. 8, 201. 4, 206. 7, 208. 6, 209. 8), is just as likely to have been used by the apostle as the shorter form -an; while תָא, the common Syriac form of the imperative from אתָא, was current among the Jews (cf. Dalman, *Gr.*² 357), especially in combinations of words, e.g. תָא שְׁמַע = ἐρχου καὶ ἰδε, John i. 46, and תָא שְׁמַע "come and hear" (cf. Levy, Neuhebr. Lexicon, i. 184; Buxtorf, Lex. talmud. rabb. 248). So interpreted, the formula is quite the equivalent of the ἐρχου κύριε Ἰησοῦ (*S*² תָא מָרָא יֵשׁוּעַ); cf. Rev. xxii. 20; for it makes no difference in the sense whether the exclamation precedes or follows (Ps. lix. 2, lxxi. 4, 12; 2 Sam. xiv. 4, 9). This accounts also for the occurrence of this formula at the close of the Eucharistic prayer in Didache, x. 6 (Const. Ap. vii. 26), no matter whether this prayer which immediately precedes the Amen be regarded as an invitation to the Lord to be present with His people in the sacrament, or as a petition for His speedy return to earth (cf. Forsch. iii. 294; Skizzen, 315, 318, 391). The Eucharistic prayers of the Didache originated in a country where Greek and Aramaic were employed side by side in the Christian communities (above, p. 12 f.), and where the word "mountain" had come to be used quite in the sense of "field"; in other words, in Palestine (cf. Schulthess, Lex. Syropal. 73; Didache, ix. 4, ἐπάνω τῶν ὀρέων, omitted in Const. Ap. vii. 25). If, as seems probable, the Didache itself was prepared in Egypt for the use of Gentile Christian Churches, it follows that these Palestinian prayers, and with them the words hosanna, maranatha, and amen, must have become current far beyond the borders of Jewish Christianity in Palestine. It is a question, however, whether from this fact we ought to infer that the word maranatha was known in the Greek Churches founded by Paul from the very first. Here there was no occasion for the introduction of Aramaic prayer words used in the very early Churches, such as that afforded by the large Jewish population in Egypt (Philo, c. Flacc. vi, about one million). Nor is there any evidence that maranatha, like such words as amen, had a place in the liturgy of the Churches of Asia Minor and Greece. The threat which a reader of the Church lessons on the island of Salamis in the fourth or fifth century is said to have made against one who used his grave contrary to his directions (C. I. Gr. No. 9303 = C. I. Attic. iii. 2, No. 3509), λόγον δῶν τῷ θεῷ καὶ ἀνάθεμα ἦτω. μαρναθῆν (sic), is very manifestly borrowed from 1 Cor. xvi. 22, but without a clear understanding of its sense. A similar use of the word is to be found in a Latin inscription discovered at Poitiers and recorded by Le Blant (Nouvel recueil des inser. chrét. de la Gaule, p. 259, No. 247). In view of all this, there can be little doubt that in quoting this fragment from the liturgy of the Palestinian Church, Paul meant to make unmistakable his reference to certain Christians from Palestine. This purpose would have been obscured had he added a Greek translation (cf. per contra, Gal. iv. 6 ; Rom. viii. 15). The purport of the words is quite in keeping with the Pauline spirit. When he thinks of the disturbers of peace in the Church and its destroyers, of its unskilled workers and hostile critics, his mind turns to the day of judgment (iii. 13-20, iv. 5): "Lord, come and put an end to all strife, and to all the activity of hostile forces in Thy Church."

13. (P. 291.) In the conditional sentence, 2 Cor. xi. 4, what the writer regards as really contrary to fact is put in the present (cf. Matt. xii. 26 ; Rom. iv. 14 ; 1 Cor. ix. 17, xv. 13, 14, 16, 17 ; Gal. v. 11 ; Kühner-Gerth, ii. 466 f.). Although Paul does in one instance (Gal. i. 6) call the preaching of the Judaising missionaries a ἑτερον εὐαγγέλιον, he does not do it without immediately correcting this perverted use of the name gospel (i. 7). It is certain that there was not a second Holy Spirit whom the Corinthians could or must receive through the new preachers, after they had received the real Holy Spirit through the ministry of Paul. Still less was there another Jesus who could be preached at Corinth, after the one Jesus who was the common subject of the Christian preaching had been heralded there and made the foundation of the Church (1 Cor. iii. 11 ; 2 Cor. i. 19, iv. 5). Even if it were conceivable in the light of Gal. i. 6 that Paul might contrast the Christ preached by himself with the Christ preached by his opponents, calling the latter a ἕτερος Χριστός, he could not speak of a ἕτερος, or ἄλλος Ἰησοῦς, as the subject of actual preaching, since there was no second or third Jesus, in addition to Jesus of Nazareth, who could be preached. Furthermore, if the three relative clauses here inserted were meant to characterise a false gospel differing from the gospel of Paul and actually preached in Corinth, then it would be necessary to read παρ' ὃν ἐκηρύξαμεν, παρ' ὃ ἐλάβετε . . . ἐδέξασθε (cf. Gal. i. 8 f.), and ἡμεῖς would probably be inserted in order to express contrast to ὁ ἐρχόμενος. But as the clauses actually read they simply mean that the Corinthians have already received all the essential truths that a new missionary could bring them. Moreover, the apodosis of the sentence shows that Paul is here stating a condition contrary to fact in the present tense. If with BD* we read ἀνέχεσθε, then the sentence means that in this case—but only in this case—are the Corinthians open to no censure in tolerating strange teachers among them (καλῶς ποιεῖτε ἀνεχόμενοι τοῦ ἐρχομένου κτλ.), as they are in fact doing (xi. 19 f.). On the other hand, if we accept the more common reading ἀνείχεσθε, it can hardly be regarded as a simple imperfect, merely descriptive of the attitude of the Corinthians heretofore ; because this attitude toward the strange teachers continues to the present time (xi. 19 f.). Rather is the imperfect to be taken in the sense of ἀνείχεσθε ἂν, there being a transition from the first to the fourth form of the hypothetical sentence (John viii. 39, without ἂν ; Luke xvii. 6, with ἂν after a well accredited εἰ with the present indicative ; cf. Winer, § 42 ; Kühner-Gerth, i. 215). This, however, gives practically the same sense as ἀνέχεσθε. But since the attitude of the Corinthians toward the strange teachers is in Paul's judgment highly censurable, in this instance, where it is actually represented as commendable, the case must be purely hypothetical. The frequently suggested interpretation of καλῶς in a purely ironical sense, in reality expressing strong censure (Mark vii. 9), is scarcely permissible, even from the point of view of style, following as it does a conditional clause in no sense ironical. Nor is it more permissible from the point of view of the thought; for, if someone in Corinth were boasting about alleged spiritual benefits which he did not yet possess, and were debating in his own mind whether he should allow them to be bestowed upon himself, it would not be occasion either for irony or censure. No difficulty to the above interpretation of 2 Cor. xi. 4 is presented by its connection with what precedes; since it is not ver. 4 alone which is connected with what precedes by γάρ, but rather the entire passage, xi. 4-xii. 18, is introduced by γάρ, in order to explain more fully xi. 2-3. And this explanation begins very properly with the concessive statement that the Corinthians would not be blameworthy anyway, i.e. Paul would not need to be anxious about them even if the case suggested in ver. 4 were actually true to fact. To assume the possibility of such a case was just as reasonable as to ask the questions in 1 Cor. i. 13 or 1 Cor. xiv. 36; for the Corinthians, in listening so patiently to the strange teachers, and in permitting them to carry on their work so long without any thought of separating themselves from Paul and his gospel, were acting as if these teachers were actually imparting to them new spiritual truths. The grammatical construction of the conditional sentence forbids the assumption that the reference in this passage may be to some possible future case, in which a certain newcomer, presumably one of the original apostles, whose immediate coming the false apostles had announced, is assumed to be engaged in preaching in Corinth (cf. Hausrath, Der Vierkapitelbrief des Paulus an die Kor. 19). It is impossible also to understand how so important a matter could be referred to in a manner so incidental and enigmatical. Ὁ ἐρχόμενος does not here mean the Great Expected One (Matt. xi. 3), still less one who has already come, i.e. some influential personality who can be connected with the strange teachers who have appeared in Corinth (cf. Ewald, Sendschreiben des Paulus, 225, 295, 298). On the contrary, it is used in a quite general sense (cf. Gal. v. 10, ὁ παράσσων ὑμᾶς; Eph. iv. 28, ὁ κλέπτων; also Rom. iv. 4; 1 Cor. xiv. 2 ff.). In order to understand the passage, it is only necessary to assume that teachers from without had appeared in Corinth (cf. Didache, xi. 1, ὅς ἂν οὖν ἐλθὼν διδάξῃ; xi. 4, πᾶς δὲ ἀπόστολος ἐρχόμενος πρὸς ὑμᾶς; cf. xii. 1, 2). With this interpretation is refuted also the opinion of Baur (i. 318) and Hilgenfeld (Einl. 298), that οἱ ὑπερλίαν ἀπόστολοι (2 Cor. xi. 5, xii. 11) refers to the original apostles. Even if it were possible to suppose that Paul, writing in opposition to the exaggeration of the authority of the original apostles on the part of the followers of Peter, with the corresponding denial of his own apostolic authority, might speak thus ironically of the original apostles,—to which Gal. ii. 6, 9 suggest a certain though entirely insufficient analogy,—from the connection of xi. 5 and xi. 4 it is certain that he had in mind the false apostles and servants of Satan (xi. 13-15) who were active in Corinth at this time. The same is true of xii. 11, particularly in view of the fact that heretofore Paul has not been comparing himself and engaging in discussion with the original apostles, but only with strange teachers in Corinth (xi. 7-xii. 11). Nor is there anything in this context which would indicate that these persons relied on the authority of the apostles, and were exalting it at Paul's expense.

§ 19. SURVEY OF THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

Unless the close connection between 1 Cor. and 2 Cor. be broken, either by the assumption that between the two there belongs an Epistle of Paul to the same Church, which is lost, or which must be searched for (n. 1), or by the assumption of an intervening visit (n. 2), or by the combination of these two hypotheses, 2 Cor. furnishes information both regarding the immediate effect of 1 Cor. and subsequent developments.

Timothy is mentioned in 2 Cor. as a joint writer with Paul of the letter; but the case is not parallel to that of 1 Cor. i. 1 (above, p. 267, n. 6), since Timothy was one of Paul's helpers who had had an active part in the organisation of the Churches in Achaia (i. 19; above, p. 264f., n. 2; cf. 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1). This explains why, contrary to his usage in 1 Cor. i. 4, Paul employs the first person plural from the very beginning of the letter, and uses it quite uniformly up to ix. 15, never exchanging it for the singular except for some good reason, and in only one instance expressly stating who is included in the "we," namely, when he refers to the pioneer preaching of the gospel among the Christians of Achaia, in which Silvanus as well as Timothy had taken part (i. 19). Consequently, as is self-evident, throughout the letter, except where the general nature of the statements made render it clear that all Christians or all like-minded preachers of the gospel are meant, the "we" includes primarily and certainly Timothy and Paul. This is true even of the concluding section chaps. x.-xiii., where, notwithstanding the fact that the introductory αὐτὸς δὲ ἐγὼ Παῦλος indicates that what follows is an expression of Paul's own opinion, in distinction from the joint communication of Timothy and Paul that precedes, we have an occasional substitution of "we" for "I" (n. 3).

Furthermore, it is to be observed that, unlike 1 Cor., 2 Cor. is not intended exclusively for the Church in Corinth, but also for all the other Christians throughout the province of Achaia (above, p. 264 f., n. 2). But if it were intended for the Corinthians only in the same way that it is meant for the other Christians in Achaia, the designation of the readers would certainly be different: either we should have the different places where the letter was to be read enumerated (cf. Rev. i. 4, 11; 1 Pet. i. 1), or all the Churches would be spoken of together as those of Achaia (Gal. i. 2; 1 Cor. xvi. 19; 2 Cor. viii. 1; Gal. i. 22; 1 Thess. ii. 14). The language of the greeting shows, therefore, that while the letter was intended primarily for the Corinthians, it was applicable also, either in whole or in part, to the other Christians in Achaia, and was intended to be communicated to them. In this respect the greeting is different from 1 Cor. i. 2 (above, 297 f., n. 8). Consequently, also, the address Κορίνθιοι in vi. 11 is not to be understood after the analogy of Phil. iv. 15, Gal. iii. 1, as if directed to all the readers, but its occurrence here is due to the fact that in some degree what precedes, and in particular what is said from this point on, is applicable only to the Church in Corinth. This same circumstance explains also the mention of the city in i. 23, which, following the repeated πρὸς ὑμᾶς, δι' ὑμῶν, ἐν ὑμῖν, i. 15–19, is somewhat strange, and, like Κορίνθιοι, excepting the greeting of 1 Cor., which does not need to be taken into account here, is quite without parallel. The expressions in i. 15–19 mean “to, through, and in Achaia”; what follows in i. 23 applies only to the Corinthians.

There were, on the other hand, other things which affected just as vitally the remaining Christians in Achaia, particularly the matter of the collection spoken of in chaps. viii.–ix., in which they had all had a part (ix. 2; Rom. xv. 26). If Titus, who, let us assume, brought the letter from Macedonia to Corinth (see below), journeyed by way of Athens, he is likely at once to have made known the contents of the communication which he bore to the Christians in Athens and in other Christian centres in Achaia en route; since he could not well have passed through these places without stopping to greet them. And inasmuch as he was also personally to superintend the collection in Achaia, he is not at all likely to have left it for the Corinthian Church to see that the letter was circulated among the Churches of Achaia, particularly since viii. 16-24 contained recommendations and proofs of the identity of Titus and his companions quite essential for carrying on the collection. But it may be questioned whether in these transactions Titus informed the other Churches of the contents of the entire letter, which dealt so largely with special conditions in Corinth, or only of such sections as i. 1-22, viii. 1-ix. 15, xiii. 11-13.

The Epistle may be divided into three clearly defined sections, chaps. i.-vii., viii.-ix., x.-xiii. The framework of the first section consists of three fragments of an account of the apostle's journey. While he was still in the province of Asia, he and Timothy, who was with him, were threatened with what seemed certain death (i. 8-10, n. 4). When he reached Troas and was minded to preach the gospel there, a favourable opportunity having offered, he found that he was not in a state of mind sufficiently composed to do so, because he had not been met there by Titus, whom he had sent to Corinth, and whose return he awaited with the utmost anxiety. In the hope of sooner meeting him, he and Timothy left Troas at once and went to Macedonia (ii. 12 f.). After their arrival in Macedonia, where this letter was written, and manifestly not very long before its composition, Titus met him and cheered his heart with good news from Corinth (vii. 5 f.).

The chronological as well as geographical arrangement of the material is retained in the two following sections.

In chaps. viii.—ix. Paul speaks of events that were taking place at the time in the Macedonian Churches where he was, particularly of a recent decision, a decision made since the arrival of Titus. He tells the Corinthians what they did not yet know, and what possibly had not been decided upon when Titus left Corinth, namely, that of their own accord the Macedonian Churches had decided to help in the collection for the Christians in Jerusalem, a collection which had been going on in Corinth now for a year, in fact since before the sending of the communication to which Paul replied in 1 Cor. (n. 5). Moved by the commendatory reports of Paul and Timothy about the collections in Achaia, and without Paul's having ventured to ask it (ix. 2, viii. 5), the poor Macedonians had at once gathered a sum which, in view of their circumstances, was considerable (viii. 1-4, ix. 2). They had already selected one of their own number to accompany Paul and Timothy on their journey with the collection by way of Corinth to Jerusalem (n. 6). The zeal of the Macedonians in this matter, which had been dragging on in Corinth for such a considerable time, and the news brought by Titus regarding the condition of the offering there, led Paul to ask Titus to return to Corinth, whence he had come only a short time before, in company with the representative of the Macedonian Christians and another brother, perhaps the person chosen by the Churches in Asia for this very purpose, in order to complete the collection (viii. 6, 16-24, ix. 3-5).

All that we learn from the second part of the letter (chaps. viii.—ix.) regarding Paul's anticipated visit is, that he did not mean that it should be delayed much longer. He does not intend to wait for the return of Titus and his companions. The two representatives of the Churches are to make the first part of the journey, which was to be completed in company with Paul, somewhat earlier than the apostle, and in company with Titus rather than Paul himself. The three are sent ahead to Corinth to announce his coming (ix. 5), and to deliver the letter in the middle sections of which they had been commended to the Christians of Achaia.

It is not until the third section (chaps. x.-xiii.) that Paul speaks particularly of his own coming. The section begins with a contrast between his anticipated presence among the Corinthians and his absence from them up to this time (x. 1-10), and concludes with the same thought (xiii. 10). Once he expresses the hope of being able to preach the gospel in the regions beyond Corinth (x. 16). But the most important purpose of his coming is to establish order in Corinth, which as yet has not been fully restored (x. 6, xii. 14 f., xiii. 1 f.). He fears that he may find many of the old disorders and be compelled to make use of harsh measures (x. 2, xii. 20 f., xiii. 7-9). As he himself indicates at the close, the purpose of the letter, which is sent from a distance in spite of the fact that he expects to come himself so soon, is to spare himself the necessity of exercising with severity the authority given him by the Lord (xiii. 10), and this is the special purpose of chaps. x.-xiii. It is with this purpose in view that he requests the whole Church to submit itself with more entire obedience than it had done heretofore (x. 6), and resents so decisively the arrogant criticisms of himself and of his letters which were still being made in the Church, particularly by the Christ party (x. 1 f., vii.-xi., xiii. 3-6, above, p. 302). For the last time he threatens those who live immoral lives, and who, in spite of all exhortations, have not repented (xii. 21-xiii. 2).

The larger portion of this section is directed against the teachers from abroad, who, as we have seen, were the followers of Peter (above, pp. 289 f., 300 f.), and the Church is requested no longer to permit these aliens to carry on their pernicious work, which more than anything else had caused the trouble and bitterness in the relations between Paul and the Corinthians (xi. 1-xii. 18). This third part of the letter is the last precursor of the apostle on the way to Corinth.

Tradition makes the Epistle a unit; and this preliminary survey shows it to be such, with an order which is both natural and logical. In spirit the reader follows Paul from Ephesus through Troas to Macedonia (chaps. i.-vii.); then he lingers with him for a moment in the Churches of Macedonia (chaps. viii.-ix.); finally, he is led to the consideration of conditions in the Church at Corinth from the point of view of Paul's coming visit there. The three sections of the letter treat respectively, the immediate past with its misunderstandings and explanations, the present with its practical problems, and the near future with its anxieties.

1. (P. 307.) The theory that after Timothy's return from Corinth Paul wrote a letter to the Corinthians which he sent to them by Titus,—a letter now lost and supposedly referred to in 2 Cor. ii. 3, 9, vii. 8,—was first put forth and defended by Bleek (ThStKr. 1830, S. 625 ff.). This theory was adopted, with varying degrees of confidence, by Credner (Einkl. i. 371), Neander (Ausleg. der Kr. 272, 293 f.), Klöpper (Untersuch. über den 2 Kr. 1869, S. 24 ff.), by the same author in his Kommentar (1874, S. 42 ff.), and by many others. According to Lisco (Die Entstehung des 2 Kr. 1896, S. 1), there is beginning "to be a consensus criticus" (it were better perhaps to say criticorum) on this point. Klöpper admits (38 f.) that in 1 Cor. xvi. 5-7 Paul lays before the Corinthians a new plan for his journey, the plan which he was engaged in carrying out when 2 Cor. was written, as contrasted to his original plan, which had already been put before them, and which is described in 2 Cor. i. 15-16, and he (43) finds in I. xvi. 5-7 the announcement of "an early arrival in Corinth"; though in this passage, which was written at least some weeks before Pentecost, Paul says that he may possibly remain away until the beginning of winter, and in any event will not come immediately (above, p. 268 f.). When now, on the strength of this, there is posited a lost letter sent in the interval between 1 Cor. and 2 Cor., in which Paul "put off his visit and in general made it dependent upon certain conditions" (43), thus accounting for the accusations against which he defends himself in II. i. 12 ff., it may be observed that there is nothing to suggest that at the time of 2 Cor. there was any doubt as to Paul's actually coming. There is nothing in 2 Cor. like I. iv. 18; so that the charge which he meets in II. i. 17 has no reference to what he had said in a very recent letter, nor to a recent change in the plan of his journey, but to the original plan. Of course there was no occasion for this charge until after Paul had declared that he would not follow this but another plan. This he had done, however, with emphasis in I. xvi. 5-7, and when 2 Cor. was written this other plan had been practically carried out, with no recognisable changes. The assumption that in the interval between the writing of I. xvi. 5-7 and II. i. 12-ii. 2, Paul had expressed himself again about the plan for his journey in a letter now lost, and in a manner essentially different from I. xvi. 5-7, and that the reference in II. ii. 3-9 is to this lost letter, cannot be harmonised with the usual translation of II. ii. 3—τοῦτο αὐτό="even this." Nor does it gain support from the translation, "For this very reason" (see below, § 20, n. 5). Unless it be assumed that Paul paid a visit to Corinth during the same interval, which changed the whole situation, and by which also the plans that were in mind when 1 Cor. was written were set aside, this hypothesis renders the entire defence in II. i. 15 ff. meaningless. Paul is accordingly represented as returning, after a temporary vacillation to which expression had been given in the intervening letter, to the definite plan stated in detail in I. xvi. 5-7. In other words, according to II. i. 15 ff., this plan must have been given up temporarily, and taken up again. It would then be necessary for him to distinguish not merely two, but at least three, and if our interpretation of I. xvi. 5-7 (below, § 20, and above, p. 268 f.) be correct, four different stages in the development of this affair—(1) the plan and the promise to come immediately to Corinth from Ephesus by the direct route (cf. I. iv. 18); (2) the opposite plan which is set forth in detail in I. xvi. 5-7, with reasons for the determination not to come immediately, but after an interval by the longer route through Macedonia; (3) the later communication to the Corinthians, of which there is no record, that plan No. 2 had been given up, and that he had returned to plan No. 1; (4) the return to plan No. 2, which, at the time when II. i.-ix. was written, had already been practically carried out. Sufficient refutation of this whole theory is the setting forth of the actual situation (cf. § 20). More than this is unnecessary in regard to Hausrath's theory, that the lost letter sent between 1 and 2 Cor. is to be found in 2 Cor. x.-xiii. (Der Vierkapitelbrief des Paulus an die Kor. 1870). The αὐτὸς δὲ ἐγὼ Παῦλος, x. 1, it is claimed, shows that what follows is an appendix of Paul's to an entirely unrelated letter, possibly a letter to the Corinthians from the Church in Ephesus, or from the Church associated with the house of Aquila in Ephesus (28). This theory rests upon the claim that, while in chaps. i.-ix. Paul speaks in an "undisturbed, most loving, and peaceful state of mind," addressing the Corinthians only in words of appreciation, in chaps. x.-xiii., on the other hand, he defends himself and his companions against the darkest suspicions in a violently polemic manner, making against the Corinthians the most serious charges (S. 2-5). This claim is refuted by the simple restatement of the situation (§ 20). In detail, while it is to be admitted that as a matter of fact the praise in viii. 7 is more strongly expressed than the thanksgiving to God in I. i. 4 f.,—since here, as in II. i. 24 ("For as regards faith ye stand"), in addition to knowledge and speech mention is made also of faith,—yet it is to be observed that there is the same appreciation in I. xv. 1 f. as is found in the earlier chaps. of 2 Cor. Furthermore, in this same section (chaps. i.-ix.) boast is made of the zeal of Paul and Timothy for the Church, and of the love in their hearts which the Corinthians had called out, and which had been awakened into new life by the attitude of the Corinthians toward them that had recently come to light (II. vii. 7, 11). No mention is made, however, of the love of the Corinthians for Paul. But this boast is made only in contrast to their lack of zeal and of an attitude toward the collection which corresponds to the love and praise of Paul. Although the apostle assures the readers of his love, he does it in such a way as to make clear that this love is not yet adequately requited by the readers (cf. vi. 11-13, vii. 3, xi. 11, xii. 15), and, in view of their attitude toward certain matters about which Paul was very much concerned, not deserved. Moreover, it is not to be overlooked that this appreciation of the Corinthians occurs in that portion of the letter (chaps. viii.-ix.) which is addressed especially to the whole Church of Achaia (above, p. 308). Hausrath gets his very dark picture of the condition of affairs in chaps. x.-xiii. only by mixing up all of Paul's statements, complaints, denials, and defences, irrespective of whether they were directed against the Church, individual members of the Church, or teachers from without, and then painting the whole with these dark colours. For example, from xii. 16-18, Hausrath infers that the Church had accused Paul and his messengers of dishonesty, deception, and fraud in the matter of the collection (S. 4, 10, 18); but it is difficult to see why the same inference is not drawn from vii. 2 (οὐδένα ἐπλεονεκτήσαμεν), and why this passage, which is so much more immediately connected with the frank discussion of the matter of the collection in chaps. viii.-ix. than is xii. 16-18, is not treated as a gross contradiction of the situation portrayed in chaps. i.-ix. In the second place, it is to be observed that xii. 18 does not deal with the collection at all, but with the first sending of Titus (viii. 6), which had nothing to do with the collection (see below, § 20, n. 4). Chap. xii. 16 (cf. xi. 7-12, xii. 13-15) deals with the apostle's personal conduct on the occasion of his two former visits, and xii. 17 with all the persons who since the founding of the Church had come to Corinth as Paul's messengers. The language of xii. 16 and the context from xi. 7 on, prove that the accusations which are met in xii. 16 originated with the followers of Peter, and that the latter were compelled to admit that he had not been any expense to the Church, but, on the contrary, had completely renounced the right to be supported, which as a missionary he might have claimed. The accusation (ἀλλὰ ὑπάρχων πανούργος δόλω ὑμᾶς ἐλαβον), which stands in absolute contrast to the concession made in the words οὐ κατεβάφησα ὑμᾶς in xii. 16 (cf. xi. 9; 1 Thess. ii. 6, 9; 2 Thess. ii. 8), would be pointless, if by the very same words the claim were made that Paul had imposed upon the Corinthians the burden of collecting a sum of money, but in doing so had not acted openly, but with deceit. Grammatically and logically, the accusation can only mean that the shrewd apostle, by refusing all compensation for his labours, which seemed generous, but really showed his lack of love for the Corinthians (xi. 11), had in another respect outwitted them, since by this cunningly-devised means he had succeeded in making them morally more dependent upon himself. Consequently πλεονεκτεῖν is manifestly to be taken in the same sense in xii. 17, 18 (vii. 2); for although this word may have been chosen here because of Paul's refusal to accept compensation, its meaning is by no means confined to fraud in money matters (cf. ii. 11, and any lexicon). The light which this hypothesis throws upon the obscurities of chaps. i.-ix. is as small as the foundations upon which it stands are weak. Nor is there any hint in chaps. x.-xiii. regarding the time of Paul's proposed visit to Corinth, to say nothing of the recalling of his original plan. If these chapters were written by the apostle in Ephesus before he started for Macedonia by way of Troas, this alleged four-chapter letter furnished the Corinthians no occasion whatever for the complaints which Paul answers in i. 12–ii. 2. When the latter passage was written, the plan set forth in I. xvi. 5–7 had been practically carried out, and II. x.–xiii. shows no hesitation as to this plan—certainly no promise to do otherwise, such as might have given the Corinthians cause for complaint. The only strange thing is that in II. xii. 14, xiii. 1, Paul makes not the slightest reference to the plan for his journey to Corinth, which is so emphatically set forth in I. xvi. 5–7. The explanation is that at the time when II. i.–ix. was written, which is also the time when II. x.–xiii. was written, this plan had become fact, so that only references of a retrospective character, like those in II. i. 15–ii. 2, could be made to it. Further, Hausrath's hypothesis furnishes not the slightest help in explaining the treatment of the individual case in II. ii. 5–11, vii. 11 f., and the matter of the collection in chaps. viii.–ix.; for in chaps. x.–xiii. the matter of the collection is not once touched upon; and where sinners are mentioned, against whom Paul fears it will be necessary for him to take strong measures when he comes (xii. 21–xiii. 10), there is no special reference to an individual case with which II. ii. 5–11, vii. 11 f. can be connected. The reference in xii. 21–xiii. 10 is to numerous offenders, whom Paul had threatened with punishment on the occasion of his second visit (xiii. 2), which by Hausrath also is placed before 1 Cor. But if the evil-doer of I. v. 1–13 was one of these offenders, then Paul laid himself open to ridicule for speaking in I. v. 1–13 with so much passion about a case with which he had long been familiar, and with which he had dealt at the time of his last visit. How much the hypothesis is worth Hausrath himself shows when he goes on to assume that the case of incest and the matter of the collection were dealt with in a lost letter of the Church of Ephesus to the Corinthians, to which Paul attached his private communication, chaps. x.–xiii. (28); for that is practically to confess that there is not a single independent word in chaps. x.–xiii. on those subjects which could have occasioned what is said in ii. 5–11, vii. 11 ff., viii.–ix. Lisco (Entstehung des 2 Kr. 1896, according to the preface written in 1886) undertook to improve Hausrath's hypothesis by cutting out of this four-chapter letter xii. 11–19, and inserting in its place vi. 14–vii. 1,—a passage which has often been felt to break the connection (see below, § 20, n. 7),—putting xii. 11–19 in between vi. 13 and vii. 2, and by then assuming that i. 1–vi. 13, xii. 11–19, vii. 2 f., ix. 1–15, xiii. 11–13 constitute a second letter, chaps. vii. 4–viii. 24 a third. Several other attempts at division similar in character have been made, which it seems superfluous to describe at length. Cf. the comprehensive discussion by Hilgenfeld ZfWTh. xli. (1899), S. 1–19. It only needs to be mentioned that Semler, who (Paraphr. in Epist. ad Rom. 1769, p. 305 ff.) explained the greater part of Rom. xvi. as an appendix to Rom., holding that it was meant originally for the Corinthians, in his Paraphr. Epist. II. ad Corinth. (1776, pref. and pp. 238, 311–314, 321), suggested that 2 Cor. be divided into the following three Epistles—(1) the Epistle which Paul sent by Titus on the occasion of the latter's second trip to Corinth, chaps. i.–viii., xiii. 11–13; (2) an Epistle to the Christians in Achaia, chap. ix.; (3) an Epistle to the Corinthians which Paul wrote after he had sent Titus the second time, i.e. after he had despatched (1), in consequence of new reports from Corinth of an unfavourable kind, chaps. x. 1–xiii. 10. It was this evidently that led Krenkel to maintain that Paul wrote this letter, x. 1-xiii. 10 (Semler's third letter), in Macedonia, after Titus and his companions, who had delivered in Corinth the letter composed of i. 1-ix. 15, xiii. 11-13 (practically Semler's first and second letters), had returned to Paul in Macedonia with fresh and painful reports.

2. (P. 307.) Following the example of Ewald (Sendschr. des Paulus, 216) and of many others, Krenkel, with especially detailed proof (154-211, 377), has recently advocated the placing of Paul's second visit in Corinth in the interval between 1 and 2 Cor., making it immediately precede the alleged intervening Epistle. The main proof of this position, namely, that this visit could not have taken place before 1 Cor. was written, has already been examined (above, p. 272, n. 14); likewise (above, p. 268, n. 7) the attempt to push 1 Cor. back from the last months of Paul's stay in Ephesus to an earlier time. Moreover, it will be shown in n. 5 that the Pentecost at which Paul was about to leave Ephesus (I. xvi. 8) belongs in the same Julian year (57) prior to the end of which 2 Cor. was written. It is possible that the departure from Ephesus was delayed, because of the delay in the return of Timothy (above, p. 269, n. 7); but it is just as likely to have been hastened because of the uprising led by Demetrius. These possibilities do not need to be taken into account here, so long as it is admitted that 1 Cor. was written several weeks before Pentecost of the year (57), before the close of which 2 Cor. was written (n. 5). Then in the interval between Pentecost and the end of December it would be necessary to place the following events (Krenkel, 377):—(1) a journey by Paul through Macedonia to Corinth, and a troubled stay in the latter place; (2) a return to Ephesus instead of the projected visit to Jerusalem; (3) the sending of Titus to Corinth with a letter of Paul's now lost, wherein announcement was made of his immediate coming for a third visit; (4) Paul's journey from Ephesus by way of Troas to Macedonia, where he meets Titus, and shortly afterwards writes 2 Cor. i.-ix., xiii. 11-13. Without taking into account at all the very clear connection between 1 Cor. xvi. and 2 Cor. i., which does not permit the intervention of a letter nor of a visit (§ 20), it must be confessed that (1) and (4) in this series give rise to the suspicion of being duplicates, due to the critic's double vision; that (2) is extremely improbable; finally, that in the case of (3) the alleged contents of the supposed letter do not harmonise with 2 Cor. ii. 3.

3. (P. 307.) From the fact that the "we" is retained in i. 3-12 it is to be inferred, first of all, that Timothy shared the extreme danger which Paul encountered while he was still in Asia. Assuming that the criticism which is answered in i. 13 was occasioned by something that was said in a previous letter, from the use of "we" it is not necessary to infer that Timothy was one of the authors of the letter; for the criticism is general, and has reference to the ambiguity of Paul's utterances in his correspondence, while in replying to this criticism Paul uses a present tense which indicates nothing as to time. Since Paul was engaged in writing a letter at this very time in conjunction with Timothy, as he had frequently done before, there was no reason why at this particular point he should change to the singular. When he does so temporarily in this immediate context (ἐλπίζω δέ), it is apparent that in expressing this hope that there may never be any further misunderstanding between him and the Church in the future, he has in mind the misunderstanding and unfavourable criticism of the changing plans for his journey, which he proposes to discuss at greater length in i. 15 ff. Inasmuch as i. 15–ii. 11 deals with the announcement and carrying out of plans of journeys and with communications by letter in which Timothy had no part, Paul retains the singular in speaking of himself, except in i. 19–22 (cf. iii. 2), which treats of the missionary preaching in Achaia. In i. 23 with ἐγὼ δέ—which stands in contrast to the preceding ἡμεῖς—Paul returns to the discussion of personal matters already begun. This singular is retained even in ii. 12 f., although, according to i. 8, Timothy was with Paul either before or at the time of his departure from Ephesus, and so certainly at the time of his sojourn in Troas; changing again to the plural in ii. 14 f., which, in spite of the general character of the statements, is to be connected with the sojourn in Troas. However, in a very skilful way, the apostle indicates that the responsibility for the sudden departure from Troas rests not upon Timothy, whose movements are dependent upon his own, but upon himself and his disturbed state of mind. With the exception of a single ἐλπίζω δέ in v. 11 (cf. i. 13, xiii. 6), the plural is retained up to vii. 2, i.e. up to the point where Paul returns again to the matters already touched upon in ii. 5–11, in which Timothy had no direct part (vii. 3–16). Since Timothy accompanied Paul to Macedonia, and was with him when Titus met him there, and naturally took a lively interest in the news which Titus brought, so occasionally here also we find the “we” (vii. 5–7, 13). Once there is a sudden change to “we” in a context where “I” predominates (vii. 14). First of all, it was a comfort to Paul that the boasts which he had made to Titus about the Corinthian Church had not proved false. Since, however, he saw fit to compare the truthfulness of this praise with the truthfulness of all that he had said to the Corinthians, i.e. of his first preaching, in which Timothy had taken part (cf. i. 19), it was natural after this reference to the first preaching of the gospel in Corinth (ἐλαλήσαμεν) to represent Timothy as sharing with him the boasting before Titus (ἡ καύχησις ἡμῶν), vii. 14 (cf. ix. 3). This, of course, was possible only if Timothy was with Paul and agreed with what he said when he talked with Titus about going to Corinth (cf. Hofmann, ii. 3. 196). In chaps. viii.–ix. the “we” predominates, although occasionally the “I” occurs (viii. 8, 10). The frequent interchange of the pronouns in ix. 3–5 affords no reason for excluding Timothy from a single “we.” In chaps. x.–xiii. also the substitution of an occasional “we” for the predominating “I” is not without significance. By x. 11a, xi. 21a, we are reminded that this discussion of the personal relation of Paul to the Church and his opponents is nevertheless part of a letter of which Timothy is one of the authors; by x. 12–16 it is suggested that Timothy is one of Paul’s missionary helpers, well known to the Corinthians, and will continue to be such. From x. 2b–v. 7b, xi. 12, we learn that the criticisms against which he found it necessary to defend himself were also to some extent urged against his helpers; x. 6, 11b, xiii. 4–9, show that Timothy was to accompany Paul to Corinth in the near future. This is indicated also by viii. 19, where the individual whom the Macedonian Churches had chosen to accompany Paul on his journey to Corinth and thence to Jerusalem is called συνέκδημος ἡμῶν not μου. Moreover, in some cases it is not impossible that what Paul says of himself and Timothy by the use of this plural may be applicable also to one or more of his other helpers. It is possible, e.g., that Aristarchus accompanied

Paul and Timothy on the journey from Ephesus to Troas and Macedonia (see n. 6).

4. (P. 309.) Since Troas is in the province of Asia, and since, moreover, Paul never uses Ἀσία except to designate the entire province (above, p. 186 f.), there is no contradiction as to locality between ii. 12 and i. 8. But it necessarily follows from ἐλθὼν δὲ εἰς τὴν Τρωάδα that in i. 8 it is not Troas that is meant, but either Ephesus or some point between Ephesus and Troas. The reference in i. 8 is certainly not to the event hinted at in 1 Cor. xv. 32; for at the time when 1 Cor. was written this was so well known to the readers, that Paul was able to call it to mind by a single word which to us is obscure. It must have been something that happened earlier. In the present case, however, when 2 Cor. was written—and this was certainly some months after the event to which he refers, as is evident from the connection between i. 8–11 and i. 3–7—Paul was still actuated by feelings of grateful joy that he had been delivered out of extreme danger. Even though the Corinthians may in some way have become acquainted with the facts in the case, or might learn the same from the person who brought 2 Cor., Paul nevertheless felt constrained himself to explain to them at the very outset the terribleness of the danger to which he had been exposed. Clearly the event must have taken place sometime between 1 and 2 Cor. It is not unnatural to assume that the event in question is that described in Acts xix. 23–41. Hofmann's objection (ii. 3. 11), namely, that, according to Acts xix. 22, Timothy had left Ephesus several months before Paul, and so could not have been with Paul at the time of Acts xix. 23 ff., as is presupposed in 2 Cor. i. 8, is not decisive against this position. The account in Acts is not complete at this point; there is no record of the return of Timothy to Paul while he was still in Asia, which we infer from 2 Cor. i. 8, and we are by no means sure whether this return took place at the time indicated by Acts xx. 1, or in the interval suggested by Acts xix. 22b. It is, however, impossible to connect 2 Cor. i. 8 with Acts xix. 23 ff., for the reason that in the latter account there is nothing to indicate that Paul's life was in serious danger. From the danger immediately threatening he escaped (xix. 30). The favour of the Asiarchs (xix. 31) would have protected him in a suit at law, such as the town-clerk (γραμματεὺς, ver. 35) had in mind (xix. 38). But it did not come to this. Paul was able to depart unmolested (xx. 1). Nor would the apostle have regarded as especially terrible a death brought upon him because of his effective preaching of the gospel in Ephesus; although, as a matter of fact, this could hardly have been the outcome of such a trial as that hinted at (cf. Phil. i. 20–23, ii. 17; 2 Tim. iv. 6–8; Acts xx. 22–24). As Hofmann suggests, it is more likely to have been the danger of drowning, possibly during a stormy voyage from Ephesus to Troas (2 Cor. xi. 25). But if Paul had left land behind, he could hardly have used the expression ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ. Or he may have fallen into the hands of robbers, and have been saved from a horrible death only through unexpected aid (2 Cor. xi. 26).

5. (P. 310.) In 2 Cor. viii. 10, Paul writes that the Corinthians had begun their collection in the previous year (ἀπὸ πέρυσσι), and in ix. 2 he says that recently he had boasted to the Macedonians that Achaia had been prepared in regard to this matter ever since the preceding year. Now manifestly the reference here cannot be to two entirely different facts, because the same expression is used in both instances to indicate the time (ἀπὸ πέρυσι), and there is nothing in ix. 2 which suggests that Paul had made a mistake in thus boasting about the Corinthians. Since it was this boasting which, according to ix. 2, incited the Macedonians themselves to take part in the collection (cf. viii. 1-5), the apostle may have made it before Titus' arrival. But this was the very time when Paul was least likely to be optimistic about conditions in Corinth (ii. 13, vii. 5). He had not boasted that the collection in Corinth was all ready, but simply that the Churches in Greece, unlike those in Macedonia, where no preparations for a collection whatever had been made, were in a position to send a collection to Jerusalem, and that these preparations to take the collection had been begun by them in the preceding year. This does not imply that they had not progressed in the collection since that time, nor that they had now completed it. The question naturally arises as to the method by which the year is here reckoned. Was it after the ecclesiastical calendar of the Jews, according to which the year begins with the first of Nisan, or the spring equinox (Hofmann, ii. 3. 211), or the Macedonian calendar (Wieseler, Chronol. 364), in which the year begins with the autumn equinox, and corresponds to the Jewish civil calendar, or the Athenian, which corresponds to the Olympian reckoning, and in which the year begins with the summer solstice (Credner, Einl. i. 371f.)? It is difficult to understand why use has never been made of other calendars, e.g. the political year of the Romans, which began with the first of January. This would have been especially appropriate in this letter, since Corinth, the city to which it was to be sent, was a Roman colony, founded by Julius Cæsar; and very possibly the letter itself was written in Philippi, another Roman colony. But just because the Churches here in question were scattered and made up of different nationalities, and therefore were without any uniform calendar, it is not likely that Paul in writing ἀπὸ πέρυσι silently took for granted one of several possible ways of reckoning the year. Quite apart from this, however, it would have been very unnatural for Paul to say in this connection simply that the event in question took place before the beginning of the last new year. In January or February we never speak of the last Christmas as that of the preceding year, nor of the vintage gathered in October preceding as that of last year. We use the expressions, "in the preceding year," "last year," etc., only when the larger part of twelve months has elapsed since the event to which reference is made. Neither, on the other hand, do we employ these expressions when considerably more than a year has elapsed. So the only conclusion to be drawn from 2 Cor. viii. 10, ix. 2, is that about a year had elapsed between the beginning of the collection in Achaia and the composition of 2 Cor. A period of from three to six months is just as much excluded by the expression as a period of eighteen or more months. Now, from 1 Cor. xvi. 1 (above, p. 260) we know that this matter had been touched upon in a letter from the Corinthians to which 1 Cor. is the answer. It is probable that prior to his departure from Ephesus, Stephanas (i. 16. 15f., cf. Hofmann, ad loc.) had been earnestly engaged in this work. Since, however, the Churches in Greece, unlike those in Macedonia, had been stirred up to this service by Paul himself (II. viii. 3-5), at the very latest this earnest request of the apostle's must have been made in the letter of Paul's, now lost (I. v. 9), which preceded the letter from the Church. Now, if 1 Cor. was written near the Easter festival (above, p. 258), then the collection in Corinth must have been begun at the very latest in February of that same year, possibly several months earlier. On the other hand, from Acts xx. 3-6 (cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 6, παραχειμάσω) we ascertain that Paul spent the three months that preceded the opening of navigation in the year 58, roughly from the 10th of December 57 to the 10th of March 58, in Greece, and naturally part of it in Corinth. Hence 2 Cor. must have been written before the end of the year 57. Not very much of this year could have remained. For, while Paul sends Titus and two other Christians on ahead, he does not expect them to return, but treats them simply as his messengers, whom he will follow shortly (II. ix. 5, x. 6, xii. 14, xiii. 1). If, then, 2 Cor. was written somewhere about November 57, the Passover near which 1 Cor. was written must have been that of 57; for if we assume that it was the Passover of 56, then between 1 and 2 Cor. there would be an interval of nineteen months (April 56 to November 57), and between the beginning of the collection (which in this case would be at the latest February 56) and 2 Cor. an interval of at least twenty-one months, which disagrees entirely with II. viii. 10, ix. 2.

6. (P. 310.) That the facts spoken of in viii. 1-5, the παρακαλέσαι Τίτον (viii. 6, cf. ix. 5), which grew out of the same, and the τὴν παράκλησιν ἐδέξατο (viii. 17) belong in the very recent past, is proved: (1) by the fact that Titus could not possibly have returned to Paul until after the events described in vii. 6-16; (2) just as certainly by the entire context, viii. 6-ix. 5, where, as is usual in epistolary style, the aorists ἐξῆλθεν (viii. 17), συνεπέμψαμεν (viii. 18, 22), ἔπεμψα (ix. 3) indicate action contemporaneous with the sending of the letter. Of Titus' companions on his second journey to Corinth, only the person first described (viii. 18-21) is expressly said to have been chosen by the Macedonian Churches to accompany Paul and Timothy on their journey to Jerusalem with the collection. The tradition which identifies this person with Luke is due to some scholar's interpretation of viii. 18. Luke was not a Macedonian. It is more likely to have been Aristarchus (Hofmann, ad loc.), who was a Thessalonian (Acts xx. 4, see above, pp. 209 f., n. 2, 212 f., n. 6), who had been with Paul for some time (Acts xix. 29, συνεκδήμους = 2 Cor. viii. 19), and who therefore had had opportunity to win commendation in a number of Churches through the part which he took in the missionary work (2 Cor. viii. 18). As a matter of fact, Aristarchus did go with Paul to Jerusalem, and accompanied him also to Rome (Acts xx. 4, xxvii. 2). Or it might have been Sopatros or Sosipatros of Berea, who a little later was with Paul in Corinth, and accompanied him also to Jerusalem (above, p. 209). The second anonymous companion of Titus (viii. 22) is included with the first among the ἀπόστολοι ἐκκλησιῶν in viii. 23, and therefore, like him, must have been the representative of a Church or of a group of Churches. Only he was not from Macedonia, and he had no connection with the matter of the collection; for in that case there is no reason why he should not be mentioned at once in viii. 18 along with Titus' other companion, since all that is said in viii. 18-22 would then apply equally to him. When we remember that it was Paul's plan on this journey, which as originally projected was to lead him through Macedonia to Corinth, and from Corinth to Palestine (Acts xix. 21, xx. 3), to take with him representatives also of other Churches which have no share in this collection (above, p. 209), we find ourselves shut up to a choice between Gaius of Derbe and one of the two men from Asia, Tychicus or Trophimus (Acts xx. 4, xxi. 29, above, p. 209, n. 2). These, then, are the "brethren" with whom, together with Timothy, after the return of the latter from Corinth, Paul planned at the time when he wrote 1 Cor. xvi. 11 to start on his journey to Macedonia, Greece, and thence to Jerusalem (above, p. 269 f., n. 8).

§ 20. OCCASION, PURPOSE, AND EFFECT OF THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

Answer to the much mooted question as to what took place between the two extant letters to the Corinthians and as to what in general are the historical presuppositions of 2 Cor., must be sought mainly from the first section of the letter (chaps. i.-vii.), which is retrospective, particularly from what is said between the first and second of the three historical notices (i. 12-ii. 11) that form the framework of the first division of the Epistle, together with what follows the third of these notices (vii. 5-16); since what is said between the second and third of these remarks (ii. 14-vii. 1 or vii. 4) is of a more general character, and much less closely connected with the historical notices that precede and follow (n. 1). On the other hand, what is said between the notice of the dangers that threatened Paul's life at or shortly after his departure from Ephesus (i. 8-11, above, p. 318, n. 4) and the notice of his journey through Troas (ii. 12 f.), is evidently inserted at this point because it relates mainly to this particular journey from Ephesus to Macedonia by way of Troas, and to events closely associated with the same.

Mention of the prayers of the Corinthians, of which he feels sure he shall have the benefit in all future dangers, such as those he had encountered in Asia (i. 11), gives him opportunity to call his conscience to witness that he had acted always, particularly in his relation to the Corinthians, simply and sincerely, not being governed by a spirit of worldly cunning, but acting under the guidance of the grace of God (ver. 12, n. 2). That the criticisms which Paul here answers, both that of insincerity and that of acting in an unsanctified and wilful manner, were actually current in Corinth, and had been made to the apostle himself by the Church, either through Titus or in a communication which Titus brought, is clear from the apologetic explanation beginning at this point. From the sentence, "We write nothing but what ye read or indeed understand" (ver. 13), we infer that Paul had been criticised for having written something in his letters or in one of them which afterwards he wanted them to understand in a sense opposed to the language, and impossible for any ordinary reader to infer. We are reminded at once of the misinterpretation of a passage in his first letter (now lost) which Paul corrects in 1 Cor. v. 9-11 (above, p. 261). That this is the case he had in mind is rendered all the more certain, by the fact that the language in which Paul corrects the misinterpretation in 1 Cor. agrees exactly with the language of the criticism here presupposed. In making this correction, he does not say, "When I wrote the passage I meant it to be taken as now explained, not as you understood it," but very pointedly, "This and nothing else is what I wrote to you"; so that it was very natural for the Corinthians, when they looked at the earlier communication again, and found language which really admitted the construction which Paul declared to be foolish and unfair, to retort, "In his letters Paul writes what his readers cannot find in them nor read out of them." So Paul gets back his own criticism of their lack of εἰλικρίνεια (1 Cor. v. 8, above, p. 276), though, as the tone of his reply indicates, in a manner entirely polite, perhaps even deferential, designed less to criticise Paul than to justify themselves for having formerly misunderstood him.

One misunderstanding was now cleared up. And with the expression of the hope that hereafter so long as he lives the Church will understand him, and understand him fully, he passes to the discussion of a second point with regard to which there was disagreement between himself and the Church. This disagreement concerned the journey to Corinth, which had been announced long before, and which was now being carried out in a way different from that which he had originally intended and announced. When, some time previously,—just how long is not indicated,—Paul had intended, and, as the context shows, promised the readers to come to Corinth sooner than he was now actually doing, or to come to Corinth before he went to Macedonia (n. 2), whither he had now gone without having come to Corinth at all (cf. i. 23), he made the promise in the confidence that the Corinthians would understand and appreciate his reasons. He meant then to arrange his plans so as to go directly from Ephesus to Corinth and from Corinth to Macedonia, whence he planned to return to Corinth and thence to journey to Jerusalem. His thoughtful intention was by paying them two visits to give the Corinthians not only a single, but a twofold proof of his love; for such, in any case, his visit was to be regarded. Now, in view of the criticism that in making his original plan, which was never carried out, and informing his readers of it, Paul had acted with fickleness (i. 17*a*), it must be assumed that it had become quite clear to the Corinthians, either from Paul's evident intentions inferred from something he had said or done, that this plan had been given up, and, over and above this, the solemn assurance of i. 23—ii. 2 makes it clear beyond all question that in its last analysis the dissatisfaction of the Church was caused by Paul's continued absence from Corinth—in other words, by the fact that he had not carried out his original plan, but had gone first to Macedonia, and kept putting off his arrival in Corinth by the slowness of his movements. In reply, Paul assures them that this failure to come to them, which they thought showed a lack of love on his part, was due only to his desire to spare them. With reference to the original plan, the carrying out of which would have met their wishes, the only criticism they make is that it was not well considered. If Paul were conscientious, they thought, he ought not to have made such a plan unless he were sure he could carry it out; and he ought not to have aroused their expectations by announcing it unless he were resolved to come at any cost. Possibly, in connection with this charge of fickleness in the matter of his earlier plan, the criticism was also made, that in changing his plans he was influenced by purely worldly designs and by motives of self-interest. If, as seems probable from i. 12, this was actually the case, the apostle gives the criticism an unexpected turn, when he asks whether generally, in making plans, he is accustomed to act in so worldly a manner as to make his yes and no in such matters absolute (n. 2). It is not the making and subsequent alteration of his plans which, in his judgment, would be a βουλεύεσθαι κατὰ σάρκα, but the subsequent demand of the Corinthians that a promise impossible of fulfilment be considered irrevocable, and that a course decided upon be persisted in at all hazards. In answer to the criticism that his promises were untrustworthy and ambiguous, he avers that what he and his helpers had said to the Corinthians was by no means both yes and no, but just as simple and straightforward as their preaching of Christ in Corinth had been; and as far as any appearance of hesitancy on his part, dictated by worldly or selfish motives, or any criticisms to that effect are concerned, he calls God to witness, who makes him steadfast and endows him with the Spirit as a pledge of his future perfecting and as a seal of the genuineness of his present motives. He calls upon God to witness to the truth of his assurance that it was his considerate desire to spare the Corinthians, which, up to this time, had kept him away from Corinth. Even though remembering the pain he had suffered in connection with an earlier visit (above, p. 263 f.), he felt inclined to spare himself the renewal of such sorrow; it was, after all, the Church most of all which he would spare sorrow, because he felt it his duty to minister rather to their joy (i. 18–ii. 2).

It may be assumed that Paul is here answering complaints of the Church which had been reported to him orally by Titus, or which had been expressed in a letter from the Church to Paul brought to him by Titus. The latter is more probable, in view of the definite form these complaints must have had, if we may judge by Paul's reply. Their primary occasion, however, could not have been the journey of Paul through Troas to Macedonia. For Paul must have sent Titus to Corinth before this journey was begun, since at the time when he set out he was expecting to meet Titus in Troas, whither he was to come from Corinth through Macedonia.

If, now, we ask how the Corinthians learned about the plan for the journey which Paul was now carrying out, and which, judging from the fact that he defends it, must have been well under way, nothing is more natural than to assume that Titus, who left Paul before he began the execution of this plan, informed the Corinthians of Paul's purpose not to come to them directly by sea, but by the longer route through Macedonia. But if, as was certainly the case, Titus was sent, and arrived later than Fortunatus, Achaicus, and Stephanas, who were the bearers of 1 Cor. (above, p. 260), he had nothing new to say to the Corinthians about Paul's plans. For example, this same plan which he was engaged in carrying out at the time when 2 Cor. was written, Paul himself had set forth in detail in 1 Cor. xvi. 5–7. Between this communication by letter and the apologetic discussion of 2 Cor. i. 15–ii. 2 nothing intervened save the partial carrying out of this plan, hence nothing had occurred in this interim that could occasion the complaints about the carelessness with which Paul made his plans, and the arbitrariness with which he changed the plans that had been already made and announced. The occasion for the complaints answered in 2 Cor. i. 15–ii. 2 must be, therefore, in part things said in 1 Cor., in part things said before 1 Cor. was written. That this is the case is proved by a careful consideration of the manner in which Paul speaks of his journey in 1 Cor. xvi. 5–9. He does it with a detail and emphasis which is intelligible only if the readers had other expectations at the time. He does not stop with saying that he will come to Corinth after he has passed through Macedonia, but adds, “For I do pass through Macedonia.” This last phrase does not add any new thought, so that its purpose must be to strengthen the preceding statement (present διέρχομαι of a future journey, used with ἐλεύσομαι), and, by the position of the second Μακεδονίαν, to emphasise strongly that this was the route that he intended to take. Change of route involved also a change in the time of his arrival and the length of his stay in Corinth, and this contrast is expressed even more strongly, both in positive and negative form, than is that between the two possible routes. He has made up his mind not to visit them immediately (above, p. 271, n. 12), which would necessitate his coming directly by sea instead of through Macedonia, and that would mean only a flying visit; whereas, according to the plan he now lays before them, while arriving considerably later, he hopes to be able to pay them a much longer visit. From the detail with which he speaks in ver. 6 and again in ver. 7 of the greater length of his visit in Corinth if the new plan is carried out, we see that he is making an effort to justify his present plan. It shall be only for their advantage that he does not now come directly by sea, but arrives considerably later, coming by the longer route through Macedonia. Therefore, at the time when 1 Cor. xvi. 5–7 was written, Paul must have been expected to arrive in Corinth very shortly from Ephesus, directly by sea. For such an expectation only the apostle himself could have been responsible. Some time before 1 Cor. was written he must have expressed this intention, the inference being that he had done so in his earlier Epistle (1 Cor. v. 9). Paul had all the more reason for fearing that the Church, or those members of it who held an immediate visit to be desirable, would be dissatisfied with the new plan which he now laid before them, involving as it did further postponement of his visit; since there were some in Corinth who interpreted his delay heretofore as due to cowardice, and who expressed the opinion that he would never appear in Corinth again (1 Cor. iv. 18); therefore the detail with which he lays his newly-made plan before his readers, in 1 Cor. xvi. 5-9, aiming to forestall such complaints. It is now clear that the original plan, knowledge of which is presupposed in I. xvi. 5-7, is the same as that which he defends in II. i. 15-17 against the charge of having been made without due care; and also that the new plan laid before the readers in I. xvi. 5-7 is identical with the plan that had been practically carried out at the time when 2 Cor. was written, and which is defended in II. i. 15-ii. 2 against the charge of changeableness, of selfish arbitrariness, and of inconsiderateness.

In spite of his careful precautions, the fears which he had when writing I. xvi. 5-7 were realised. This communication, and his subsequent journey by way of Troas to Macedonia, had caused the dissatisfaction in Corinth which in II. i. 12-ii. 2 Paul seeks to allay. This, taken along with the fact that in spite of its general character II. i. 13 manifestly has special reference to the misunderstanding discussed earlier in I. v. 9-11, and to the conclusion which had there been reached concerning the matter (above, p. 322), proves those to be in error who assume a lost Epistle between 1 and 2 Cor., especially those who suppose that a visit took place between the writing of these two letters

(above, § 19, n. 1, 2, p. 312 f.). The principal cause for the origin of the first of these hypotheses is the observation that the news from Corinth, which is presupposed in II. i.–vii., was not brought by Timothy,—although from what is said in I. iv. 17, xvi. 10 f., we should expect Timothy to report to Paul the effect of 1 Cor.,—but by Titus, of whom no mention is made in 1 Cor. If, now, as from II. i. 8 appears to be the case, Timothy was with Paul when he started on his journey from Ephesus to Macedonia, and if, as indicated by II. vii. 14, he was also with Paul at the time when Titus was sent to Corinth (see above, p. 316 f., n. 3), it seems as if a situation had been created by the sending and the return of Titus entirely different from that produced by 1 Cor., which ended with the return of Timothy to Paul. Inasmuch, now, as mention is made in II. ii. 3, 9, vii. 8–12 of a letter of Paul's which had been received in Corinth shortly before, the effect of which is reported to Paul by Titus, it was very natural to assume that this letter was not our 1 Cor., but a later Epistle of Paul's which Titus had taken with him the first time he went to Corinth. This assumption seems all the more necessary, according as it is felt that what is said in II. ii. 3, 9, vii. 8–12, cannot be made to apply to 1 Cor. without doing considerable violence to the language. In addition to what has been said above in proof of the inseparable connection between 1 and 2 Cor., the following is to be remarked: From the fact that Timothy returned to Paul before the latter's departure from Ephesus, it does not follow that the expectations expressed in I. xvi. 10 f. were all realised. Indeed, the expectation that Timothy will arrive in Corinth after the arrival of 1 Cor. is not unconditionally expressed (n. 3); so that it is not unlikely, either that Timothy did not reach Corinth at all, but for some reason unknown to us had occasion to return to Paul in Ephesus directly from Macedonia; or that, while he did go to Corinth, he arrived and departed again before

1 Cor. reached its destination. In either case, Timothy could not have brought Paul the news about the effect of 1 Cor., which Paul hoped he would bring. It was for this reason, then, that immediately after Timothy's return he despatched Titus, in company with another Christian, to Corinth, in order that they might bring the news concerning the effect of 1 Cor. which he awaited with so much anxiety. That this was the purpose for which Titus was sent we are justified in assuming, since nothing is said of any other object, and since this assumption is in entire harmony with all the hints concerning the result of the journey (n. 4).

The whole question turns upon a letter of Paul's concerning the effect of which upon the Church he was so anxious before Titus' arrival, that for the time being he regretted having written it (vii. 8). In these circumstances, it is not surprising that in Troas he was so disturbed, when Titus failed to meet him there according to expectations (ii. 13), as to be practically unable to preach. That the letter in question is our 1 Cor. may seem doubtful if ii. 3 be interpreted to mean that Paul had actually written in that letter what is expressed in the verses just preceding, namely, his determination not to come at once to Corinth as he was expected to do, but to remain away temporarily in order not to be in Corinth a second time in sorrow (i. 23-ii. 2). For although the plan he was now engaged in carrying out had been set forth in I. xvi. 5-7, in contrast to the earlier plan which would have brought him to Corinth by the direct route and at once, in that presentation the essential point of the statement in 2 Cor. expressly referred to by τοῦτο αὐτό is lacking, namely, the motive here indicated for the change in the plan of the journey (i. 23-ii. 2). There is, however, nothing to prevent us from translating: "And I wrote for this very purpose, that when I come, I may not have sorrow from those who ought to give me joy; (and I wrote) with confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all" (n. 5). What has just been declared to have been his reason and purpose in remaining away from Corinth, or for changing the plan of his journey, is here assigned as the reason and purpose for his writing. Instead of making his visit at once according to the announcement, he had sent the long letter, at the close of which he had carefully explained that he was not coming to Corinth at once, and why he had made the change.

The opinion that what Paul says in ii. 4 about his state of mind when the letter in question was written, does not harmonise with the quiet tone of 1 Cor., is not made more intelligible by being repeated. With what tremendous wrath against the alien destroyers of the Church (I. iii. 16 ff., ix. 1, xvi. 22), against the scandalous members of the same (v. 1-5), against the Church itself which was so unruly and at the same time so self-conscious, and against the noisy brawlers (iv. 7, 18-21, v. 2, viii. 1 f., xi. 16, xiv. 37 f.), does every line of the Epistle quiver! The tone of the eloquent description in iv. 8-13 and of the apostle's half ironical self-judgment in vii. 25, 40 is that of bitterest agony. It required effort on the apostle's part to reply as calmly as he did to the arrogant communication which the Church had sent to him (above, pp. 277, 282). But that is the very situation which brings tears to the eyes of a man of deep feeling. Moreover, in entire keeping with 1 Cor. is the necessity which he now feels of protesting that in the communication in question he had no deliberate intention of causing the Church pain (II. ii. 4, cf. vii. 8-11). So far as we are able to judge from letters which are extant, there is no other Church whose open sores are so ruthlessly exposed as those of the Corinthians (I. iii. 3, iv. 6-10, v. 1 f., vi. 1-10, 18-20, viii. 10-12, x. 20-22, xi. 17-30). When, after a deeply humiliating discussion, he says that he did not write thus in order to shame the Corinthians (iv. 14), manifestly the effect is not less painful than in another passage, where he says in so many words that his intention was to shame them (vi. 5). The same is true also of the passage where he introduces the discussion of all sorts of disorders and of wilful violations of the custom of the Church, by the commendatory remark that they follow his instructions (xi. 2). There is not to be found throughout this entire long letter a single real commendation of any feature of the moral or religious life of the Church, and Paul was not usually sparing of such commendations. The only thing that he praises is what God has done for them (i. 2, 9, 26, iii. 6-10, 16, iv. 15, vi. 11, 20, xv. 1 f.) and bestowed upon them in the way of spiritual gifts (i. 4-7) (above, pp. 279, 297 f., n. 5). In referring to a letter of this kind, he had just as much occasion to protest that he had not written it with any intention of causing the Corinthians pain, though it actually had this effect, as he had the right to assure them that they ought rather to regard it as a special token of his love (II. ii. 4, cf. vii. 8-11). Incidentally we learn that disparaging remarks had been made in Corinth to the effect that Paul praised himself (II. iii. 1, v. 12, x. 12, cf. iv. 5) and defended himself when there was no sufficient occasion for it (xii. 19). For such strictures as these ample occasion was furnished by 1 Cor. Quite in the manner of an accused person he had questioned the competency of the tribunal before which it seemed he was charged (I. iv. 1-5). In another passage, of which there are reflections in II. iii. 1-3 (I. ix. 1-3), he had made a very concise defence before his accusers and judges. He had justified at length the way in which he had preached at Corinth, I. i. 18-iii. 2, and defended single points in his judgments which had been questioned, e.g. what he had said about the happiness of the unmarried state, I. vii. (see above, p. 276 f.). He had pictured eloquently the self-sacrifice which his calling involved, I. iv. 9-13, xv. 32. Again and again he had commended his example to the Church, I. iv. 16 f., viii. 13, ix. 26 f., x. 33, xi. 1. Not only had he spoken emphatically of the validity of his apostleship (I. i. 1, ix. 1), and of his relation to the Church as its sole founder (iii. 6, 10, iv. 15), but he also claimed to have fulfilled his office in Corinth in a manner both skilful and faithful (iii. 10, iv. 4). What sort of reward and praise he hoped one day to receive from the just Judge (iii. 8, 13, iv. 5, ix. 18) he left them to infer from his proud assertion, that he laboured more abundantly than all the other apostles (xv. 10).

But the serious demands which he made had also tested severely the obedience of the Church (II. ii. 9), especially what he had said in connection with the case of incest (I. v. 1-13). Assuming that practically all that happened between the two letters was the sending of Titus, and his return with news from Corinth, this must be the case referred to in II. ii. 5-11, vii. 11 f. There is no reason why we should be surprised at the position which Paul now takes, nor is there any justification for replacing the data supplied by existing sources for the explanation of these passages by conjectures which cannot be proved. If the view of Paul's original demand set forth above (p. 278) be correct, it is quite in keeping with the principle of Church discipline clearly stated in II. x. 6. In the first place, Paul must have waited for the Church to concur in his previous judgment; for only after this agreement had been declared could the judgment be executed by the joint action of Paul and the Church in the manner that Paul had proposed in 1 Cor. But, as a matter of fact, as appears from II. ii. 6-11, the Church had referred the question back to Paul for his further decision. And, indeed, the judgments of Paul in 2 Cor. sound so much like answers to definite communications and questions, that the conjecture forced upon us earlier by i. 8-ii. 4 is fully confirmed, namely, that the Corinthians had recently communicated with Paul, not only orally through Titus, but also in a letter which Titus brought to Paul. Paul's verdict, which begins with the words, "Sufficient for this man is the punishment decreed by the majority" (ii. 6, n. 6), presupposes (1) that the offender had been definitely punished either by word or by deed, and that Paul had been informed of the fact; (2) that this punishment had been decreed not unanimously, but only by the decision of the majority; (3) that the Church had submitted to Paul for his decision the question whether this punishment was sufficient. This in turn presupposes (4) that the opinion had been expressed in Corinth that the punishment was by no means sufficient, or that Paul would not be satisfied with it, or both. Paul at once declares the punishment to be sufficient, not, however, in the sense that the matter is thereby settled, but with the added remark that the punishment is enough to enable the Church now to show mercy to the evil-doer and uphold him by their encouragement, lest he be entirely overcome by his great sorrow. For the Church to forgive him, Paul says, is not only permissible, but, in view of the harm which may thereby be avoided, it becomes their duty. There seems, therefore, to be sufficient reason for the apostle's request that it be formally decided to show love to the offender (ver. 8). But by the τουναντίον μᾶλλον this verdict of Paul is set in strong contrast to another judgment, which went to the opposite extreme. Instead of increasing the sentence already passed, they are to lighten the same by formal decree, or otherwise to render it less severe. Inasmuch as the judgment expressed at the outset is opposed to the opinion that the punishment already decreed is by no means sufficient, the τουναντίον μᾶλλον renders it quite certain that this other view had been submitted to the apostle by the Church for his decision. This must have been the opinion of the minority, since the punishment actually decreed represented the mind of the majority. We learn at the same time that the Church was uncertain whether Paul in turn would be satisfied with what had been done; for he finds it necessary expressly to assure the Church that he concurs in the act of forgiveness decided upon (ver. 10).

What this punishment was which had been decided upon by the majority, naturally we are not able to determine with entire certainty. Manifestly it was not the punishment suggested by Paul in I. v. 3-5; since (1) the infliction of this punishment required Paul's co-operation in a manner which necessitated prearrangement, and since (2) this punishment involved the death of the offender; so that there could have been no question about a subsequent increase of penalty, or about Paul's satisfaction with what had been done. More likely it was an ordinary case of discipline according to the rules laid down in I. v. 11; 2 Thess. iii. 14 f. The severer penalty demanded by the minority, and which the Church thought that Paul also might insist upon, can hardly have been any other than that which Paul proposed in I. v. 3-5. Consequently in the communication, to which Paul replies in II. ii. 6-11, the Church must have asked him whether, under the altered conditions, he still held to his original judgment. Paul reverses his decision, and earnestly requests that the punishment under which the offender is at present suffering be lessened by formal decree, lest he completely yield to despair. He was able to do this without prejudice to the seriousness of the affair, or to his own personal dignity. How strongly he felt himself under obligation to take this position, is indicated by ii. 11. He knows that nothing would please Satan more than to see him, influenced by the motive of worldly consistency which he had condemned in i. 17, stand by his original judgment and proposal. All such suggestions he rejects as cunning temptations of Satan to keep him from permitting clemency. The primary purpose of his original judgment had been to save the soul of the offender (I. v. 5). That purpose was now being accomplished without resort to the extreme measures he had at first proposed; the offender was deeply penitent. It seems also that this person had done all in his power to prove to the Church that he regretted his action, and, in so far as this was possible, to atone for the wrong which he had done to his father against whom primarily the sin had been committed (n. 6). But if the severe disciplinary measures adopted by the Church were enforced longer, or if they were increased, there was, Paul now thought in the light of the news that had come to him, extreme danger that the purpose of reforming the offender and of saving his soul would be defeated altogether. For if this person were wholly overcome by his sorrow, he would fall into the hands of Satan, who, by the suggestion that Paul ought persistently to stand by his first decision, was endeavouring to lead even the apostle astray. Paul gives up the means which he had previously suggested, in order to secure the end which it was altogether desirable to accomplish.

But more than this, what he had designed by his earlier proposition to accomplish in the Church was in large part accomplished, and promised soon to be entirely realised. The only intention which can be directly inferred from I. v. 1-13 is the intention to move the Church to a more modest judgment of itself and a more rigorous disciplining of its sinful members. When, now, in II. ii. 9, vii. 12, Paul says that he wrote as he did in order to prove whether the Church was ready to render entire obedience, and to give it an opportunity to show an earnest desire to please its founder, the statement can only be regarded as an expression of his original intention in the light of the accomplished result. From the stirring description of the effect of the earlier letter, vii. 7-12, which clearly has its climax in the reference to the case discussed earlier in ii. 5-11, we learn that now the Church was deeply impressed with the magnitude of the offence committed against Paul and in the sight of God, and that it was not only exceedingly anxious to conciliate the apostle, but had also visited its displeasure and punishment upon the offender (vii. 11, n. 6). While as yet the majority had not agreed to Paul's earlier proposal, they had nevertheless, in reporting the disciplinary measures proposed, and in stating the manner in which the entire action had been taken, practically resubmitted the whole case to him for his opinion and decision (ii. 6-8). Finally, they had endeavoured, not unsuccessfully, to justify themselves in this matter. Perhaps in his joy at what had been accomplished, Paul expresses himself a little extravagantly when he writes, "In every way ye have shown yourselves to be pure in this matter" (vii. 11, where the εἶναι is not to be overlooked). Although this is not equivalent to the statement that the Church had proved itself to be quite without fault, it does show that Paul had been convinced by the Church's explanation (ἀπολογία)—for mere oral communication through Titus could hardly be so designated—that the situation was not just what he supposed it was when he wrote I. v. 1. Essentially the case seems to have been as Paul had heard it, and possibly there were other members of the Church who knew of it besides those who had given the information to Paul. But the matter was not so generally known in the Church as Paul had supposed, and the charge that the Church as a body had shown more than heathen indifference with regard to a case of flagrant immorality proved to be ungrounded. No one could rejoice that it was so more than Paul, and he would not have been the large-hearted man and the sincere Christian that he was, had he stood stubbornly by his first judgment and proposal. It would be inconsistent with his dignity and our own to defend him, otherwise than by a statement of the facts, against the unworthy charge of endeavouring to cover up by false diplomacy an alleged defeat which he is supposed to have suffered, either by the failure of the miraculous punishment which he had predicted, or by the defiant opposition of the Church.

The greater his anxiety before the arrival of Titus lest the effect of 1 Cor. should be the entire alienation of the Church, the more easily we are able to understand the exuberant joy caused by Titus' tidings. This does not, however, prevent him, in the first division of the letter, which concludes with an extravagant expression of this joy, from taking very seriously and answering very decidedly the complaints of the Church that had reached him about the ambiguity of his letters (i. 13), the untrustworthiness of his decisions, and the lack of love which they thought was evidenced, both by the change in the plan of his journey, and by the tone of his earlier letter (i. 15–ii. 5, cf. vi. 12, vii. 3). Rejoicing that his greatest anxiety is now finally relieved, Paul looks forward to the future with confidence in the Church (vii. 16). He hopes for a complete restoration of understanding and confidence (i. 13*a*). This involves the admission that this hope was yet far from being realised. He must still ask the Corinthians not to close their hearts to him (vi. 13), and to restore to him the place in their midst which belonged to him (vii. 2). Between these two requests stands the exhortation suggested in vi. 1 and introduced directly in vi. 11, that they avoid altogether dangerous associations with the immoral practices of their heathen neighbours, especially with idolatry, confident that their Father will compensate them richly for all the sacrifices which they make for His sake, and that they endeavour also to live in holiness (vi. 14–vii. 1, n. 7). Just as these exhortations are made in view of the special case of heathen immorality, with regard to which Paul's mind had been set at rest by the news brought by Titus and by the communication which the Church sent by him, so it is certain that the happy turn which this matter had taken was the principal reason why Paul was so joyful. He is able now again with joyful confidence, with perfect frankness, and with a heart full of love and with sympathy for the entire Church, to exhort them and to make requests of them. And there are still many things with reference to which there is need for request and exhortation.

This was the case with regard to the matter of the collection, to which the second division of the letter is devoted (chaps. viii.-ix.). The fact that we do not find here the same mingling of strong expressions of joy and of endeavours to secure beforehand entire understanding between himself and his readers that characterises chaps. i.-vii., is explained, partly by the different subject-matter in the two sections, partly by the circumstance that in the matter of the collection he is dealing not with the Church in Corinth alone, but also with all the Christians in Achaia (above, p. 308), who had no share in the conflicts between the Corinthians and Paul. Still the underlying tone is the same in this as in other parts of the letter. His generous recognition of the willingness of the Macedonians to make sacrifice, of the zeal of Titus, of the merits of those who accompanied him, as well as of the Christian virtues of the readers (viii. 7), and his mention of the praiseworthy zeal with which the Corinthians had begun the collection more than a year before (viii. 10, ix. 2), all express indirectly his displeasure at the delay and parsimony which the Corinthians had recently shown in the matter. His various exhortations, that now this matter be brought finally to a close, are pressed upon them not so much by fault-finding, as by a statement of urgent reasons.

Quite a different tone, however, pervades the third division of the letter (chaps. x.—xiii.). Being an expression of Paul's own personal feelings, it is distinguished from the preceding sections, which were written also in Timothy's name, by the introductory phrase, αὐτὸς δὲ ἐγώ, x. 1 (cf. xii. 13 : also ἐγώ, xii. 16, in like contrast to his companions ; ἐγὼ μὲν Παῦλος, 1 Thess. ii. 18). He has still upon his heart a request affecting his personal relation to the Church, which, he intimates, must be expressed in a spirit of gentleness and mildness, because he is compelled continually to restrain the anger which he feels when he thinks of the followers of Peter, who are chiefly responsible for the disturbed relation between the Church and its founder, and who continue to keep this relation disturbed (xi. 1–12, 18, above, p. 289 ff.), and of the members of the Christ party, who, assuming a superior air of neutrality, are continually criticising him, his letters, his personal appearance in Corinth, and his conflict with the foreign teachers who were his rivals (x. 7–18, above, p. 292 f.). While he everywhere distinguishes sharply between these false apostles and members of the Church, calling the former tempters and aliens (above, p. 287 f.), in the case of those who boasted that they were followers of Christ this was not possible. Therefore he blames the Church as a body for the currency in their midst of the disrespectful remarks of these people (x. 1*b*, 2*b*, 9–10, 13*a*, 14*a*, xii. 19*a*, xiii. 3). Particularly does he find fault with the Church for not having silenced and ejected the followers of Peter, thereby compelling him to defend his own case against these servants of Satan (xii. 11, v. 12). The request which Paul has to make of the Church is suggested in x. 1, but its full statement is postponed by the interjection of his prayerful wish that he may be spared the necessity of acting with severity when he comes to them (x. 2, cf. xiii. 7–9 ; 1 Thess. iii. 10), and of the explanations which follow (x. 3–6). Nor is this request stated, except in incomplete form in x. 7 (especially if βλέπετε is an imperative), xi. 1, 16, xiii. 5. But summing up the impression as to its purpose which we get from this entire section of the letter, this request may be stated somewhat as follows: "See to it before I come that my visit be mutually peaceful, pleasant, and profitable, by repudiating the foreign teachers, by informing the haughty members of the Christ party what is their proper place, and, under threats of the severest discipline, by setting those right who are living unchaste lives." The tone of this part of the Epistle differs from that of chaps. i.–vii., in that Paul here openly attacks the opponents, with whom it was impossible to come to terms, reminding the Church in a connected statement of their duty with reference to such persons. This explains why his self-defence, which is continued through this section, takes on uniformly a tone of irony, which we do not discover in chaps. i.–vii. Naturally, also, in chaps. i.–vii., where, after days of anxious care, his unburdened heart first gives itself vent, there is an overflowing expression of joy, acknowledgment, and hope. On the contrary, in chaps. x.–xiii., where he discusses grievances not yet adjusted, naturally a prominent place is given to the expression of his displeasure and anxiety, lest things should not turn out as he wished. Taken as a whole, however, the picture of the condition of the Church and of its relation to its founder which we get from the third section of the letter, is the same as that which we get from the first section. Where there was occasion for demands such as are made in vi. 14–vii. 1, there is place also for concern such as is expressed in xii. 21, and for threats such as those in xiii. 2. The complaints which Paul found it necessary to reply to in i. 12–ii. 2 (above, p. 323 ff.) were not less serious than those in x. 1 f. The incidental denial in vii. 2b has the same value as the plain discussion of xii. 13–18. The demand at the same time that the Church sound the praises of their own apostle in opposition to the followers of Peter, thereby putting a stop to their mischievous work and sparing the apostle the necessity of commending, praising, and defending himself, which recurs so frequently in xi. 4–xii. 19, is made also in v. 12 (cf. iii. 1). Only in this latter instance it is incidental, which was appropriate in view of Paul's purpose to discuss the matter by itself later. The hope which he expresses in i. 13^b is expressed in more general form in xiii. 6 (cf. also v. 11). His assurance to them of his love, which they had failed to appreciate, and his complaint because of their failure to reciprocate it (xi. 11, xii. 14), not only have a general resemblance in content to i. 15, 23, ii. 4, vi. 11–13, but are expressed in similar language (xii. 15, περισσότερως ὑμᾶς ἀγαπῶ, cf. ii. 4; ἀγαπητοί, vii. 1, xii. 19). The request of vii. 2^a could stand equally well at the beginning of chap. xi. When in x. 6 expression is given to the expectation that in the near future the Church will return to a condition of entire obedience, it is practically admitted that there are yet some things lacking, of which he purposes now finally to speak. This involves no contradiction to his joyful acknowledgment that, as a result of 1 Cor., the Church had shown itself ready to submit entirely to the apostle's judgment — particularly with regard to the case of incest (ii. 9, vii. 12, above, p. 332 ff.). Nor is it inconsistent in any way with Titus' praise that the entire Church had received him, the messenger of the apostle, in a spirit of obedience, and even of fear and trembling, i.e. as a lord and master (vii. 15, cf. Eph. vi. 5). It is only an illustration of a habit of the apostle's, which may be observed variously both in his relation to men and to God, to begin by giving utterance to praise, thanksgiving, and acknowledgment for good received, and then to express the anxiety and urgency which he still felt, in request, demand, and complaint. And this was the wise way to proceed, if he wanted to put right the affairs of a Church which a few months before had apparently been inclined to sever its relations with him and the Gentile Church which he had been instrumental in organising, but which now, confessing its manifold faults, showed itself eager to make its peace with its founder and to win back his love, which it seemed to them they had all but forfeited.

We have no definite information as to the reception accorded by the Corinthians to this last message of Paul on his way from Ephesus to Corinth. This deficiency is, however, supplied by the facts. If in all essential respects this letter did not accomplish its purpose (xiii. 10), particularly if the Church allowed the followers of Peter to keep on with their work, it was impossible, after what had taken place, for the life and death struggle between Paul and the Corinthian Church to be kept up longer. And if Paul had suffered defeat in this struggle, it would have led necessarily to the separation of the Corinthian Church from the Gentile Church. But no such separation took place. Some forty years later the Roman Church felt called upon, in consequence of a rebellion which, under the leadership of a few gifted younger members, had broken out in Corinth against the venerable head of the Church, to interfere in the confused affairs of its sister Church by sending it a weighty letter of exhortation. Just as there were things in the situation which reminded Clement, the author of this letter, of the existence of cliques in the apostolic age, spoken of in 1 Cor. i.-iv. (Clem. 1 Cor. xlvii.), so we in turn are able to discover in the picture of the Corinthian Church, found in Clement's letter, certain characteristics of that Church to be observed from the Epistles of Paul. But between the troubles of the year 57 and those of 95-97 there is no direct connection. On the contrary, we learn that for a long time, to the joy of the entire Church, the Corinthians had been living a peaceful life, adorned with every Christian virtue (Clem.

i. 2-iii. 1), so that the revolution that had now broken out seemed a breach with the entire past history of the Church back to the days of Paul. Clement directs them to take up again Paul's 1 Cor. (xlvi. 1), the Romans feeling sure that they are at one with the Corinthians in paying honour to Paul.

This condition was the fruit of the "weighty and powerful letters" of the apostle (2 Cor. x. 10). Had Paul been under necessity of securing his victory, which, according to the witness of subsequent conditions, he certainly did win, by personal encounter with his opponents and with the Church which remained rebellious in spite of his letters, it is not likely that all traces of such conflict would have so completely disappeared. We learn of a three months' sojourn of Paul in Greece, ending in the spring of 58 (Acts xx. 2 f.), but nothing is said of any battles which he had to fight during that visit (n. 8). If Romans was written during this period in Corinth, its quiet tone and the careful working out of its elaborate plan prove that for Paul this period was not one of harassing struggle, but of recuperation and of preparation for new work in the far West.

1. (P. 321.) When in ii. 14-16, in contrast to the confession of the weakness which prevented him from making use of the opportunities to preach in Troas, Paul expresses his gratitude to God that in spite of such weakness his presence and preaching has proved effective in every place,—naturally therefore in Troas also,—this statement, like i. 18-22, is intended to prevent a false generalisation and interpretation of his weakness. It also furnishes a natural transition to the detailed contrast between the genuine preachers of the gospel, of whom he is one, and the wandering Jewish Christian teachers, who peddle the word of God (ii. 17-v. 21, see above, p. 290, line 15 f.). Then from vi. 1 on the discussion returns again to affairs in Corinth (see below, n. 7).

2. (Pp. 321, 323, 324.) In i. 12 the reading ἀπλότῃτι is to be preferred to ἀγιότῃτι. πρότερον, without the article in i. 15, which was not understood by numerous copyists (for this reason omitted in \aleph^* ; other MSS. read τὸ πρότερον; K has τὸ δεύτερον), is not to be taken with ἐβουλόμην, before which it would have to stand, but with ἐλθεῖν. It thus emphasises the πρὸς ὑμᾶς, if, indeed, originally the πρότερον did not precede ἵνα instead of standing in its present position. Of the numerous interpretations of i. 17, that deserves the preference which makes τὸ ναί and τὸ οὐ the subjects, and ναί, οὐ the predicates, because of what follows in i. 18 (cf. Jas. v. 12). Even if there were an actual contradiction to the latter passage, which in a general way is comparable with it, it would be no objection to this interpretation of the present passage. As a matter of fact, however, Paul is not disputing at all the truth of the general rule that a Christian's Yes and No ought to be as reliable as his oath (cf. Matt. v. 37). Indeed, in i. 18 f. he claims that he and his helpers follow this rule in the exercise of their calling. Only he goes on to explain that the application of this rule to plans for the future, the carrying out of which is dependent upon the providence of God, would be a carnal misuse of the same. In similar passages in his letters, indeed in passages more or less directly bearing upon this very question, he makes abundant use of that pious εἰν quite in the sense of Jas. iv. 15, which excludes an unconditioned ναί and οὐ from reference to actions that are to take place in the future (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 19, xvi. 4, 7; 2 Cor. ix. 4, xiii. 2; 1 Tim. iii. 15; Rom. i. 10, xv. 32 [Acts xviii. 21]).

3. (P. 328.) The distinction between εἰν I. xvi. 10 (cf. Col. iv. 10), and ὅταν I. xvi. 2, 3, 5 (cf. II. x. 6), and ὡς ἂν I. xi. 34, is not to be overlooked. Something is to be said in favour of the view of Lightfoot (Bibl. Essays, p. 277, 1893), who remarks that possibly the reason why Acts xix. 22 speaks of the sending of Timothy and Erastus to Macedonia only is the fact that Luke knew that Timothy went no farther than Macedonia. On the other hand, the contention that if he did actually go to Corinth, Timothy would have to be mentioned in II. xii. 17 f. is purely arbitrary; because Timothy is one of the writers of this letter, so that if he went to Corinth, he is included in the plural of xii. 17. To mention especially the sending of Titus and the person who accompanied him from among a number of cases of this kind was natural, because it was the latest instance (see the following note).

4. (P. 329.) The reference in II. xii. 18 is not to the second sending of Titus to Corinth, on which occasion he took with him 2 Cor., although this is not precluded by the use of the aorist παρεκάλεσα (cf. viii. 6, 17, ix. 5, above, p. 320, n. 6), but to Titus' earlier trip thither. (1) Mention is made here of only one person who accompanied Titus, whereas on the second journey he was accompanied by two other Christians (above, p. 320 f.), concerning both of whom it is said, quite as much as it is said of Titus and in the same breath, that they were sent by Paul and Timothy (viii. 18 and 22, συνεπέμψαμεν; ix. 3, ἐπέμψα τοὺς ἀδελφούς), both of whom, moreover, are called ἀπόστολοι ἐκκλησιῶν (viii. 23). To regard the person whom Paul mentions second as the principal person, in comparison with whom the first individual who is incidentally mentioned (xii. 18) can be quite ignored, is just as arbitrary as to identify τὸν ἀδελφόν, xii. 18, with τὸν ἀδελφόν ἡμῶν, viii. 22, rather than with τὸν ἀδελφόν, viii. 18, or any other Christian (cf. 1 Cor. i. 1, xvi. 12; Rom. xvi. 23). Still this is done by Krenkel (351 ff.). (2) The questions in ver. 17 and ver. 18^b prove that the reference is to a sending of Timothy which had taken place in the past. Krenkel, who rightly accepts this as beyond question (353 f.), tries to use it in support of his hypothesis that II. x.-xiii. is a separate letter which was sent to Corinth later than II. i.-ix. But this is possible only if it be maintained that the brother referred to in xii. 18 is identical with the brother mentioned in viii. 22, which has been shown to be quite impossible. In no other passage does Paul have occasion to mention the fact that Titus was accompanied by another person on his first journey to Corinth, since he does not elsewhere speak of the first sending of Timothy. The utmost that can be concluded from the fact that no mention is made of Titus' companion in the passage where the return of the latter is spoken of (ii. 13, vii. 6-15), is that Titus started on the return journey from Corinth without his companion. The purpose of the first sending cannot be inferred from viii. 6, where the first and second sending are contrasted with each other. If by that which Titus had begun on his first visit, and was to finish on his second, Paul had understood the charity work of the collection (I. xvi. 3), then he must have let τὴν χάριν—either with or without ταύτην preceding or following—come immediately after προενήρξατο without καί, unless he had chosen to bring out more clearly the identity of the object in both cases by using ὁ προενήρξατο κτλ. Since, however, he describes the work begun and to be completed by Titus first in a very general way as a work directed to the Corinthians (εἰς ὑμᾶς), and then by the use of καί contrasts the work of charity in question with other things, it is clear that this is the special undertaking which at this visit Titus is to carry on and bring to a conclusion. What Titus had accomplished on his former visit, and what he is to do on this occasion, are conceived of as the beginning and the end of a comprehensive work, the general purpose of which is the restoration of normal conditions in Corinth and of normal relations between the Church and its founder. He had made a successful beginning of this on the occasion of his first visit; now he is to fill up the measure of his service by bringing to a conclusion the troublesome matter of the collection (cf. Hofmann, ii. 3. 204f.). Both the καί which precedes τὴν χ. τ. and the καί which precedes ἐπιτελέσῃ serve to contrast the purpose of the present coming with the results of the first. Against the interpretation of the second καί in the sense, "Among other things this also," there are the following objections: (1) It does not account for the peculiar structure of the sentence. (2) Throughout the entire context as far as ix. 5 the matter of the collection is the only reason and purpose given for sending Titus at this time. On the other hand, when Paul comes to speak of the other things which he desired to see accomplished (chaps. x.-xiii.), Titus drops out altogether; since, as has been shown, xii. 18 is only a reference to the earlier sending. When so understood, καὶ τὴν χ. τ. does not harmonise with ἐπιτελέσῃ. (3) Neither does it harmonise with προενήρξατο, with which also it would have to be taken according to this construction; for in the passage where Paul speaks of the results of the first sending of Titus (vii. 6-15) there is no reference to the collection. Neither does the reference in xii. 18 touch this matter (above, p. 314f., n. 1). Paul gives no hint that Titus brought him news regarding the condition of the collection, to say nothing of a commission given to Titus regarding this matter.

5. (P. 330.) Although Heinrici still argues with great detail for the possibility of the view (ii. 23 f., 127 ff.) that ἔγραψα, ii. 3, 4, also ii. 9, refer to the words just written, or to all that precedes of the letter which Paul is now in process of writing, it may be considered certain that an earlier letter is meant. For the following reasons: (1) When referring to that which immediately precedes, Paul is in the habit of using the present, γράφω, Gal. i. 20 ; 1 Cor. iv. 14, xiv. 37 ; 1 Tim. iii. 14 (once, 2 Cor. xiii. 10, even with reference to the entire letter here concluding) ; so also λέγω, Rom. vi. 19 ; 1 Cor. vi. 5 (with reference to vi. 4), vii. 6, 35 ; 2 Cor. vii. 3, viii. 8 ; Phil. iv. 11 ; 2 Tim. ii. 7 ; Philem. 21 ; λαλῶ, 1 Cor. ix. 8, xv. 34. Only in two instances, Philem. 19 and 1 Cor. ix. 15, does he use ἔγραψα, and there because he pictures to himself vividly the impression which the words he has just written will make upon his readers when they come to read what had been written some time before. With these exceptions ἔγραψα when used by Paul always refers either to a letter which is just being concluded, Rom. xv. 15 (cf. xvi. 22 of the amanuensis) ; Gal. vi. 11 ; Philem. 21, or to an earlier letter, 1 Cor. v. 9, 11 (cf. vii. 1 ; 2 Cor. vii. 12). (2) There would be no occasion whatever for the assurance of ii. 4 with reference to the preceding portion of the letter. It would not occur to anyone that what precedes was written to grieve the Corinthians, for neither in what precedes ii. 4 nor in the chapters immediately following is there a single severe or cold word, but only a warm-hearted and carefully considered self-defence, in which among other criticisms he answers that of want of love. (3) Without any question the same matter is discussed in vii. 11 ff. as in ii. 5-11 ; hence the letter referred to in ii. 9 must be the same as that which in vii. 8 is spoken of as belonging to the past. That, however, the ἔγραψα in ii. 3, 4, 9 refers in all three cases to the same letter, is proved by the very close sequence of thought in ii. 3-11. (4) It is not Paul's manner to interrupt a discussion not yet finished in order to say that in writing the letter he has shed many tears or sheds them now. It would be more in keeping with his manner for him to write that the readers can see how deeply he is moved, or in connection with some severe word to say that he could not write this without tears (cf. Phil. iii. 18). If, however, the reference in ii. 3, 4, 9 is to an earlier Epistle of Paul's, and, in particular, the same Epistle which is spoken of in vii. 8, 12, then it is natural to infer from the similarity of sentence structure in ii. 3 and ii. 9 that τοῦτο αὐτό, ii. 3, means the same as διὰ τοῦτο αὐτό (I. iv. 17 N*AP), and is related in sense to εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο, 2 Cor. v. 5 ; Col. iv. 8 ; Eph. vi. 22 (Rom. ix. 17) ; cf. Erasmus (Paraphr. in ep. Pauli, 1523, p. 150) ; Rückert and Hofmann, ad loc. This construction is good Greek (Kühner-Gerth, i. 310, A. 6 ; Winer, § 21. 3, A. 2), occurs without question in 2 Pet. i. 5, and would certainly have to be admitted in the present passage even if it did not occur elsewhere in Paul's writings. But this construction does occur in Phil. i. 6, where otherwise the αὐτό would be meaningless. In order to any other interpretation, an instance must be shown in which a Greek writer has expressed the object of his conviction or confident expectation in the accusative after πέποιθα. Phil. i. 25 cannot be cited as a case in point ; since in this passage the τοῦτο simply prepares the way for the following ἔτι, and belongs to οἶδα by which the clause is governed. It is correctly translated by Peshito, "And this I know confidently." The same version translates 2 Cor. ii. 3 somewhat freely, but quite correctly, "And (as to) my writing you, (so) is (it) this, in order that if I come those may not cause me grief from whom I ought to have joy" ; in other words, the reason and purpose of my coming was this. Even if τοῦτο αὐτό, which probably belongs before ἔγραψα (DG), with a ὑμῖν inserted between it and the verb, were the strongly emphasised object of ἔγραψα, it certainly would not imply a mysterious reference to something which was more familiar to the readers than to ourselves (Meyer, Ewald, "The thing which is known to you"; Klöpper, "Something which causes grief"). At most it could be only a resumption of the τοῦτο of ii. 1. Then the subject of Paul's earlier communication in his letter would be the determination not to come to Corinth a second time in sorrow. But the context, i. 15-ii. 2, shows that this determination was practically identical with the determination to come to Corinth not at once by the direct route, but by the longer way through Macedonia. On this construction of the passage, then, in the letter in question Paul had expressed the same intention with regard to his coming to Corinth that he had since carried out, which, moreover, leaving quite out of account the reason for writing given in II. i. 23-ii. 2, he had set forth in detail in I. xvi. 5-7. Since, now, in the same letter the very opposite determination could not have been expressed, namely, Paul's purpose to come to Corinth at once and by the direct route, to assume, as, for example, Krenkel does (377) that this statement did actually stand in the letter written in the interval between 1 and 2 Cor. and at the same time to affirm that II. ii. 3-9 has reference to this same letter, is to involve one's self in the most glaring contradiction. But if what was said in this letter was simply a repetition of the determination expressed in I. xvi. 5-7, only in different words and with more detailed statement of the apostle's reasons, then there was no point in his appeal to the letter supposed to have been written in the interval. But now since "that very thing," which he writes in II. ii. 1 is not to be found in 1 Cor., the τοῦτο αὐτό must be taken adverbially.

6. (Pp. 333, 335, 336.) It is assumed by the present writer that οὐκ ἐμέ λελύπηκεν, ii. 5, is a question calling naturally for an affirmative answer; consequently that ἀλλά does not mean "but" (sondern), but is equivalent to a "nevertheless" (aber), which serves to introduce the following clauses, 5b-6. Further, it is assumed that ἀπὸ μέρους does not, as Hofmann contends, belong to the main clause of the sentence beginning with ἀλλά, but is a part of the subordinate sentence attracted out of its place on account of the strong emphasis, as is so often the case before ἵνα. "Nevertheless, in order not in a measure to burden you all, I declare the penalty imposed by the majority to be sufficient." The ἀπὸ μέρους is added, because a different judgment on Paul's part, namely, the demand for the offender's severer punishment, would be a heavy burden, especially upon the person himself, and might drive him to despair. That, in turn, would be a burden to all the members of the Church; not only to the majority, who regarded the penalty that had been temporarily imposed as sufficient, but to the minority, who, either because they feared the effect of leniency, or because they honoured Paul's judgment, felt that a severer penalty ought to be imposed. This supposed obligation they could have fulfilled only with bleeding hearts, and the wound would not be easily healed. Instead of ικανή Paul writes ικανόν, evidently under the influence of the legal use of τὸ ἱκανόν (Acts xvii. 9; Mark xv. 15). There is a legal colouring also to κυροῦν (ii. 8, cf. Gal. iii. 15) and the expressions used in vii. 11 f. ἀπολογία (cf. Phil. i. 7, 16; 2 Tim. iv. 16; Acts xxv. 8, 16, xxvi. 1 f.; Rom. ii. 15); ἐκδίκησις, ὁ ἀδικήσας, ὁ ἀδικηθεὶς (Acts vii. 24-27; 1 Cor. vi. 7 f.; Philem. 18); πράγμα (1 Cor. vi. 1; 1 Thess. iv. 6). If

2 Cor. followed 1 Cor. without an intervening letter or a visit of Paul's, there is no question that II. ii. 5-11, vii. 11 f. refers to the same case as I. v. The language used points in the same direction, τις (II. ii. 5; I. v. 1); ὁ τοιοῦτος (II. ii. 6, 7; I. v. 5). Then ὁ ἀδικηθεὶς (vii. 12) cannot refer to Paul, which would imply a strangely impersonal way of speaking, but to the offender's father (above, p. 296, n. 4). Paul might have said that the Church had done him wrong, in causing him the disgrace and the grief occasioned by the occurrence of such a scandal in a Church which he had founded; but he could not have called it a violation of his rights, particularly since what the offender had done had no relation whatever to Paul's own person. When, now, Paul says that he discussed this matter in his letter, not in its relation to the offender himself, nor in relation to the father whose rights had been violated, this is quite in keeping with the manner in which the affair is handled in I. v. Nothing is said in this passage about the father, who evidently did not belong to the Church. Neither is the offender himself the object of the discussion, but the Church in which, to its disgrace and injury, an offence of this kind remains unatoned for,—a fact, however, that does not imply that Paul was indifferent to the fate of any individual member of the Church. But, with regard to this individual, Paul had expressed only the hope that by the judgment which destroyed his physical life his "spirit" might be saved. What is said in vii. 12 must have been occasioned by communications from the Church concerning the offender, who had repented, and concerning the father, who possibly had been persuaded to be lenient or even to forgive the offence. This was done in order to influence the apostle to leniency. But Paul no longer needed such arguments (cf. ii. 10). In their gratification at the favourable outcome of the matter, both as regards father and son, the Church is not to overlook the fact that from the beginning the apostle has been concerned about the attitude of the Church, which, therefore, has been a matter of greater importance to him than the adjustment of the legal relations between the father and son. Consequently also his present joy does not concern these individuals, but the conduct of the Church in this matter, and the restoration of the friendly relation to himself, which had been disturbed by their earlier attitude in the affair (vii. 7-11). Rightly recognising the fact that the matter here dealt with is one which does at least have a legal side, but falsely assuming that the matters dealt with in 1 Cor. have been pressed into the background by a long interval of time and by the intervention of new and important transactions between Paul and the Church, both by letter and in person, Krenkel (S. 306) conjectures that the occasion for ii. 5-11, vii. 11 f. was a suit at law between members of the Church (cf. I. vi. 1 ff.). Much more common is the assumption that some member of the Church (Bleek, 1830, S. 629; Neander, 296, 347; Hilgenfeld, Einl. 284), or one of Paul's Judaizing opponents, possibly a member of the governing body of the Church (Ewald, S. 227), had publicly offered him a grave insult, very likely on the occasion of his second visit in Corinth, putting it in legal form (Weizsäcker, S. 298), and the Church had failed to come earnestly to the insulted apostle's defence. According to this last mentioned hypothesis, the insulted apostle was filled with wrath, and what he was unable to accomplish in person, namely, the punishment of the one who offered the insult by the very majority of the Church which had indorsed him, he accomplished by means of the letter, now lost, which he sent by Titus! In the exposition of this view it is not accidental, but fundamental for the theory (perhaps we should say destructive of it) that the words, "The insulter" and "The insulted," which are taken from Luther's translation, recur again and again as if this were, of course, the correct translation of ὁ ἀδικήσας and ὁ ἀδικηθεῖς. Of course, the idea of injured reputation comes under the general conception of ἀδικεῖν; but in Paul's writings, where ἀδικεῖν occurs eight times, ἀδικία twelve times, and throughout both the Old and New Testaments, where these words (also ἄδικος, ἀδικημα) occur very often, there is not a single instance where the words can be shown to have the meaning, insult, libel, still less the narrower sense of slander. On the contrary, its universal meaning is illegal action; or where the verb has an object (generally personal), the illegal injury of a person, or injuring of a thing (Rev. ix. 4), cf. Aristot. Rhetor. i. 10, p. 1368, ἔστω δὴ τὸ ἀδικεῖν τὸ βλάπτειν ἐκόντα παρὰ τὸν νόμον. If it were a matter of insult or abuse by word or deed, Paul would write the words ὁ λοιδορήσας and ὁ λοιδορηθεῖς; or, if he wanted to use a legal term in this passage, ὁ ὑβρίσας and ὁ ὑβρισθεῖς; cf. Meier-Schömann, Attischer Prozess, bearb. von Lipsius (1883-87), S. 394-402. The prevailing misunderstanding of the passage is helped by the failure to distinguish between the broader and narrower meaning of injuria, the latter of which corresponds to the Greek ἀδικεῖν, ἀδικία, ἀδικημα. Cf. Theophilus, Paraphr. instit. Just. iv. 4 end, οὐκ ἔωσι τοὺς ὑβριστὰς ἀτιμωρήτους οἱ νόμοι. Γενικῶς δὲ injuria λέγεται πᾶν ὃ μὴ κατὰ νόμον γίνεται, quod non jure fit; ἀδικῶς δὲ λέγεται contumelia a contemnendo, ἣν οἱ Ἕλληνες ὑβριν καλοῦσιν. Cf. Scholion to Leo's Basilica, lib. ix. tit. 21, 1, and Ulpian, Digest. xlvii. 10. 1 end. The difficulty which one has in understanding how Paul, in such a deep expression of his feelings as this, which is thoroughly intense, and which is put in the first person throughout, could in one instance designate himself by the third person, ὁ ἀδικηθεῖς, as if he were a stranger, would, of course, be removed if we could assume that possibly Timothy is "the injured person" (thus Beyschlag, ThStKr. 1871, S. 670). But this interpretation gives no logically possible connection between vii. 12b—where Paul speaks not only of himself, but includes at least Timothy—and vii. 12c. If, with a view to lessening the contradiction, it be said that the main reason for writing the letter was not regard for the one who had been wronged, nor for the one who had suffered the wrong (Krenkel, 299), it is nevertheless true that, according to vii. 12b, the real purpose of the letter was to give the Church an opportunity to prove their zeal for Paul (and Timothy); and so, if "the person injured" were Paul himself or Timothy, he did, as a matter of fact, in a very real sense, write on account of the ἀδικηθεῖς. Moreover, this hypothesis in all its forms stands in contradiction to ii. 5. If οὐκ ἐμὲ λελύπηκεν be taken as a statement of fact, then it is hypocrisy unworthy of the apostle; if it be taken as a question, it is incomparably foolish. Nor is it easy to see how the Church could have succeeded in making itself appear blameless in this matter (vii. 11).

7. (P. 337.) Frequent doubt has been expressed as to whether II. vi. 14-vii. 1 was originally a part of the letter and as to its Pauline origin. Ewald (282 f.) held that it was taken from the writings of one who belonged to the apostolic circle at a somewhat later date. Hilgenfeld (287, A. 1) conjectured that it was taken from the letter mentioned in 1 Cor. v. 9,—a theory which Francke (ThStKr. 1884, S. 544 ff.) undertook to prove. Krenkel rejoices (332) that the fact that this section does not belong in 2 Cor. is coming more and more to be recognised, and thinks that he discovers many similarities to the language of the Epistle of Clement. The problem calls for a discussion of the context. After the general discussion concerning the office of preaching, to which he was led through opposition to the Jewish Christian wandering teachers (ii. 17–iii. 1, v. 12), Paul, in vi. 1, returns again to the discussion of the special conditions in the Corinthian Church, which, with the exception of a few brief remarks (iii. 1–3, v. 11–13) seem to have been lost sight of from ii. 14 on. He and his companions are not only commissioned to preach the gospel of reconciliation to the unconverted (v. 11–21), but also to help the Churches already gathered through the preaching of the gospel,—in this instance those of Achaia here addressed, and in particular those of Corinth (vi. 11),—and to warn them lest they receive grace in vain in the day of salvation (vi. 1–2, cf. i. 24). As was recognised even by Clement (Strom. i. 4), and, as is clearly set forth by Hofmann (ii. 3. 166–174), vi. 3–10, which has no grammatical connection with what precedes, is the introduction to vi. 11, between which and what precedes there is undoubtedly an anacoluthon. Conscious that his work and personal life among them have been blameless, Paul (and Timothy) now ‘opens his mouth unto them,’ i.e. he is about to tell them solemnly and frankly what he has in his heart to say to them (cf. Matt. v. 2; Acts viii. 34, x. 34). And this is an exhortation like that in vi. 1, i.e. a warning against everything which might make their acceptance of that redemptive grace by which Christians are distinguished from the still unregenerate world seem to be an illusion. The remark that his heart as well as his mouth is open to the Corinthians, and the request that the readers open their hearts to him, as children ought to do to their father (I. iv. 14), is a further introduction to the statement he is about to make, occasioned by the distrust of the Church which has not altogether disappeared. Now this statement, which has been led up to at such length and in so many different ways, and which has been held back so long, would be ridiculous if it were simply the two words χωρήσατε ἡμᾶς, vii. 2*a*. That, however, would be the case if vi. 14–vii. 1 were to be set aside as an interpolation, for, in what follows vii. 2*b*–18 there is nothing which corresponds to the promised παράκλησις. This is found in vi. 14–vii. 2*a*. It is the demand that is found running through 1 Cor. that the Church separate itself more entirely from the heathen immorality by which it was surrounded. With vi. 16 cf. I. iii. 16, viii. 10, x. 20–22, xiv. 25; with vi. 17 f. cf. I. x. 13 f., cf. above, p. 274 f., 296, n. 2. There is nothing peculiar in the character of the words used, although ἐτεροζυγεῖν, μετοχή, συμφώνησις, Βελίαρ do not occur elsewhere in the writings of Paul nor in the N.T. The passionate antithesis with which the section begins is quite in keeping with the mood which is reflected in vi. 3–10, vii. 1–11, while the solemn words of vi. 16*b*–vii. 1 harmonise with the manner of the announcement in vi. 11. These pressing exhortations have their own significance, but, in addition to that, serve appropriately as the introduction to the matter discussed in vii. 5–16, all the more so because the case of the man who had committed incest, which had caused Paul so much anxiety, had now become a source of joy to him. Since, however, these exhortations did not touch at all Paul's personal relation to the Church, the exhortation vii. 2*a*, which is clearly different from vi. 13, forms an appropriate transition to what follows.

8. (P. 343.) Although no representatives of the Corinthian Church are mentioned as accompanying Paul to Jerusalem along with the representatives of the Churches of Galatia, Asia, and Macedonia (Acts xx. 4, above, p. 209, n. 2), in view of Rom. xv. 25-28 we may not assume that the collection in Achaia was not completed, and that Paul's efforts in this matter (2 Cor. viii.-ix.) were fruitless.

V.

THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

§ 21. CONTENTS OF THE LETTER AND THE PROGRESS OF ITS THOUGHT.

THE Epistles of Paul, considered up to this point, have been addressed to Churches, or groups of Churches, that owed their Christianity to him. In this letter, however, he turns his attention to a Church which was undoubtedly founded without any co-operation from him or his helpers. Though individual Christians living in Rome at the time may have been personally, or even intimately, acquainted with Paul, to the Church as a whole he was a stranger, and to the large majority of the Roman Christians personally unknown. His first concern, therefore, was to establish a connection between himself and the Church. This explains why he begins with a salutation which is more elaborate than in any other of his Epistles, and why in this instance the part in which the author speaks of himself is expanded into a lengthy complex of clauses (i. 1-5), whereas, in other letters, either the characterisation of the readers (1 Cor. i. 2) or the contents of the salutation (Gal. i. 3-5) is more fully developed. Paul introduces himself to the Church, so to speak, not as if they had never heard of him before, but still in such a way that the Church can form some idea, from the very way in which he characterises himself, as to the occasion of the letter, and the grounds on which Paul based his right to address them thus in a long Epistle. He is not merely an individual engaged in the service of Christ like all Christians, but also an apostle; he is not merely one of the numerous missionaries about whose call there may be some question (above, p. 289 f.), but he owes his position to a definite call from God, just as the readers owe their Christian faith to a definite call of God. Although the contrast with which he testifies to the genuineness of his apostleship is not so strong here as in 1 Cor. i. 1, particularly Gal. i. 1, nevertheless the threefold repetition of κλητός (vv. 1, 6 f.) does show the same careful premeditation as 1 Cor. i. 1 f. How anxious he is that the readers shall realise the full import of this self-characterisation is shown by the fulness with which he develops this particular idea, though it was familiar to every Christian of that time. The fact that all which follows κλητός ἀπόστολος in i. 1b-5 is an expansion of this idea, proves that Paul cannot here be saying anything of himself not equally applicable to others who have been called to be apostles. While in other places he speaks of his special call to be the apostle to the Gentiles (xi. 13, xv. 16), and so of his special gospel (ii. 16, xvi. 25), here he calls the gospel, for the proclamation of which he has been separated from all other avocations, a message of God. This expression is employed here in the same sense in which it and its synonyms are everywhere used, in distinct contrast to the conception of teaching, which is the product of human reflection and which varies in each case with the type of mind or the peculiar gifts of the preacher (1 Thess. ii. 2, 8, 9, 13; 1 Cor. ii. 1-5; 2 Cor. ii. 17, xi. 7). When he goes on to say, further, with reference to this same gospel, that long before God had suffered this message of His to enter the world He had promised the sending of the same through the prophets, and that this promise was recorded in the Holy Scriptures (i. 2, cf. x. 15; Luke iv. 17-21); and when, further, the central point of this gospel is declared to be the Son of God, who entered into a natural human life as a descendant of David, and was appointed to become a Son of God in power, and so to enter into a new and higher life of which the Holy Spirit was the norm and the resurrection the beginning, the points made are simply the close connection between the gospel and the revelations, scriptures and history of the O.T. on the one hand, and the exaltation of the Son of David, living in the flesh, to His present glory (cf. Jas. ii. 1; 2 Pet. i. 16), on the other. When, now, at this point with the mention of Christ he passes again by a natural transition from the description of the gospel to a direct characterisation of his apostolic calling (i. 5), he includes himself at once with others to whom what he here says of himself is equally applicable. Since this letter was not written in conjunction with anyone else, and since from i. 8-xvi. 23 or xvi. 25 Paul uses the singular when speaking of himself, it is self-evident that the plural in i. 5 is to be taken literally, as always in Paul's writings (n. 1). Since, moreover, the only thought expressed indicating any wider or narrower circle to which Paul belonged is that of his apostolic calling, it was perfectly clear to his readers that he included with himself other men who, like him, were κλητοὶ ἀπόστολοι (cf. x. 15, xvi. 7). They could say with Paul, "Through Christ we received grace as Christians, and a call as apostles to the end that we might arouse obedience to the faith among all peoples, to the glory of His name." The idea that Paul is speaking here of his special commission as the apostle to the Gentiles, has against it not only the context of the salutation, as pointed out above, but also the usage elsewhere of πάντα τὰ ἔθνη (n. 2). The whole human race with its national divisions, representing as it does the utmost diversity, is the common, originally undivided field in which the older apostles and Paul were appointed to labour. Nor can it be claimed that in this passage "all peoples" must mean the Gentiles, on the ground that otherwise in i. 6 Paul would impart the trivial information to the Romans that they are a part of the human race. Paul does not say that they are included in the πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, but that they are the called of Jesus Christ, a Church already gathered through the influence of the gospel, in that region which is the appointed field of labour for all the apostles. For this reason, neither Paul nor any of the apostles, whose call is essentially a call to preach the gospel, have any direct missionary relation to the Roman Christians. But this does not by any means render the apostles indifferent to those who are already converts. For, in the first place, existing Churches are centres of the Christian faith (cf. Phil. ii. 15 f.), the spreading of which is the distinctive function of the apostles; and, in the second place, the word of the apostles has a right to special consideration among those who are already believers (cf. xii. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. ii. 20, iv. 11-16; 1 Pet. v. 1). Such consideration for what he is about to write Paul seeks from all the Christians in Rome at the time whose character, not only as children of God through grace, but also as those called to be saints, i.e. as a Christian Church (cf. 1 Cor. i. 2), he emphasises once more before adding his general salutation (ver. 7).

The first thought expressed after this carefully weighed greeting is that of gratitude to God for all the Roman Christians, more particularly for the fact that their conversion to the Christian faith has become known throughout the whole world (i. 8, cf. xv. 19; 1 Thess. i. 8 f.). How much this means to Paul is evidenced by the solemn assurance which follows, that in his private devotions, which have relation to the gospel quite as much as his outward activities, he remembers regularly also the Roman Christians, making request in all his prayers that the way may be finally opened for him, in the will of God, to come to them (ver. 10). This thought he expands by explaining that he has a longing desire to see them in order to impart some spiritual gift from which he expects the Roman Christians to be strengthened, or, as he immediately adds by way of explanation and correction, from which he expects them and himself to be mutually encouraged by the faith that is in each (ver. 11 f., cf. xv. 24, xvi. 25).

Paul could not have spoken with greater precaution or modesty of the result for which he hoped from this long intended visit to Rome. Not only does he place the Christians in Rome on the same level with the Churches organised by himself (cf. 1 Thess. iii. 2, 13; Acts xv. 32, xvi. 5, xviii. 23), but he guards expressly against giving the impression that they alone are to be benefited by the visit (cf. per contra, 2 Cor. i. 15; Phil. i. 24-26). If he had said nothing further with reference to the purpose of his projected visit, all that could be inferred from his words would be that for Paul as a missionary the existence of a Christian Church in Rome was a matter of great importance; that for a long time he had had it in mind, in further pursuance of his missionary plans, to come also to Rome, regarding which plans, however, nothing more definite is said; and, finally, that the exchange of spiritual gifts which would take place with the Roman Christians on that occasion would be advantageous both to them and to him. But now he mentions a second motive for his coming, using a phrase which indicates the introduction of a new thought, namely, his desire to obtain also in Rome some fruit, i.e. his hope to preach the gospel with result also among the Roman populace, the great mass of whom are unconverted. Although he expresses himself very modestly with reference to the result for which he hopes from this contemplated missionary preaching (τινὰ καρπὸν), still this seems to have been the chief purpose of the visit to the capital which had been planned so long and so repeatedly postponed on account of some external hindrance; for in concluding this discussion with the words, "Such is the willingness on my part to preach the gospel to you (al. among you), i.e. to the people in Rome," he mentions only the missionary preaching as the object of his coming, making no reference whatever to the hoped-for effect of his visit upon the Roman Church (vv. 13-15, n. 3). That he is just as willing to labour as a missionary in Rome as he is conscious of his obligation to do so, is proved by his declaration that he is not ashamed of the gospel (ver. 16). The fact that until now he has remained away from Rome is not, therefore, to be explained as due to any lack of willingness on his part, nor this lack of willingness as due in turn to his want of confidence in the gospel.

In this way Paul prepares the way for statements about the gospel which go far beyond any requirements of the purpose manifest from the connection with the preceding context, and which are to be made the theme of more extended discussions. Paul does not hesitate to introduce the gospel, this weak and foolish preaching (1 Cor. i. 17-25), into the very centre of the world's culture, because he has learned and experienced its essence to be what he describes in i. 16 f. It is a power of God unto salvation for every one that believes, primarily for Jews and Greeks (n. 4). The gospel is such a universal means of salvation, upon the sole condition of faith, because in the same is revealed a righteousness of God which results from faith, and which has for its aim the creation of faith. This is in accordance with the word of the prophet: "The righteous shall attain to life as a result of faith" (Hab. ii. 4; cf. Gal. iii. 11); since this prophecy contains the two thoughts which are fundamental in the statement about the gospel, namely, that only the righteous attain to life, and that by no other means than through faith, all that follows to viii. 39, or indeed to xi. 36, is intended to make clear to the Romans this construction of the gospel.

In the first section (i. 18–iii. 20) he proceeds to show in proof of the first of the two propositions contained in the citation, that the wrath of God is directed against all unrighteousness and ungodliness of men, for which they are responsible and inexcusable, throughout the course of history (i. 18), as well as at the final judgment, when the righteousness of God, concealed from the thoughtless by the manifold proofs of God's goodness in creation, shall be revealed as retributive righteousness (ii. 3–10). Furthermore, in God's impartial determination of the destiny of the individual soul there is no distinction between Jew and Gentile (ii. 11–22). While the advantage of being an Israelite, and thus of belonging to the people of God's revelation, is not to be denied, this cannot in any way alter the fact that in the final judgment all men must appear before God as liars and sinners worthy of condemnation, for He is the only true and altogether righteous one (iii. 1–8). Finally, even Christians are not to imagine that they are exempted a priori from this condemnation of a sinful race under God's wrath. On the one hand, they are included in the scriptural judgment already quoted concerning the universal sinfulness of men; and, on the other hand, they are aware that the proof furnished by the history of Israel regarding the impossibility of obtaining righteousness through the observance of the law holds for the entire race (iii. 9–20).

Although from the course of the argument condemnation seems to be the inevitable end of the entire human race, a second section (iii. 20–v. 11) is devoted primarily to showing how the righteousness of God necessary to life is restored in Christ, being proclaimed in the gospel which requires faith, and how by faith it becomes the possession of all Christian believers, Jews and Gentiles alike (iii. 20–30). The objection that through the doctrine of justification as here set forth Christians are in danger of falling into antinomianism is disposed of very briefly (iii. 31). On the other hand, the further objection that by accepting this doctrine Christians sever themselves from the religion of the O.T., or, in other words, render entirely external the unquestionable relation existing between the Christian Church and Abraham, the progenitor of the religious community under the O.T. dispensation, is answered in great detail. Since, according to Gen. xv. 6, the religious attitude of Abraham was, rather, essentially similar to that of the Christian, the opposite conclusion follows, namely, that the theocratic community of which Abraham was the founder has its proper continuance in Christianity, which embraces the circumcised and the uncircumcised, but is self-consistent because it makes both alike stand in the faith through which Abraham, being yet uncircumcised, obtained his position of acceptance with God, and his significance for the history of religion (iv. 1-22, n. 5). Since, now, this exposition ends with the reaffirmation of the original position that Christians are justified by faith (iv. 23-25), upon it is very properly based the assurance that Christians, being justified and reconciled, are at peace with God, and in spite of all the afflictions of the present may and should cherish the confident hope of their future glory or final redemption (v. 1-11, n. 6).

Here the theme stated in i. 16 f. seems to have been developed to its logical conclusion; since, from the preceding description of the origin and nature of the Christian life, with the future consummation of the same which this nature involves, it must be apparent that in Christian experience the gospel, being a revelation of the righteousness requisite to life, has proved itself to be a saving power. Nevertheless, a third section (v. 12-viii. 39) is added, closely connected with the one which precedes, concluding with similar thoughts. Although the main statement beginning with διὰ τοῦτο in v. 12 is left unfinished, and although even the comparative sentence introduced into the main sentence immediately after the latter is begun is not concluded, the progress of thought can hardly be said to be obscure. As death, which was brought into the world by Adam, more specifically by Adam's sin, reigned over all Adam's descendants, so shall the grace and the gift of God and of Christ, which had their inception in history through Christ, more precisely through Christ's one act of righteousness, reign in the new humanity descended from Christ who is the second Adam. Inasmuch as the Mosaic Law is described as subordinate to the two world principles, Adam and Christ, or sin and righteousness, or death and life (v. 20), it is at once clear that the reign and supremacy of grace under the Christian dispensation may not be limited, or, rather, set aside, by the subordinate dominion of the law. In proof of this last point, he calls attention to the fact that in the very community where the law had served only to increase sin, namely, in Israel, redemptive grace had been revealed in its greatest fulness. This statement is intended to guard against the possibility of grace being looked upon as a makeshift, or as one means of salvation among others, as might easily have been the case had grace been manifested first to another people without Israel's experiences with the law. The fact that Christ appeared in Israel is assurance that grace may reign wherever it is accepted.

The objection that if this doctrine of law and grace be true, one needs only to continue in sin in order to receive constantly new supplies of grace, Paul meets by recalling the fact of the new birth connected with baptism, which makes a sinful life on the part of the Christians seem unnatural, furnishing the strongest motive for holiness. It is just because Christians are not under law, which in itself has no power to overcome sin, but under grace, which in the resurrection of Christ and regeneration of the Christian proves itself to be a life-giving power, that they dare to hope for mastery over sin (vi. 1-14). But from the experience of the readers not only is this pernicious theory (vi. 1), but likewise the possibility of any practical misuse on the part of the Christian of his privileges under the gentle rule of grace, instead of under the hard discipline of the law, easily refuted as due to wrong inferences from the doctrine of justification expounded above. From being sinful and disobedient servants of God, as they were formerly, they have become servants obedient from the heart, and are, therefore, no longer slaves and mercenaries of sin, but slaves of righteousness and soldiers of God. They have only to recall their pre-Christian life, and the death which was the inevitable issue of that life, and then to observe the process of sanctification taking place in their present Christian life, and to remember that eternal life is its final goal, in order to lose all desire to sink back into their former state (vi. 15-23, n. 7).

Moreover, Paul feels that it is incumbent upon him to justify to his readers even the presupposition, namely, that the Christian is no longer under the law, but under grace (vii. 1-6), which in vi. 1-14 and vi. 15-23 is defended against false inferences. From their acquaintance with the law, the readers know that the Mosaic ordinances have authority over a man only so long as he lives, which implies that it has no power beyond death. Both these phases of the truth are illustrated by a single appropriate example, namely, the law of marriage, which unites two human lives into one. In the case of the surviving party when a marriage bond is annulled by death, we see that death frees from the law. The illustration of the marriage bond thus cited is used also as a figure in the application of the principle stated in vii. 1 to the subject under discussion. Since Christ's obligation to the law ceased with

His death, and since Christians became subsequently through baptism partakers of Christ's death, the same as though they themselves had actually died (vi. 3, cf. Gal. ii. 19, iv. 4 f.), for them also obligation under the law as a marriage bond is legally annulled, in order that they may be united to the risen Christ in a new marriage union. Not until they come into this new fellowship with Christ are they able to attain to a true moral life permeated by a new spirit; whereas, on the other hand, while they lived still under the law and served God according to the letter, sinful desires awakened by the law held sway over their bodies, and life under the law issued in death (n. 8).

Here again a conclusion seems to follow fatal to all that has been said heretofore. If exemption from the law and cessation from the life of sin go together, then we seem driven to the blasphemous conclusion that the law and sin are identical. This objection Paul answers in vii. 7–viii. 11 chiefly from his own experience with the law in his early life and now in his Christian life. This experience he describes under the presupposition that Christians who like himself have been brought up under the law have had essentially the same experience. When he became a Christian he continued to regard the law as holy, righteous, and good; and as a converted man his will gave fullest assent to it. But in individual experience, as in the life of men generally (cf. iii. 20, iv. 15, v. 20), the law has proved itself to be a power awakening and developing latent sin, thereby deepening the knowledge of sin; and even when the will gives assent to the contents of the law, it is incapable of overcoming sin. If, along with his lament due to doubt about his moral capacity, there is a place in the Christian's life for gratitude to God for His gift in Christ (vii. 24 f.), this is no effect which after all has been wrought by the law, but the outcome of the liberating work of the Spirit, begetting a new Christlike life in those who have been born again. God's very act in sending the Son was positive expression of His will that henceforth sin should no more rule in the flesh; and with Christ's coming was begun the actual fulfilment of this divine purpose (viii. 3). Through the Spirit received by the Christian from Christ the ordinances of the law are fulfilled in their unity by those who give themselves up to the control of this Spirit instead of continuing under the power of their inborn nature (viii. 4). Eventually, through the same Spirit the body also, which is still subject to death, shall be quickened (viii. 11). Finally, in language which soars higher and higher as the climax is approached, the fact is proclaimed that the sonship wrought in us by the life-giving Spirit involves not only the obligation of a present walk according to the Spirit, but warrants also the hope of future glory, and supplies the power to overcome all the sufferings of the present (viii. 12-39).

Thus the discussion of the supremacy of grace over all who have been renewed by Christ (v. 12-viii. 39) leads to the same conclusion as the discussion of the doctrine of justification (iii. 21-v. 11), and the development of the theme announced in i. 16 f. might be considered complete if in the discussion up to this point Paul had taken adequate account of Israel's special position of privilege, at which he hinted in his statement of the theme, and expressly admitted in iii. 1-3 (cf. ii. 25). When a Jewish Christian like Paul is able to describe with constantly increasing enthusiasm the glory of the redemption wrought by Christ for the whole human race, affirming that in its completion even inanimate nature is drawn into its sweep, while he passes by with a single incidental remark (iii. 3), the fact that by the vast majority of his own nation, mediators of the divine revelation though they are (iii. 2, v. 20), no benefits are enjoyed from this salvation, this omission itself requires explanation. This is given in the fourth section (ix. 1-xi. 35). After the song of thanksgiving in viii. 31-39, it was most fitting for Paul to aver with all solemnity that he speaks the absolute truth when he says that in his heart he suffers unceasing pain because of his unbelieving countrymen. To be sure, he does not want this to be understood as implying that God did not fulfil the promise which He made to Israel, or that the unbelieving Jews have a right by reason of their origin, and of such moral service as they may have rendered in addition, to complain of the new course taken by history with the entrance of the gospel (ix. 6 f.). From such errors he is saved by his knowledge of O.T. history and prophecy (ix. 7b-29). But nevertheless it grieves him exceedingly that while Gentiles, who are little concerned about righteousness, are saved, Israel, with all its striving after legal righteousness, obtains neither this righteousness nor the righteousness of faith, stumbling at the very point where they ought not to stumble, namely, the revelation of God in Christ (ix. 30-33). But Paul is not satisfied with merely lamenting the tragic fate of his nation. Because of their earnest, albeit blind zeal, which led them to resist the gospel, thereby giving the Gentiles their present pre-eminence, he longs for their salvation, and beseeches that it may be granted them by God (chap. x.). That there can be no question of a permanent rejection of Israel is proved by every conversion of individual Jews, like Paul, and by the existence of a body of Jewish Christians, numbering thousands (xi. 1-7a, cf. ix. 27-29). The hardening of Israel, which carries with it still other judgments of a more external kind (xi. 7b-10), is not an end in itself, but designed, primarily, to enable the Gentiles to obtain part in redemption. There is hope that finally the conversion of the Gentiles will react upon Israel, leading to their salvation also (xi. 11 f.). Paul calls the special attention of the Gentile Christians at Rome to the fact that, in fulfilling the specific work involved by his commission as an apostle to the Gentiles, he does so always with the additional purpose in view of arousing the jealousy of his countrymen and of winning at least some of them, and thus of preparing the way for the conversion of Israel, with which event will come the end of the world (xi. 13-15, cf. ver. 12, n. 9). Similarly, applicable only to Gentile Christians is the warning against an overbearing attitude toward the Jewish people in their present hardened state (vv. 16-24), and the proclamation of the final redemption of the whole of Israel as a truth of scriptural revelation (vv. 25-32). The fourth section ends with an exclamation of wonder at God's government of the world (vv. 32-36).

To the explanation of the nature of the gospel here concluded Paul adds in a fifth section (xii. 1-xv. 13) a comprehensive and well-arranged statement of how one ought to walk in accordance with the same. Unlike what immediately precedes, which is directed to the Gentile Christians alone, what is here said is expressly addressed to all the Christians in Rome (xii. 3). Compared with similar parts of other letters, this section of Romans is especially noticeable for its pressing exhortation to obedience to State authority, together with the fulfilment of all the duties of citizenship (xiii. 1-7), and for the emphasis which it lays—much stronger than in Gal. v. 14—upon the principle that active brotherly love is the true fulfilment of the law (xiii. 8-10, cf. viii. 4). The exhortation to live a sober and self-controlled life in view of the constantly nearer approach of the day of Christ, and in the care of the body to avoid everything that might arouse the passions (xiii. 11-14), introduces at once the discussion of a schism among the Roman Christians regarding which Paul must have been well informed (xiv. 1-23). There were Christians in Rome who from principle avoided the use of meat, possibly also of wine (vv. 2, 20), claiming that such use was defiling (vv. 14, 30). This being their position, naturally they condemned severely all other Christians who used the customary foods without distinction, and were themselves in turn despised for their superstitious scruples (vv. 3, 10). From the opinion of the vegetarians that those who ate meat were not steadfast, but in danger of stumbling (ver. 4), we infer that they looked upon their own abstinence as a means of securing religious steadfastness, and commended it as such to others (cf. Heb. xiii. 9). Although Paul rebukes the ascetics for their bigoted judgment of others, declaring them to be weak in faith, and takes his own stand with those strong in faith, as regards the actual practice in the matter he goes no further than to state that both practices are consistent with the Christian profession, dealing at greatest length with the obligation of those strong in faith to avoid offending the conscience of their weaker brethren. They are not to influence such either by their contemptuous treatment of them, or by their challenging example to act against their consciences (vv. 13-23, cf. 1 Cor. viii. 7-13). The ascetic party must, therefore, have been in the minority. That they were native Jews is probable, as evidenced by the use of the conceptions κοινός and καθαρός (vv. 14, 20), and made certain by the fact that in correcting their judgment of those who eat meat Paul argues that the use of meat is just as consistent with Christianity, and just as much to be tolerated in the Christian Church, as is the observance of certain days (n. 10). This argument has weight only if the ascetics claimed the unquestioned right to set apart on religious grounds certain days, which could have been none other than the Jewish Sabbaths, feasts, and fasts. From the fact that the ascetic party were Jews it does not follow necessarily that those who ate meat were exclusively Gentiles. They could equally well have been Jews, like the apostle, who, in using the phrase "we who are strong," identifies himself with those who used meat (xv. 1).

According to a reliable tradition, xiv. 23 was followed immediately by xvi. 25-27 (§ 22); but even if this were not its original place, it is clear that after concluding the discussion of the differences between the vegetarians and those who ate meat, Paul must have passed to a more general exhortation to preserve the unity of the Church by mutual concessions. From the fact that in the application of this exhortation to the readers united thanksgiving is declared to be the goal toward which they are to strive (xv. 6), and that in the explanation which follows (vv. 8-12) the union of Israel and of the Gentiles is proved from history and Scripture to be the final goal of the course of redemption, one sees that in these closing sentences of the fifth parenthetic section Paul's aim was to remove all differences between the Jewish and Gentile Christians in Rome by which the unity of confession and of worship was imperilled.

The sixth section (xv. 14-xvi. 24, or -xvi. 27) begins with a retrospect of the letter itself, now nearing its close. Paul corrects the possible impression which may have been produced by the elaborateness of the letter and its strenuous tone, that he regarded the Roman Christians as in very special need of instruction. To him even it had seemed a venture to direct such a letter to them. Still this feeling was mitigated somewhat by the fact that he discussed only certain phases of Christian truth, and in doing so was always conscious of reminding them of truths with which they were already familiar. He had ventured to write them in the interest of his calling as the apostle to the Gentiles. By reason of the wide extent of the territory in which heretofore he had carried on his work, it had happened that up to the present he had found constantly new labours close at hand, and so had been prevented from realising the desire which he had often felt of coming to Rome (n. 11). And even now, when he finds no more occasion in the regions lying about the eastern part of the Mediterranean for the kind of missionary work which he recognises as his special work, namely, that of laying foundations, he cannot at once visit Rome on his way to Spain, as he had longed to do for many years, but must go first to Jerusalem to deliver the collection gathered by the Christians in Macedonia and Greece. Not until this business is finished will he go to Spain by way of Rome. So for the present he requests the prayers of the Romans for his protection against the dangers which threaten him at the hands of unbelieving Jews in Jerusalem, and for a favourable reception of the collection on the part of the Christians there, in order that by the will of God he may come to Rome in a joyful state of mind. Here the letter returns to the point at which it began (i. 1-15), and is temporarily concluded with a benediction (xv. 33). The discussion of his projected missionary journeys and his missionary plans, which is merely begun in i. 1-15, is here completed. Now for the first time we understand clearly Paul's statements at the beginning of the letter about his desire to come to Rome, and the hints about the hindrances which hitherto he had always encountered in endeavouring to carry out this purpose (i. 10, 13a). In particular is it clear why he was unable at the beginning of the letter to announce his approaching visit, but had to be satisfied with merely expressing his earnest desire, his willingness, and his hope to come. Great emphasis is laid upon the significance of the circumstance which at this time compels him to postpone his visit still longer, and which justifies the composition of this elaborate letter, namely, the journey to Jerusalem with the collection. In this collection the Gentile Christian Churches founded by him fulfil an obligation of love and of gratitude to the mother Church (xv. 25-27), and Paul hopes that this gift will be the means of producing similar kindly feeling toward the Gentile Christians among the Jewish Christians of Jerusalem (xv. 31). What he said in i. 11 about the purpose of his visit to Rome, and of the fruitful effect which he hoped to see resulting from his visit for the Roman Christians and for himself, is here repeated. He himself hopes to be quickened by his sojourn among the Roman Christians (xv. 24), and is in turn convinced that he will come to them in the fulness of Christian blessing (xv. 29). Since, however, he calls the quickening which he himself hopes to receive among the Roman Christians a "partial filling" (ver. 24), it is certain that he did not contemplate any protracted stay in Rome. This agrees with the modest way in which he spoke in i. 13 of the results which he hoped to obtain from his proposed missionary work in Rome; but just why this was the case is made clear now for the first time, by the repeated notice (vv. 15, 24, 28) that the real objective of his more extended missionary plans is Spain, and that Rome is only a stopping-place for the missionary pressing his way to the extreme West.

The remembrances, greetings, and repeated parting wishes (chap. xvi.) require special investigation, there being more serious question as to their place in Romans than as regards any other part of the letter.

1. (P. 354.) Concerning Paul's use of the first person plural, see above, p. 209, n. 3, p. 316, n. 3. The treatise of Dick, Der schriftstellerische Plural bei Paulus, 1900, betrays in the very title the lack of a distinction between the true epistolary style and the usage of the literati. As is well known, the ancient form of the introductory greeting designated by their personal names the writer of the letter in the nominative and the recipient in the dative; in other words, with entire objectivity as third persons. Paul follows this scheme essentially in all his writings, except that he makes the greeting proper a grammatically independent sentence expressive of his wishes toward them (cf. ZKom. Gal. 29 f., and above, p. 177, n. 2). It appears, therefore, to be contrary to literary style, when before the greeting, which is moulded after the Semitic form into an address to the recipient, ver. 7*b*, an I and thou, or a we and ye appear, as ver. 4, ἡμῶν; ver. 5, ἐλάβομεν; ver. 6, καὶ ἐπεί. No Gal. i. 2, ἐμοί; 2 John 1, 3 John 1, Tit. i. 3 ἐγώ; Philem. 2, σοῦ, more often ἡμῶν and ἡμῖν, 1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Thess. i. 1; 1 Tim. i. 1; Philem. 1; 2 Pet. i. 1; 2 John 2.

This prominence of subjectivity, however, is not at all confined to the letters of the N.T. or the early Christian literature. Cf. e.g. Berl. ägypt. Urk. No. 405. 6, δρογοαστρίφ μου ἀδελφῇ, Nos. 814. 1, 892. 1, and even in Cicero, Ep. ad famil. xvi. 1. In inscriptions also the same thing occurs not infrequently.

2. (P. 354.) Like other Biblical writers, Paul applies the name (τὰ) ἔθνη to Gentile nations in contrast to Israel, and also, following the later Jewish usage (וּמִמָּן, נְתִינִים, Gentile), to individual Gentiles in contrast to Jews (Rom. ii. 14, iii. 29, ix. 24, 30, xi. 11–13, 25, xv. 9 f., 12, 16, 18, 27, xvi. 4). But since Israel also is an ἔθνος (John xi. 48–52, xviii. 35; Luke vii. 5, xxiii. 2; Acts x. 22, xxiv. 3, 10, 17, xxvi. 4, xxviii. 19; also וְאֵלֶּיךָ Ex. xix. 6, xxxiii. 13; Deut. iv. 6; Isa. i. 4, iv. 2), πάντα τὰ ἔθνη could not well be used to denote the Gentile world excluding Israel. In Rom. xv. 11 (Ps. cxvii. 1) the synonymous expression coupled with it (πάντες οἱ λαοί) shows rather that the apostle's meaning is mankind as it is divided into peoples, including Israel, and that the two parties which are distinguished in xv. 8–10 as πρωτομή, or λαὸς τοῦ θεοῦ and ἔθνη, are here spoken of together. If it is perfectly plain that in Matt. xxviii. 19, Luke xxiv. 47, Israel is by no means excluded, but simply that the confining of missionary work to that nation is forbidden, ZKom. Matt. 714, A 9, why should the interpretation be different in Rom. i. 5, xvi. 26; Gal. iii. 8; 2 Tim. iv. 17; Matt. xxiv. 9, 14, xxv. 32; Mark xi. 17, xiii. 10? Moreover, in a speech to Gentiles who had heard nothing as yet of the choice of a people of God and of a special revelation to that people, it would be most inappropriate to say, Gott alle Heiden ihre eigenen Wege haben wandeln lassen ("God suffered all Gentiles to walk in their own ways") (Acts xiv. 16). This translation of Luther's would require the reading ταῖς ἰδίαις αὐτῶν ὁδοῖς, and necessitate the placing of the words in an emphatic position. The meaning is rather that formerly, in contrast to the present preaching of the gospel to all mankind, God suffered the many nations which make up humanity to go their several ways; cf. Acts xvii. 24–30; Rom. iii. 25. Even in the O.T. the term commonly includes Israel; cf. Jer. xxv. 15, 17–25. It is also a very significant fact that the LXX repeatedly uses τὰ ἑθνὰ ἔθνη, where the other modifying words do not make it quite clear that ἑθνὶς or ἑθνικὸς is restricted to nations other than Israel, Deut. viii. 20, xvii. 14; 1 Sam. viii. 5. But the whole of mankind is just as much the field of labour for those apostles to whom the Son of David had given grace and apostleship while He lived in the flesh (Matt. v. 13 f. [xiii. 38], xxviii. 19; Luke xxiv. 47; Acts i. 8), as for Paul, who had been called by the ascended Son of God (Acts ix. 15, xxii. 15, xxvi. 17; 1 Cor. i. 17–24, ix. 20; Col. i. 28). True, the original apostles had to begin their work with Israel and in Jerusalem (Matt. x. 5, 23; Luke xxiv. 47; Acts i. 4, 8, ii. 39), while Paul, on the other hand, was chiefly an apostle to the Gentiles. But this fact did not affect the universality of the apostleship of either, neither was it affected by the subsequent division of their field of labour (Gal. ii. 9, above, p. 266, line 23). Paul considers his mission to the Gentiles only one part of his calling, and indicates that even this has reference also to Israel (Rom. xi. 13 f.). But in his greeting to the Romans he does not speak as an apostle to the Gentiles, but simply as one called to be an apostle, with the same right to address them that Peter would have. He writes, not on the authority of his calling as an apostle of the Gentiles, but only in the interest of it (xv. 15 f.; see below, § 24, n. 1). If Paul had wished to say that by origin the Roman Christians belonged to the class indicated by πάντα τὰ ῥωμα, according to established usage he must have written ἐξ ὧν ἔστε καὶ ὑμεῖς; cf. Gal. ii. 15; Rom. ix. 6, 24, xi. 1; Phil. iii. 5; Acts x. 45, xi. 2, xv. 23; Rev. v. 9, vii. 4-6. What he really does say is that they are a Christian community within the bounds of the apostolic field of labour. Writers as early as Ambrosiaster and Chrysostom (x. 453) give the correct interpretation of the plural ἐλάβομεν, as do also Bengel and von Hengel. There is nothing in the greeting to justify the assumption that persons like Timothy are included in the plural rather than the original apostles (Holmann, iii. 9, who cited xvi. 21). By those who had received an ἀποστολή, the readers must have understood those who, like Paul, were κλητοὶ ἀπόστολοι, and only those (cf. i. 1). Such a full title would not be appropriate to subordinate missionary helpers.

3. (P. 357.) Since οὐ θέλω δι' ὑμῶν ἄγνοεῖν, i. 13 (cf. 1 Thess. iv. 13; 1 Cor. xii. 1; Phil. i. 12), introduces either a new subject or a new phase of the same subject (more certainly even than if γάρ were used; cf. 1 Cor. x. 1; Rom. xi. 25; 2 Cor. i. 8; Col. ii. 1), and since ὅτι πολλὰκις ὁ κύριος contains nothing which has not been said before (i. 10 f.), it follows that the new point of view from which Paul here considers his journey to Rome is to be found in the new statement of his purpose in coming, namely, ἵνα τιμὰ καρπὸν ἀχθῶ καὶ ἐν ὑμῖν. By this cannot be meant the effect of his coming upon the Roman Christian, which has been already described, i. 11 f., but rather the successful missionary work he hoped to accomplish among the Roman populace. This, too, is the only interpretation that accords with the term used (not to be confounded with καρπὸς πωλῆς, φέρων, καρποφορεῖν), which denotes the results of labour (cf. Rom. vi. 21; Phil. i. 22; Matt. xxi. 34; John iv. 36)—or, to put it more precisely, since an apostle, i.e. a missionary, is here speaking, the results of preaching, which is represented under the figure of labour in a field or garden (1 Cor. iii. 6-9). Paul's intercourse with the Roman Christians (i. 11 f.) will not require labour on his part, but will bring him quickening (xv. 24). There is no essential change in the sense, if, with D² G² d g, Ambrosiaster, we read οὐκ αἴωμαι (instead of θέλω) δέ, which sounds more natural, and could have been easily displaced by the other reading which occurs so frequently in Paul's writings. The ἐν ὑμῖν, i. 13, is quite synonymous with ἐν Ῥώμῃ, just as ἐξ ὑμῶν, Col. iv. 9, means "from Colossæ" (Onesimus was not a member of the Church there, but probably had lived in Colossæ); πρὸς ὑμᾶς, Rom. i. 10, xv. 22, 23, 32, "to Rome"; and δι' ὑμῶν, Rom. xv. 28; 2 Cor. i. 16, not directly through the midst of the assembled congregation in Rome or Corinth, but "through (οἶα) Rome or Corinth." That in this passage the readers are addressed not as members of the Roman Church, but as representatives of the Roman populace, the vast majority of whom were as yet unconverted, appears—(1) from the fact that in i. 15, where unquestionably the reference is to the same work as in i. 13, the ὑμῖν is very clearly defined by the appositional τοῖς ἐν Ῥώμῃ. To state that the readers are in Rome would seem superfluous, since up to this time it has always been presupposed, and according to the prevailing text of i. 7 was also formally expressed (see below, § 22, n. 3). On the contrary, it would be very much in place to remark, "When I say ὑμεῖς and ὑμῖν, I mean the people in Rome." The point is just as clear if we read ἐν ὑμῖν in

i. 15 as in i. 13 (so D* and several Latin MSS., also G with its copyist's error ἐπ' ὑμῖν, for which g substitutes in vobis). (2) The same conclusion follows from the meaning of εὐαγγελίζεσθαι. It is impossible longer to speak of preaching the gospel to those who are already κλητοὶ ἄγιοι (i. 6, 7). Against a perverted use of Gal. iv. 13 see above, p. 171, n. 2. (3) It is evident also from the fact that in i. 13 ἐν ὑμῖν stands in contrast not to ἐν ταῖς λοιπαῖς ἐκκλησίαις (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 17, vii. 17, xiv. 33), but to ἐν τοῖς λοιποῖς ἔθνεσιν. Thus the readers are addressed as τὸ ἔθνος τῶν Ῥωμαίων. But that does not mean the Roman nation, even if it were possible to use such a term; nor yet the populus Romanus (δῆμος Ῥωμαίων, Just. Apol. i. [in the address]), the whole body of cives Romani, but the total population of Rome at that time, citizens and non-citizens, foreigners and natives, slaves and free men, consisting of all sorts of nationalities, Romans, Greeks, Egyptians, Celts, Syrians, and Jews,—an ἐπιτομή τῆς οἰκουμένης, as the rhetorician Polemo (in Galenus, ed. Kühn, xviii. 1. 347) called Rome. The sense of i. 13 would have been practically the same if Paul had written καὶ ἐν Ῥώμῃ, καθὼς καὶ ἐν ταῖς λοιπαῖς πόλεσιν. Cf. an imperial writ of the third century (Grenfell and Hunt, Papyri Towns, 120: ἐν ταῖς πόλεσιν ἀπάσαις, ταῖς τε κατ' Ἰταλίαν καὶ ταῖς ἐν τοῖς ἄλλοις ἔθνεσιν; further, Galenus, Anat. admin. i. 1, ed. Kühn, xix. 218, ἐν Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ δὲ καὶ τισιν ἄλλοις ἔθνεσιν γενόμενος; cf. Acts xxvi. 4 (above, p. 68, n. 15); also Acts ii. 5 (not ἐκ, but ἀπὸ παντὸς ἔθνους, above, p. 61); cf. further the contrast in Dio Cass. xxxvi. 41 (al. 24) between οἴκοι (in Rome) and ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν (in the provinces, i.e. among the subject peoples); liv. 30, ἡ Ἀσία τὸ ἔθνος=the province of Asia with all its motley population. Ramsay, Stud. Oxon. iv. 30, compares for this use of ἔθνος C. I. Gr. 2802; Le Bas-Waddington, No. 1219; Inscr. Brit. Mus. 487. The argument remains unchanged if we make καθὼς begin a sentence running through and including ver. 14, a punctuation which has much to commend it (cf. Klostermann, Korrekturen, 4 f.). Paul's purpose through missionary preaching to achieve some results in Rome also is in keeping with the fact that among all other peoples and in all other parts of the world he feels himself a debtor both to Greeks and Barbarians, to the cultured and uncultured alike. Although the reference here is primarily to the regions in which Paul had laboured hitherto, where he had to deal now with Barbarians who spoke Lycaonian (Acts xiv. 11), now with Athenians trained in philosophy, sometimes with Jews, sometimes with Greeks, nevertheless in the comparison of Rome with these provinces there is an indirect reference to the peculiarly varied mixture of peoples in the imperial capital. Paul is thinking, however, not so much of the different nationalities represented in Rome, as of the different degrees of culture among the individuals to whom the gospel is to be brought.

4. (P. 357.) The omission of πρῶτον, i. 16, in BG and in Marcion (Tert. c. Marc. v. 13; GK, ii. 515), proves merely that it was early found to be embarrassing. In ii. 9, 10 there is no question as to the soundness of the text, and there is no conceivable reason why πρῶτον should have been introduced from these verses into i. 16. But, as Klostermann (Korrekturen, 14–24) was the first to point out, the common view, that Jews and Greeks (=Gentiles) here represent the two divisions of mankind or Christendom comprehended in the phrase παντὶ τῷ πιστεύοντι, is quite untenable. For, on this interpretation, the essential equality of Jew and Gentile and the Jew's priority over the

Gentile are asserted in the same breath. The correct interpretation is that found in an ancient summary (Cod. Amiat., ed. Tischendorf, 240, c. iii.), which gathers up the contents of Rom. i. 13-17 in the words "de gentibus græcis ac barbaris et primatu Judæorum atque Græcorum." The reasons for so interpreting the passage are—(1) Paul does not use "Ἕλλην, ἑλληνικός κτλ. in the sense of "Gentile," as did other Jews who wrote in Greek subsequent to the time of the Seleucidæ (above, p. 58, n. 2). 1 Cor. i. 22 is applicable only to Greeks, not to all non-Jews. In Col. iii. 11 Scythians and Barbarians are mentioned with Greeks. There are other passages (Rom. iii. 9, x. 12; 1 Cor. x. 32, xii. 13; Gal. ii. 3, iii. 28) where it is uncertain whether the word is used in its proper national sense, or its derivative, religio-historical sense. But here the latter meaning is impossible, for, in the immediate context (i. 14), "Ἕλλην is used to denote not Gentile in contrast to Jew, but the Greek and the man of Greek culture, including the Hellenised Jew, the Hellenist (above, pp. 41, n. 8, 71, n. 21) in contrast to the Barbarian, i.e. the man without Greek culture; (2) an instance has yet to be cited where πρῶτον or a similar word inserted between τὸ καὶ destroys the parity of the words connected by these particles. Even if the reading were πρῶτόν τε καὶ, it would not bear this interpretation. In Acts xxvi. 20 the preaching in Damascus and Jerusalem which afterward affected the whole country of Judæa (cf. Acts ix. 27 f.; Gal. i. 22 f.; Rom. xv. 19) is treated as one composite whole and spoken of as the apostle's first preaching, in contrast to his later preaching to the Gentiles, which was separated from his first ministry by an interval of several years. There is a passage in Eusebius (Ecl. Proph. iii. 26, ed. Gaisford, p. 162) which may be considered parallel in spite of the difference between πρῶτον and πρότερον, and which weighs against the common interpretation of Rom. i. 16. Speaking of what the devil had done to Jerusalem through the instrumentality of the Roman legions, his agents, Eusebius says: πάσαν φθορὰν ἐνηργήσατο αὐτῷ τε πρότερον τῷ λαῷ καὶ τοῖς τὴν πόλιν ἐνοικοῦσι πολίταις, ἔπειτα δὲ καὶ τῷ ναῷ καὶ τῇ πάλαι συντελουμένῃ ἐν αὐτῷ λατρείᾳ; (3) certainly in Rom. i.-ix. we do not find any development of the idea that the gospel is a power of God unto salvation in a higher degree or sooner in the case of believing Jews than of believing Gentiles. On the contrary, up to x. 12 the whole argument is to show that, with respect to the divine judgment and in regard to the way of salvation, there is no distinction between Jew and Gentile. This statement is not invalidated by the mention of the privileges of Israel in iii. 1. Not until x. 19 (if πρῶτος be taken as a part of the preceding question—with Bentley, Critica Sacra, ed. Ellies, 30, and Hofmann, ad loc.) is mention made of the prior claims of Israel to Christ's redemption and the gospel, and their corresponding treatment at the hand of God. It is referred to again slightly in xv. 8 f., but by this time the theme stated in i. 16 f. must have been quite forgotten by the readers. On the other hand, the thought would be more appropriate that, whereas the gospel exists, as it certainly does and ought, for all men, it is intended, however, primarily, or at least in the first instance, for the people of God's revelation and for the world of Greek culture. In view of actual facts, this thought would not require further elucidation. As yet, the apostolic mission had not extended to the barbarous peoples beyond the bound of civilisation, but had been directed to Jews and Greeks, or at least Hellenised peoples, of course without neglect of its duty toward individual Barbarians in the Græco-Roman world (Rom. i. 14), and without losing sight of its ultimate goal (Matt. xxviii. 19; Acts i. 8; Rom. xi. 11-15, 25-32; 2 Tim. iv. 17). Consequently Paul does not go to the Parthians or the Ethiopians, but, after having preached the gospel from Jerusalem to Illyricum (Rom. xv. 19), he "must see Rome also" (Acts xix. 21). Jews and Greeks are prepared beyond the rest of mankind for the reception of the gospel, and for that very reason, too, are most responsible for their religious and moral attitude. This explains πρῶτον in ii. 9 f. as in i. 16. A δεύτερον and a τρίτον are not excluded but rather implied, so there is no contradiction of the complete universality of divine providence and revelation.

5. (P. 359.) Although the different views regarding iv. 1 f. (cf. above, p. 131 f., n. 2) and iv. 16-22 cannot be discussed here, it should be observed that two aspects of Abraham's fatherhood are distinguished in iv. 11, 12 which in πατὴρ πάντων ἡμῶν, iv. 16, are combined. He is the father of uncircumcised believers (ver. 11), and more definitely by reason of circumcision he is father of those Jews who have not only been circumcised but also walk according to Abraham's faith (ver. 12). The logical and stylistic incongruity of the article before στοιχοῦσιν is perhaps relieved by Hort's conjecture (Append. 108) that we read καὶ αὐτοῖς instead of καὶ τοῖς, the only reading that has come down to us. Or perhaps the τοῖς before στοι (χοῦσιν) is due to an unconscious repetition on the part of the copyist.

6. (P. 359.) Since we are to read ἐχωμεν and not ἔχομεν in v. 1, and must accordingly construe καυχώμεθα, v. 2, 3, as subjunctive, the section v. 1-11 begins, it is true, in hortatory form. But this does not change its logical relation to what precedes, as indicated above, especially in view of the fact that from ver. 9 on the declarative form is resumed. The key to the interpretation of v. 12-21 is to be found in the word βασιλεύειν, which is five times repeated (v. 14, 17, 21, cf. also vi. 12, and κυριεύειν, vi. 14).

7. (P. 361.) The characteristics of this kingly rule are—(1) its absoluteness; (2) its independence of the will and conduct of those born under its sway. The latter applies especially to the line beginning with Adam, the former to that beginning with Christ.

8. (P. 362.) If ἀμαρτίας and ὑπακοῆς, vi. 16, cannot denote the two masters between whom choice must be made (which would require rather τῇ ἀμαρτίᾳ and τῇ ὑπακοῇ), and if both are used attributively, it follows that the readers were always servants, and servants of God. The τῆς ἀμαρτίας in vi. 17 is also to be taken attributively, which the article does not forbid (cf. Luke xvi. 8, xviii. 6; 2 Cor. i. 8); for the thing contrasted with their former state is not the choice of a new master, but the fact that they have become obedient from the heart in their conversion to the gospel. The attracted clause εἰς ὃν παρεδόθητε τύπον is to be expanded into εἰς τὸν τύπον διδασκῆς, ὃν παρεδόθητε, and the latter phrase further into ὡς παρεδόθη ὑμῖν (cf. Ewald and Hofmann, ad loc.; possibly also Philo, de Josepho, xvii, ἐν οἷς ἐπετράπησαν κατηγορηθέντες). It is plain that language like this could be addressed only to Jewish Christians who, prior to their conversion, considered themselves servants of God (cf. viii. 15), but rendered their Master only an external or seeming obedience. Really at that time they were the slaves of sin, and did not become slaves of righteousness until their conversion. The change from the contrast between obedient and disobedient servants of God in vv. 16, 17 to the different contrast of vv. 18–23 is quite in keeping with Paul's style (cf. also John viii. 33–34), as is also the change from the figure of slavery to that of military service in ver. 23 (cf. vi. 13); observe also that while ἀφώνια (= stipendia) denotes regular pay (cf. 1 Cor. ix. 7; Luke iii. 14), χάρισμα means an extraordinary largess (donativum); cf. Tertullian's translation, De Resurr. xlvii, and pseud-Origenes, Tract., ed. Batiffol, p. 198. 5, "stipendia salutis . . . charismatum donativa." It is perfectly clear that in vii. 1–6 Paul addresses the readers as if they, like himself, had lived under the law prior to their conversion and new birth. No rational man could possibly say this of native Gentiles. Neither could a Christian who had grown up in Judaism speak in this connection of native Gentile Christians in relation to himself as Paul does from vii. 4 (καρποφορήσωμεν) on. Consequently, for this reason if for no other the question of the nationality of the Roman Christians may be regarded as settled, for it is equally clear that Paul is not here addressing a part of his readers. Manifestly the fact that he addresses them as brethren in vii. 1 and again in vii. 4 is not an accident, since no address of this kind has been used since i. 13. He remembers that the great majority of these Christian brethren in Rome are of like origin with himself, and have stood in the same relation to the law. But there is nothing in the passage which justifies us in taking ἀδελφοί differently from the way in which it is taken in i. 13, viii. 12, xii. 1, by making it refer simply to a part of the Roman Christians, who as yet have been addressed without distinction. Had Paul wished to direct to the Jewish members of the Church in contradistinction to the Gentiles the address which begins here, it would have been necessary for him to write ὑμῖν δὲ λέγω, τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς μου κατὰ σάρκα (cf. xi. 13, ix. 3), or τοῖς ἐκ περιτομῆς; or, if after he had written the ambiguous ἀδελφοί it occurred to him that the part of the Church which he was addressing needed to be more clearly distinguished, he could have added after ἀδελφοί, ὑμῖν γὰρ λέγω, τοῖς τὸν νόμον γινώσκουσιν. As the passage reads, Paul does not make a distinction between those of his readers who know the law and those who do not; but, as he appeals to their experiential knowledge concerning the length of time the law is valid, he simply reminds himself and all his readers that he is speaking in this letter to those who know the law. It is difficult to understand how Hofmann, iii. 261, in spite of his grammatically correct rendering of the words ἀδελφοί—λαλῶ, can still hold that Paul is addressing here only the Jewish portion of his readers, and that λalῶ refers merely to what is said in vii. 1–6. This is logically impossible. Moreover, a less important but sufficiently valid objection is the fact that if Paul had intended thus to make the word refer to the statement that follows, it would have been necessary for him to write λέγω (I say) instead of λalῶ (talk, speak), Rom. iii. 5, vi. 19, ix. 1, xi. 13, xii. 3; 1 Cor. vi. 5, vii. 6, 8, x. 15; 2 Cor. vi. 13, vii. 3, viii. 8, xi. 21). Even where λέγω and λalῶ occur together (Rom. iii. 19; 1 Cor. ix. 8) the distinction is not lost.

9. (P. 365.) A decision between the reading ὑμῖν δέ (SABP) and ὑμῖν γάρ (DGL) in xi. 13 is difficult, but it is not of much importance in determining the historical meaning of the passage, for evidently Paul is not thinking here of some characteristic of his readers suggested by what he is about to say (as if, e.g. he had said ἔθνεσι γὰρ λαλῶ; cf. vii. 1, n. 7). The appositive τοῖς ἔθνεσιν may be translated in one of two ways: "You who are Gentiles in distinction from other people"; or "You who are the Gentile members of this circle." Both renderings are possible grammatically (cf. the similar ambiguity in Luke xviii. 13). But the emphatic position of ὑμῖν at the beginning of the sentence shows clearly that Paul is here distinguishing a special class among the readers who hitherto have been addressed as one body (cf. Rev. ii. 24; Luke xi. 42-53).

10. (P. 366.) If in xiv. 5 we read ὃς μὲν γάρ (N*ACP), it is even clearer than when γάρ is omitted (BDG) that the contrast between observance and non-observance of certain days is intended only as an illustration. Moreover, according to the shorter and more correct reading in xiv. 6, only those who do observe days are mentioned and compared with those who eat meat and not those who make no distinction between days, which renders it evident that the illustration is intended to show the ascetic that the eating of meat to which he objects is just as much to be tolerated as the observance of certain days. From this it follows that the ascetics must have regarded the observance of days as right beyond all question, and made it their own practice (cf. Sketches, 177, 353, n. 13). From this we are not, however, to conclude with E. Riegenbach (ThStKr. 1893, S. 652 f.) that the question of the observance of days was a subject of controversy between the weak and the strong parties in the Roman Church. Since the Mosaic law did not forbid to Israelites the use either of meat or of wine, these ascetics could not possibly have based their own practice and their demands upon their fellow-Christians on the doctrine that the law, particularly the Mosaic law, prohibiting the use of certain foods, was binding upon Christians. A connection with Essenism is the more unlikely, because the opinion which was first advanced by Jerome (adv. Jovin. ii. 14), that the Essenes abstained from the use of meat and wine, has very little to support it (cf. Lucius, Der Essenismus, S. 56; Schürer, ii. 569 [Eng. trans. ii. 200]). Philo's statement (Quod omnis prob. lib. xii, Mangey, ii. 457), that the Essenes do not sacrifice beasts, but purify their hearts, indicates nothing as to abstinence from the use of meat. But this statement is to be understood in the light of the more definite language of Josephus (Ant. xviii. 1. 5). Although in places the text of Josephus is not quite certain (Niese, ed. major on vol. iii. 143, 10), it is nevertheless clearly stated that in place of the sacrificial ritual in the Temple at Jerusalem from which they were excluded, the Essenes made the required sacrifices among themselves (ἐφ' αὐτῶν τὰς θυσίας ἐπιτελοῦσιν). Farther on we learn that they considered the preparation of the bread and other food to be a priestly function (ιερεῖς δὲ [χειροτονοῦσιν] ἐπὶ ποιήσει σίτου καὶ τῶν βρωμάτων), considered the house where they ate a temple, and looked upon their common meals as sacrificial feasts (Bell. ii. 8. 5). Had the food which was set before the members of the order by the cook (μάγειρος—named along with the baker—Bell. ii. 8. 5) consisted solely of vegetables, it would have been necessary to state the fact explicitly, since the use of θυσίας ἐπιτελεῖν to denote the preparation of food most naturally suggests the slaughter of animals. It is also to be noted that according to Philo (Eus. Præp. viii. 11. 4, βοσκήματα; § 8, παντοδαπὰ θρέμματα) they engaged to a large extent in the raising of cattle in addition to agriculture. Moreover, when it is said to their credit that they were always temperate at their meals, and that only enough food and drink to satisfy hunger and thirst was set before them, the drinking of wine is presupposed (Jos. Bell. ii. 8. 5). Their abhorrence of all food not prepared by themselves (Bell. ii. 8. 8 and 10) plainly refers not to particular kinds of food which they were forbidden to use, but to the method of its preparation (slaughter), which, in their eyes, assumed the character of worship. This feeling of the Essenes may be compared to the Jews' detestation of "Hellenic oil" (Jos. Vita, 13), although they made abundant use of "clean" oil. If only abstinence from the use of meat were under discussion in Rom. xiv., one might conclude that reference was intended to the School of the Sextii in Rome, under whose influence Seneca became a vegetarian in his youth (Epist. cviii. 17-22). But since it is implied in xiv. 17, 21 that these ascetics abstained from wine also (cf. Col. ii. 16, ἐν πόσει), and since in xiv. 5 f. it is presupposed that they and possibly other Christians in Rome observed certain days on religious grounds, the probability is that the tendency in question had a Jewish source. Upon various occasions Jews were accustomed to abstain from meat and wine—that is to say, from whatever was physically stimulating or ministered merely to pleasure. Sometimes it took the place of a complete fast as a preparation for receiving revelations (4 Esdr. ix. 24-26, xii. 51); again, it was a way with the pious of expressing sorrow for some painful misfortune. According to Bala Bathra, 60*b*, after the destruction of the Temple (70 A.D.), the Pharisees resolved never again to taste of wine or meat, and only earnest effort prevented this custom from becoming general (cf. Delitzsch, Brief an d. Römer in d. Hebr. übersetzt u. aus Talmud u. Midrasch erläutert, 1870, S. 97). The Jewish Christians in Rome, like James in Jerusalem (Eus. H. E. ii. 23. 5), may have practised such abstinence and urged it upon all Christians, either as a sign of sorrow for the unbelief of their people and for the approaching judgment upon Israel and Jerusalem (cf. 1 Thess. ii. 16; Rom. ix. 3), or in view of the near approach of the Parousia (cf. Rom. xiii. 11-14; 1 Thess. v. 4-8; Matt. xxiv. 37, 49, ix. 15, xi. 18 f.).

11. (P. 367.) Since διό, xv. 22, means "therefore," not "thereby," the hindrances in question could not have been formally stated in the preceding verses. Nor is the real cause which had kept Paul away to be sought in xv. 20 f.; for the reason that, if it was a matter of honour with Paul to preach only where Christ had not yet been preached, the number of places where he found it necessary to tarry would have been fewer, and rapid progress from the East to the West instead of being hindered would have been furthered. Hence διό refers to what precedes the description of the method of his missionary work (vv. 20, 21), namely, to the statements concerning its importance and wide compass (vv. 15*b*-19). Assuming that the rather late reading ἐλεύσομαι πρὸς ὑμᾶς, xv. 23, is spurious, and that γάρ, xv. 24, is genuine, it follows that ὡς ἂν—Σπανίαν is dependent upon the preceding participial clause, and the sentence beginning with νυνὶ δέ, ver. 23, but deprived of its proper conclusion by ἐλπίζω γάρ—ἐμπελησθῶ, is taken up again by νυνὶ δέ in ver. 25. If this was written at the beginning of 58 A.D., the ἀπὸ πολλῶν ἐτών, xv. 23 (which the reading ἱκανῶν, BC, is possibly meant to weaken somewhat), would imply that Paul's mind was turning towards Rome earlier than might be inferred from 2 Cor. x. 16 and Acts xix. 21—perhaps as early as his first stay in Corinth (end of 52 until Pentecost 54).

Communications from his landlord concerning the conditions in Rome (Acts xviii. 2) may have moved him to this. The main difficulty that prevented the fulfilment of his desire was the work in Ephesus, which occupied him for three years altogether. After having sought in vain to reach the western coast of the province of Asia, before he crossed into Europe (Acts xvi. 6), and perhaps even on his first missionary journey (above, p. 181), Paul would not have been inclined to leave the East, nor could he have set out from Corinth for Italy and Spain without first having accomplished the preaching of the gospel in the province of Asia. But how Paul could write xv. 23 without having been in Alexandria must find its explanation in facts about which we can only make conjectures; cf. Skizzen, 343, A. 32.

§ 22. THE INTEGRITY OF THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

There are facts in the tradition of the text which are or seem calculated to arouse suspicion as to whether some parts of the received text belonged originally to the letter (n. 1). These facts are as follows:—(1) In the West as in the East, and indeed in the East even before Origen, texts were in existence, which, though differing among themselves, agreed in that in all of them ἐν Ῥώμῃ was wanting in i. 7 (n. 2). There is no more probability that these words belong to the original text than that ἐν Ἐφέσῳ belongs to Eph. i. 1. But because of the general conviction, which in this case also was not disputed by Marcion, that the letter was intended for the Christians of Rome, ἐν Ῥώμῃ was inserted, only much earlier than the ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, in order that at once in the introductory greeting, as at the beginning of the other Church letters of Paul, this letter might have a clear designation of its recipients. This supposition would also not have any greater historical significance even were it proved by means of further documentary evidence to be beyond question. For in i. 15 the words τοῖς ἐν Ῥώμῃ, which are lacking in only one of the witnesses for the reading of i. 7, here approved, are also for internal reasons indisputable. It is evident besides from i. 8–13 that Romans was addressed to a locally defined group of Christians, and from xv.

22-32 that the residence of the readers lay on the road from the East to Spain. Only the one who confounds the introductory greeting with the general address can fail to feel the lack of definiteness of locality in the greeting (see above, p. 77 f.). (2) According to the testimony of Origen, when this testimony is rightly understood, Marcion not only threw out entirely the so-called doxology, xvi. 25-27, but also mutilated all that followed xiv. 23 in the text commonly used by the Church (n. 3). Now, even if the interpretation of Origen's testimony were correct, which makes Marcion throw out entirely not only xvi. 25-27 but xv. 1-xvi. 24 as well, it would not necessarily follow that Marcion's recension was based upon a copy of the text current in the Church which concluded with xiv. 23; for we know that Marcion threw out, either altogether or in large part, whole chapters from the text of the Epistles which he found current, partly because they did not seem to him adapted for the edification of the Church, and partly because they were contradictory to his own views. If, on the other hand, the interpretation of Origen be correct, it is proof that Marcion had a copy of Romans which contained sections beyond xiv. 23 at least similar to our text of chaps. xv.-xvi., and that these were so objectionable to him that he struck out considerable portions of them. (3) The attempt has been made to connect with the facts mentioned under (1) and (2) certain doubtful traces of the circulation of a Latin text which in chaps. xv.-xvi. is supposed to have contained only the doxology (n. 4). (4) Even as early as Origen's time there existed among the exemplars used in the Church the difference, that in some of them xvi. 25-27 stood between xiv. 23 and xv. 1, and in others at the end of the letter (n. 3). From the fact that Origen interprets the doxology as the conclusion of the letter, we may infer that this location was the one preferred in the circle to which he belonged.

When, however, he characterises this position ut nunc est positum, he seems to imply that the older tradition was in favour of the position after xiv. 23. Since, however, he considered it a matter of small importance, he merely expressed his opinion and refrained from all critical consideration of the question. The testimony of Origen does prove at least that the difference in the location of the doxology was not due in the first place to the systematic revision of the text (Lucian, Hesychius) which was made subsequent to Origen's time, but that it goes back to the time of the unregulated growth of text-transmission, at least back of the year 230. This fact renders our judgment regarding the original position of the doxology independent of the question as to the age of the existing sources for the text which have the doxology in one or the other of these positions, and of the very diverse opinions regarding the value of these extant sources; for all of these are later than Origen. The question as to the original location of the doxology is essentially independent of the question whether it was written by Paul or added by someone else later. For whoever wrote it could not have left it doubtful where he intended it to be placed. Assuming that the doxology is an interpolation, there is a third possibility, namely, that the writer placed the doxology after xiv. 23, but that this was at the same time the conclusion of the letter, in addition to the other two, namely, that the doxology stood originally either between xiv. 23 and xv. 1 or after xvi. 23 (24). This third possibility arises, however, only in case chaps. xv.—xvi. are also questioned.

The external evidence involved in the above problem is as follows:—I. Witnesses for the doxology between xiv. 23 and xv. 1: (1) Nonnulli codices known to Origen and regarded by him as witnesses of the original tradition, or at least of the tradition most prevalent in the earlier period; (2) the Antiochian recension of the text, represented by L and most Greek cursives, by the liturgical tradition of the Greek Church, by the commentators of the Antiochian school, Chrysostom, Theodoret, and their successors, by the later Syriac (S³), and by the Gothic translation (n. 5). (3) That this position of the doxology was once widely current also in the West, is evidenced (a) by an old Latin capitula which divides Romans into fifty-one chapters: chap. l. begins with xiv. 15 and is followed immediately by chap. li., which began with xvi. 25–27, or consisted only of these verses (n. 4); (b) the copyist of the Greek and Latin bilingual G, who, without copying any part of the doxology itself, did, nevertheless, leave space enough for it after xiv. 23 (n. 6). To this is to be added still other evidence, that in the West also the position of the doxology at the end of the letter was not the only position (n. 5). (4) In favour of the location after xiv. 23, or partly favouring it, is the testimony of those MSS. which have the doxology twice (n. 7), after xiv. 23 and after xvi. 23 (24). II. Witnesses for the doxology after xvi. 23 or xvi. 24: (1) the Alii codices of Origen, which represented the tradition preferred in his vicinity; (2) the so-called best MSS. α BCD (regarding these see n. 6), also three or four cursives; (3) of the versions, the Coptic, Vulgate, and Peshito (n. 8); (4) of the commentators, Origen, Ambrosiaster, Pelagius (n. 4), Augustine (n. 4), Sedulius, and possibly also John of Damascus (n. 5). To this is to be added the partial testimony of MSS. which give the doxology twice (above, under I. 4). III. So far as we know, throughout the entire ancient Church only in Marcion's N.T. was the doxology wholly omitted, which fact is referred to in a notice by Jerome, the meaning of which is not clear (n. 9). The actual omission of the doxology in G [see under I. 3 (b) above], and other facts which some have attempted to interpret in this way, cannot be taken as evidence of the existence in the ancient Church of a text without the doxology. The single case where the doxology is omitted altogether, that of a Vulgate MS. of the ninth or tenth century, which has a mixed text, is to be explained as an isolated, but very natural result in the mixing of Latin texts in which the position of the doxology varied (n. 6).

This review shows only that the difference in the tradition, which existed before Origen's time, was decided in and about Antioch and Constantinople in favour of the position of the doxology at the end of chap. xiv., by the rest of the Church in favour of the position at the end of chap. xvi. For us the question must be decided by the internal evidence, and this evidence is in favour of the opinion that originally the doxology stood after chap. xiv. For (1) while Paul not infrequently interrupts the course of a letter with a doxology ending with ἀμήν, he never concludes a letter in this manner, but always with a benediction ἡ χάρις τοῦ κυρίου κτλ. (n. 10). (2) If it is difficult to see how Paul could have written these weighty sentences, most intimately connected with the argument of the Epistle, after a long series of personal notices (xv. 14–xvi. 23), which as it grows longer shows constantly less and less connection with the theme of the letter, still less is it possible to conceive how in thus gathering up the thread of the discourse, broken so long before, he should have been suddenly so deeply moved as to be unable to conclude properly the sentence which he began. In view of this anacoluthon, the evidence for which is conclusive, it is doubtful whether originally xvi. 25–27 was a doxology at all (n. 11). (3) The subtle connection in thought between the doxology and the contents of both chap. xiv. and chap. xv. 1–13 makes it impossible to suppose that the doxology found its place so appropriately between xiv. 23 and xv. 1 by accident. Nor could it have been placed there by a reviser, who would look at the matter from a purely external point of view. However, the position after chap. xiv. must be due to the writer of the doxology, and this is true whether the writer is the same as that of the letter or is to be distinguished from the latter (n. 12). (4) That the doxology did not stand originally at the end of chap. xvi. follows also from the fact, that it is hardly possible naturally to explain the confusion in the tradition of the text otherwise than by assuming that this confusion is due either to a later insertion of the doxology in chap. xvi. or later addition to the same (n. 13). (5) Assuming that the doxology stood originally at the end of the letter, there is no natural way in which to explain its transference to the position following xiv. 23 (n. 14). If, on the other hand, the doxology stood originally after xiv. 23, it is easier to see how in certain localities it came to be transferred to the end of the letter. Since in Origen's time this transference had been generally accepted in his neighbourhood (above, p. 399 f.), it is probable that it was made in the second century, i.e. at a time when as yet a general freedom which later disappeared was allowed in the handling of apostolic texts. Furthermore, the change was made probably in Alexandria. Because, beginning with Origen, the oldest witnesses for the position of the doxology at the end of the letter may be traced directly or indirectly to Egypt. And Alexandria was the point from which a text modified by critical reflection could spread most easily both toward the East and the West (n. 15). The text under discussion is of this character. The doxology seemed to disturb the close connection between xiv. 1-23 and xv. 1-13, and, after the analogy of Jude 24 f.; Phil. iv. 20; 1 Pet. iv. 10 f.; 2 Pet. iii. 18; Heb. xiii. 20 f., seemed to belong much more naturally at the end of the letter, for which reason it was transferred to this position. Or possibly criticism reached simply the negative conclusion that the doxology was not in its right place after xiv. 23, so that it was transferred to the end, in order that a portion of the text handed down by the tradition might not be altogether lost. There are other instances where this has happened (n. 15 regarding John vii. 53–viii. 11); and the principle involved was openly avowed in the fourth century in connection with the discussion of critical questions (Eusebius, in Mai, Nova p. bibl. iv. 1. 255; GK, ii. 913).

Presupposing the genuineness of the doxology, the attempt has been made to trace the uncertainty regarding its position back to the time when the letter was written, and to explain the uncertainty partly in a mechanical way as due to the manner in which the letter was written, partly as due to intention on Paul's part. Neither supposition has any plausibility (n. 16). More is to be said for the suspicion roused by the varying position of the doxology as to its genuineness, or even as to the genuineness of the section, xv. 1–xvi. 24, standing between the two locations of the doxology, about which there has been a question ever since before Origen's time. For, on either supposition, it is easy enough to explain the varying position of the doxology. If xv. 1–xvi. 24 is a later addition, the position of the doxology after xiv. 23 is easily explained by supposing that the new section was added, while the position of the doxology at the end of the letter only requires the supposition that in order to retain the old conclusion the new section was simply inserted between xiv. 23 and the doxology (cf. what is said regarding xvi. 24 in n. 13). On the other hand, supposing that everything else is genuine and that the doxology alone is a later addition, it is only necessary to imagine that in some cases the work of the interpolator, who, it is assumed, certainly inserted the doxology between xiv. 23 and xv. 1, was simply copied, while in other cases, where the doxology seemed out of place in this location, or where, after comparison with other MSS., its position seemed suspicious, it was omitted here and inserted rather at the close of the letter, in order that no portion of the existing text might be lost.

Suspicion as to the genuineness of the doxology was proportionally increased according as the error was accepted that in antiquity there were MSS. in the Church which did not have the doxology. Then, in addition, there were the objections, which were made to the contents of all that follows xiv. 23, so that up to the present time there are three opinions which have been maintained, supported in every case by inaccurate representation of the facts of the tradition: (1) that only the doxology is spurious (Reiche, Mangold); (2) that while xvi. 1-23 or parts of this section were written by Paul, it was intended for the Church in Ephesus (n. 20); (3) that all following xiv. 23 is a false enlargement of the original letter (Baur, n. 19). It is self-evident that the last hypothesis leaves unexplained the very ancient variations in the position of the doxology. It is equally plain also that the second view must be helped out by assuming peculiar accidents in connection with the preparation and transmission of Paul's letters. If the preceding account of the tradition be correct, taken alone it furnishes positive support to no one of these negative views. Consequently, to secure acceptance, they must have all the stronger support from the internal evidence.

Taking it for granted from what has been said above, that in the Bible used in the Church the doxology stood originally immediately after xiv. 23, the considerations which led to this conclusion are also for the most part strong arguments against the view that the doxology is spurious. The internal connections between the doxology and what precedes (xiv. 1-23) and follows (xv. 1-13), which have been already referred to (n. 12), show a subtleness of thought which one seeks for in vain in the whole body of ancient Christian literature proved to be the work of interpolators. The doxology re-echoes the main thought of the letter; but for all that it is not made up of words or phrases taken from the preceding part of the Epistle or from other letters of Paul and patched together again, as is the case in the ancient pseudo-Pauline Epistles to the Laodiceans and Corinthians. On the contrary, thoughts which had influenced the author from the beginning of the letter are summed up again in a manner independent and yet in entire conformity to the context of chap. xiv. and chap. xv. (n. 17). Furthermore, the harshness of the expression, the anacoluthon in the construction of the sentence (n. 11), and the fulness and intensity of the thought are strong proofs of the genuineness of the doxology, unless it be shown that these qualities are characteristic of the compilations made by interpolators in the ancient Christian Church. All clear cases go to show only the contrary. Finally, no reasonable motive for the forgery has yet been discovered. If the forger found the letter concluding abruptly with xiv. 23, he would have met the necessity for a proper conclusion to the letter by adding Paul's usual benediction, e.g. a sentence like xvi. 24. At most he would have added only some blessings and greetings such as could be found at the close of almost any of Paul's Epistles. On the other hand, if he found chap. xv. already a part of the letter, the same reasons which led at a very early date to the transference of the doxology from its position following xiv. 23, and which render it impossible to believe that it stood originally at the end of the letter, and was transferred later to the position after xiv. 23, would be conclusive arguments also against the supposition that the interpolator inserted it between chap. xiv. and chap. xv.

Paul himself could not have concluded the letter either with xiv. 23 or xiv. 23 + xvi. 25-27. Nor would a simple benediction like xvi. 20 or xvi. 24, which might have been pushed out of its original place by the addition of

xv. 1-xvi. 20 (or -xvi. 23), have sufficed. For, leaving out of consideration the fact that elsewhere Paul is accustomed to prepare the way for the conclusion of his letters at considerable length (n. 10), in this instance there were special reasons why something needed to be added to chap. xiv. It is clear not only from the discussions of chap. xiv., but also from the entire letter, that Paul was quite thoroughly informed concerning the conditions and feeling of the Roman Church. He must have had friends there who gave him this detailed information. Is it likely, then, that he would conclude the letter without a parting greeting to these friends? Such unfriendliness would be all the more unnatural in this instance, because here he is approaching a Church the majority of whom were unknown to him and he to them. If, as any careful investigation will show, Paul's purpose in this letter was to establish a more intimate relation between himself and this Church, which up to the time had remained a total stranger to him, had he brought the letter to a close without emphasising, at least at the end, the personal relations which he undoubtedly had with individual Christians in Rome, and so making evident the connecting ties already existing between himself and the Roman Church, he would have been neglecting the most obvious means of accomplishing this end.

The surprise expressed now for more than a hundred years, that Paul should have had such an exceptionally large number of greetings to express and convey to the Church in a place that he had not yet visited, shows lack of careful observation. Not a single salutation or other communication intended for individual members is to be found at the close of letters addressed to the Churches founded by Paul at Thessalonica, Corinth, Philippi, and in Galatia. Similarly, the greetings from individuals in 1 Cor. xvi. 19 f. and Phil. iv. 21 f. are only those of persons of special importance to these Churches, and are,

moreover, addressed to the whole Church in Corinth and Philippi (n. 18). On the other hand, in the letter to the Church at Colossæ, which Paul had not organised, and which he had never visited (Col. ii. 1), he conveys the greetings of six individuals (iv. 10-14), who, with the exception of Epaphras, were quite as unknown to the Church personally as was Paul himself. More than this, he requests the conveyance of a special greeting to an individual member of the Colossian Church; also to a member of the neighbouring Church of Laodicea, which likewise he had never visited (Col. iv. 15, 17), although at the same time he had despatched to a prominent Christian household in Colossæ a private letter dealing exclusively with personal matters. Nor does he fail in this letter to the Church, which as yet was a total stranger to him, to make special mention of Onesimus, about whom the private letter despatched at the same time was written, and to remark expressly that Colossæ was Onesimus' home (Col. iv. 9), a fact which the readers themselves knew without being informed. He makes exactly the same remark about Epaphras (iv. 12), who, being the founder of the Church (i. 7), was certainly well enough known to all. Who does not see that all these personal references are due to Paul's desire to make the Church feel that it is not such a stranger to him as it seems, and at the same time are indicative of an effort on his part to bring himself into closer touch with the Church where as yet he was really a stranger? This is exactly the case in Romans. Furthermore, in Rom. i. 10-15 he had spoken of the desire which he had felt for a long time of coming to Rome. But in making this statement he had not said when or under what circumstances he hoped to come, nor explained why now he sent this long letter to Rome before carrying out the plan which he had had in mind for so long. Inasmuch as he deemed the matter of sufficient importance to the Romans and to himself to be mentioned at the very beginning of his letter, it is inconceivable that he should have brought the letter to a close without answering questions which were suggested by his statements, and which must have been raised in the mind of everyone who read i. 8-15 with interest (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 18-21, xvi. 1-11). In short, he must have concluded his letter with something at least closely resembling xv. 13-xvi. 24. If this passage is a later addition, it must have been slipped in in an underhand way in place of the original conclusion of the letter, the contents of which were similar to what is found here. And this substitution must have been made before Marcion's time, since in his own recension of the Epistle he adopted portions of Rom. xv.-xvi. from the text current in the Church (n. 3). Moreover, the substitution must have been made before any copies of the letter were put into circulation; otherwise in the widely ramified tradition there could hardly fail to be some clear trace of a copy of Romans without chaps. xv.-xvi. The substitution must have been made in the archives of the Roman Church, or just as the letter was about to be issued, before any copies were made for general circulation. Those who believe that possible must make at least an effort to render it comprehensible and clear to others. They must also advance strong arguments to prove that chaps. xv.-xvi. were not originally a part of the letter. With regard to chap. xv., these arguments are such that the number convinced by them grows constantly fewer (n. 19). Similarly, the opinion that chap. xvi. like chap. xv. was intentionally added to Romans has scarcely any advocates left. More popular is the view that either wholly or in large part chap. xvi. was directed to Ephesus and became attached to Romans by accident (n. 20). This view was first suggested by the mention of Prisca (Priscilla) and Aquila and the Church in their house, and of Epænetus, the first convert of Asia, whose name follows directly (xvi. 3-5, n. 21).

At Easter 57, Aquila and his wife were still in Ephesus (1 Cor. xvi. 19). If Paul wrote Romans in Corinth at the time indicated by Acts xx. 3 (information which, presupposing that Rom. xv., xvi. are genuine, we get also from Rom. xv. 25–xvi. 2), some ten or eleven months had elapsed since that time. Now, this Jewish couple, who were natives of Pontus, who had lived for a time in Rome, and who, after they were driven from Rome in the year 52, came to Corinth, had been closely associated with Paul ever since, and, as the circumstances of their removal to Ephesus show, had guided their movements altogether in accordance with his missionary plans (above, p. 262, 265, n. 3). It is consequently not at all impossible that when Paul turned his attention toward Rome and prepared to give up his work in Ephesus, this couple left Ephesus, very soon after the sending of 1 Corinthians, at about the same time that Paul did, and returned to Rome, where they had resided earlier, in order to prepare quarters for the apostle there as they had done previously in Ephesus. That Epænetus should accompany them thither is not strange, in view of the fact that he was the first convert of Asia, and so probably owed his conversion to the zeal of this couple, not becoming acquainted with Paul until afterward. Through these old friends and companions, whom he mentions first among the Christians in Rome to be greeted, he may have received news from Rome more than once before Romans was written. Moreover, what he says in praise of them would sound very strange in a letter to the Ephesian Church. For three years the Church which gathered for worship in Ephesus had seen them share Paul's labours, and had witnessed their self-sacrifice on his behalf. If Paul desired to remind the Ephesians of this service (cf. Phil. iv. 3; 1 Cor. xvi. 15 f.; 1 Thess. v. 12; cf., however, 2 Tim. i. 18), he must have called their attention to the services which they had rendered in Ephesus, instead of speaking, as he does, of the gratitude felt toward them by all the Gentile Churches. Indeed, the use of this last expression to designate the Churches founded by Paul and his helpers and under his care, an expression not to be found in any of the letters directed to these Churches (cf., however, 1 Cor. iv. 17, vii. 17, xi. 16, xiv. 33; 2 Cor. viii. 18, xi. 28, xii. 13; 2 Thess. i. 4; Phil. iv. 15), can be understood only if this letter is intended for a Church outside this circle (cf. § 23). All the Gentile Churches are indebted to this Jewish couple. Like xv. 26–28, the statement in xvi. 4 is designed to make the Romans realise that in those parts of the Church which were under Paul's dominating influence Gentile and Jewish Christians were united to each other by ties of self-sacrificing love and by a pious sense of gratitude. That these remarks are not only in harmony with xv. 1–13, but have also close relation to the general purpose of Romans (§ 24), is self-evident. It is with the same purpose in mind that in three passages Paul calls particular attention to the fact that the persons to be greeted (xvi. 7, 11), or sending greetings (xvi. 21), are countrymen of his (n. 22, also § 23, n. 1). Not only does the language suggest ix. 3, but the purpose of these short notices is the same as that expressed with so much intensity in ix. 1–5, x. 1 f., xi. 1 f., xiv. He wants the Romans to know that he is anything but an apostate Jew without sympathy for his own unfortunate countrymen. The deeper his grief for the obdurate and unfortunate majority of his countrymen, the profounder his joy for every brother after the flesh who has become also a brother after the Spirit. The further remark that Andronicus and Junius were honoured among the apostles, i.e. in the mother Church, and that they became Christians before he did himself (n. 23), is also one of the trivial means which Paul uses to accomplish the great apologetic purpose of the letter, and is in so far evidence that these greetings were an original part of Romans. Rome is also suggested by Rom. xvi. 13. In this verse a certain Rufus and his mother are greeted, the latter of whom had at one time shown so much motherly kindness to Paul that he calls her his own mother. On the other hand, in a passage peculiar to Mark's Gospel, Simon of Cyrene is called the father of Alexander and Rufus (Mark xv. 21), which can hardly be explained otherwise than by the assumption that the sons of Simon were known to the first readers of Mark's Gospel. Since, however, Mark's Gospel was intended for Roman Christians, and since, according to the unanimous tradition, this Epistle was directed to Roman Christians, it cannot well be due to accident that in the former a Christian from Jerusalem named Rufus is mentioned as a person known to the readers, and that in the latter a Christian by the name of Rufus is greeted. The close relation existing between Paul and the family, shows that this Rufus, with his mother, must have resided earlier in the East; cf. below, § 53, especially also n. 5 of that section. Accepting these facts as conclusive evidence that the list of greetings was intended for persons in Rome, other names, which support this conclusion, deserve notice. The expressions τοὺς ἐκ τῶν Ἀριστοβούλου and τοὺς ἐκ τῶν Ναρκίσσου τοὺς ὄντας ἐν κυρίῳ do not refer to Christian households (1 Cor. i. 16, xvi. 15; 2 Tim. i. 16, iv. 19; cf. 1 Cor. i. 11), but to the Christian members of two larger circles mostly non-Christian (x. 11, n. 24). In all probability Aristobulus and Narcissus were two prominent men, some of whose slaves or freedmen had become Christians. Narcissus, the once all-powerful freedman of the emperor Claudius, died in Rome at the end of the year 54. Also an Aristobulus, a favourite of the emperor Claudius and brother of Herod Agrippa I., lived in Rome for a time at least during Claudius' reign. Since the slaves of such distinguished households not infrequently retained the family name, even when they passed into the possession of other masters

after the death of their own, probably we have to do here with the former slaves of this Aristobulus and Narcissus. This is rendered even more probable by the mention of the Jew Herodion (ver. 11), whose name indicates that he belonged to the household of the Herodian prince just mentioned. The fact that he is mentioned co-ordinately with the group of the Aristobuliani does not prevent him belonging to the same, any more than the mention of Epænetus in ver. 5 prevents him from belonging to the Church in the house of Aquila. It has been shown further by Lightfoot from numerous inscriptions, that many of the names which occur in this chapter were more or less commonly used in the royal household in the first century, e.g. Ampliatius, Urbanus, Stachys, Apelles, Tryphana, Tryphosa, Philologus, Nereus (n. 24). Although as yet no one of these persons has been certainly identified, nevertheless the information gathered by Lightfoot, taken together with the fact that the Christian faith made its way at an early date into the royal household in Rome, winning converts among the royal servants (Phil. iv. 22), does go far to confirm the belief that these greetings were intended for persons in Rome. At the same time the tradition of the Church, even where it has local colouring, is always under the suspicion of being dependent upon what is said in the N.T., and the material which up to the present time has been gathered from inscriptions and legends with a view to clearing up the question of the names in Rom. xvi. needs to be further tested and further confirmed before it can be utilised as proof in a text-book. Without recourse to this material, however, it may be regarded as proved that Rom. xvi. 1-16 was intended for persons in Rome, and that it was, therefore, an original part of the letter. To the unity of the Epistle, which in tradition has come down to us as a single letter, other objections have been made, without reference to the facts of the tradition concerning the text, and based on exegetical discussions and internal criticism of the thought connection. These can be refuted only by a full and complete exposition of Romans, which at the proper time the present writer hopes to be able to publish (n. 25).

1. (P. 378.) Regarding Rom. i. 7, W. B. Smith, JBL, 1901, pp. 1-21, and Harnack, ZfNTW, 1902, S. 83 ff., have written, following the present writer. From the literature on Rom. xv. 16, and the doxology in particular, the present writer calls special attention to SEMLER, Paraphrasis Ep. ad Rom. 1769, pp. 277-311; GRIESBACH, Opusc. Acad. ii. 62-66; REICHE, Comm. Crit. in Epist. Pauli, i. 88-120; BAUR, Paulus,² i. 393-409; LIGHTFOOT in the Journal of Philology, ii. (1869) p. 264 f.; iii. (1871) p. 193 f., which articles, together with Hort's reply in the same journal, iii. 51 f., will hereafter be cited as reprinted in Lightfoot's Bibl. Essays (1893), pp. 284-374; MANGOLD, Der Rom. und seine geschichtl. Voraussetzungen, 1884, S. 44-166; LUCHT, Über die beiden letzten Kapitel des Rom. 1871; E. RIGGENBACH, NJbDTh. 1892, S. 498-605; 1894, S. 350-363, the latter treatise being cited here as Rigggenb. ii.; W. B. Smith, JBL, 1901, p. 129 ff.; Spitta, Zur Gesch. u. Lit. des Urchristent. iii. 1, S. 6 ff.

2. (P. 378.) Rom. i. 7 reads (1) in G $\gamma \pi \alpha \sigma \iota \nu \tau \circ \iota \varsigma \omicron \upsilon \sigma \iota \nu \epsilon \nu \acute{\alpha} \gamma \alpha \pi \eta \theta \epsilon \omicron \upsilon \kappa \lambda \eta \tau \circ \iota \varsigma \acute{\alpha} \gamma \iota \circ \iota \varsigma . \chi \acute{\alpha} \rho \iota \varsigma \kappa \tau \lambda .$ Many clues show that this text was in early times widely current. For (2) just the same text lay before Ambrosiaster (the Roman commentator, circa 370, ed. Ben. ii. App. p. 28). According to most MSS., the text preceding his comment is the ordinary reading of the Vulgate ("omnibus qui sunt Romæ, dilectis dei, vocatis sanctis"); but a "Cod. Mich." has, on the contrary, Romæ in caritate dei (plainly without dilectis dei). This Vulgate text (with Romæ and dilectis dei) was not that of Ambrosiaster, and even in Cod. Mich. Romæ is an interpolation, as is shown by the exposition: "Quamvis Romanis scribat, illis tamen scribere se significat, qui in caritate dei sunt." Farther on vocatis sanctis is utilised, but not dilectis dei. Hort, in opposition to Lightfoot in the latter's Biblical Essays, p. 345, cf. 288, 365, has sought vainly to weaken this argument. Ambr. does not set over against all the Christians in Rome those who are in the love of God, but he considers it noteworthy that Paul, when writing to the Romans, designates his readers not as Romans, but as persons in the love of God. (3) The Greek text of D begins with $\kappa \lambda \eta \tau \circ \iota \varsigma \acute{\alpha} \gamma \iota \circ \iota \varsigma$, but is to be restored to $\tau \circ \iota \varsigma \omicron \upsilon \sigma \iota \nu \epsilon \nu \acute{\rho} \omega \mu \eta \epsilon \nu \acute{\alpha} \gamma \alpha \pi \eta \theta \epsilon \omicron \upsilon \kappa \lambda \eta \tau \circ \iota \varsigma \acute{\alpha} \gamma \iota \circ \iota \varsigma$, following the Latin text (d: "omnibus qui sunt Romæ in caritate dei, vocatis sanctis"). In d a corrector of the eleventh century (d) pointed, by means of a critical sign before in, to a correction on the margin, which is now torn off (Cod. Clarom. ed. Tischendorf, pp. xxv, 537). The corrector wished either to strike out in caritate dei, or in place of it to read dilectis dei. The former is the more probable, if one compares the text of E (the former S. Germanensis, now in St. Petersburg), which, according to a transcript furnished the present writer by C. R. Gregory, reads $\tau \circ \iota \varsigma \omicron \upsilon \sigma \iota \nu \epsilon \nu \acute{\rho} \omega \mu \eta \kappa \lambda \eta \tau \circ \iota \varsigma \acute{\alpha} \gamma \iota \circ \iota \varsigma$. As is well known, E is a copy of D, a copy, however, of D made after that MS. had gone through the hands of its correctors (Tischendorf, op. cit. xxv; Gregory, Prolegomena, 423). Therefore $\epsilon \iota$ ἀγάπη θεοῦ after ἐν Ῥώμῃ, which was original in the lost text of D, has been removed by a corrector, and likewise from d. (4) The diffusion in the West of the uncorrected text of Dd is attested by old MSS. of the Vulg. like Fuld. Amiat. ("omnibus qui sunt Romæ in caritate [Amiat. dilectione] dei vocatis sanctis"). (5) Origen has the ordinary text, to be sure, in his Comm. in Jo. tom. xix. 5 (ed. Preuschen, p. 304, the citation tom. ii. 10, p. 64, is not in point), and in the Hom. in Num. (Delarue, ii. 301), preserved in Latin only. But in such matters dependence can be placed neither on the versions nor on such long quotations as that in John (tom. xix. 5), which Origen hardly could have copied single-handed from the Bible. The Comm. in Rom., which belongs to the last period of his life, gives us only his text of Rom. i. 1-7. According to the text preceding his exposition, κλητοῖς ἀγίοις was wanting, a lack which the exposition confirms (Delarue, iv. 467). Moreover, also, Origen could not have read the ἐν Ῥώμῃ which the text printed above contains. Although Origen doubted as little as Ambrosiaster that the letter was addressed to the Romans (iv. 468, 487, etc., cf. below in § 28 his view of Eph.), he says nothing at all of Rome in his exposition of the introductory greeting, but writes: "dilectis dei, ad quos scribit apostolus." So his text ran πᾶσι τοῖς οὖσιν ἀγαπητοῖς θεοῦ, χάρις κτλ. (6) A scholion of the minuscule 47 reads, τὸ "ἐν Ῥώμῃ" οὔτε ἐν τῇ ἐξηγήσει οὔτε ἐν τῷ ῥητῷ (in the text) μνημονεύει (Griesbach, Symb. Crit. ii. 15). In the first edition the present writer could refer this to Origen only conjecturally. Recently this conjecture has been established by the Mt. Athos MS. mentioned below in n. 3. This MS., it is true, in spite of the assurance that its text of Rom. is drawn from Origen's Commentary (v. d. Goltz, S. 8), has ἐν Ῥώμῃ in the text; yet right here is the same scholion as in min. 47, except that τοῦ replaces τό at the beginning (op. cit. 52 f., cf. ThLb. 1899, col. 179 f.). There existed then in ancient times a Western (Nos. 1, 2) and an Eastern (Nos. 5, 6) text, which agreed in leaving out ἐν Ῥώμῃ. But they differ from one another in this, (a) that Nos. 1, 2 retained κλητοῖς ἀγίοις, while Nos. 5 (and 6?) rejected it; (b) that Nos. 1, 2 have ἐν ἀγάπῃ θεοῦ, No. 5 having ἀγαπητοῖς θεοῦ in its place. The texts classed under Nos. 3, 4, as well as that of Ambrosiaster's Cod. Mich. (under No. 2) and of the translator Rufinus, or his editor (under No. 5), evidently present mixtures of the old text (without ἐν Ῥώμῃ) with the common text. There is no satisfactory explanation of a subsequent substitution of ἐν ἀγάπῃ for an original ἐν Ῥώμῃ. It was a firm belief of the early Church (Can. Mur. lines 47-59; Tert. c. Marc. v. 17; Apolonius in Eus. H. E. v. 18. 5; Ambrosiaster on Col. iv. 16, cf. GK, ii. 74 f.) that the letters of Paul were intended for the whole Church, in spite of their being addressed to definite localities; but this belief has not produced the omission of the name of the place from the introductory greeting in any of the other letters. On the other hand, we have in Eph. i. 1 an example of how in antiquity the name of a place, originally lacking, has subsequently been inserted, and indeed on the basis of the still much older tradition that that letter was intended for the Church of Ephesus (see below, § 28). The same cause occasioned the insertion of an ἐν Ῥώμῃ in Rom. i. 7; for although Marcion disputed that Ephesians was intended for Ephesus, neither he nor anyone else has doubted that Romans was intended for Rome. Since, also, those who found no ἐν Ῥώμῃ in i. 7, as Origen and Ambrosiaster, were convinced of this, it is easy to understand that others wished to see this expressed in the introductory greeting after the analogy of all other Church letters, finally also of Ephesians. To this especially led also the expression ἐν ἀγάπῃ θεοῦ κλητοῖς, unusual in the N.T. After the analogy of καλεῖν (κληθεῖς) with ἐν εἰρήνῃ, ἐν χάριτι, ἐν ἁγιασμῷ, ἐν ἐλπίδι, ἐν κυρίῳ (1 Cor. vii. 15, 22 ; Gal. i. 6 ; Eph. iv. 4 ; 1 Thess. iv. 7), the originator of the text under consideration doubtless desired to join ἐν ἀγάπῃ with κλητοῖς, and understand it as follows, "all, who in (or by) God's love are called to be saints" (cf. Rom. viii. 28). But how natural was the connection of τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν ἀγάπῃ θεοῦ with the inopportune recollection of τῇ οὔσῃ ἐν Κορίνθῳ, 1 Cor. i. 2, and τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Φιλίπποις, Phil. i. 1. At first ἐν Ῥώμῃ may have been written alongside of ἐν ἀγάπῃ as a marginal gloss, then have been inserted in the text before ἐν ἀγάπῃ (so D originally and Amiat., Fuld.), and finally have fully displaced the ἐν ἀγάπῃ (so the corrector of Dd and E). This appears to have been the history of the development of the text in the West. Also in the Greek Orient ἐν ἀγάπῃ θεοῦ, appearing in such an unusual connection, was the stumbling-block. It was changed into ἀγαπητοῖς θεοῦ, and κλητοῖς ἁγίοις was omitted, which appeared unnecessary alongside of κλητοὶ Ἰ. Χρ. of ver. 6. Only Gg and Ambrosiaster have preserved the original text entirely unchanged (see No. 1). The question concerning τοῖς ἐν Ῥώμῃ, i. 15, is entirely different from that concerning ἐν Ῥώμῃ, i. 7. Cod. G, which omits these words also, stands entirely isolated in this respect. The witnesses, which partly or fully confirmed his text of i. 7, also Orig. and Ambrosiaster in their expositions, failed him in i. 15. Therefore, whoever questions the genuineness of τοῖς ἐν Ῥώμῃ (i. 15) must hold that these words were interpolated very much earlier than ἐν Ῥώμῃ, i. 7. It is, however, out of the question that a place of destination for the letter should have been missed earlier in i. 15 than in i. 7, and that an interpolation resulting therefrom should have spread more rapidly and universally than the ἐν Ῥώμῃ, i. 7. In none of the passages where πρὸς ὑμᾶς, δὲ ὑμῶν, or ἐν ὑμῖν gives, an undoubted designation of the residence of the group of readers intended, so that Rome or Corinth could be substituted (Rom. xv. 22 f., 28 f. ; 1 Cor. xv. 5-7 ; 2 Cor. i. 15 f., x. 14 f.), is such an interpolation to be found. On the other hand, the subsequent insertion of ἐν Ῥώμῃ, i. 7 has its exactly corresponding analogy in Eph. i. 1, and in the places of destination of the remaining introductory greetings of Pauline Church letters its fully satisfactory explanation.

3. (P. 379.) Orig. Comm. in Rom. Interpr. Rufino ad xvi. 24-27 (Delarue, iv. 687) : "Caput hoc Marcion, a quo scripturæ evangelicæ atque apostolicæ interpolatæ sunt, de hac epistula penitus abstulit ; et non solum hoc, sed et ab (al. in) eo loco, ubi scriptum est, 'omne autem, quod non est ex fide, peccatum est' (xiv. 23), usque ad finem cuncta dissecuit. In aliis vero exemplaribus, id est in his, quæ non sunt a Marcione temerata, hoc ipsum caput diverse positum invenimus. In nonnullis etenim codicibus post eum locum, quem supra diximus, hoc est, 'omne autem, quod non est ex fide, peccatum est,' statim coherens habetur, 'ei autem, qui potens est vos confirmare.' Alii vero codices in fine id, ut nunc est positum, continent. Sed jam veniamus ad capituli hujus (al. ipsius) explorationem." A MS. of the tenth century (Cod. 184, B 64 of the St. Laura monastery on Mt. Athos), brought into prominent notice by E. v. d. Goltz (TU, N. F. ii. 4a, 1899), which gives a text of Rom. drawn directly from Origen's commentary, confirms the view that this Father read and exegeted the doxology at the end of the Epistle. Unfortunately, however, two scholia drawn from Or. upon xiv. 23 and xvi. 25 are quite erased except for the abbreviated name of Or. (Goltz, S. 60). Hort (in Lightfoot, Bibl. Ess. 330; NT. App. 112) preferred the reading of a Parisian cod. adduced by Delarue, in eo loco, which, according to Riegenb. ii. 359, is found also in Cod. 88 of the library of the monastery of St. Gall; and by the conjecture non solum hic (instead of hoc) he sought to bring out the meaning that Marcion elided the doxology not only after xiv. 23, but also after xvi. 23 (24). Among the arguments against this conjecture and the opinion built upon it (cf. GK, ii. 519, also Lightfoot, 353), the following ought to suffice:—Even supposing Or. had known MSS. which had the doxology twice, after chap. xiv. as well as after chap. xvi. (so Hort, 341), a thing unattested and most improbable, and even if Or. had tacitly assumed that Marcion had found the doxology in both places, a thing still more incredible, one cannot believe that a man of Origen's learning would take this remarkable way of expressing the simple thought that Marcion did away with the doxology altogether. Without changing hoc into hic (here), we can see that the clause beginning with sed et treats not of the doxology again, but of chaps. xv., xvi., and that after this remark Or. returns again to the doxology ("hoc ipsum caput, capitulum hoc"). The reading of in (instead of ab) eo loco makes no essential change in the sense, since whatever Marcion is here represented as doing to the rest, usque ad finem indicates the extent of his emendation. If Or. wrote ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ τόπῳ, he was pointing out primarily the passage where Marcion began to use his knife, and not till later did he specify how far the devastation which he wrought extended. Just as caput hoc and (ab eo loco) usque ad finem cuncta form a contrast, so also do the new predicates penitus abstulit, and dissecuit. The doxology he had wholly discarded; on the other hand, all that the MSS. of the Church give from xiv. 23 on to the end of the Epistle he had cut to pieces and mutilated by omissions (cf. Reiche, Comm. Crit. i. 90, A. 7; Fr. Nitzsch, ThSkKr. 1860, S. 285 ff., and the present writer's GK, ii. 519 f.). An attempt has often been made to take dissecuit in the sense of desecuit (amputavit), this, too, in the writings of a cultured Latin like Rufinus; moreover, the St. Gall MS. gives as its reading the otherwise unsupported desecuit (Riegenbach, ii. 359); but such a meaning is incompatible with the structure of the sentence. "Et non solum hoc, sed et" presupposes in the original that elliptical οὐ μόνον δὲ ἀλλὰ καί, to which a Latin translator (Rom. ix. 10, Vulg.), or a Latinising scribe (Cod. D, Rom. v. 3), very naturally would add a demonstrative: "not only did he do this which was just mentioned, but he also committed something other and different which is now to be mentioned." Further than this, Tertullian's words (c. Marc. v. 14 at the end, "bene autem quod et in clausula tribunal Christi comminatur," cf. Rom. xiv. 10) cannot prove in opposition to Or. that Marcion closed his Rom. with xiv. 23, as the present writer thinks he has shown from Tertullian's use of words (GK, ii. 521) more exactly than Hort (Bibl. Ess. 335). If it is unthinkable that Paul should have ended his letter at xiv. 23 without anything like a greeting, it is no less so that Marcion should have simply cut away all such material as he found there. He retained the personal references in Col. iv. quite fully, and accepted without change

Philem.—a letter which consists almost entirely of such references, GK, ii. 527, 529. On the contrary, he expunged all of Rom. iv. and 2 Cor. vii. 2–xi. 1, and all but a few sentences of Rom. ix. 1–xi. 32. But Rom. xv., xvi., including the doxology, also called for a free use of his knife. The appeal to the prophetic Scriptures, xvi. 26, xv. 2 f., 9–12; the recognition of Israel's prior rights, xv. 8; and the debt of the Gentile Church to Jewish Christianity, xv. 27, xvi. 4, cf. also xvi. 7, were unbearable to him; while the names xvi. 5–15—meaningless to Churches of a later time—must have seemed to him superfluous. What he retained we have no means of finding out; but there is nothing against the supposition that he worked up xv. 1–3a, 5–7, 14–24, 29–31a, 32, 33, and something from chap. xvi., into a tolerable whole. The present writer does not understand how Spitta, S. 18 f., without any attempt to refute the demonstration given above, can confidently repeat the old mistake that Marcion did not at all have the doxology any more than he had chaps. xv. and xvi. in his N.T.; and then again, also on the basis of this statement, can venture the conjecture that he had found a text of the Church limited to chaps. i.–xiv. That this is due to an accidental mutilation of a copy is, to be sure, very “simply” explained by the insufficient analogy of the ending of Mark.

4. (Pp. 379, 381.) In very many Vulgate MSS. there is a list of chapters (so-called Brevis, also Capitula) belonging to Rom. which Wetstein, NT, ii. 91, was the first to deem worthy of notice, a notice, however, which was not exactly clear. Later, however, it was made use of for the critical question by Lightfoot, Bibl. Ess. 289, 355–362; Hort, ibid. 337, 351; also NT, Appendix, p. 111; Corssen, Epist. Paulin. codd. græce et latine script. Spec. i. (1887) p. 21; Riggerbach, 531–558, ii. 350–363. It is found, e.g. in the Amiatinus, ed. Tischendorf, 240; in six Roman MSS. cited by J. M. Thomasius (Opp., ed. Vezzosi), i. 388; in many English MSS. cited by Lightfoot, 357; and in others cited by Riggerbach, 532. This Capitulatio Amiatina, as, for the sake of brevity, it must be called here, is in the oldest dated Vulg. MS. (Fuldensis, ed. Ranke, 176–179) so combined with another that its chaps. 24–51 (beginning with Rom. ix. 1) are added directly to chaps. 1–23 of the other (which embrace Rom. i.–xiv.). This naturally may be explained by saying that there was wanting in the exemplar of Fuld. a leaf which contained chaps. 1–23 of this Capit. Amiat., and that for this reason the copyist of Fuld. was induced to fill up the gap from another MS. with an altogether different Capit., taking chaps. 1–23 from this without noticing that in this mechanically combined Capit. Rom. ix.–xiv. occurred twice; cf. Riggerbach, ii. 355. This is proved by the fact that Fuld. has the Capit. Amiat. throughout for the other Epistles, that in the very part of Rom. for which the other Capit. was used the chapter numerals of the Capit. Amiat. are inserted in the text, and that in a list of Church lections, p. 165, it follows not its own combined Capit., but the unmixed Capit. Amiat. This was present then in the exemplar of Fuld. originally, just as in the numerous MSS. mentioned. It lies also at the basis of an old concordance (Concordia, also Capitulatio, Canones, Concordia canonum), consisting of a hundred and one titles not numbered; one which Vezzosi (Thom. Opp. i. 489) edited from a Murbach MS. and which is extant in many Vulg. MSS. in a mutilated form only, that is to say, without the first forty-three titles (Amiat. p. 237;

Fuld. p. 173; in three MSS. in Thomasius, i. 384, and in many others; cf. Berger, Hist. de la Vulg. p. 209, n. 2. The first words "de unitate ecclesiae" = title 44 of the Murbach Concordance (Thomasius, i. 492). The high antiquity of the Capit. Amiat., which appears from the facts already adduced, is established by the Biblical text presupposed in it; this is not the Vulg., but a text earlier than Jerome's time; cf. Lightfoot, 362; Riggenbach, 531-541. But the Capit. Amiat., which the present writer quotes according to Amiat. and Fuld., ignoring slight orthographic variations, consists of fifty-one chapters. Chap. xvi., according to the wording of the title and the specification in the text, includes Rom. xiii. 14b ("et carnis curam ne feceritis") - xiv. 6; chap. xvii., only Rom. xiv. 7-8; chap. xviii., Rom. xiv. 9-13; chap. xlix., only Rom. xiv. 14; chap. l. has the title, "De periculo contristante fratrem suum esca sua, et quod non sit regnum dei esca et potus, sed justitia et pax et gaudium in spiritu sancto"; chap. li., "De mysterio domini ante passionem in silentio habito, post passionem vero ipsius revelato." Cf. the like sequence in the Concordance quoted in Thomasius, i. 392. From this we cannot decide definitely whether chap. l. included Rom. xiv. 15-23 or only xiv. 15-20; and whether chap. li. included simply the doxology, to which title 51 without doubt refers, or also something before and after. The chapter numerals in the text embarrass us here, for it is not until Rom. xv. 4 that we find the numeral 51, and the doxology, to which alone reference is made in title 51, stands in the text of this Vulg. MS. not here, but at the close of the Epistle, and without chapter numeral. The only thing certain is that the Capit. Amiat. was prepared for an old Latin text of the Bible, in which xvi. 25-27 followed chap. xiv. immediately, and that whoever transferred it to Vulg. MSS. left the Capit. unchanged while allowing it to exert no influence upon his Biblical text. Since in this text the section to which title 51 refers was not to be found near at hand, the numeral 51 was put at xv. 4, apparently with the idea that xv. 4-13 contained something measurably corresponding to this title. In the lectionary of Fuld. p. 165, it is taken for granted that Rom. xv. 8 is contained in chap. li. Further, though the limits of the sections cannot be determined always with certainty from the wording of their titles, we cannot believe that the Capit. Amiat., which cut up Rom. xiv. into five chapters, 1 Cor. xvi. into seven, and 2 Tim. iv. into no less than eight, should have included Rom. xv., xvi. under the one title 51, which refers only to Rom. xvi. 25-27. It was consequently natural to conjecture that the Capit. Amiat. was intended for a Bible in which Rom. closed with chap. xiv + xvi. 25-27, so that of chaps. xv., xvi. only the doxology was included. Nevertheless it is exceedingly precarious to infer from what remains of the Capit. Amiat. that a Latin Rom., which contained only i. 1-xiv. 23 + xvi. 25-27, existed and was more or less current. For (1) the significant diffusion of this Capit. Amiat. does not prove that it included only these fifty-one titles from the start. Even if the lists adduced by Lightfoot from English MSS., which are identical in the main with the Capit. Amiat., but include also chaps. xv., xvi., should prove to be nothing but later supplements, neither does this prove that the Capit. Amiat. is more than a fragment. The Concordance mentioned above is likewise only half preserved in the oldest and best MSS. (Fuld. Amiat. and three MSS. in Thomasius), and thus far is fully known from just a single MS. Before Heb. in Fuld. is a Capit. consisting of twelve headings, the last heading of which begins with Heb. ix. 11 (see the italic numerals in Ranke, 322. 12), so that Heb. x.-xiii., and perhaps also a part of Heb. ix., remain unnoticed. This is also the case with Cod. Reginae Suecicae (Thomasius, i. 428), from which the numerals xi., xii., which have fallen out of Fuld. p. 312. 26, 28, must be supplied. The fact that the text of Heb. in Fuld. is, besides, divided completely into one hundred and twenty-five chapters, and by a later hand again, as also in the Amiat., into thirty-nine chapters (Ranke, 492), makes the defect in the Capit., which prefaces the Epistle, and in the numerals in the text corresponding to it, all the more striking. So this Capit. also lay before the scribes of the oldest Vulg. MSS. in a mutilated form, and even yet is known in that form only.

(2) Among the countless Latin Bibles, about the contents of which more or less is known, not one has been found so far which contains a Rom. consisting simply of i. 1-xiv. 23 + xvi. 25-27. Since the same is true of the Greek MSS. and of all the versions, and since even Marcion accepted fragments of Rom. xv., xvi. (above, p. 396 f., n. 2), we have not a single sure trace of this shorter form of the Epistle. Some have thought that such a trace was found in the circumstance that Irenæus, Tertullian, and Cyprian quote nothing from Rom. xv., xvi. How much this argumentum e silentio is worth can be seen in the case of Irenæus, who quotes nothing from the following chapters of Paul's letters:—1 Cor. xvi.; 2 Cor. i., vi., viii.-xi. (only a doubtful reference to ix., x. in iv. 25. 3); Col. iv.; 1 Thess. i.-iv.; 2 Thess. iii.; 1 Tim. iii.-v.; 2 Tim. i.-ii.; Tit. i.-ii. If this incompleteness in his quotations cannot prove that these twenty chapters and Philem. besides were wanting in the N.T. of Irenæus, neither is his silence about Rom. xv., xvi. of any weight. As for Tertullian, there should be an end of making that in clausula, which refers to Rom. xiv. 10, c. Marcion, v. 14 (above, p. 397), apply to this argument; for even if this should mean "at the end of Rom." it would be unimportant in determining Tertullian's N.T., for everywhere in his c. Marcion he argues on the basis of Marcion's N.T., not his own, with only here and there a side glance at the Church Bible; cf. GK, i. 601-606, ii. 453. Besides, Tertullian, de Fuga, 12 ("Quando Onesiphorus aut Aquila aut Stephanus hoc modo" by bribing the persecutors "eis" the apostles "in persecutione succurrerunt?"), has in mind plainly Rom. xvi. 4, the only passage from which we can gather that Aquila too, like Onesiphorus (2 Tim. i. 16-18) and Stephen (Acts vi.-vii.), had exposed himself to mortal danger. Other hints are less conclusive; cf. Rönseh, Das NT Tertullians, 350; Mangold, 36 ff.; it is doubtful whether Cyprian, Epist. lxxv. 3 ("conprobantes, nec ante se religioni, sed ventri potius et questui profana religione servisse"), had Rom. xvi. 18 in his thought. Of other Latins who cite passages from Rom. xv., xvi., the present writer adduces pseudo-Cypr. de Singul. Cleric. pp. 181. 19, 212. 23 (chaps. xv. 2, xvi. 17); Hilary (Trin. iv. 8, Bened. p. 830), only the doxology; Ambrose (Præf. in Ps. xxxvii., ed. Ben. i. 819) and Victorinus (c. Arium, iv. 17, Migne, 8, col. 1112) only Rom. xvi. 20; Priscillian, ed. Schepss, 92. 14 (chap. xv. 4); cf. the same author's Canons and Sections, pp. 128, 129, 131, 135, 136, 140, 141, 170; August. Exposit. Preposit. Ex Epist. ad Rom., ed. Bass. iv. 1222 (without touching on the doxology); c. Maximin. Hæc. ii. 13, tom. x. 844, 845 ("in fine epistolæ sic loquitur"), then follows the doxology: Specul., ed. Wehrich, pp. 204. 8-208. 21 (chaps. xii. 1-xv. 7 continuous, without doxology; then xv. 26, 27; further, xv. 30; finally, xvi. 17-19); Jerome often. Of the commentators, Pelagius (see the recast form of his commentary under the name of Jerome, Vall. xi. 3. 210, 216 f., and Zimmer, Pelagius, S. 310, 312) seems to have discussed the doxology, not after xiv. 23, but at the close of the letter, however, with xvi. 24 after xvi. 27, as his remark upon xvi. 24 ("hæc est subscriptio manus ejus in omnibus epistolis," etc.) shows, and is confirmed by the Würzburg excerpt in Zimmer, S. 64. Ambrosiaster also is important; for though elsewhere he notes differences between texts (GK, i. 34), he expounds Rom. xv., xvi., placing the doxology at the end, without any critical comment. Origen, too, who was once in Rome, knew only of the uncertain position of the doxology (see above, p. 396 f., n. 3). Of old quotations or allusions, aside from Jude 24 (see below, § 44, n. 13), the present writer instances the following: Ign. Eph. (address) (εὐλογημένη . . . πληρώματι) appears to be founded upon Rom. xv. 29, cf. Trall. address; ἐκκλίνειν, often applied in later times to heretics, was used by him also (Eph. vii. 1, in connection with the writer's comment, Patres apost. ii. 11), and is drawn probably from Rom. xvi. 17. Clem. 2 Cor. xx. 5; Mart. Polyc. xx. 2, may have been imitations of Rom. xvi. 27. It is quite conceivable that the greeting occurring just there in Mart. Polyc., Εὐάρεστος ὁ γράψας, received its form under the influence of Rom. xvi. 22. Of more weight are the Actus Petri cum Simone, ed. Lipsius, p. 45. 4 (Quartus from Rom. xvi. 23), pp. 48. 7, 49. 15, etc. (Narcissus from Rom. xvi. 11), also p. 52. 27 from Rom. xvi. 20; from which we may conclude that this writer of legends at about 170 considered Rom. xvi. as an integral part of Rom.; cf. GK, ii. 845, 855. We may add the citations in Clem. Alexandrinus (collected in Griesbach, Symb. ii. 493 f.), who quotes in Strom. v. 65, Rom. xv. 29 in loose connection with xvi. 25, and in Strom. iv. 9 the doxology, without stating more exactly their position in the Epistle.

5. (P. 381.) Of the uncials which give the Antioch recension in a pure state (KL), K has a gap between Rom. x. 18 and 1 Cor. vi. 13 (Gregory, Proll. 431). Alongside of L, Tischendorf, NT, ii. 442, 456, puts al (i.e. min.) fere 200, item lectionaria. Indeed Hort (in Lightfoot, 340) can find only 8-10 min. which do not have the doxology after xiv. 23, and there alone. It signifies little that a Greek, who wrote the min. 66 (Harleian MS. 5552; Griesbach, Symb. ii. 166-188; Gregory, p. 656) in the sixteenth century, after Erasmus had published his N.T., remarks on xvi. 24: τέλος τῆς ἐπιστολῆς ὧδε ἐν τοῖς παλαιαῖς ἀντιγράφοις. τὰ δὲ λοιπὰ εἰς τέλος τοῦ ἰδ' κεφαλαίου εἰρίσκειται (Griesb. ii. 180). Chrysostom (vol. ix. 718-756) and Theodoret (Noesselt, 146-162) seem to know nothing at all of another text. They see also a close connection in the sense between xvi. 25-27 and xiv. 23, and treat xvi. 24 as the end of the Epistle. Cf. the Valense (Cramer, iv. 490, 528), Œcumenius, and Theophylact (Migne, tom. 118, col. 604, 633; tom. 124, col. 533, 557). John of Damascus, on the contrary, who gives little more than an excerpt from Chrysostom, commented upon the doxology after xvi. 24. The scribe of our solitary MS. has on his own responsibility inserted the doxology in the section embracing xiv. 23b-xv. 7, for it receives no notice in the exposition there (ed. Lequien, ii. 54, 59). Influenced by the Alexandrian tradition, Joh. Dam. has here broken loose from Chrysostom. It would be an odd counterpart to this if Cyril of Alexandria had followed the Antioch text; but this we cannot safely infer from the order of citations in Orat. I. de recta fide ad reginas (Aubert, v. 2, 118 f.; Rom. x., xvi. 25-27, xv. 8), for he returns straightway to Rom. iv. In another set of citations (op. cit. 59) the order is Rom. xiv. 10, xv. 13 ff., xvi. 16, 20. The fragments of his commentary (Mai, Nova. p. bibl. iii. 1, 45) treat Rom. xiv. 6, 14, xv. 7, but not the doxology. Of the Gothic version there is preserved after Rom. xiv. 20 only xv. 3-13, xvi. 21-24, and the latter section serves as the close of the letter in a Cod. Ambrosianus which lacks xiv. 6-xvi. 20. Since this version rests in essentials upon a Greek text of Antiochian recension, it almost goes without saying that it admitted the doxology after xiv. 23, an assumption confirmed by the close of the Epistle, which has been preserved. Hort, in Lightfoot, 340, and Riggenbach, 550, by calculating the space necessary, have established the same point also in the case of the Gothic and the parallel Latin text of the Cod. Carolinus at Wolfenbüttel, which contains, among other passages, xiv. 9-20 and xv. 3-13 (Tischend. Anecdota sacra et prof. 155-158; Bernhardt, Vulfila oder die goth. Bibel. xlii. f., 369, 372). The Cod. Carolinus is not a strong witness for the existence of an independent Latin text which had the doxology after xiv. 23. On the other hand, Riggenbach, 553 f., through calculation and conjecture, has made it quite certain that a Latin Bible at Monza (Riggenb. 532; Berger, Hist. de la Vulg. 139 f., 395), out of which all but a few leaves of Rom. x. 2-xv. 10 are torn, had the doxology after xiv. 23, the Epistle closing with xvi. 24. Moreover, there is nothing against our assuming that the exemplar of the Latin text g, as well as that of the Greek text G bound with it (see n. 6), had the doxology after xiv. 23. The Latin testimonies in n. 4 are also in point here. For the liturgic tradition of the Byzantine Church, cf. Scrivener, Introd. ⁴ i. 84 (Rom. xiv. 19-23+xvi. 25-27, lection for Sabbath before Quinquagesima).

6. (Pp. 381, 382.) Cod. G (ed. Matthæi, 1791), written in the ninth century by an Irish monk in Switzerland, with a Latin interlinear version, leaves a third of page 18 v. blank, i.e. between xiv. 23 (fol. 18 r.) and xv. 1 (fol. 18 v.). Codex F, the Greek text of which is copied either from G or from the same exemplar, joins xv. 1 immediately to xiv. 23, and only in its Latin text (f) retains, in dependence on the Vulgate, xvi. 25-27 after xvi. 24, with which the whole letter closes in its Greek text just as in G. One thing is accordingly certain, that the exemplar of G did not have the doxology after xvi. 24; for why should a monk of the ninth century have refused to copy the verses which stand at this place in all Vulg. MSS. if he found them there also in his exemplar? The only thing open to question is what induced him to leave a blank space large enough for the doxology after xiv. 23. The simplest explanation is that he found it at this place, but on account of his trust in the Vulg., which has no doxology here, he hesitated to copy here a passage which seemed strange to him in this connection. Leaving a space sufficient for xvi. 25-27 is in any case a half-way proceeding, and so proof of a critical reflection, serious indeed, but not carried to a conclusion. But just such reflection could be induced by the two factors mentioned, the existence of the doxology in the copyist's exemplar at this point, and the self-evident acquaintance of a Western monk with the Latin Vulg. On the other hand, it is most improbable that his exemplar contained the doxology either after xiv. 23 or after xvi. 24, and that, as Hort still assumed (Lightf. Bibl. Ess. 340), the mere recollection of other Greek MSS. which placed it after xiv. 23 should have aroused in him strong critical suspicions. For (1) Greek MSS. were certainly such rarities in the monasteries of Switzerland in the ninth century that it is most improbable that a scribe should reflect upon the textual peculiarities of other Greek MSS. than that lying directly before him. (2) There was surely nothing in xiv. 23 to stir a Latin monk to special reflection if the doxology was wanting here in his exemplar; for neither in the Vulg. was he wont to read it at this point in the Epistle nor to hear it so read in public worship. The lack of the doxology could have impressed him only when he came to the end of the letter, since it appeared there in the Vulgate; for which reason it was also attached there in the Latin text of F (f). (3) The hypothesis that, aside from the Marcionite Bibles (see above, n. 3, below, n. 9), there were Latin and Greek Bibles without the doxology, finds even less support than the assumption that there were Bibles with the doxology but without chaps. xv., xvi. (above, n. 4). Of the countless Bible MSS. of all tongues, just one has been pointed out thus far which gives Rom. xiv.-xvi. complete except for the doxology. This is a MS. at Milan hailing from Bobbio in the ninth or tenth century (Ambros. E 26 infra; cf. Riggenbach, 556; Berger, Hist. de la Vulg. 138 f., 394). But what is more natural than that in mixed texts, to which class this MS. belongs, the variation of the exemplars with respect to the place of the doxology should finally result in some one instance in its complete disappearance? In the development from G, or the exemplar of G and F, to F we can see this process going on before our eyes. The effort has been made to wring from the Græco-Latin Cod. D (Sæc. vi.), which has the doxology after xvi. 24 and no gap between xiv. 23 and xv. 1, testimony to an older text without the doxology. While the text of D is divided throughout according to the sense into short lines, the doxology is written in lines considerably longer and repeatedly breaking off in the middle of a word, ed. Tischendorf, p. 92. Corssen (Specim. ii. 27) concluded from this that the scribe of D, who with this exception copied throughout an exemplar divided into lines according to the sense, took the doxology from another MS. with lines not thus divided, the reason being that the chief exemplar did not contain the doxology at all. On the further assumption that G and F also go back to this chief exemplar of D, he holds that the absence of the doxology in G (F) can also be explained in the same way. Not to speak here of Corssen's genealogy of MSS. in other respects, we have seen already that G's attitude to the doxology definitely presupposes an exemplar in which the doxology stood after xiv. 23. But as for D, the form of the letter's close, like the same phenomenon at the end of Eph., p. 327, demands another explanation. Such a one is given in GK, ii. 160; similarly Riggenbach, 577. The last four lines of Eph., too (from καὶ ἀγάπη, vi. 23, to ἀμήν, vi. 24), are written without reference to division according to sense. Moreover, while under all the other Epistles except the last (Philem., GK, ii. 160) the end of the preceding Epistle and the beginning of the following are marked by three lines wider apart than usual, and by the words ἐπληρώθη ἄρχεται, there stand under Romans merely πρὸς Ῥωμαίους in a single line, and under Eph. simply πρὸς Ἐφεσίους, πρὸς Κολοσσαείς in two lines. A glance at the requirements of space explains all. The scribe wished to begin a new Epistle always upon a new page. But there were cases where at the close of an Epistle a consistent division according to the sense would have made a few words run over to a new page, or rather two pages, since it concerned the Latin text on the right hand page as well as the Greek on the left. So rather than leave so much parchment blank, he determined to adopt a style of writing not so wasteful of space, and in Eph. at least, to make the subscription shorter for the same reason. The four long lines of Eph. vi. 23 f. would have made seven lines divided according to sense. There are twenty-one lines on a page, and since fifteen lines of text precede, the last of the (15+7) twenty-two lines and the subscription would not have found room on the page. By compressing seven lines into four, the scribe retained (15+4) nineteen lines of text and had two left for the subscription, which for this very reason he made shorter and more compact as before described. In the case of Rom. the ten (or including the "Amen," eleven) lines written without reference to the sense, would have made perhaps seventeen or eighteen ordinary lines divided according to the sense, or including the preceding seven ordinary lines, twenty-four to twenty-five for the page. The scribe, therefore, when he came to a fitting break, gave up his diffuse way of writing, wrote the doxology in longer lines, and retained this more sparing method to the end. He thus obtained seventeen lines of text, without the Amen. By more fully utilising the space he could have found room not only for the decoration at the end, but also for a complete subscription as under the following Epistles, or at least like that under Eph. But not having formed any rules as yet in this the first Epistle of the collection, he preferred to be lavish with the space he had saved. Contrary to the rule he afterwards followed, he put the ἀμήν in a line by itself (18), and some distance below πρὸς Ῥωμαίους as line 19. The present writer paid no attention to this when he saw the MS., but is relying upon Tischendorf's copy, p. 92, cf. præf. ix. Other isolated cases in which D's so-called stichometric writing is awkwardly carried out, or even quite given up (p. 130. 10, where ἀδελφὴν belongs to the next line, as also καί in 130. 13, and p. 134. 2-4), need another explanation, which Corssen, at any rate, has not found; cf. Riggenbach's remarks in opposition to him, 575, and against Lucht, et al. 565-574. Tischendorf, Cod. Clarom. p. 550, noticed that a corrector of the seventh century (D) found nothing in the doxology to correct; and that another corrector (D), a Greek, who in the ninth century supplied the whole MS. with accents and made some corrections, accented only the first four words of xvi. 25-27. Arguing from this, he was of the opinion that both doubted the genuineness of the doxology. The first difficulty was set at rest by the fact that the doxology in D has no mistake of grammar or spelling. The second is explained by assuming that this Greek of the ninth century consulted in his revision a Greek text which had the doxology after xiv. 23, like the great majority of Greek MSS. for centuries. He had nothing to guide him then after xvi. 24, and was unwilling to undertake the task of accenting the rest of the text proprio Marte. Whether at the same time he made critical conjectures as to the genuineness or relevancy of the doxology here, is of no importance to us. A Greek text without the doxology must be first discovered or its existence established on stronger grounds than those found hitherto. Concerning Treschov's error, more often repeated years ago (Tentamen descr. codic. 1773, p. 55), that the doxology is altogether wanting in five Vienna MSS., which really have it after xiv. 23, and concerning a similar mistake of Erasmus, cf. Reiche, 89, n. 3.

7. (P. 381.) The doxology follows chap. xiv. as well as chap. xvi. in AP, some Armenian MSS., and a few Greek minusc. (Paul, 5, 17, 37, of which No. 5 is especially noteworthy in putting Phil. immediately before Thess., a proceeding very common in the West during the fourth century, GK, ii. 349). Hort's view (in Lightfoot, op. cit. 341 ff.), that the doxology was used thus twice before it came to be placed after chap. xiv. alone, has all analogies against it, and, in addition, the oldest testimony, that of Origen, who knows simply the alternatives: "either after chap. xiv. or after chap. xvi." (above, p. 396, n. 3).

8. (P. 381.) We know not how the doxology was arranged in the Syrians' N.T. before its recasting in the Syriac Vulgate, the so-called Peshito. Aphraates cites nothing from Rom. xiv. and xvi., including the doxology, but only xv. 1 (Wright, 141). Ephrem in his commentary (ed. Lat. 43, 46) passes over the doxology in both places; but this signifies nothing, for he does the same with Rom. ii. 2-16, xv. 13-16, xvi. 1-12. And it is only the inexact translation of the Meehitharists which makes it appear as if Ephrem joins xv. 1 immediately to xiv. 23a, xiv. 23b being omitted. P. Vetter kindly informs the writer that the word rendered there in line 11 by subdit is the same as that rendered by dixit in line 8. According to the Armenian original, the chapter numeral belongs after manducat, line 10. After that the translation should run: "Et ut arceat et (=etiam) credentes (without ipsos), dixit: 'Debemus inquit, nos qui potentes sumus,'" etc.

9. (P. 381.) Jerome in Eph. iii. 5 (vol. vii. 592): "(Qui volunt prophetas non intellexisse, quæ dixerint, et quasi in ecstasi loquutos, cum præsentī testimonio (Eph. iii. 5) illud quoque, quod ad Romanos in plerisque codicibus invenitur, ad confirmationem sui dogmatis trahunt legentes: 'Ei autem qui potest vos roborare juxta evangelium meum et prædicationem Jesu Christi secundum revelationem mysterii temporibus æternis taciti, manifestati autem nunc per scripturas propheticas et adventum domini nostri Jesu Christi et reliqua' (Rom. xvi. 25). Quibus breviter respondendum est, temporibus præteritis tacitum Christi fuisse mysterium non apud eos, qui illud futurum pollicebantur, sed apud universas gentes, quibus postea manifestatum est. Et paritur annotandum, quod sacramentum fidei nostræ nisi per scripturas propheticas et adventum Christi non valeat revelari. Sciant igitur qui prophetas non intelligunt nec scire desiderant, asserentes, se tantum evangelio esse contentos, Christi nescire mysterium, quod temporibus æternis gentibus cunctis fuerit ignoratum." That this was copied quite literally from Origen, Hort saw (Lightfoot, Bibl. Ess. 333; Appendix, 113). The present writer thinks in GK, ii. 428 f., he has pointed out and proved as well that this polemic of Origen is directed, not against Montanists, as Jerome seems to have understood it (cf. col. 589), nor yet confusedly, first against Montanists, then against Marcionites, as Hort assumed, but exclusively against the latter, and against Marcionites indeed, who when disputing with the orthodox, appealed to a text (Rom. xvi. 25 f.) which they did not receive at all themselves. Now, when Origen speaks of the doxology as contained in most MSS., the MSS. without it, which he implies, must be simply those of the Marcionites, where the doxology was indeed lacking; for among the Church MSS.

Origen had found no variation with respect to the doxology but that of position, now after xiv. 23 and now after xvi. 23 (above, p. 396 f., n. 3).

10. (Pp. 382, 387.) Doxologies in the course of Epistles, Rom. i. 25, ix. 5, xi. 36; Gal. i. 5; Eph. iii. 20 f.; Phil. iv. 20; 1 Tim. i. 17, vi. 16; 2 Tim. iv. 18; cf., further, 1 Pet. iv. 11, v. 11; Heb. xiii. 20 f. (A solemn wish with doxological close; 22-24 personal matters; 25 benediction). In all these cases, and so also in Rom. xvi. 27, ἀμήν at the end of the doxology is attested by most or all sources (2 Cor. xi. 31 cannot be compared here); on the contrary, it is very doubtful whether Paul closed a single Epistle or benediction with ἀμήν. Also in Gal. vi. 18 it is lacking in G, Ambrosiaster, and Victorinus. A doxology as the real end of an Epistle occurs in the N.T. only in 2 Pet. iii. 18; Jude 25. If we compare the other Epistles of Paul, we shall find no ground at all for wondering at the endings of the letter which it is alleged are heaped up in Rom. xv. 5, 13, 33, xvi. 20, xvi. 24 (xvi. 27). Gal. vi. 11 retrospect of the completed letter, vi. 16 blessing, vi. 18 benediction. In 1 Cor. the intimation of the coming benediction (xvi. 21) is followed, after an intervening remark of warning, by a double benediction (xvi. 23 f.). 1 Thess. iii. 11-13 blessing with well attested ἀμήν, and following λοιπόν (iv. 1), so that all that follows appears supplementary to the letter already virtually ended. But it is followed by v. 23 another blessing, 26 greetings, 27 remark about the letter, 28 benediction. Similarly 2 Thess. ii. 16 f. first closing blessing (iii. 1, τὸ λοιπόν), iii. 5 another blessing, iii. 16a third blessing, 16b benediction, 17 intimation of the last greeting, 18 actual benediction. 2 Tim. iv. 18 closing doxology with Amen, 19-21 greetings with other information, 22 double benediction.

11. (Pp. 382, 386.) The genuineness of φ̄, xvi. 27, can hardly be doubted; for, in the first place, the remarkable incompleteness of the sentence was very easy to remedy; and, secondly, the emendations which we find are most various. Some changed φ̄ into αὐτῷ (P, Copt., min. 31, 54); others struck out φ̄ (B) or φ̄ ἡ (min. 33, 72), or made from φ̄ ἡ an εἰη (min. 55 and scholion of min. 43). To the latter group belong also f (the Latin text of F, the Greek text of which lacks the doxology), and Rufinus as translator of Origen (iv. 687), who here at least has not rendered fairly Origen's very peculiar text (GK, ii. 429, A. 2). S¹ treated the doxology very freely: "But to God who can stablish you in [according to] my gospel, which was preached about [περί] Jesus Christ according to the revelation of the secret, which from eternal times was hidden, but in the present was revealed through prophetic Scriptures, and by command of the eternal God was made known to all nations for the purpose of obedience of the faith: to Him, who alone is wise, glory through Jesus Christ for the age of the ages. Amen." Clement, Strom. v. 65, p. 685, and Origen, vol. i. 389, 488, iv. 104 f., 226, 257, always quote the doxology incompletely, without ver. 27.

12. (Pp. 383, 385.) The ascetics judged that their fellow-Christian of liberal views would not stand firm, but ran the risk of falling. Paul, however, assures them that he will surely be kept in his upright position, and that the Lord has the power to make him stand (xiv. 4). The liberals, on the other hand, who like Paul thought the ascetics weak, also despised them, and Paul warns them not to put in the way any stones over which these weak brethren might stumble (xiv. 13, 20 f.). The τῷ δυναμένῳ ὑμᾶς στηρίξαι, xvi. 25, refers to both these things at once. Paul does not here utter a pious wish, but again reminds himself and the readers, as in ver. 4, with the similarly sounding words δυνατεὶ ὁ κύριος στήσαι αὐτόν, of the power of God which is able to establish those who are in danger of unstable going, of stumbling or of falling; cf. also the expressions στήκει ἢ πίπτει, σταθήσεται, ver. 4; προσκόμμα ἢ σκάνδαλον, ver. 13; διὰ προσκόμματος . . . προσκόπτει, vv. 20, 21. He comforts himself with this power of God, both in regard to the liberals, who in the judgment of the ascetics are in danger of falling, and also in regard to the ascetics, concerning whom he has the fear, that they might be enticed by the inconsiderate behaviour of the strong to act contrary to the dictates of conscience, and thereby to fall in the most disastrous way. As Paul, ver. 10*b*, unites in a we the two parties addressed separately in ver. 10*a* (cf. vv. 13*a*, 19), so he can unite them both in ὑμᾶς, xvi. 25, after ver. 22, which refers to the liberals, and ver. 23, which refers to the ascetics. What Spitta (S. 7 f.) has to say against the present writer's proof of this connection, is at least not founded on the error that στηρίζειν means "strengthen"; it means rather "establish," either at the outset so to place something that it remain firm, or to make more secure, to support, what is already standing, but might easily become unstable or fall. The contrast between falling and destructive temptation is found, e.g., 2 Pet. iii. 16 f. (ἀσθήρικται—ἐκπεσεῖν τοῦ στηριγμοῦ); Luke xxii. 32, cf. Mark xiv. 27 ff.; 2 Thess. iii. 3; Rev. iii. 2, and the connection of στηρίζειν with the idea of standing, being stable, is unmistakable (1 Thess. iii. 2, 8, 10; 1 Pet. v. 10, 12). Also Rom. i. 11; Acts xviii. 23 (variant reading) the idea is not of strengthening the faith, but of stablishing the believers in upright bearing (cf. 2 Cor. i. 24). Here, however (xvi. 25), the question concerns a stablishing not in the πίστις τοῦ εὐαγγελίου (Phil. i. 27), but in the ethical manifestation of faith (cf. 1 Thess. iii. 13; 2 Thess. ii. 17). The connection with κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον κτλ. suits only this interpretation. The Gospel of Paul and the preaching of Jesus Christ are not named as the means of producing and strengthening faith, but as the norm of conduct, and as the standard according to which God will stablish the Romans. His personal assurance in the matter of clean and unclean things, Paul emphasises strongly in xiv. 14; at the same time, however, he expresses the thought that in this he knew that he was of the same mind as the "Lord Jesus." He desires also here to give utterance to the two thoughts, namely, (1) that the ethical principles which he has developed in chap. xiv. correspond especially with what he himself—the Apostle of the Gentiles—has preached, and (2) that, moreover, also in the preaching of Jesus Himself the outlines of these principles had been drawn (cf. Matt. xv. 1–20). In confirmation of the fact that τὸ κήρυγμα 'I. Xp. does not mean the preaching about Christ, but the preaching and teaching of Jesus Himself, the following proofs are offered: (1) The comparison with Matt. xii. 41; 1 Cor. ii. 4, xv. 14; (2) the similarity of the genitive with εὐαγγέλιον and κήρυγμα demanded by the style; (3) the use of the personal name 'Ιησοῦ before Χριστοῦ; (4) the placing alongside of each other of the two ideas determined by the article—a position which excludes their identity (cf. below, § 48, n. 2). By means of this, however, the passage xv. 1–3 following is prepared for in more than one way. The κατὰ Xp. 'I., xv. 5, corresponds to the κατὰ τὸ κήρ. 'I. Xp. In xv. 3, 7, 8 there is presented as authoritative example the Jesus Christ who lived on earth, renounced self-will, cared for the needy, was calumniated by the ungodly of His own nation, and yet who all His life long served the people of the circumcision. In the διάκονον γεγενῆσθαι περιτομῆς, however, the διακονία τοῦ λόγου, the preaching, is also included as an essential element. Moreover, the further reference to the prophetic writings (xvi. 26) agrees perfectly with xv. 4, 8-12; and the mention of the especial gospel of the apostle to the Gentiles and the thought that the mystery of salvation formerly kept secret is intended for all nations (xvi. 26) is an excellent preparation for xv. 8-13. Moreover, xv. 1-6 also bears upon the discussion of the relations existing between the Jewish and Gentile Christians; as is especially shown by the comparison of ver. 4 f. with ver. 13, and the close connection between ver. 6 and vv. 9-10. There is here no further discussion of the especial opposition of the vegetarians to the eaters of meat, but much more general admonitions and wishes in relation to the restoration, through mutual concessions, of unity among all the Church members—a unity which showed itself also in worship. This duty holds good for the antagonism which obtained among the Roman Christians, mentioned in chap. xiv., moreover, also, for many other existing differences, and not least for the opposition of the Jewish to the Gentile born members of the Church, to the discussion of which the general sentences, xv. 1-3, form the transition. The δυνατοί among whom the Jewish Paul classes himself, ver. 1, are naturally not the Gentile Christians; they are also, however, not identical with the anti-vegetarians in chap. xiv., who there are just as little called δυνατοί as the vegetarians ἀδυνατοί, and with whom Paul in chap. xiv. not once identifies himself by a we. The strong are rather those whom God, who has the power to do it, has established, according to Paul's gospel and Jesus' preaching (xvi. 25, cf. Tit. i. 9; 2 Cor. xii. 10; Phil. iv. 13), and who, like Paul, have risen above all such oppositions (cf. 1 Cor. ix. 19-23). Hofmann, who, following Griesbach, contended for the position of xvi. 25-27 after xiv. 23 as the original one (iii. 577), tried to make it out that the sentence begun with τῷ δὲ δυναμένῳ, and resumed in μόνῳ σοφῷ θεῷ, xvi. 27, finds its regular continuation in xv. 1. No one could object to the construction of ἀφείλω with dative and following infin., cf. viii. 12, xiii. 8; and perhaps even the δέ, xv. 1, which is undoubtedly genuine, could be justified grammatically. But stylistically considered, the result is a monstrous form of sentence. A more probable explanation, and one much more in keeping with Paul's peculiar style, is that the sentence as he originally intended to construct it became weighted down by parenthetical remarks and, though he made an effort to carry the construction consistently through by taking up again the emphatic dative object, the doxology with its solemn "amen" forcing its way in afresh, drove the purpose from his mind.

13. (Pp. 383, 384.) After the prayer, xvi. 20a, all witnesses except DG (dg) and perhaps also Sedulius have ἡ χάρις τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ μεθ' ὑμῶν (without ἀμήν). But the second benediction also, ἡ χ. τ. κ. ἡμ. Ἰ. Χρ. μετὰ πάντων ὑμῶν (with or without ἀμήν) is quite overwhelmingly attested; only it is written sometimes after xvi. 23 (as ver. 24; so DG, the Antioch recension [L, the majority of min., the Antioch commentators]; among versions the Goth. and S³, and many Vulg. MSS.), sometimes after xvi. 27 (so P, a few min., S¹, Armen., Ambrosiaster, and the true Pelagius, see above, p. 401, n. 4). It is wanting altogether in SABC, a few min., Copt., and important Vulg.

MSS., also probably in Origen's text. On the strength of this, Tischendorf and Westcott and Hort have stricken it out as a doublet of xvi. 20. But (1) according to the great mass of evidence it differs from ver. 20 in giving a fuller designation of Christ and in inserting πάντων; (2) the double form of the benediction (xvi. 20, 24), is vouched for by such manifold testimony, belonging to most widely differing portions of the Church, that it must go back to high antiquity; (3) Paul would be departing from a settled custom if he closed a letter with greetings to or from individuals without a formal benediction; on the other hand, he never objects to a double benediction (see above, n. 10). These benedictions may be essentially similar and bound together like a double "farewell" (1 Cor. xvi. 23, 24; Eph. vi. 23, 24; 2 Tim. iv. 22), or they may be separated by remarks of a different character, 2 Thess. iii. 16b, 18. In both 1 Cor. and Eph. he added a πάντων to the second and final benediction, exactly as in Rom. xvi. 24. Also in 2 Tim. iv. 22 the two benedictions, standing side by side, are related one to the other as the particular to the universal. Although, where Paul joins the second benediction immediately to the first, or lets it follow soon afterwards, he prefers not to repeat the same words; yet an explanation is unnecessary when, on the other hand, in Rom. xvi. 20 and xvi. 24, where many small items intervene, he shows no hesitation in repeating the customary benediction in essentially the same words. (4) Upon the twofold presupposition that the doxology belongs to the end of the letter, and that xvi. 24 is not genuine,—a presupposition which the textual critics whose views now prevail have not proved, but have simply laid down as axiomatic in discussing this question,—the transmission of the text of xvi. 20–27 remains inexplicable. Suppose that the need arose for a benediction at the end of the letter owing to the removal of the doxology from that point to an earlier part of the letter, and that this need was met by making up xvi. 24 or by placing xvi. 20b after xvi. 23, how then are we to account for the fact that texts otherwise most various (DPS¹, Arm., Ambrost., Pelag.) agree in having the doxology in chap. xvi. and right next to it, either before or after the benediction, xvi. 24; and that most of them (all those named except D) retain xvi. 20b besides? (5) On the other hand, it is easy enough to explain the fact on the presupposition that the doxology stood originally after xiv. 23. When the doxology was moved to the close of the Epistle, sometimes it was simply added at the end (after xvi. 24, so D), sometimes it was inserted between xvi. 23 and xvi. 24, so as to retain the original ending (P, min. 17, 80, S¹, Arm., Ambrost., Pelag.). A third method, followed by some apparently as early as Origen's time, was to treat the doxology as a sufficient substitute for the original ending (cf. Jude 24 f.; 2 Pet. iii. 18), and to strike out xvi. 24, which was the easier, since essentially the same benediction was to be found in xvi. 20. In this latter opinion they agreed with those in the West who, even before the doxology was moved to the end, had stricken out xvi. 20 as superfluous alongside of xvi. 24 (G and perhaps the exemplar of D, see beginning of this note). Moreover, this misplacement had a corrupting influence upon the text of the doxology itself. The witnesses for the position after xiv. 23 (Antioch recen.) all have the simpler form εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, without τῶν αἰώνων, and those which have the doxology in both places (AP) prove an essential connection between the form of the text and its position by giving the shorter form of the doxology after chap. xiv. and the longer (with τῶν αἰώνων) after chap. xvi. In itself, the shorter form of the doxology is more likely to be the original one; and this supposition is fully confirmed by such good witnesses as BC, which, in spite of the misplacement of the doxology, have retained its shorter form. The expansion of the doxology, then, which its position at the end of the letter invited, did not follow its misplacement immediately, or was not in all cases connected with this directly. But the group of witnesses which agree in giving the original text of the doxology deserve, as in the discussion of its position also, the preference over that group the great majority of which give, together with the position at the close, the corrupted text.

14. (P. 383.) Bengel, Appar. Crit. (ed. 2) 340: "Videntur Graeci, ne lectio publica in severam sententiam (xiv. 23) desineret, hanc ei clausulam attexuisse, cf. var. Matt. iii. 11." He means the omission in Matt. iii. 11 of καὶ πυρί. But how can that be compared to removing a significant section from its original position? How much more natural, with such an aim in view, to have continued the lection to xv. 4 or xv. 7, or, if transposition of the text were once allowed to enter, to have put here a prayerful wish such as that in xv. 13, which accords with xiv. 17 and with xiv. 23 also! (through ἐν τῇ πιστεύειν). Hort (in Lightf. Bibl. Ess. 342) assumed that in ancient times Rom. xvi. was not read in worship, and that therefore the edifying doxology was joined to a neighbouring lection. Since this does not explain the removal of the doxology from the end of chap. xvi., but only how it came to be joined to an earlier passage, Hort arrived at the untenable hypothesis mentioned above, p. 405, n. 7. Further, the omission of xvi. 1-24 in the liturgy would not explain why the doxology was put after xiv. 23 and not rather after or before xv. 13 or before xv. 33. That the prayerful wishes there would have been no hindrance is seen from Phil. iv. 19 f.; Heb. xiii. 20 f.; 1 Pet. v. 10. This explanation, then, could be considered only if it could be proved that chap. xv. was also excluded from public reading in church. But the extant lectionaries give lections from chap. xv. (cf. Scrivener, Introd. 4 i. 82) on the seventh Sunday after Pentecost, Rom. xv. 1-7; on the tenth Sabbath after Pentecost, Rom. xv. 30-33; also Rom. xv. 7-16 and xv. 8-12 on week-days, Zacagni, Coll. mon. i. 587; ibid. p. 538, cf. p. 575 f., embracing the fifth lection of Euthalius, of which chaps. xviii., xix. = Rom. xv. 1-33. The lectionary in the Fuld., ed. Ranke, 165, includes Rom. xv. 8 ff. There may possibly have been before Origen's time a lection system which excluded Rom. xv.-xvi.; but even so it certainly could not have had at that early date such a powerful influence upon the shaping of the text as to make the misplacement of the doxology, which it brought about, as is claimed, appear to Orig. the older form of the text. Also Riegenbach's explanation, 603 f., that the purpose was to make Rom. close with such a blessing as the other Epistles have, is unsatisfactory. This aim could have been attained much more simply by putting xvi. 24 after the doxology, or, if this verse did not then exist, after xvi. 20, just as in Phil. iv. 23 (cf. 20); Heb. xiii. 25 (cf. 21); 2 Tim. iv. 22 (cf. 18); 1 Pet. v. 14 (cf. 11) the benediction follows hard upon the doxology, and some important witnesses (above, n. 13) actually do place the benediction immediately after the doxology, xvi. 25-27 in Rom.

15. (Pp. 383, 384.) As to the Peshito, back of which our search cannot go (above, n. 8), we must remember that even before its final redaction the Syriac N.T. received influences from Alexandria; cf. GK, i. 386, 406, ii. 560, 564. The West became acquainted with Alexandrian textual criticism at the beginning of the fourth century through Pierius, "the younger Origen" (Jerome, Vir. Ill. lxxvi.). The spacial separation of the two passages, xiv. 23 and xvi. 24 is much too great to be compared with transpositions like those in 1 Cor. xiv. 33-40, xv. 26, which probably arose in a merely mechanical way. More comparable is the varying position of John vii. 53-viii. 11. But, firstly, this is a pericope which did not force its way into the N.T. until the fifth century. Secondly, it is indubitable that the scribe who first connected it with the Fourth Gospel put it where the Textus Receptus and the oldest MSS. have it, and that only later critical suspicions caused it to be placed after John xxi., or also after Luke xxi. In respect of age, even such changes as the insertion of ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, Eph. i. 1, cannot be compared, but rather the changing of the original text of Rom. i. 7 mentioned above, p. 394 f. The transposing of the doxology from its original position after xiv. 23 to the close of the letter was no longer new at the time of Origen; it goes back into the second century, to the time when the effort was made in various ways to frame a fitting close to the unfinished Gospel of Mark, when Tatian compiled his Diatessaron, and also handled Paul's Epistles in bold fashion (Eus. H. E. iv. 29. 6).

16. (P. 384.) In order to explain the variant position of the doxology, and at the same time the alleged multiplicity of endings (xvi. 25-27, xv. 33, xvi. 20, xvi. 24), Griesbach, loc. cit., assumed that Paul, after finishing the letter proper, chaps. i.-xiv.—since the writing material for the purpose was used up—wrote (1) on a separate sheet the sentences intended for the close, xvi. 25-27, perhaps with xvi. 24; (2) again, on another sheet xvi. 21-23 or xvi. 21-24; then (3) on a third sheet chap. xv. as a postscript to i.-xiv. + xvi. 25-27, the need for which came to him as an afterthought; finally (4), again on a separate sheet xvi. 1-20. The sheets then, when copies were made of the Epistle, were arranged in various orders. Eichhorn, Eint. iii. 32, appropriated the essentials of this hypothesis; so also Laurent, Ntl. Stud. S. 31, with the needful modification, however, of substituting "strips of papyrus" for "leaves of parchment" (cf. 2 John 12, χάπτης; Birt, Buchwesen, S. 61 f.). But opposed to this and every such hypothesis is the following:—(1) All the texts of Rom. as we know it in literature go back to just two archetypes, one of which placed the doxology after chap. xiv., the other after chap. xvi. But on this hypothesis either all the MSS. go back to a single orderly edited exemplar, the variant position of the doxology then remaining unexplained, or the "dissecta membra epistolæ" remained in the archive of the Roman Church unarranged, and copies were made of them as the need arose. In this case we must have met in the MSS. many different arrangements of chaps. xv., xvi., instead of just two. (2) It is hardly thinkable that Paul or his amanuensis Tertius (xvi. 22) should have failed to take care, by gluing the papyrus leaves together, that the letter came to the readers in the form intended. Renan (St. Paul, 1869, pp. lxxiii-lxxv) explained Rom. as a circular letter, which Paul himself had prepared in four copies—(1) For the Romans, chaps. i.-xi. 15; (2) for the Ephesians, chaps. i.-xiv. + xvi. 1-20 (with some changes in chap. i.); (3) for the Thessalonians, chaps. i.-xiv. + xvi. 21-24; (4) for an unknown Church, chaps. i.-xiv. + xvi. 25-27. It is plain that even with some changes in chap. i. (omission of ἐν Ῥώμῃ in

i. 7, 15, perhaps), Rom. i.-xi. is still far from being suited to the Ephesians and Thessalonians. There is hardly a sentence in i. 1-16 which is not affected in form and content by the reference to Rome and to Paul's peculiar relation to the Christians there. Not to speak of the opening greeting (above, p. 352 f.), imagine i. 8-16a addressed to Macedonia, where shortly before writing Rom. Paul had spent weeks or months! But the thought of Rome suggests also the theme i. 17 f. and its whole development of this up to xi. 36. To speak of the merest externals, what would the overwhelmingly Gentile Churches of Ephesus and Thessalonica think of chap. vii. 1-6, viii. 15, or even of vi. 16 f. (above, p. 374 f., n. 8)? But if the whole letter needed a complete recasting to adapt it to other Churches than that of Rome, where do we see traces of these various recensions from which our Rom. was compiled? Lightfoot (Bibl. Ess. 287-320), though he sought to refute Renan's hypothesis, advanced a similar one, and maintained it in essentials (ibid. 352-374) against Hort's criticism (ibid. 321-351); Paul himself in later time, perhaps during his Roman imprisonment, transformed the letter originally addressed to the Roman Church, which included chaps. i.-xiv., xv. 1-xvi. 23, into an Epistle suited to a wider circle, by writing ἐν ἀγάπῃ in i. 7 for ἐν Ῥώμῃ ἀγαπητοῖς, by striking out (τοῖς) ἐν Ῥώμῃ in i. 15, and further by cutting off xv. 1-xvi. 23, instead of which he framed a new ending for the Epistle, xvi. 25-27. But (1) we should expect least of all from Paul himself such a partial and external procedure by which the Epistle's local reference would be merely a little obscured, not removed altogether (see above, against Renan). (2) Why should he have found xv. 1-13 less adapted to a larger circle of readers than i. 8-16 or xiv. 1-23? The relation of particular to universal which subsists between that section and these is just the opposite of that which Lightfoot seems to have presupposed. (3) Since Paul elsewhere seems to have had no objection to having a letter addressed to one Church read by another (Col. iv. 16), no motive can be found for this literary labour of the apostle so strange in itself. (4) The supports which Lightfoot thought he found in the text as transmitted are most decidedly weak. Marcion, even aside from the fact that he had none of the doxology, but did have parts of chaps. xv., xvi., could give absolutely no support to such a hypothesis on account of his treatment of the text (above, p. 396 f.). Just as little can Cod. G and all the witnesses for the position of the doxology after xiv. 23; for there is not a hint that they go back to a text without xv. 1-xvi. 23. Finally, as for the variants of Rom. i. 7 and i. 15, it has been shown to be (above, p. 394 f.) extremely probable, that in the first passage ἐν ἀγάπῃ θεοῦ was the original text, which was changed into ἐν Ῥώμῃ ἀγαπητοῖς θεοῦ only after a considerable circulation of the Epistle in the Church, therefore certainly a long time after the death of Paul. It has also been shown that the omission of the apparently unnecessary τοῖς ἐν Ῥώμῃ, i. 15, was only an arbitrary act, appearing only in isolated instances, and favoured by the original text of i. 7.

17. (P. 386.) A particular chain of thought suggested before, in ii. 16, the statement that in Paul's gospel the universality of God's plan of salvation was manifested more clearly than before (cf. i. 16, iii. 29); but that this gospel of Paul is not his own peculiar teaching, but the one message of salvation in a particular historical form, is maintained in i. 1 by the designation of it as the gospel of God, and here by the co-ordination of it with the preaching of Jesus. In xvi. 26, as in iii. 21, x. 11, the reference is to the inner connector of this gospel with the O.T. ; i. 2, however (cf. x. 15 ; Luke iv. 17 ff.)—a verse that verbally resembles xvi. 26 much more closely than do iii. 21, x. 11, which are essentially related passages—seems rather to express the thought that God had promised long before that He would send forth such a message of salvation. If the words εἰς ὑπακοὴν πίστεως εἰς πάντα τὰ ἔθνη echo i. 5 almost exactly, cf. vi. 17, x. 16, xv. 18, xvi. 19 ; 2 Thess. i. 8, we should also note the variation which is just what might be expected in a compiler. The στηρίζειν of the Romans, which Paul hoped to accomplish by his visit (i. 11), he must for the present leave to God, since he cannot come to Rome immediately (xv. 23–33). That a blessing certified before, indeed, but still veiled, has been made known in the gospel (iii. 21, πεφανερωται = φανερωθέντος, xvi. 26), and repeatedly unveils itself to the believing hearer (i. 17, ἀποκαλύπτεται = κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν, xvi. 25) was said before. But the correlate of these ideas is expressed not there, but only in xvi. 25 by μυστήριον, which only shows again that no pseudo-Paul is here copying the apostle. There the connection and the aim of the teaching involved the calling of this real blessing which is unveiled through the gospel, the righteousness of God. Here there was no occasion for it, and it sufficed to characterise the present as a time in which was revealed to all men what had been a dark secret to former generations ; for in this past, which for many of the readers was not yet banished by the gospel, are rooted the wrongs and quarrels and the confused notions against which Paul had to fight in xiv. 1–23, xv. 1–13. We find μυστήριον not infrequently in the older and less disputed parts of Paul's letters (Rom. xi. 25 ; 1 Cor. ii. 7, iv. 1, xiii. 2, xiv. 2, xv. 51 ; 2 Thess. ii. 7 ; cf. Phil. iv. 12) ; but its use as a formal designation of God's plan of salvation is confined to the present passage and Eph. i. 9, iii. 4, 9, vi. 19 ; Col. i. 26 f., ii. 2, iv. 3—very narrow limits, it must be admitted. Indeed, Eph. iii. 3–6 and Col. i. 26 f., especially have a close resemblance to Rom. xvi. 25 f., but there is nothing in this doxology which betrays borrowing from any of these passages. Besides, it requires no proof to see that, if Paul was indeed the author of Eph. and Col., the thought expressed in these Epistles, that the sharing of the Gentile world in salvation was long hidden or remained a secret, but was revealed in the gospel, could not have occurred to him for the first time some years after he wrote Romans. The expressions ἀπὸ χρόνων αἰώνων (cf. πρὸ χρ. αἰ., 2 Tim. i. 9 ; Tit. i. 2), κατ' ἐπιταγὴν . . . θεοῦ (cf. 1 Tim. i. 1 ; similarly Tit. i. 3), τοῦ αἰωνίου θεοῦ (cf. 1 Tim. i. 17, τῷ βασιλεῖ τῶν αἰώνων), have awakened suspicions from their similarity to passages in the Pastoral Epistles. But none of them is copied, least of all the last, and the individual elements have nothing peculiar about them. Paul employs αἰώνιος outside of the doxology and the Pastoral Epistles ten times ; κατ' ἐπιταγὴν in 1 Cor. vii. 6 ; 2 Cor. viii. 8 (cf. 1 Cor. vii. 25), a common mode of speech, indeed, in such a connection (e.g. κατ' ἐπιταγὴν τῆς θεᾶς in a Phrygian inscription, JHSt. 1883, p. 388). These similarities can prove nothing alone ; and even if other evidence were forthcoming, all that they could help to establish would be that Rom. xvi. 25–27 and the Pastoral Epistles were written by the same person. The case is not changed if by that person we understand Paul. On the contrary, it is absurd to claim that the same pseudo-Paul who forged the Pastoral Epistles interpolated Romans.

18. (P. 388.) We find greetings from large groups of Christians to the collective body of readers in 1 Cor. xvi. 19 f. ; 2 Cor. xiii. 12 ; cf. Tit. iii. 15 ; 1 Pet. v. 13 ; Heb. xiii. 24 ; together with more particular greetings, Phil. iv. 22 ; Rom. xvi. 16. Gal., Eph., 2 Thess., and 1 Tim. have no greetings at the end ; in 1 Thess. v. 26 is simply a request to greet one another in Paul's name, cf. Rom. xvi. 16a. The only case where individuals are addressed in the course of the letter is Phil. iv. 2 f. Apart from the letters addressed to places which Paul had not yet seen, Rom. and Col. (see above, p. 388), greetings to individuals and from individuals occur besides only in the private letters, Philem. 23 f. ; 2 Tim. iv. 19-21. Even in the case of brief personal intercourse with a Church, there would be no end of greetings if the writer sought thus to express all the connections formed at that time. This is illustrated by formulas such as those in Ign. Smyrn. xiii ; ad Polye. viii ἀσπάζομαι πάντας κατ' ὄνομα and ἐξ ὀνόματος, cf. 3 John 15 ; Berl. ägypt. Urk. 27. 18, 93. 28, and often. For the same reason, Paul, in his letters to the Churches founded by him at Philippi, Thessalonica, and Corinth, and in Galatia, avoids personal greetings at the close altogether. He would have done the same then probably in a letter to the Ephesians.

19. (Pp. 385, 389.) Baur (i. 394) : "xv. 1-13 contains nothing which the apostle might not have said better in xii. 1 f." Answer : Paul said nothing similar in xii. 1 f. ; in xv. 1-13, for the very first time in the whole Epistle, he touches on the difference between the Jewish and the Gentile elements within the Church as an opposition which endangers unity of faith and worship, and which he exhorts both sides to put away. That there were Gentile Christians in Rome was seen before in xi. 13 ; but only the Gentile Christians were admonished in xi. 16 ff., not both parties in the Church ; and these were exhorted to a proper attitude, not toward the Jewish Christians, but toward unbelieving Jews. According to Baur 394 f., Lucht 174 ff., concessions are made to the Jewish Christians in xv. 8 f. which Paul never offers. But the historical fact that the personal activity of Christ did limit itself to Israel (γεννησθαι), could not be denied by even a fanatical anti-Semite, to say nothing of Paul, who laid stress upon these very things, namely, that all revelations, including the last and greatest, were entrusted to this people and had taken place in Israel (iii. 2, v. 20) ; that Jesus in the whole sphere of His life was under the law, in order that first of all He might redeem them that were under the law, i.e. the Israelites (Gal. iv. 4 f., iii. 13 ; Rom. vii. 4) ; and that only in consequence of His death and the unbelief of Israel did salvation turn to the Gentiles (Gal. iii. 14 ; Rom. xi. 11-xv. 30). The appearance of Christ in Israel is, indeed, made the proof of God's faithfulness in fulfilling His promises made to the patriarchs ; but so far is this from excluding the idea of grace, that promise and grace are rather correlated (Rom. iv. 13-16 ; Gal. iii. 17 f.). Yet it is emphasised no less strongly in Rom. iii. 3, ix. 4-6, xi. 1 f., 27-29, that God in fulfilling His promises toward Israel has proved His faithfulness and will still prove it. Paul never taught that the Gentiles had an historical right to salvation similar to that of the Jews. It is therefore hard to see why he could not here, as in xi. 30, emphasise as characteristic of the Gentiles' relation to salvation the fact that they owed this simply to the mercy of God. A concession to the Jewish Christians such as sets one thinking is to be found not in xv. 8 f., but in xiv. 5 ; see § 23.

Incredible as it may seem, Baur (396, 399) gathered that Paul presupposed in i. 11 a lack on the Romans' part of the "essentials of the deeper knowledge," namely, the "pneumatic," which accordingly he must needs impart to them. On this view, to be sure, the words of approbation in xv. 14, and the apologetic remark a little farther on about his writing the letter, appear like a contradiction. In reality he expressed himself much more modestly with reference to the result of his coming visit in i. 11—where, moreover, there is no mention of the letter—than in xv. 29 (above, pp. 355 f., 369). It is unquestionably true that it was a venture to write to the Romans, for Paul, who considered himself above all a missionary to the Gentiles, had no immediate connection with the Roman Church by virtue of his calling. But the attentive reader does not see this for the first time in xv. 15, it appears in the opening greeting, so diplomatically worded, and in the tone of the whole Epistle. Nowhere the tone of a teacher to his pupils, no use of νουθετεῖν (1 Cor. iv. 14; Col. i. 28; 1 Thess. v. 12, 14; Acts xx. 31), though this is allowable even among equal brethren (Col. iii. 16; 2 Thess. iii. 15; Rom. xv. 14), or of παραγγέλλειν (1 Cor. vii. 10, xi. 17; 1 Thess. iv. 11; 2 Thess. iii. 4, 6, 10, 12) and διατάσσεσθαι (1 Cor. vii. 17, xi. 34, xvi. 1); but everywhere the most considerate tone of one who wishes to come to an understanding with equals, and who exhorts them as a brother. The principle proclaimed in xv. 20 of preaching the gospel only where Christ has not yet been named, is held to be un-Pauline, indeed, even incompatible with the writing of a letter to the Romans. But (1) Paul says merely that he prides himself upon such pioneer work, and by no means that he regards every continuation of work begun by others as sin or folly. (2) This declaration corresponds with his actual procedure since the outset of the first missionary journey. As in Corinth (1 Cor. iii. 10), so everywhere he laid the foundations; and he expresses himself quite similarly in 2 Cor. x. 15 f. (3) Writing Rom. is no εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, and so cannot be inconsistent with this principle. (4) Paul spoke most modestly in i. 13–15 of his missionary work in Rome (above, pp. 355 f., 369, 371). Anyone can see from Paul's actual practice why he did not wish to make Rome a centre for his missionary preaching. Wherever there was a thriving Church, whether founded by himself or by others, his tarrying was never long, and his εὐαγγελίζεσθαι not great. But it was natural surely for Paul, restless missionary as he was, to tell what was the aim of his journey to the West, since he did not intend to accomplish much in Rome. What we miss in i. 13–15 we find in xv. 22–29. Rome was his stopping-place on the way to Spain. That a pseudo-Paul regarded Rome and Italy as the province of another apostle is a thoroughly groundless insinuation of Baur's (398). It is all the more strange when we hear that this man's views agreed with those of the author of Acts (398, 408), which, as we know, closes with a terse but lively description of a two years' preaching activity of Paul in Rome, and says nothing of another apostle there. Baur (401) considered the Spanish journey "the most incredible thing told about the apostle's life." He failed to see that the possible unhistoricity of this tradition does not affect in the least the question whether the real Paul expressed such a purpose of going thither, while it is an almost insuperable obstacle to supposing that a pseudo-Paul—especially if belonging to the first century, see above, p. 388 f.—would have put such an utterance into the mouth of the apostle. This holds also against Lipsius, HK, ii. 2, 86, 195 f., who rejected xv. 19b, 20b (including ἀλλά, ver. 21), 23, 24 as interpolations, and in ver. 28 preferred to read ἐλεύσομαι πρὸς ὑμᾶς instead of ἀπελεύσομαι—Σπανίαν, though retaining the rest of chap. 15 as genuine. That Paul should speak of preaching in Jerusalem agrees with Acts xxvi. 20, ix. 26–29, and is not inconsistent with Gal. i. 17–24. Gal. does not mention the place of his εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, about which the Churches in Judea heard at the time when he betook himself from Palestine to Syria and Cilicia (Gal. i. 21–24). But since this news, as the form of expression shows (ὁ διώκων ἡμᾶς ποτε, ver. 23), spread from Jerusalem out into Palestine, the natural assumption is that during his fifteen days' stay in the city he who before was known as a persecutor became known as a preacher of the gospel, cf. ZKom. Gal. 74 f. Since his aim in Rom. xv. 19 is not to tell where he had preached first and where last, but to give the most widely separated regions of his activity hitherto, he does not mention Damascus, but Jerusalem and the borders of Illyricum. He does not say that he has preached in Illyricum; for nothing compels us to understand μέχρι as inclusive rather than as exclusive, as, e.g. in Rom. v. 14; Phil. ii. 30. The Roman province of Illyricum bordered in the south on Macedonia and was separated from Achaia, to which also Epirus belonged, by a strip of land belonging to Macedonia (Marquardt, i. 297, 318 f., 331). If Paul considered his task of preaching the gospel in Macedonia fulfilled when he had founded Churches in Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea, he had in so doing "fulfilled it as far as Illyricum." This way of looking at it may seem extravagant, but it was the prevailing one in apostolic times, coming to light everywhere in the N.T., and lying at the basis of Paul's missionary methods; cf. Skizzen, 76–82. Moreover, it is possible that immediately after writing 2 Cor. Paul may have set forth from Thessalonica or Berea upon a short preaching tour, which brought him still nearer to the bounds of Illyricum than he had come before. The vague expression τὰ μέρη ἐκείνα, Acts xx. 2, allows freest play to our imagination. Also during the three months which he spent in Greece (Acts xx. 3), he may have made in connection with his visit to all the Churches "in the whole of Achaia" (2 Cor. i. 1, above, p. 264, n. 2), a preaching tour which led him beyond the border of Achaia, and near to the confines of Illyricum, perhaps to Apollonia or Dyrrhachium. The intention of making such a tour is possibly expressed in 2 Cor. x. 16. It would be after his return from this trip that he wrote Rom. in Corinth. If his fifteen days in Jerusalem (Gal. i. 18) seemed important enough to be mentioned here, his journey to the borders of Illyricum need have lasted no longer. In short, the charge of historical improbability can be brought against Rom. xv. 19 only by those who regard the much abused Book of Acts as an exhaustive journal even when, as in xx. 1–2, it compresses the record of about ten months into four lines. And whence did the alleged interpolator get the fact? 2 Tim. iv. 10 gives instead of Illyricum the equivalent name Dalmatia, and makes Titus go thither, not Paul.

20. (Pp. 385, 389.) Semler, op. cit. 293, and Eichhorn, *Eintl.*¹ iii. 243, had expressed various doubts about Rome as the original destination of Rom. xvi.; but D. Schulz (ThStKr. 1829, S. 609–612) developed the arguments which have given great currency to the view that this chapter or great parts of it are fragments of a letter to the Church at Ephesus. Rom. xvi. 1–20 is claimed for Ephesus by Reuss, Lipsius, and others, following D. Schulz; xvi. 3-20 by Ewald (Sendschr. des Pl. 428), Mangold, and others; and xvi. 1-6, 17-20 by Lucht. The whole "list of names," which, according to Lipsius, 86, should lead to this conclusion, reduces to 3 out of the 31 (i.e. if we count the names Aristobulus and Narcissus and the larger groups in xvi. 5, 10, 11, 14, 15 as each a single person), namely, Aquila, Priscilla, and Epānetus. The first two, however, were at home in Pontus, Rome, and Corinth, as well as in Ephesus, see above, also p. 389 f. Concerning 2 Tim. iv. 19, to which those at least who deny the genuineness of 2 Tim. cannot appeal, see §§ 33, 37. To hold that Paul knew personally all those named or indicated in xvi. 3-15 would be a gratuitous assumption. He sends greetings to whole Churches which had never seen him and to individual members of them (Col. iv. 15, cf. ii. 1); and he directs greetings from himself or from his whole neighbourhood to the collective membership of Churches founded by him, without excepting those who had been added since his last stay, or who were personally unknown to the Christians of his neighbourhood (1 Cor. xvi. 19a, 20a; Phil. iv. 21 f.; 1 Thess. v. 26). Consequently, also in Rom. xvi. 3-15 we can decide only from more particular statements whom of those greeted Paul knew personally. This can be claimed more or less definitely only for the persons mentioned in xvi. 3-9, 13. Those whom he knew had told him the names of these others whom he greets, and doubtless something about them also. With regard to particular ones, see below, nn. 21-24. Concerning xvi. 17-20, see § 23.

21. (P. 389.) The Antioch reading Ἀχάϊας, xvi. 5, is wholly untrustworthy, being introduced from 1 Cor. xvi. 15, which a thoughtless comparison of Rom. xvi. 3-5 with 1 Cor. xvi. 19 easily suggested. According to Acts xx. 31, cf. xix. 8-10, xx. 18, the time during which Aquila lived in Ephesus without Paul (Acts xviii. 21-xix. 1), lasted about nine months. It would be a curious assumption that he and his wife restricted their evangelistic work to the teaching of Apollos (Acts xviii. 26). It is very possible that Epānetus, like Paul, found employment as a fellow-craftsman in Aquila's trade, or even was bought as a slave by Aquila in Ephesus, and that thus his conversion was brought about. We can comprehend why it was that a congregation gathered immediately in Aquila's house in Rome as it had done in Ephesus (1 Cor. xvi. 19); for they doubtless needed a large shop in which to carry on their trade. The workmen engaged there, probably slaves of Aquila, must have formed the nucleus of the congregation. Probably all the persons mentioned as far as xvi. 10a belonged to Aquila's household when he was in Ephesus, and so were known to Paul. All those named as far as xvi. 13 being apparently members of the congregation in Aquila's house (§ 23, n. 1), those mentioned in xvi. 10b-13 would constitute the circle outside of the immediate household (xvi. 3-10a).

22. (P. 391.) Taken by itself, συγγενής, xvi. 7, 11, 21, may indicate blood relationship (cf. Luke i. 36, 58, ii. 44, xiv. 12; John xviii. 26; Acts x. 24). But it is exceedingly improbable that Jason of Thessalonica, Sosipater of Berea, cf. Acts xvii. 5-9, xx. 4, above, p. 209, and a certain Lucius (ver. 21), Macedonians sojourning in the neighbourhood of Paul at Corinth, also Herodion (ver. 11), Andronicus, and Junias (ver. 7), were all relatives of Paul. Besides, the emphasising of the personal relationship would have no weight, the uniform lack of particularity in describing the various ties of kinship (Col. iv. 10; Acts xxiii. 16) would be singular, and the separation of the names of these relatives living in Rome (xvi. 7, 11) would be incomprehensible. The conjecture of Semler (Paraphr. epist. ad Rom. 302; cf. Laurent, Ntl. Stud. 33), that συγγενεῖς means here fellow-countrymen of Paul from Cilicia or from the Synagogue of the Cilicians (Acts vi. 9) has still less to recommend it. It goes back rather, as in ix. 3, to γένος in the sense of nation (Gal. i. 14; 2 Cor. xi. 26; Phil. iii. 5; Acts xiii. 26).

23. (P. 391.) Rom. xvi. 7. Since Junius, Junia was an exceedingly common nomen in all grades of society (e.g. C. I. L. vi. 20850–20919), it would be most natural to find here a woman, Junia. But since Junianus is also not uncommon (C. I. G. 4118; C. I. L. ii. 1359, iii. 4020, v. 3489; Orelli, 4141, following De Vit, Onom.—also in a Christian inscription), there is almost nothing in the way of assuming a contracted form Ἰουνίας from this masculine name. While the other statements, perhaps, would fit a married couple, the designation συναιχμαλώτους μου would refer more naturally to two men. Since Paul is not at present lying in prison, and, moreover, is not in the same place with these two people, this designation points even more clearly than συνεργούς μου to a community of life belonging to the past. They must have once shared an imprisonment of Paul. This Paul calls a captivity, just as in Col. iv. 10; Philem. 23, since all Christians are soldiers of Christ (2 Tim. ii. 3 f.; 1 Tim. i. 18; 1 Cor. ix. 7; 2 Cor. x. 3), and therefore, whenever they are imprisoned, are prisoners of war. The frequent figurative use of στρατιώτης and συστρατιώτης (Phil. ii. 25; Philem. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 3) does not commend but forbids Hofmann's view, iii. 617, iv. 2. 147, that συναιχμαλωτος, like συστρατιώτης, expresses simply the fellowship of the Christian state. Besides, on this view, Paul's language, if it is to be understood at all naturally, would imply that the persons in question were "captured from the world by Christ" at the same time as he, which was true of none of them. Cf. the writer's article on "Paganus," NKZ, x. (1899) S. 38 f., and "Zur Lebensgeschichte des Paulus," NKZ, xv. (1904) S. 32 ff. If Andronicus and Junias were converted before Paul, whose conversion followed hard on the death of Stephen and the first spread of Christianity beyond Jerusalem, they must have belonged to the Jerusalem Church before 35 A.D. Consequently we are to understand by ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις: "famed, mentioned with honour in the circle of the apostles," and hardly, "eminent apostles." The latter sense would be, in view of all that the N.T. tells us of the missionaries of that time, extravagant, to say the least. Οἱ ἀπόστολοι alone means, in Paul's mouth, the original apostles (Gal. i. 19; 1 Cor. xv. 7). Since Paul had not been imprisoned in Jerusalem before he wrote Romans, we may assume that Andronicus and Junias belonged to those fugitives who came from Jerusalem to Antioch (Acts xi. 19), that they were active in the mission there, and that sometime during the years 43–50, when we know practically nothing about Paul, they were cast into prison along with him; cf. 2 Cor. xi. 23; Clem. 1 Cor. v. 6. Paul may have become acquainted with them as early as his first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion (Gal. i. 18; Acts ix. 26), and it may have been in remembrance of experiences which he then had shared with these and others of that city now living in Rome that he mentioned Jerusalem instead of Damascus in xv. 19.

24. (Pp. 392, 393). Regarding the names in xvi. 8-15, cf. Lightfoot, Philippians, ed. 3, pp. 171-175; Riggenbach, 509 ff. (1) Ampliatius (ver. 8; D and the Antioch recension have the contracted form 'Αμπλιάν), a "nomen servile" De Vit, Onomast.), occurring also in higher circles perhaps by the third century (Cod. Justin. v. 56. 2). A connection with the gens Claudia is attested by C. I. L. vi. 14918, 15509, cf. also Claudia, 2 Tim. iv. 21; Phil. iv. 22, and below, § 33, n. 2. Under Urbanus, Lightfoot, p. 174, cites an inscription of the year 115 (Gruter, p. 1070, 1=C. I. L. vi. 44), which, in a list of freedmen employed in the imperial mint, gives Urbanus, Ampliatius next to each other, as here, xvi. 8-9. In 1880 a vault was discovered in the Catacomb of Domitilla, over the entrance to which the builder and first owner is indicated by Ampliatii, and in the interior of which an Aurel. Ampliatius, plainly a descendant of the founder, has put up a monument to his wife; cf. de Rossi, Bull. di archeol. crist. 1880, p. 171; 1881, p. 57 (1883, p. 121; 1886, p. 59 other Ampliatii); Hasenclever, JbPTh. 1887, S. 499. If the archeologists are right in assigning the building of the vault and the inscription outside to the end of the first century, and the inscription inside to perhaps the middle of the second, it is probable that the builder of the tomb was the Ampliatius of Rom. xvi. 8 or a son of his. (2) Aristobulus (ver. 10). With regard to this man, mentioned in the text, p. 392, cf. Jos. Bell. ii. 11. 6; Ant. xviii. 5. 4, 8. 4, xx. 1. 2. A mutilated Jewish inscription at Rome (Schürer, Gemeindeverf. der Juden in Rom. S. 17, 40, No. 36) probably refers to a Jew, Herodion (ver. 11) rather than to an otherwise unknown Synagogue of the Rhodians. (3) The Christians ἐκ τῶν τοῦ Ναρκίσσου (ver. 11). Concerning the famous Narcissus, cf. Tac. Ann. xi. 29-38, xii. 1, xiii. 1; Suet. Claud. xxviii; Dio Cass. lx. 34. Inscriptions from Rome: C. I. L. vi. 15640=Muratori 1150. 4 ("Claudia Veneria Ti. Claudio Sp. F. Ser. Narcissiano Filio"; Muratori 902. 5 (Narcissus and Narcissianus, freedmen of the Flavian imperial house, both names also from Pannonia, C. I. L. iii. 3973); Orelli, 4387; C. I. G. 6441b, Βαλλία Ναρκισσιανή; C. I. L. vi. 22871, Narcissias. The name Narcissus is not uncommon outside of Rome also; but this cannot impair the significance of the fact that from the time of the famed Narcissus there were numerous Narcissiani in Rome, or weaken the inference that it is an entire group of these which is mentioned in Rom. xvi. 11. The Acts of Peter, which makes Narcissus a Roman presbyter (above, p. 401, n. 4 at the end), does not draw from local tradition, but thoughtlessly selects two names, Narcissus, who is by no means presupposed as still living in Rom. xvi. 11, and Quartus (ver. 23), who was to be found really in Corinth, and places them in Rome, simply because they are mentioned in Romans (GK, ii. 858). (4) Tryphæna is naturally not the "queen" of that name in Pisidian Antioch, whom the Acts of Thecla connects with Paul (GK, ii. 906 f.). Yet the circumstance that this historical personage was related to the emperor Claudius suggests the conjecture that the Tryphæna of Rom. xvi. 12 was a servant in the court of Claudius and then of Nero, especially since Tryphæna as well as the next name here, Tryphosa, occurs among women in service at the Claudian court (C. I. L. vi. 15241, 15280, 15622-15626; cf. Lightfoot, 174). Two ancient Christian inscriptions should also be mentioned, one from the Cæmeterium of Priscilla (Bull. arch. crist. 1886, p. 48, No. 31, Τρυφῶ [ν or ὠσα] . . . Τρυφᾶ[αῖν]), the other from the Cæmeterium of Hermes (Bull. 1894, p. 17, ostensibly from the first half of the second century. "Tryphonillam . . . Aurelia Tryphæna parentes"). (5) Regarding Rufus, ver. 13, see above, p. 393, and § 53, n. 5. Of itself this very common name would suggest no special relations. It is found also among Roman Jews (Schürer, S. 36, No. 16, 17). (6) Phlegon, cf. C. I. L. vi. 15202, "Ti. Claudi Phlegontis Ti. Claudi Juliani Lib." Moreover, the writer Phlegon, a freedman of Hadrian's, lived and wrote in Rome. (7) Patrobas = Patrobius, cf. Tac. Hist. i. 49, ii. 95; Suet. Galba, xx; C. I. L. vi. 15189, "Ti. Claudio Patrobio," cf. Gruter, 610. 3. (8) Concerning Hermas (ver. 14), Origen (iv. 683) made the modest but worthless conjecture that he was identical with the Roman Christian Hermas, who, in the time of Clement, wrote the Shepherd; cf. the writer's Hirt des Hermas, 33. (9) Nereus and his sister (ver. 15). Νηρεὺς and Νηρεΐς, quite common names of slaves and manumitted persons, also of some in the service of the emperor, C. I. L. iii. 256, vi. 8598 (Domitia Nereis, wife of a freedman and secretary of the emperor). Lightfoot, 174, cites from Acc. di Archeol. xi. 376, a Claudia Aug. L. Nereis, who was closely related to a mother and daughter Tryphæna (ibid. xi. 375). Among the earliest Roman martyrs belong Nereus and Achilleus, valets of the Christian lady Domitilla, according to the Greek legends, but prætorians rather, according to the eulogy of bishop Damasus; cf. Achelis, Texte u. Unters. xi. 2. 44. These traditions cannot have sprung from Rom. xvi. 15; for in that case the sister of Nereus would not be wanting in the legend, nor would the names associated with Nereus be all different from those in Rom. xvi.

25. (P. 394.) It is sufficient refutation of the involved interpolation hypothesis of Völter to have stated it in the light of its results (above, p. 164). On the presupposition that xvi. 3-20 was addressed to Ephesus, H. Schultz (Jb f DTh. 1876, S. 104-130) proposed ascribing xii. 1-xv. 7 also to this letter, which he dated in Paul's later life. This supposed "Eph." had been welded upon the older Rom. (i. 1-xi. 36, xv. 7-xvi. 2, 24) by a redactor, slight changes being made at the points of juncture. Connecting with this theory, though denying that any parts of the letter were intended for Ephesus, Spitta (Z. Gesch. d. Urchrist. i. 16-30), and again with more detailed proof and many not unessential changes—"Untersuchung über den Röm.," op. cit. iii. 1 [1901] has sought to prove that Romans, as handed down to us, and already known to Marcion, was made out of two letters of Paul addressed to the Roman Church. The longer and earlier letter has been preserved essentially unchanged in i. 1-xi. 36, xv. 8-33, xvi. 21-27; and the shorter and later letter appears in xii. 1-xv. 7, xvi. 1-20, likewise complete, save for a salutation which had been omitted by the editor. It is supposed that this shorter letter was not written until after Paul's release from his first Roman imprisonment and toward the end of his journey among the Eastern Churches,—a further activity attested by the Pastoral Epistles. This would date the letter probably in the beginning of 64 A.D. The longer letter, however, within the limits of which the shorter has been inserted, is a mixtum compositum. Paul himself is supposed to have worked over an earlier circular letter, which had been addressed soon after the apostolic council to the Jewish Christians, or to the mother Church. The original letter, which in i. 16b-xi. 10 is preserved in its essential content and wording, was changed into a letter to the alleged Gentile Christian Church in Rome by prefixing i. 1-16a, by inserting iii. 1-8, vi. 12 f., 15-23, xi. 11-36, and by adding xv. 8-33, xvi. 21-27. There were still other short sentences, which Spitta has culled out with more or less certainty, as additions of the editor or later readers, as e.g. xi. 25 (ἵνα μὴ—φρόνιμοι, cf. xii. 16), xiv. 5-6a, xv. 7 (καθὼς θεοῦ); but these are inconvenient for the interpretation presupposed by him (S. 38 ff., 43, 50). Spitta also in his later and fuller treatise, which, to be sure, is not brief, has not given any adequate reason why an editor should have worked over two letters of Paul to the Romans into a single letter which must have been accomplished before the two original letters were circulated outside of Rome. By this theory the letters gain nothing in edification, and how much they lose in clearness and reasonableness would best be shown by Spitta's argument for his hypothesis if it were tenable. Still worse must be the judgment which we would have to pass upon Paul if he worked over his alleged circular letter to the Jewish Christians of Palestine into a letter to the Gentile Christians of Rome. Instead of sending the Romans a copy of the earlier letter, with a shorter note accompanying it, in which he would explain why he recommended them to read this communication, originally not intended for them, Paul sent them, without one word of explanation or excuse, a writing of motley patchwork, which in its essential content was entirely unsuited to the Roman Christians, whom, however, he is addressing (e.g. vii. 1-6). The other doubts concerning this, and the similar hypothesis (mentioned above, pp. 153 f., 415 f.), are indeed not lessened but rather increased by the assertion (S. 6) that not one single letter of the N.T. "is preserved in its original form."

§ 23. CONSTITUENCY AND ORIGIN OF THE ROMAN CHURCH.

In xi. 13, xv. 5-12 it is clearly stated that among the Christians in Rome, to whom, as a body, the letter is addressed, there were Gentiles as well as Jews. On the other hand, if all the Christians in Rome had been Jews, Paul would not have expressly characterised certain individuals to whom he sends greetings as countrymen of his (n. 1). At the same time, it is undeniable that in addressing the readers as a body Paul assumes that, like himself, they had lived under the law prior to their conversion (vii. 1-6, viii. 15, also vi. 16; see above, p. 374 f., n. 8). This does not involve contradiction any more than when Paul addresses the Churches at Corinth and Thessalonica and in Galatia uniformly as Gentile Christian Churches, though from the beginning their membership included a number of Jews and more proselytes (e.g. 1 Cor. xii. 2; Gal. iv. 8; 1 Thess. i. 9). The correct inference is, rather, that in Rome the Gentile Christians constituted a comparatively small minority, just as did the Jewish Christians in the other Churches mentioned. This is proved by the passage where Paul turns directly to his Gentile readers, for the first time calling attention expressly to his special commission as the apostle to the Gentiles (xi. 13). The way in which this transition is made (above, p. 375 f., n. 9) shows that Paul thought of the Church, which to this point he had addressed without distinguishing the separate elements within it, as a body of native Jewish Christians. This conclusion is confirmed by the way in which from xi. 11 on (notably in xi. 13–32) he speaks of the now unbelieving Israel. This differs altogether from the tone of ix. 1–xi. 10, in which he defends himself against the appearance or the charge of heartless indifference toward his unbelieving and unfortunate countrymen (ix. 1–5, x. 1 f.). At the same time, by disavowing motives to which his solemn affirmation of sympathy for Israel might be attributed, he protests against a false grief for Israel, such as might imperil faith in the gospel and the preparatory revelation in the O.T., a grief such as only native Jews were liable to feel. The remnant of the saved, predicted by the prophets, the “seven thousand” of the present time (ix. 29, xi. 4), are not to allow themselves to be misled by the obstinacy and misfortune of the majority of their countrymen. On the other hand, from xi. 13 on the Gentile Christians in Rome are warned against an attitude of arrogant contempt toward the unbelieving Israel, and against failing to recognise this nation’s importance, which will one day be made manifest. Moreover, the manner in which Paul strives to give expression to his own patriotic feeling, even in the personal notices of chap. xvi., is intelligible only on the supposition that he is speaking to Jewish Christians (above, pp. 391, 417, n. 22). The same is true with reference to what he says about the mutual exercise of love and gratitude between Jewish and Gentile Christians where his influence dominates (xv. 26–32, xvi. 3 f., above, pp. 368 f., 391 f.). In the light of what is said in Gal. iv. 10, Col. ii. 16, if this were a Gentile Christian Church, Paul could not mention the observation of certain days as he does in Rom. xiv. 5 f., as if the readers were perfectly justified in maintaining their customs without renouncing entirely principles tested by more than ten years of heated controversy. If, on the other hand, he is addressing a Church which is predominantly Jewish, in which the Gentile Christian minority is at least under the same obligation to submit themselves to the majority as the majority is under obligation to defer to them (cf. xv. 1–7), what is here said is only a statement of his view that of itself the Jewish manner of life is just as consistent with the Christian faith as is that of the Gentiles (1 Cor. vii. 18–20, ix. 20 f.; Gal. ii. 14, v. 6), something Paul never denied. Had the Church been so predominantly Gentile that Paul could have assumed that it felt itself to be one with the Churches in the East founded by himself, he would have referred at once to its Gentile origin, and to himself as the apostle of the Gentiles (cf. Eph. iii. 1). Instead of this, however, from i. 1 on we observe he is very careful to base his right to address the Roman Christians on the broad foundation of the general apostleship which he shares with the older apostles. He also guards carefully against the implication that his special call to the Gentiles (xi. 13; xv. 15 f.) and his gospel (ii. 16, xvi. 25) prevent him from being considered a legitimate preacher of the one gospel of God, promised in the O.T., and first preached by Jesus (above, p. 353). Finally, he asks especially that his message be received by all the Christians in Rome (n. 2). Even the theme developed in i. 18–v. 11, the implications of which are followed out in v. 12–viii. 39, was suggested by his realisation of the difference between his readers' point of view and his own construction and presentation of the gospel. Only on the theory that the letter was intended for Christians, who on account of their Jewish training still found the complete recognition of this truth difficult, was it necessary to give such a fundamental development of the thought that the gospel is a power of God unto salvation for all men under the sole condition of faith. Nothing but the fact that his readers were Jews could have made it necessary for him to answer the objections that the gospel doctrine of justification was practical antinomianism (iii. 31, compare vi. 1, 15), and broke the close connection between the Christian and the O.T. Church (iv. 1 ff., above, p. 359). Even leaving quite out of consideration the various passages where it is expressly stated that before their conversion the readers were disobedient servants (vi. 16 f.), filled with the spirit of bondage (viii. 15), not becoming free from the bondage of the law until their conversion (vii. 1-6, above, p. 360 f. 374 f.), such teaching regarding the law as is found in chaps. vi., vii. (cf. iii. 20, iv. 15, viii. 3 f., x. 4) was applicable only to native Jews who for some reason, either by their own reflection or by the influence of the slanderous assaults of their unbelieving countrymen (iii. 8), doubted whether such an entire severance of their religious and moral life from the Mosaic law, as taught by Paul, was possible. The exhortations to live at peace with their non-Christian neighbours, and to fulfil conscientiously all obligations to the State (xii. 17-xiii. 7), are fuller and more strenuous than in any other of Paul's letters, which goes to confirm our belief that Paul is here addressing the Christian part of that Jewish population, which some years before had been driven from Rome by the Emperor Claudius on account of their incessant rioting.

Many thoughts regarding law, faith, and justification similar to those in this Epistle are found also in Galatians.

But even a superficial comparison of Romans with this or any other of Paul's Epistles addressed to Gentile Christians, in which he antagonises the destructive influence of hostile teachers and of a false gospel, will show that no part of Romans was occasioned by like conditions in Rome. Not only is the teaching under which the Romans became Christians unconditionally approved (vi. 17, xvi. 17), but also the faith of the Church at the time is recognised as normal (xv. 14, xvi. 19; cf. i. 8, 12, xv. 24). This is not contradicted by the occasional reference which we find to the weakness of the flesh, i.e. an unripe condition of moral and religious life (vi. 19, cf. 1 Cor. iii. 1 f.), to individual weakness of faith (xiv. 1), and indirectly to the lack of close harmony between the Jewish majority and the Gentile minority in the Church (xv. 1-13). Throughout the entire doctrinal discussion of the letter there is not the slightest hint of apostasy, nor of reversion to a Jewish or Gentile manner of life, nor of any actually threatening danger that the readers would be deceived into accepting a false gospel. Nor can the injunction at the end of the letter (xvi. 17 f.), that the Church be on its guard against persons who stir up dissensions and create occasions of stumbling, who do not, as they pretend, serve Christ, but their own bellies, and who by their fine speeches, which have a pious and friendly sound, deceive the innocent, be taken as indicating any such condition of things. That in thus exhorting the Church Paul did not have in mind persons who were actually working at the time in Rome with success, is proved by the fact that in this very connection he says to the readers, emphatically, that their obedience has become known to all men, and that he rejoices over them; something that he could not say of all Churches (n. 3). Therefore the desire which he hopes to see fulfilled by this warning, namely, that through their experience they may become constantly wiser in respect of the good, and remain free from the evil, has reference to the future. Accordingly, the statement that God, who desires peace in His Church, will quickly crush Satan under their feet, is made in view of the possibility that persons may come among them and disturb their peace, as had been done elsewhere (cf. 2 Cor. xi. 3). What led the apostle to insert in this peculiar place such an exhortation, designed to warn the readers against future dangers, is clear from xvi. 16. After greeting the different groups into which the Roman Church was divided without making any distinction among them, he enjoins them all to express their fellowship with one another by a holy kiss. That this fellowship, however, was wider than the bounds of the local Church, is proved by the addition of a greeting from all the Churches of Christ to the Roman Christians. Besides the Christians in Corinth and vicinity, among whom Paul was when he wrote (xvi. 1, 23), he was surrounded at the time by representatives of the Macedonian Churches, probably also of other Churches (xvi. 21, cf. xv. 26, above, p. 209). During the preceding years Paul had had a great deal of trouble in the Asiatic Churches, but especially in Corinth, with persons who disturbed the peace of the Church in one way and another. In both localities the Churches themselves had not rejected such persons with enough decision. How natural, therefore, at this point, where he conveys greetings from these Churches, to warn the Romans against such teachers! But he describes them in such general terms that it is necessary to conclude also from the passage that at the time the false teachers and disturbers of the peace had not as yet appeared in Rome. For if they had, Paul could not have failed to specify their particular character. The Church had not yet become involved in the conflict that was being waged between Paul and the Judaisers. The extremely cautious way in which Paul speaks when endeavouring to secure an understanding between himself and the Church, proves that while the majority were not hostile to him and his work, they did, nevertheless, feel him to be still a stranger, and regarded him not altogether without mistrust. This is explained, however, by the fact that the Church was made up largely of Jews, who were indebted for their Christianity neither to Paul nor to any of his helpers (n. 4).

The Roman Church did not have a founder in the same sense as did the Church in Ephesus or Corinth (n. 5). If so, Paul could not have remained entirely silent regarding such a person when speaking of the teaching to which the readers owed their conversion (vi. 17, xvi. 17). The first trace which we have of the presence of Christianity in Rome is the vague statement of Suetonius regarding the banishment of the Jews from Rome by the emperor Claudius, which occurred probably in or shortly before the year 52 (n. 6). Since the Jews were banished by this decree only from Rome, not from Italy, many may have remained in the vicinity of the city. Others, like Aquila, left the country altogether, not, however, before they had at least heard of Christ (above, p. 265, n. 3). Soon after the death of Claudius (Oct. 54) the Jews returned again to Rome in large numbers, and under Nero regained their old rights. It may have been in consequence of these disturbances under Claudius, for which the Jews were in danger of being deprived also of their rights of citizenship, that the Christians among the Jews who came back, and those who now migrated to Rome for the first time, refused probably from the very outset to share the worship and the congregational fellowship of the synagogues. If some such relations as existed for at least some months between the synagogue and the preaching of the gospel in Ephesus and Corinth had existed also in Rome, there would certainly be some trace of it. Moreover, in spite of all the confusion and error about the distinction between what was Christian and what was Jewish in the year 64, the Christiani in Rome were known to the heathen population as a separate sect (Tac. Ann. xv. 44). In Romans the Jewish slanderers are spoken of as outsiders under God's condemnation (iii. 8), distinct from the "called of Jesus Christ" (i. 6). And although the majority of the latter were of Jewish birth, the Gentile minority in the Church did not feel that they were in any sense Jewish proselytes, for they needed to be warned against arrogantly despising the unbelieving Jew (xi. 13-32), and exhorted to accommodate themselves to the Jewish Christians in a self-denying spirit (xv. 1-13).

Among the Jews who during the three years prior to the composition of Romans returned to Rome or migrated thither were Christians from Palestine. Andronicus and Junias, Rufus and his mother, were not the only ones of this kind (above, pp. 392, 420, n. 24, No. 5). Paul nowhere says anything which implies that he is dealing with recent converts. Andronicus and Junias became Christians even before Paul (above, p. 418, n. 23); and in xiii. 11 it seems to be presupposed that the nucleus of the Church became believers at about the same time that Paul did, i.e. in the early years of the Church's growth. However this may be, the fact that a considerable number of persons who earlier had been members of the Church in Palestine now belonged to the Church in Rome, explains the warmth of tone of xv. 25-32, which would have sounded strange in a letter to a Church which had had no intimate relations either with the donors or with the receivers of the collection here mentioned. From this point of view it is also very easy to understand why, in writing this letter, Paul should have in mind and take notice of the Epistle of James, which was written some seven to ten years earlier to Christians in Palestine and adjacent regions (above, p. 128 f.). With the vigorous communication that was kept up between the Jews in Rome and in the home-land (n. 7), it is not at all impossible that the gospel was introduced in Rome, as it had been brought earlier to Antioch not with the aid of regular missionaries, but by Christians from Palestine who settled there, among whom, as among those who settled in Antioch, there were native Cyrenians (Acts xi. 20, xiii. 1; Rom. xvi. 13; Mark xv. 21). Their Christian faith was proclaimed first to the Jewish population in Rome and gained here its first acceptance, without, however, involving the exclusion of proselytes and Gentiles from the Church thus formed. We may assume that after the complete separation of the Roman Christians from the synagogue, which at latest must have taken place at the time of the return of the Jews who had been expelled from the City, and at the time of the reconstruction of the Christian Church about 54, the non-Jewish element began to increase in numbers and influence. Still, up to the time when Romans was written, the character of the Church had not yet essentially changed. It stood in closer relation to the Churches in Palestine than to those in Asia, Macedonia, and Greece.

1. (P. 421.) Of all the persons Paul greets he designates only three as Jews (xvi. 7, 11); but certainly we cannot conclude from this that the rest were Gentiles. Other epithets also, like συνεργός (vv. 3, 9), ἀγαπητός (vv. 5, 12), δόκιμος (ver. 10), and ἐκλεκτός (ver. 13), are not meant to be confined to the persons so designated. Of those whose names follow, we either know or infer to be Jews, though the first three are not so designated: Aquila, Priscilla (ver. 3), Mary (ver. 6, because of her Hebrew name Μαριάμ, so MDGL, or according to ABCP Μαρίαν), Andronicus and Junias (ver. 7, above, p. 415, n. 23 f.), Herodion (ver. 11, above, pp. 393, 419, n. 24), Rufus and his mother (above, p. 392). There are thus eight in all. But since, as these very examples remind us, Jews at that time quite commonly bore Greek and Latin names, the majority of those greeted may have been Jews. Along with six Latin names (Aquila, Prisca, Ampliatus, Urbanus, Rufus, Julia, xvi. 3, 8, 9, 13, 15) and one Hebrew (ver. 6), we find (including Aristobulus and Narcissus, who are not themselves greeted, and Junias, in consideration of its Greek termination, see above, p. 418, n. 23) nineteen Greek names. Suet. Claudius, xv: "Peregrinae conditionis homines vetuit usurpare Romana nomina, dumtaxat gentilitia." Exempt from this rule, as well as from its appended restriction, were the freedmen, the many Flavii, Claudii, Julii, who had been slaves of some member of one of these clans, or else were descended from such, cf. Pauly, RE, v. 675. Julia (ver. 15), as well as the Roman Christian Claudia (2 Tim. iv. 21), must have belonged to this class. The Church consisted for the most part of aliens, freedmen, or slaves of Greek and Oriental extraction, and especially of Jews. Twice, xvi. 14, 15, Paul strings together five names without repeating the ἀσπάσασθε, and associates with each group the other Christians especially connected with them, though without naming individuals. Here, then, are two narrower circles within the Roman Church clearly distinguished, to which the congregation in Aquila's house (ver. 5) should be added as a third; cf. Hofmann, iii. 615. Like the Jews (n. 6), the Christians also assembled in various places in the capital, cf. Acta Justiniani, c. iii (Otto,³ ii. 270). Since Paul notices this grouping three times, and since we cannot think of Christians quite isolated from their fellow-believers, the only natural assumption is that the persons mentioned in xvi. 5-13 all belonged to the congregation in Aquila's house. This is probable, on independent grounds, in the case of the one first mentioned, Epānetus (above, pp. 389, 417, n. 21). The two groups in xvi. 14, 15 are indicated merely by bare names; all those to whom Paul is more closely bound, and whom he greets accordingly, belong to the congregation in the house of that pair who had been associated with him for so many years. Mary, too (ver. 6), must have come into closer touch with Paul previously somewhere in the Orient, if the reading ἡμᾶς instead of ὑμᾶς is right. In reality the former reading is to be commended not only because of the position of Mary's name among those of persons to whom Paul stood in close relationship, but also because εἰς ὑμᾶς or ἐν ὑμῖν would be so self-evident that it would have been left unwritten, as is twice the case in ver. 12. Cf. § 53, n. 5.

2. (P. 423.) The repetitions of πάντες, i. 7, 8, xii. 3, xv. 33, xvi. 24, might perhaps of itself express the simple wish, in view of the wide diffusion and separation of the Christians in the city (see preceding note), that the letter might be made known to them all, cf. 1 Thess. v. 27. It is more natural to think of the distinction between those personally known to Paul and strangers to him. But neither motive explains why πάντες is present in xvi. 15, yet absent in xvi. 14. More probably, considering the tone in which the letter opens, Paul presupposes that the Roman Christians, the great mass of whom were personally unknown to him, might think that, in so far as they were Jews, the apostle to the Gentiles did not concern them. An address to one of these who proudly calls himself a Jew, breaks in suddenly at ii. 17 and leads up to the description of the true Jew, who is spiritually circumcised, i.e. who believes in Christ, ii. 29. It is not Paul's way to picture to himself a Jew taken at random from those beyond the reach of his voice, and then to address him thus. He must have assumed rather that most of his readers, being Jews by birth, needed correction upon this point. Cf. the address in the singular, viii. 2, ix. 19, xi. 17 (there the circle is narrowed by xi. 13), xiv. 4, 15; 1 Cor. iv. 7, viii. 10. Rom. ii. 1 cannot be compared because of its connection with what precedes.

3. (P. 425.) The forewarning, xvi. 17-20, has its counterpart in those which Paul gave the Galatians before he wrote Gal., and even before the Judaisers came to them, Gal. i. 9, v. 3, above, pp. 165, 179 f.; Phil. iii. 1 ff. is a like case. The opinion often expressed that xvi. 17-20 could have been addressed only to a Church very long known to Paul, whether at Ephesus or at Rome after Paul's two years' stay there, has the text against it. It is only because the readers' obedience to the faith has become known everywhere that Paul knows about it, and finds occasion to express his joy over it (xvi. 19, just like i. 8, cf. Col. i. 9; Eph. i. 15). If Paul had had a knowledge of them at first hand, we should have found some trace of it in this or the other parts which Spitta (above, p. 420 f.) assigns to a later letter to the Romans (cf., per contra, Phil. i. 27, 30, ii. 12). Besides, Paul does not speak of obedience to himself or his teaching, but to God and the teaching which they had received from others than himself (xvi. 17, 19, essentially like vi. 17).

4. (P. 427.) If the view of the composition and state of the Roman Church set forth above is as firmly grounded on the text of the Epistle as it seems to the present writer, opposing views need no detailed refutation. The so-called Ambrosiaster (circa 370) developed in his commentary (Ambrosius, Opp., ed. Bened. ii. Appendix, p. 25 in the Introduction, and upon i. 5, 8, 9, 11-16, xiv. 1, 23, xvi. 17) the following view:—Certain Jews living in Rome, who had come to believe in Christ, no one knows how, have preached to the essentially Gentile population of Rome a Christianity altogether fettered by Jewish legalism, and that, too, with speedy success. The founders of the Church are just like the Judaizers in Galatia, false apostles, and the Church gathered by them consists of Gentiles who have allowed themselves to be brought under the law, but lack the true knowledge of Christ and the "spiritual gift" (Rom. i. 11), which Paul wishes to impart to them by his letter and his subsequent visit. Some few Christians, indeed, of a more enlightened sort, have come to Rome, as may be gathered from chaps. xiv. and xvi.; but they have not been able to change the character of the Church essentially. Paul does not declaim here as in Gal. against the Judaistic Christianity of the readers; he even commends their faith; but the explanation of this is that the Romans, not having yet learned the true gospel, cannot have fallen away from it, and so deserve a measure at least of praise for receiving with faith even a Christianity so extremely defective. The confirmatio, which Paul wishes to bring them (Rom. i. 11), is conversion to the true gospel. A brief summary of Rom. (Cod. Amiat. 240; Fuld. 179; Card. Thomassius, Opp. i. 391) expresses this view in the words: "Hi præventi sunt a falsis apostolis et sub nomine d. n. Jesu Christi in legem et prophetas erant inducti. Hos revocat apostolus ad veram evangelicam fidem." According to a second view (Jerome in Gal. v. 2, Vallarsi, vii. 478; Argument. solius epist. ad Rom. Amiat. 235; Fuld. 171; Thom. i. 388, the second Prolog.; cf. the late Catholic Passio Petri et Pauli, chaps. 5-10, ed. Lipsius, 122-128, also 188-193), the Church was composed of perhaps equal parts of Jews and Gentiles, and had been torn by fierce strife between the two parties. The aim of the Epistle would be, according to this summary: "His taliter altercantibus apostolus se medium interponens ita partium dirimit quæstiones, ut neutrum eorum sua justitia salutem meruisse confirmet." An echo of this opinion is found in Hug, *Evl.*³ ii. 398; his further remark, however, that the letter was addressed primarily to the Jewish Christians (399), does not convey a clear idea. When Jerome in the preface of his commentary on Galatians (Vall. vii. 371) compared Gal. with Rom., and pointed out as a characteristic of Gal. that the readers had not come out of Judaism into the faith, he evidently followed an old authority, which had more definitely recognized the Jewish Christian character of the Roman Church. Until Baur's time, the commentators on Romans, whose number grew in the sixteenth century especially, considered its historical presuppositions hardly worth a thorough investigation; and if in any way they hinted at an opinion about the first readers of the Epistle, they started for the most part with the assumption that the apostle to the Gentiles was dealing with Gentiles in this letter likewise. But Baur (TZfTh. 1836, No. 3, S. 54; ThJb. xvi. 60, 184; Paulus,² i. 343) claimed that Rom., too, should be regarded as a letter occasioned "by special relations and needs" and arising under the "imperative stress of circumstances" (Paulus, i. 349; cf. 346), and starting from chaps. ix.-xi. as the kernel of the whole, he arrived at this conclusion: "So fundamentally and radically has the apostle aimed to refute Jewish particularism, that it lies wholly uprooted before the consciousness of his time" (380). It is therefore after all not a letter of the missionary who has regard to the "special relations and needs" of the Church addressed, but the systematic exposition of a writer who appeals to the consciousness of his time. Chaps. xv., xvi., which are peculiarly instructive as to "the special relations" under which the letter arose, are explained to be not genuine (393), and the opening greeting and the introduction, i. 8-16, where he constantly confounds the aims of the letter with those of the approaching visit to Rome, are dismissed with a few remarks, the exegetical worth of which is on a level with Ambrosiaster's endeavours; cf. e.g. Baur, 396, 399 on Rom. i. 11 with Ambrosiaster, p. 29. Baur expressly appeals to Ambrosiaster as an ancient authority "for the Judaistic character of the Roman Church" (391). Baur concluded from the teaching of the Epistle that the Church was of this character, and inferred further on the same grounds that it consisted predominantly of those who were Jews by birth (369-372). Even after Mangold (Der Rm. und die Anfänge der röm. Gemeinde, 1866, second enlarged ed. 1884) sought to prove by more careful exegetical and historical argument the overwhelming Jewish character of the Church, prominent exegetes have thought that they could still maintain that the Roman Church was for Paul "a Gentile Church like those of Thessalonica and Corinth, however many Jews might have belonged to it" (Hofmann, iii. 623). It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that those who are not exegetes, like Weizsäcker (408-424), should have returned to this view, perhaps still combined with the hypothesis that Judaistic teachers were already busy trying to win the Church to their doctrine, and to cut off Paul's approach by hatefully assailing his teaching (425). The leading proof of this, which Weizsäcker finds in iii. 8 (427), falls to the ground for the simple reason that Paul never indicates his single self by the plural (above, p. 209 f., n. 3, 316, n. 3). Cases like προηγουσάμεθα, iii. 9, and λογιζόμεθα, iii. 28, are not comparable; for in these he classes himself with the readers whose assent to his previous discussion he presupposes. But since the connection of ideas in iii. 8 indicates a circle certainly no narrower, the "we" can be nothing less than the Christians whose theory and conduct are so slandered by the non-Christians,—plainly not by Gentiles, but by Jews (as in προεχόμεθα, iii. 9; cf. iv. 1, 16, 24, v. 1-11, viii. 4-39).

5. (P. 427.) Regarding the alleged labours of Peter in Rome before the time of Rom., see below, § 39. The Roman Jews and proselytes also, who became believers at Pentecost (Acts ii. 10 f., 36-42), could not soon thereafter have become the first preachers of the gospel in Rome; for they were not festival pilgrims, but persons who had settled in Jerusalem and belonged to the nucleus of the mother Church (see above, p. 61). We may more likely sift out as the kernel of fact in the romancing narrative in Clem. Recogn. i. 6-11, that Barnabas in very early times, perhaps shortly after his separation from Paul, had come as a preacher to Rome, where later we meet Mark his nephew, who had been his companion at that time (Col. iv. 10). To be sure, in the other recension of the same romance, Clem. Hom. i. 6-14, the first preacher in Rome is nameless, and Barnabas meets Clement for the first time in Alexandria. It is a question, though, whether the rather widespread tradition of Barnabas' sojourn in Rome, to which was added later the story of his preaching in Milan and other places in northern Italy, springs from the pseudo-Clementine fiction (so Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelgesch. ii. 2. 273), or whether the author of the Recognitions did not use an older tradition. The Cypriote monk Alexander, probably in the sixth century, who makes Barnabas go to Rome and then to Alexandria in the interval between Acts xi. 22 and xi. 25 (Encomium in Barn. chap. xx.; Acta SS. Jun. ii. 442), names as his general sources Clement of Alexandria and other old writings, chap. viii. p. 438), and for particulars appeals to traditions of the ancients (chap. xiii. p. 440, γέροντες, πατέρες); nowhere does he appear to be dependent upon the Clement romance. Cf. Acta Petri, chap. iv.; Acta Apost. Apocr., ed. Lipsius, i. 49. 9.

6. (P. 427.) Suet. Claudius, 25: "Judæos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit." For the chronology see Part XI. vol. iii. Since Suetonius (Nero, xvi.) possessed a definite knowledge of the sect. of Christiani which was probably not less than that of Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44), it seems impossible that he should have understood by Chrestus the Founder of Christianity; for in that case we must ascribe to him what is incredible enough, a belief that Christ was present in Rome in person. On the other hand, Χρηστός and Χριστός then sounded alike as pronounced by many, and confusion between them and plays upon them were not lacking (Just. Ap. i. 4; Theoph. ad Aut. i. 1; Tert. Apol. iii; Lact. Inst. iv. 7. 5); nor is it easy to see why a single disturber of the peace should be allowed to keep up his disturbance; so that we may regard it as perhaps settled that tidings of Christ's appearance in Palestine aroused fierce and long-continued quarrels among the Roman Jews, chaps. l-lii. Suetonius did not understand the report that came to his ears. It is questionable whether the scholiast on Juven. Sat. iv. 115 (ed. Cramer, 145), refers to this expulsion of the Jews from the city: "Inter Judæos, qui ad Ariciam transierant, ex urbe missi." According to Cicero, pro Flacco, xxviii, there must have been a considerable number of Jews in Italy even before his consulate (63 B.C.). At the time of this oration (59 B.C.) the Jews in Rome possessing citizenship were already a power in the popular assemblies. At all events, Philo, Leg. ad Cai. xxiii, speaks inexactly when he represents it as if the whole body of Jews in Rome consisted of prisoners of war who had been emancipated by the masters who had bought them, and thus had attained to citizenship. There is no stress to be laid upon the circumstance that Philo does not mention Pompey here (so A. Berliner, Gesch. der Juden in Rom. i. 6, n. 1); for of what other Jewish captives could Philo have thought than those whom Pompey, after his conquest of Jerusalem (63 B.C.), brought with him to Rome on the occasion of his triumphal procession (61 B.C.). His statement, inexact in any case, must be reduced to this, that the body of Jews in Rome received an important addition (61 B.C.) in the shape of captives. Under Augustus they dwelt for the most part on the right bank of the Tiber (Philo, loc. cit.). Later, we find them settled in other parts of the city also, with various synagogues, and with cemeteries outside the gates, cf. Schürer, iii. 35, 44 (Eng. trans. II. ii. 240, 247); Berliner, i. 105. Since of the synagogues in Rome, the existence of which has been established thus far by inscriptions, one was called the synagogue of the Hebrews (above, pp. 47 f., 67, n. 14), we may assume that those who belonged to the others became Hellenised early. In 4 A.D. more than 8000 Jews in Rome attached themselves to a deputation from Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. xvii. 11. 1; Bell. ii. 6. 1); so that, reckoning all these as men, the Jewish population of Rome at that time amounted certainly to more than 30,000. A still larger figure can be inferred from the fact that Tiberius was able to draft 4000 men for military service from among the Jews in Rome (Jos. Ant. xviii. 3. 5; Tac. Ann. ii. 85; Suet. Tiberius, xxxvi; cf. Philo, Leg. ad Caium, xxiv; Euseb. Chron. ann. Abr. 2050). There is something strange in the assertion of Porphyry, or of the heathen writers who cite him, about the lex Judæorum (occurring in August. Epist. cii. 8, ed. Goldbacher, p. 552. 2): "Postea vero prorsus etiam in fines Italos, sed post Cæsarem Gaium aut certe ipso imperante." In spite of the express differentiation of the Christian and the Jewish religion, is there confusion here as to the time when each found entrance into Italy?

7. (P. 428.) Cicero, pro Flacco, xxviii; Philo, Leg. xxiii, p. 568; Jos. Vita, 3; Acts xxviii. 21; Berliner, i. 30 ff.).

§ 24. THE OCCASION OF THE LETTER.

Paul was on the eve of the collection journey which he made in the spring of the year 58 from Corinth, by way of Macedonia to Jerusalem (xv. 25; cf. Acts xx. 3-6). The elaborate plan of the letter and its quiet tone presuppose that at the time when Paul wrote he was enjoying comparative rest both of body and of mind. The excitement which, in spite of all his preparations, he had not been able to allay before his arrival in Corinth sometime in December of 57 (above, p. 338 ff.), must have been already overcome. We may assume that the letter was written in Corinth, but not until toward the close of the three winter months that he spent in Greece, mostly at Corinth, i.e. not before the beginning of March 58. This season of the year, when navigation was beginning to open up, and this place—Corinth—are suggested by the commendation of Phoebe, a deaconess in the Church at Cenchrea, the port of Corinth, who was about to start on a journey to Rome (xvi. 1). The hospitable Gaius, with whom Paul was lodging when he wrote Rom. (xvi. 23), we look for and find in Corinth (1 Cor. i. 14).

After the re-establishing of harmony in the Corinthian Church and the completing of the collection, Paul was in a position where, feeling that his work in the East was done, he could turn his thoughts to future undertakings, particularly to the preaching journey in the West which he had planned a number of years before (above, pp. 367 f., 377, n. 11). That this Epistle was written in connection with this plan would be manifest from the very fact that the bulk of its contents is placed between discussions of these plans (i. 8–16, xv. 15–32). But besides this proof, we have the fact that in the one passage where the composition of the letter is referred to expressly, Paul says in so many words that he wrote it because of his calling as the apostle to the Gentiles and in the interest of the same (n. 1). It is not directly the function of an apostle to the Gentiles, especially as this function is described in xv. 16–21, to write letters at all, to say nothing of letters to Churches predominantly Jewish. As a missionary in general, and in particular a missionary to the Gentiles, even if he comes to Rome, he cannot carry on his specially commissioned work in the Roman Church which is already organised. In fact, it never occurred to him to express any such intentions (above, p. 355 f.). Nevertheless, the reason for the composition of this letter was Paul's calling, which made him a debtor to all unconverted Gentiles. To him, as a missionary planning now to leave the East in order to engage in work in the West, the existence of a Church in Rome which had been organised without his help was a matter of the utmost significance (i. 9). For in the first place, his honour as an apostle commissioned to all peoples forbade him passing by the capital of the empire without exercising his office there, at least to some extent. Not only might such action make it appear as if he had no real confidence in the cause that he represented (i. 14-16); it would lower his own sense of the scope of his calling. In the second place, the geographical situation of the Roman Church made it the natural starting-point and centre of support for all further missionary work around the western end of the Mediterranean. Rome was destined to be the metropolis of the coming Church of the West (n. 2). The person who, like Paul, intended to do missionary work in Rome itself, even though only for a time, and who purposed to accomplish the organisation of Churches in Spain, Gaul, or Africa (i. 13-15, xv. 24, 28), had necessarily to be in entire harmony with the Roman Church. The material aid obviously suggested in xv. 24 (n. 3) was of small consequence compared with the moral support of the Roman Church, which was indispensable to the apostle of the West. Accompanied by their intelligent interest and upborne by their prayers, he desires now to go to Jerusalem (xv. 30) and later to Rome, and from Rome to Spain.

Had the Roman Church been organised by Paul or by one of his helpers, and had it not subsequently become estranged from him, a brief notice of his forthcoming visit would have sufficed, particularly since Aquila and Priscilla had gone to Rome some time before (above, p. 389 f.). But, in view of the origin and character of the Roman Church, of which Paul had learned through the reports of his friends there, it seemed to him necessary to make himself perfectly understood by stating comprehensively his view of the gospel, thereby allaying the prejudices felt by most native Jewish Christians toward him and his missionary work, and guarding against future troubles. The predominantly Jewish character of the Church, its close connection with the Church in Palestine, and its location at the centre of the world's travel, made it just as easy for it to become a centre of the Judaistic propaganda, by which the apostle had been everywhere followed, as it was for it to become the centre of support for missionary work in the West, as Paul intended it should.

To what extent the apostle by his letter succeeded in warding off this danger and in accomplishing his own purpose, we learn in part from later letters of his. In more than one respect the future turned out differently from what Paul desired, hoped, and expected at the time when he wrote Romans. He was, to be sure, delivered from the hands of "unbelievers in Judea" (xv. 31; Acts xxi. 32). He also came to Rome, and with joy (xv. 32; Acts xxviii. 15), and possibly went even to Spain. But his rescue at Pentecost 58 by the Roman guard from the fanaticism of the Jews in the temple was the beginning of a five years' imprisonment. The appeal to Cæsar, which he made before the procurator Festus in the summer of 60 at Cæsarea, occasioned his transfer to Rome. Here he arrived in the spring of 61, remaining, according to Acts xxviii. 30, for two whole years, or until early summer of 63, before there was any change in his condition. Letters, in which Paul speaks of himself as a prisoner, must be considered from this point of view, whether he had written them in Cæsarea or Rome, or in an entirely different period of imprisonment.

1. (P. 435.) Hofmann, iii. 623, appealing to i. 5, xv. 15 f., remarks that Paul wrote this letter "in his capacity as Apostle to the Gentile world." But i. 5 offers no grounds for this (above, p. 370, n. 2), and the very essential distinction between διὰ τὴν χάριν, xv. 15, and διὰ τῆς χάριτος, Rom. xii. 3, or κατὰ τὴν χάριν, 1 Cor. iii. 10, Eph. iii. 7, is blurred by his ambiguous expression here, and is even quite disowned in his rendering, 613, "by virtue of which calling." No more correct is Lightfoot's translation, Bibl. Ess. 297, "by the grace." As so often elsewhere, διά, c. acc., denotes that in consideration of which, and with a view to which something is done, whether this end be a thing (1 Cor.

ix. 23 ; Matt. xv. 3) or a person (Rom. iv. 24 ; 1 Cor. iv. 6 ; Mark ii. 27 ; Matt. xxiv. 22). Only in the sense in which one could speak of Paul as an Apostle to the Gentiles in connection with the collection journey to Jerusalem (Rom. xv. 25-32), or in connection with his earlier journey to the Council of the Apostles (ii. 1-5), can it be said that Paul wrote Rom. in his capacity as Apostle to the Gentiles.

2. (P. 436.) Th. Schott (Der Römerbrief nach Endzweck und Gedankengang, 1858) opposed not only the unhistorical treatment of the Epistle by most of the commentators, but also that of Baur, which is historical only in appearance, and sought energetically to explain the peculiarity of the letter as due to the state of Paul's missionary labour at the time of its composition. Not to speak of the superficial or quite mistaken explanations of individual passages bearing strongly upon the question of the composition of the Church (i. 5 f. S. 50, vi. 16 f. S. 263, vii. 1-6 S. 266-271, xv. 1-13 S. 313, nothing at all about πάλιν, viii. 15, or ὑμῖν δὲ τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, xi. 13), the success could not be great, since Schott (60, 99, 101-117), without support in the letter or the other known historical circumstances, maintained that there was an essential difference between the mission in the East and that in the West, only the latter being a purely Gentile mission.

3. (P. 436.) Regarding προπεμφθῆναι, xv. 24, cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 6, 11 ; 2 Cor. i. 16 ; but especially Tit. iii. 13 f. ; 3 John 6. As to the act itself, cf. also Ign. Smyrn. x. How essential it was for Paul as he pressed forward in his missionary work to leave the Churches behind him in good condition, is shown by 2 Cor. x. 15.

VI.

THE LETTERS OF THE FIRST ROMAN IMPRISONMENT.

§ 25. TIME AND PLACE OF THE COMPOSITION OF THE EPISTLES TO PHILEMON, THE COLOSSIANS, AND "THE EPHESIANS."

IF these letters were written by Paul, they were all despatched by him at the same time. Practically identical reference is made in both Eph. vi. 21, 22 and Col. iv. 7, 8 to the oral reports concerning Paul's condition which Tychicus was to deliver to the readers of both letters. In other words, the sending of Tychicus to the place where the readers were was contemporaneous with the sending of both letters. Tychicus was their bearer. In Colossæ additional reports concerning the condition of affairs where Paul was were to be made by Onesimus, whom Paul sent with Tychicus on the journey. This is all that is said in Col. iv. 9; it is not said that Tychicus and Onesimus would arrive in Colossæ at the same time. From the fact that Onesimus is not mentioned in Eph. vi. 21 f., it may be inferred that he was not to stop in the place, or places, to which Ephesians was directed, or that he was not to go there at all. The slave Onesimus, who had run away from his master, had fled to the place where Paul was in prison, and had been converted to the Christian faith by him. Paul sends him back to his master Philemon bearing a letter pertaining exclusively to this personal matter (Philem. 10-17). There is no indication that Onesimus had any other commission. The only reason why he had occasion to supplement the oral reports of Tychicus, or to inform the Christians in Colossæ of Paul's condition before Tychicus' arrival, was the fact that Colossæ, whither the latter was bound with a letter to the local Church, was Onesimus' home, and thus the place where Philemon lived (n. 1).

So far as notices are given relative to Paul's condition and surroundings, they are the same in all three letters. The following persons were with him :—(1) Timothy (Col. i. 1 ; Philem. 1), who accompanied him on his journey to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 4), and who at the time of Philippians, which was certainly written in Rome, was there (i. 1, ii. 19). (2) Luke (Col. iv. 14 ; Philem. 24), who, presupposing that Luke is the author of the account in Acts xx. 5–xxi. 17, xxvii. 1–xxviii. 16, accompanied him from Philippi to Jerusalem, and later from Cæsarea to Rome. (3) According to Acts xx. 4, xxvii. 2, with Paul was also Aristarchus of Thessalonica (Col. iv. 10 ; Philem. 24), who appears to have been an earlier helper and companion of his, and who on the occasion of the insurrection of the silversmiths in Ephesus was deprived of his freedom, at least temporarily (Acts xix. 29). The designation which Paul uses in speaking of him, συναιχμάλωτος (Col. iv. 10), may have reference to these earlier experiences (above, p. 418, n. 23). Since Paul was never actually a prisoner of war, this expression, like συστρατιώτης (Phil. ii. 25 ; Philem. 2), must certainly be at least partially figurative, and its use may be explained by supposing that at the time when Colossians was written Aristarchus was voluntarily sharing the dwelling in which Paul was a prisoner ; so that, since Paul was under military surveillance, his condition, like the apostle's, might be compared to that of an αἰχμάλωτος. The same would apply (4) to Epaphras (Philem. 23). A Colossian by birth (Col. iv. 12), he had laid the foundations of the local Churches (Col.

i 6-8, iv. 12 f.) in his native city, and apparently also in the neighbouring cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis, in the valley of the Lycus (n. 2). In so doing Epaphras had taken occasion to inspire these Churches with a sense of reverence for Paul, and the main purpose of his journey to Paul in prison seems to have been to arouse the apostle's active interest in the spiritual development of these Churches (Col. i. 8 f., iv. 12 f.). It appears that originally Epaphras had undertaken to preach the gospel in his native city either by Paul's commission, or at least at his suggestion (n. 3), and it is probable that both Epaphras and his fellow-townsmen Philemon became personally acquainted with Paul and Timothy during Paul's three years' residence in the province of Asia, and were converted by Paul in Ephesus. When Colossians was written, Epaphras does not appear to have contemplated an immediate return to his home. Instead of Epaphras, Paul seems to have sent back to Asia, and among other places to Colossæ (Eph. vi. 21 ; Col. iv. 7), (5) Tychicus, a native of the same province, who had accompanied Paul on his journey from Macedonia to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 4), who seems also to have acted as Paul's messenger to Ephesus on a later occasion (2 Tim. iv. 12). (6) Demas, whose greeting is sent along with that of Luke, without either praise or blame (Col. iv. 14 ; Philem. 24), was perhaps a Thessalonian (2 Tim. iv. 10 ; above, p. 213, n. 6). Greetings are also sent from (7) Mark (Col. iv. 10 ; Philem. 24) and (8) Jesus Justus (Col. iv. 11). From these greetings it is not to be inferred that those who sent them were personally known to the readers (cf. Rom. xvi. 16b, 21-23). A local Church in which Paul had a deep interest (Col. i. 8), and a household in this Church with which Paul stood in intimate relations, were also of interest to the helpers who were living more or less constantly in his companionship. To this circle Jesus Justus, who is not mentioned in Philem. 24, does not seem to have belonged; nor would Mark, who has not appeared in company with Paul since the separation between him and Barnabas (in the year 52), be mentioned in Col. iv. 10 and Philem. 24, were it not that he planned to go shortly to Colossæ. News of his coming and instructions as to his reception had reached the Colossian Church earlier, though from whom and through whom we do not know. Now again, in case of his coming, Mark is commended to the kindly reception of the Church. For this reason Mark, who is mentioned prominently in Col. iv. 10 and in Philem. 24, is spoken of, on the one hand, as the cousin of Barnabas, who was widely known, and, on the other hand, as being at that time friendly toward Paul and his preaching work, the purpose in both cases manifestly being to commend him to the readers (n. 4). In this regard Mark and Jesus Justus (and that is why he is mentioned here) were different from the other missionaries of the circumcision who were about Paul. From the fact that he praises Mark and Jesus Justus because they and they alone of the circumcision were fellow-workers with him on behalf of the kingdom of God, and as such were a source of comfort to him, it is to be inferred that there were a number of native Jewish missionaries at work where Paul was, and that their method of work was not a source of gratification to him.

Paul is in prison on account of the fulfilment of his office as apostle to the Gentiles (Eph. iii. 1, 13, iv. 1, vi. 20; Col. i. 24, iv. 3; Philem. 1, 9, 10, 13, 23). He feels that in suffering thus he may expect the sympathy and the prayers of his readers (Col. iv. 18; Philem. 22). Once at least he expresses the hope that through the prayers of his friends in Colossæ he may be set at liberty and be able to visit Colossæ at no distant day (Philem. 22, cf. Phil. i. 19). The prayer, however, which he most earnestly requests is not that he may be released, but that he may be able to preach the gospel where he is with fitting cheerfulness and with good results (Eph. vi. 19 f.; Col. iv. 3 f.; cf. also Philem. 10). No external hindrances seem to stand in the way of this preaching, and Paul speaks as if he intended to carry it on for a long time to come.

The question whether these letters were written in Cæsarea (Pentecost 58 to late summer 60) or in Rome (spring 61 to 63) can be decided only by a comparison of the situation at the time when they were written—which has just been described—with the meagre accounts which we have of these two periods of Paul's captivity (n. 5). At Cæsarea Paul was kept in chains in Herod's pretorium under military guard; he was not harshly treated; his friends were allowed to visit him, and to provide him with whatever he wanted (Acts xxiii. 35, xxiv. 23, 27, xxvi. 29, 31). Of preaching activity, however, during this imprisonment there is no hint in Acts. It is also very unlikely that Paul would have felt at liberty to preach in a city of Palestine, especially if the division of their respective fields of labour, agreed upon by Paul and the older apostles a little more than six years before he was arrested, was primarily a geographical division (above, p. 265 f.). The contemporaneous missionary work of Paul and his helpers, Timothy, Luke, Aristarchus, Epaphras, Demas, possibly also Tychicus, and of numerous missionaries of Jewish birth, who, with the exception of Jesus Justus and Mark, were hostile to Paul, presupposes a large city, which Cæsarea was not (n. 6). In Cæsarea dwelt the evangelist Philip, with whom Paul and his companions had lodged shortly before his arrest (Acts xxi. 8-14). How could Paul have forgotten this worthy preacher, or how could he silently imply that he was a missionary hostile to himself? Yet this is what he does if Col. iv. 11 was written in Cæsarea.

We learn more concerning this evangelistic work carried on parallel with Paul's ministry and in opposition to himself—a work referred to in Col. iv. 11—in Philippians (i. 14–18), which was written in Rome. The origin and composition of the Roman Church (above, p. 421 ff.) offered an especially inviting field to the missionaries of the circumcision. In Rome, Paul was not in prison, but lived in his own hired dwelling. He was under military guard, and carried a chain, but was otherwise so little restricted that for two whole years he received numerous visitors as he chose, and was able to carry on an important missionary work (n. 7). Moreover, what could have induced a runaway Colossian slave to go to Cæsarea is not apparent. Since Onesimus was not a Christian at the time, and since, according to Philem. 11, 18, he had committed serious offences against his master, he is not likely to have gone for protection to Paul, a friend of his master's. To Rome, however, streamed just such characters from all the provinces. In the metropolis, with its motley population, they were most secure. What brought Onesimus into contact with Paul in Rome we do not know (n. 8). Nor are we able from positive reports which we have from other sources to explain on what Paul based the hope, which is quite definitely expressed, of being set at liberty again (Philem. 22). The longer, however, the situation described in Acts xxviii. 30 f. continued without the institution of a trial, the more probable it became that eventually he would be set at liberty for lack of evidence against him (Acts xxv. 25–27, xxvi. 31). In Cæsarea, on the other hand, this was not to be thought of so long as Felix was in power, since Paul could not permit himself to offer the procurator a bribe (Acts xxiv. 16). Under Festus the use of this means was out of the question, and the appeal to Cæsar cut off all prospect of an early release. But even in case of acquittal by Festus, for which possibly he might have hoped before he made his appeal, he could not very well have planned to make a journey to Phrygia. For a number of years he had been anxious to go to Rome (above, pp. 367 f., 434 f.). According to Acts xxiii. 11, a revelation by night had confirmed anew his conviction that in spite of his arrest Rome was to be his next objective point. It was under the influence of this idea that he made his appeal to Cæsar, and the appeal proves that two years' imprisonment had not quenched the desire to go to Rome (Acts xxv. 11, 25, xxvii. 24). If, then, he had been set at liberty in Cæsarea, he would have had no motive to go to Colossæ instead of to Rome as he had planned.

To be sure, by his preaching in Rome the goal of his desire was not fully attained. But it was in part and to a degree that surpassed all expectation. Instead of doing missionary work for a few weeks on his way to Spain, he was able to preach for two entire years in the capital with zeal and good results. Judged by the standard of work during his earlier years, when these two years in Rome drew toward their close, he had completed another important period of his life history. Almost five years had passed since he had taken leave of the Church in Asia for a long period, if not for ever (Acts xx. 25). It is not, therefore, strange that Paul felt it necessary before extending his missionary work in the West to visit again his Churches in the East, also to become acquainted with the Eastern Churches that had been organised without his help (Col. ii. 1). Whether this intention was carried out this is not the place to inquire. But there is not much doubt that these three letters were written in Rome during the two years mentioned in Acts xxviii. 30. As to their more exact dating, all that can be said is that they could not have been written at the very beginning of the period. News must have reached the East that Paul was able to carry on his work in Rome before helpers journeyed from this region to Rome to support him. Nothing is said which would indicate that any one of these helpers had just come to Rome; and although we do not know all that Tychicus was instructed to report orally, we may infer from the manner in which Paul speaks of his imprisonment, his preaching activity, and his fellow-workers, that the readers had been for some time acquainted in a general way with the situation in which he was placed. Consequently, it is more probable that the letters were written in the second than in the first of the two years (n. 9).

1. (P. 440.) Since it was not until after his flight that Onesimus was converted through Paul (Philem. 10), and thus was not a member of the Church at Colossæ, Col. iv. 9 must simply mean that Colossæ was his ordinary home, past as well as future (above, p. 371, n. 3). It would have been altogether too meaningless for Paul to refer in this fashion to the mere circumstance of his possible birth in Colossæ had he come later into possession of a master resident elsewhere. We must seek Philemon's house in Colossæ then, where even in the fifth century men believed that they could still point it out (Theodoret in the introduct. to Philem., ed. Noesselt, p. 711). The identity of the destination of Col. and of the letter to the congregation in Philemon's house follows from the mention of Archippus in both letters. According to Philem. 2, he must have belonged to Philemon's household; and if, as was shown, Philemon's house, from which Onesimus ran away, stood in Colossæ, that city was the home of Archippus also. It was a bold assertion of Theodore of Mops. (ed. Swete, i. 311), that we can infer from the wording of Col. iv. 17 that Archippus dwelt in Laodicea and performed some service in the Church there. Theodore in his exposition of Philem. does not mention the dwelling-place of that household at all, so that he probably held it to be Laodicea, in accordance with his remark upon Col. iv. 17; and Lightfoot (Colossians, ed. 2, pp. 244, 309), though he recognised that Philemon and Onesimus belonged to Colossæ, felt compelled to agree with this view of Col. iv. 17. Archippus would then be at the same time a member of the Church in Philemon's house in Colossæ, and a servant of the neighbouring Church in Laodicea! In reality, after greetings are sent to the Christians in Laodicea, Col. iv. 15, and a commission is entrusted to the Colossians with reference to that neighbouring city, iv. 16a, we are brought back again to Colossæ by the direction that the letter from Laodicea be read also in Colossæ. It is there alone that we must seek Archippus, for whom there is, in close connection with what precedes (iv. 17, καί), a reminder to be given by the Church to which he belongs. Theodoret was quite right in rejecting Theodore's view of Col. iv. 17. Moreover, the more particular statement that Archippus was the first bishop of Laodicea (Const. Ap. vii. 46) is worth as little as the other statements we find there, e.g. that Philemon was bishop of Colossæ, and Onesimus of Beroëa. An Archippus from Hierapolis in the legend of the miracle at Chonæ (Colossæ) can hardly have anything to do with our Archippus, as Batiffol, Stud. patr. i. 33, conjectures; for even according to the narrator himself this Archippus was only ten years old ninety years after the building of a Michael Chapel, which itself was built many years after the death of the apostles John and Philip (Narratio de miraculo Chonis patrato, ed. Bonnet, 1890, pp. 3, 8, 5, 6). Nor can we infer that Philemon dwelt elsewhere than in Colossæ from the fact that Paul had long been intimately acquainted with him and his family (§ 26), while the rest of the Colossian Church were still unknown to him (Col. ii. 1; see below, n. 3). In that case we should have to put Philemon's home in an altogether different region; for Paul had not yet been in Laodicea or Hierapolis either. Rather was the case the same with these Churches as with the Church at Rome (above, p. 416, n. 20). Paul does not regard acquaintance with some of the present members of a Church as acquaintance with the Church as a whole. Philemon, apparently a well-to-do householder at Colossæ (§ 26), can very easily have become acquainted with Paul and have been converted through his labours during the apostle's residence of almost three years in Ephesus, or if not then in some other part of the province. Whether or not the same is true of Apphia and Archippus we cannot tell. From the position of these two names between that of Philemon and the Church in his house (Philem. 2; cf., per contra, Rom. xvi. 5, above, p. 417, n. 21) so much only is certain: that they were members of his family, Apphia his wife probably, and Archippus his son. Philemon is called the συνεργός of Paul and Timothy, but Archippus their συστρατιώτης. The latter expression seems to indicate an activity requiring more pains and self-denial—one more like that of Paul and his tried helper, cf. Phil. ii. 25; 2 Tim. ii. 3; 1 Cor. ix. 7; 1 Tim. i. 18. We cannot gather with certainty from the connection in Col. iv. 17 that it belonged to Archippus' office to read letters and other writings in the meetings at Colossæ (cf. 1 Tim. iv. 13?), or to serve as intermediary in the intercourse with other Churches (Herm. Vis. ii. 4. 3). But that it was a service which affected the whole local Church, is plain from the fact that the reminder about this is contained not in the letter to Philemon and the congregation in his house, but in that to the Church of Colossæ. Ambrosiaster's imagination is a trifle too lively when he writes of Archippus: "Post enim Epaphram, qui illos imbuat, hic accepit regendam eorum ecclesiam," and when in the prologue he represents the false doctrine as intruding "post prædicationem Epaphræ sive Archippi." But Hitzig, Zur Kritik paul. Briefe, 32, and Steck, JbPTh. 1891, S. 564 ff., went much further astray when they found in Col. iv. 17 an "insulting utterance," a "sharp sting," an "unworthy insinuation," which could not be believed of the apostle, the less so as he wrote Philem. 2 without chiding Archippus. According to this, all Paul's exhortations which are not confirmed by a circumstantial statement of their occasion, would be insults. If such a one had occurred in Philem. 2, the critics would have seen all the more in this a proof that Col. iv. 17 was falsely ascribed to Paul on the basis of Philem. 2. A conjecture like that of Hitzig, 32 (whom Steck follows), that a philosopher, Flavius Archippus, who was condemned to work in the mines by a proconsul Paulus (Plin. Ep. ad Traj. lviii-lx, lxxx, lxxxi), furnished occasion for the invention in Col. iv. 17, must be left to its fate.

2. (P. 441.) For history and geography see LIGHTFOOT (op. cit.), 1-72; HENLE, Kolossä und der Brief des Paulus an die Kol. 1887; RAMSAY, Church in the Roman Empire, 2 ed. 1893, pp. 465-480, with detailed map; ibid. Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i. 1 (1895), pp. 32-121 (Laodicea and Hierapolis), 208-234 (Colossæ); HUMANN, CICHORIUS, JUDEICH, and WINTER, Altortümer von Hierapolis, 1898. Κολοσσαί (so in the older writers, upon coins, and in the older MSS. of the N.T.; Κολασσαί perhaps from the fifth century A.D. onwards) was in Persian times one of the largest and richest cities of Phrygia (Herod. vii. 30; Xen. Anab. i. 2. 6). The cities founded in the time of the Seleucidæ, Apamea (Ἀπάμεια Κιβωτός, formerly Κελαιναί) eastward and Laodicea (Λαοδίκεια ἡ πρὸς τῷ Δύκῳ or ἐπὶ Δύκῳ) about nine miles west of Colossæ, together with Hierapolis which lay about six miles north, outstripped the ancient Colossæ (Strabo, xii. 576). Yet Laodicea did not rise to prominence until just before the time of Christ (Strabo, xii. 578, ἐφ' ἡμῶν καὶ τῶν ἡμετέρων πατέρων), and in Strabo's time (he wrote 18–19 A.D.) Colossæ still shared the prosperity of the neighbouring towns (Strabo, 589, πόλισμα, 576, does not mean necessarily "small town"), and when Pliny (H. N. v. 41) reckons it as one of the oppida celeberrima of Phrygia, we need not understand him as referring simply to historical renown. The great commercial highway which led from Ephesus through the valley of the Mæander, then through that of the Lycus to Apamea, and finally through the Cilician Gates to Tarsus and Syria, passed through both Colossæ and Laodicea (Ramsay, Hist. Geogr. 35 ff.). But Laodicea had the advantage of being at the junction of several roads leading in all directions (Ramsay, Cities and Bishop. i. 1. 12, n. 1). The chief source of its riches, to which reference is made also in Rev. iii. 17, was the trade in the jet-black wool produced in the Lycus valley, which was preferred even to that of Miletus (Strabo, 578). In addition to this was the wool-dyeing industry of Hierapolis, favoured by the nature of the water there, which rivalled the scarlet and purple dyeing of other places (Strabo, 630). Laodicea was also the chief city of the district (conventus) of Cibyra, which belonged to the province of Asia (Plin. H. N. v. 105; cf. Marquardt, *R. Staatsverw.*² i. 341). Theodoret on Col. (ed. Noesselt, 472) calls it the Metropolis of Colossæ. The Church of Laodicea, as being the most important of the three mentioned in Col. iv. 13, is the only one included under the seven Churches of the province addressed in Rev. (i. 11, iii. 14); and even in Col. ii. 1, cf. iv. 13, Laodicea seems to stand for Hierapolis too. A synod occasioned by the Easter disputes met in Laodicea circa 165–170 (Eus. H. E. iv. 26. 3, v. 24. 5; cf. Forsch. iv. 266, v. 26). Yet Hierapolis itself remained famous in Church annals as the long-time home of the "apostle" or rather evangelist Philip and his daughters, and as the episcopal see of Papias and of Claudius Apollinaris (Eus. H. E. ii. 15. 2, iii. 31. 3–5, 36. 2, 39. 9, iv. 26. 1, v. 19. 2, 24. 2). On the other hand, Colossæ falls quite into the background in the tradition. The fortress Χῶραι, built probably under Justinian, about two miles south of Colosse, afterward quite swallowed up that city (Ramsay, Hist. Geogr. 80, 135, 429; Church in R. E. 478). While a bishop of Colossæ still signs with that title the decrees of the Trullan Council of 692 (Harduin, Conc. iii. 1710), there appears at the second Nicene Council of 787 a bishop Dositheus, or Theodosius, of Colossæ or Chonæ (op. cit. iv. 280, 449; cf. 32, 120, 468). Thereafter the name Colossæ disappears. The tradition is handed down merely that Chonæ is the ancient Colossæ, e.g. in the historian Nicetes of Chonæ (ed. Bonn. p. 230) in the thirteenth century. One of the earthquakes frequent in this region (Strabo, xii. 578, 579) may have helped to obliterate Colossæ. Only we may not, with Lightfoot, 71, think of this as happening in the third century. Theodoret, in his hypothesis to Philem. p. 711, thinks he knows that Philemon's house is still standing in Colossæ in his day, and the continued existence of a bishopric of Colossæ without any other name affixed proves the existence of the town until 692 at least. Of the earthquakes about which we have information, only one could have any significance for the N.T. In 60 A.D., according to Tacitus (Ann. xiv. 27, eodem anno; cf. chap. xx. Nerone IV. et Corn. Cosso coss., hence not, as we find it asserted more often, 61 A.D., to which the transition is not made until Ann. xiv. 29), Laodicea was severely damaged by an earthquake, but soon arose by its own resources and without government assistance, which probably had been rendered on a former occasion (Strabo, xii. 579). Unquestionably Eusebius has the same occurrence in mind when he states that in anno Abr. 2079 (63 A.D.), Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colossæ were destroyed by an earthquake (Chron. ii. 154). For the Jewish Sibyllist, about 80 A.D., who knows the ground in Asia Minor, and who speaks just like Tacitus of the destruction and rebuilding of Laodicea (Sib. iv. 107; cf. ZfKW, 1886, S. 37), thus attests indirectly that no like misfortune has again befallen the city between 60 and 80 A.D. Of more importance for us is it that even from the days of Antiochus the Great (Jos. Ant. xii. 3. 4) many Jews had been settling in this region. From the statement of Cicero, pro Flacco, xxviii, that Flaccus, 62 B.C., confiscated in the district of Laodicea Jewish temple tribute to the amount of more than twenty pounds of gold, and in that of Apamea almost a hundred pounds, it has been estimated that in the former district there were over 11,000 free Jewish men, and in the latter 55,000 (Lightfoot, 20; Henle, 53, A. 2). It is unknown, to be sure, how large these two districts were; cf. Ramsay, Cities and Bishop. i. 2. 667. In Hierapolis there was a well-organised Jewish community, cf. Altertümer von Hier. 46, 96 (No. 69), 138 (No. 212), 174 (No. 342). The connection with Jerusalem was fostered, cf. also Acts ii. 10, xxi. 27. Cæsar's decrees of tolerance, issued at the instance of the high priest and prince Hyrcanus II., benefited also the Jews of Laodicea (Jos. Ant. xiv. 10. 20; cf. Schürer, i. 348 [Eng. trans. i. i. 382 f.], iii. 67 f. [Eng. trans. ii. ii. 225 f.]). From Jews of this region the fable spread that the Ararat upon which Noah's ark (κιβωτός) grounded was near Apamea Kibotos: Orac. Sib. i. 261-267; Jul. Afric. Chron. (Routh, *Rel. S.*² ii. 243), and coins of the third century A.D. to be found in Eckhel, iii. 132-139; cf. Schürer, iii. 14 f. (new matter, not in Eng. trans.); Ramsay, op. cit. 669-672.

3. (P. 441.) If in Col. i. 7 we read ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, which is very strongly attested (N*ABD*G, Ambrosiaster), and which has been subsequently altered in old MSS. like N and D into ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν as an easier reading, we are shut up to the conclusion that Epaphras is a servant of Christ among the Colossians for and in place of Paul and Timothy; cf. Philem. 13, ὑπὲρ σοῦ. The notion lying back of this is that properly Paul himself, as apostle of the Gentiles, and especially of the province (Acts xix. 10) to which Colossæ belonged, would have been bound to preach in that city (Col. i. 25). It was a help to him and Timothy for Epaphras to undertake this work. It is not decisive against this interpretation that we have ἐστίν instead of ἐγένετο. Epaphras's service of Christ in behalf of the Churches founded by him still continues; he prays for them constantly, actually toils for them (iv. 12 f.), and has probably been begging Paul to interest himself in them, and to write them a letter of encouragement. Hence the present in i. 7 may be non-temporal, combining past and present. But the ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν seems natural only on the supposition that Epaphras preached in Colossæ and its neighbourhood at the time when Paul and Timothy were working in Ephesus at what they believed to be their task, namely, bringing the gospel to the province of Asia, which included Colossæ, Laodicea, and Hierapolis. The feeling of obligation to preach also in other cities of the province comes out, e.g. in 2 Cor. ii. 12 f., and Acts xix. 10 does not exclude the supposition that Paul himself preached in other cities too; Acts xix. 26 may even seem to favour it. At all events, several Churches beside that of Ephesus sprang up in the province at this time (1 Cor. xvi. 19). That even then the gospel had penetrated as far as the Lycus valley is probable, though it cannot be proved from Acts xix. 10, 26; for aside from the possibility that the expression is hyperbolic, Luke uses "Asia" in a very narrow sense, excluding the whole of Phrygia, and hence the Phrygian cities Colossæ, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, which belonged to the province of Asia (above, p. 186). All that we can infer with complete certainty from Col. i. 4-9, ii. 1, is that Paul, whether on his second and third missionary journeys (above, pp. 188 ff.) or during his three years in Ephesus, had never come to Colossæ or to that Phrygian section of the province of Asia at all. Theodoret (pp. 472, 483), differing from the older commentators (Ambrosiaster, Ephr. Syr., Chrys., Theod. Mops.), thought that Paul (ii. 1) has joined with the Christians of Colossæ and Laodicea, whom he had seen, other Christians whom he had not seen. But the lack of all hint of a contrast ("not only—but also") and the union without distinction in ii. 2 of the Churches indicated in ii. 1, are decisive against this view. Theodoret avoided the force of Col. i. 7 (cf. Eph. iv. 20) by assuming that the Colossians had heard from Epaphras simply of the progress of the gospel in the whole world (cf. i. 6*a*). Perhaps also the Antiochian reading καθὼς καὶ ἐμάθετε, which Theodoret had before him, helped to weaken the sense of the sentence.

4. (P. 442.) For particulars about Mark see Part ix. The designation "nephew of Barnabas" hardly looks like a title for distinguishing him from some other Mark of whom we know nothing, and it is more natural to assume that he was then unknown in Colossæ and the neighbouring towns. On the contrary, they had heard of Barnabas, the older and more famous missionary (cf. also 1 Cor. ix. 6) and joint-founder of the Church in Pisidian Antioch, which was not so very far east of Colossæ. The bare name of the next man mentioned, Jesus, characterises him as a Jew; his surname also, Justus, was common among Jews; cf. Jos. Vita, 9; Acts i. 23 (Joseph Barsabas Justus, confused apparently in the Acts of Paul, ed. Lipsius, p. 108. 14, p. 116. 12, not only with Barnabas, but also with Jesus Justus, GK, ii. 889), and many other examples from literature and inscriptions adduced in Lightfoot, 238. With Hofmann, iv. 2. 148, we may take ἐκ περιτομῆς οὗτοι μόνοι as parenthetic, which is most natural; or, with Bleek, we may consider that οὗτοι μόνοι was added as an afterthought to sharpen the expression. In any event the information here given is not simply that the men just named were Jews, which would be quite needless in the case of the last two, nor is it that these two or three men were Paul's only effective and agreeable fellow-workers, for Epaphras, Luke, and Demas are also called συνεργοί, and two of them are strongly commended (Col. i. 7, iv. 12, 14; Philem. 23 f.). We are shut up to the meaning given above, which had been accepted even by commentators who, like Lightfoot, failed to see the grammatical grounds for their correct exegesis, because they clung to the heavy punctuation after περιτομῆς used before Lachmann's time. But it also follows that none of the other συνεργοί then with Paul were Jews. To except Luke from this number (so Hofmann, iv. 2. 151; Scriptbeveis, ii. 2. 99) is impossible, for he was staying with Paul not only as physician (Col. iv. 14), but also as συνεργός (Philem. 24), and hence must have been mentioned in Col. iv. 11 if he had been a Jew. It is, if possible, still more certain that Epaphras, who is mentioned immediately after iv. 11, was a Gentile. The contrary opinion of Jerome (in Philem. 23, Vallarsi, vii. 762) is based on an unfortunate combination of the designation συναιχμάλωτος with the ancient tradition that Paul's family were carried away captive by the Romans at the taking of Giscala (above, p. 681 f.). All that is open to question is, whether οἱ ὄντες . . . παρηγορία refers to Aristarchus also, as most critics say, or only to Mark and Jesus, as Hofmann holds. Grammatically, we cannot decide how far back the reference of the οἱ extends (cf. Acts xx. 5). But since Aristarchus' relation to Paul and his work has been already sufficiently indicated by συναιχμάλωτός μου, it seems unnatural to refer ver. 11 also to him. The same principle holds in the distribution of epithets in Philem. 23 and 24. Besides, it would be strange for Paul now to assert expressly of such a tried helper that he was not a hindrance to him like others, but a furtherer of his work, and had therefore proved a comfort to him in the trouble which these others had caused. In Philem. 24, Mark, indeed, who was to come to Colossæ shortly, is mentioned, but not Jesus Justus. It is possible to suppose that an original Ἰησοῦς, as indicating him, has disappeared in the Ἰησοῦ of ver. 23, if it has not suggested, indeed, the whole phrase ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, which is exceedingly rare in combination with συναιχμάλωτος, συστρατιώτης, συνεργός μου.

5. (P. 443.) Among others, Reuss, Thiersch, and Weiss decide in favour of Cæsarea as the place where Eph., Col., and Philem. were written; so, too, Hilgenfeld as far as regards Philem., the only one which he considers genuine. The ancient commentators, without exception, and most of the moderns, decide in favour of Rome. At all events, the disposition not to let Paul rest altogether from letter-writing while in Cæsarea is not pertinent here. Neither have we any letter dating from the three years which may lie between 2 Thess. and 1 Cor., and we know of just a single one, which Paul wrote toward the end of this time (1 Cor. v. 9). Paul may have written twenty letters in Cæsarea. One, of which we hear in 2 Pet. iii. 15, probably falls within this period.

6. (P. 443.) According to Jos. Bell. ii. 18. 1, vii. 8. 7 (cf. vii. 8. 7, Niese, 362, "with women and children"), the Jewish population of Cæsarea numbered over 20,000. Though the Gentiles were in the majority there (Bell. iii. 9. 1), the Jewish minority was so large that, until the time of Festus, they could think of claiming the town as Jewish (Ant. xx. 8. 7, 9; Bell. ii. 13. 7). Cæsarea certainly had no more than 60,000 inhabitants.

7. (P. 444.) Acts xxviii. 16, 20, 30 f. According to the ancient Acts of Paul, that apostle, though, to be sure, not until his arrival in Rome the second time, hired a barn outside the city (ed. Lipsius, 104. 4; cf. GK, ii. 889, and below, § 36, n. 10). At any rate, Acts xxviii. 16-31 implies no little attic chamber, but a roomy abode, cf. Acts xix. 9.

8. (P. 444.) Lightfoot, 312, mentions as possible occasions for the acquaintance of Onesimus and Paul: a chance meeting with his fellow countryman Epaphras, destitution and hunger, remembrance of words of Paul which he had once heard in Philemon's house, and pricks of conscience. He also cites Sallust, Catil. xxxvii. 5; Tac. Ann. xv. 44, to show that Rome was the great resort of the rabble.

9. (P. 446.) If the statements of Tacitus and of Eusebius (above, p. 449, line 2 ff.) refer to the same event, and if, as Tacitus says, Laodicea (with the neighbouring towns) recovered straightway from the earthquake of 60 A.D., the lack of any reference to this in letters sent from Rome to this region between the spring of 61 and 63—perhaps not till the autumn of 62, or during the winter of 62–63—is not remarkable. If Eusebius has the right date (63 A.D.), all that we need to assume is that Col. was written before the earthquake, or at least before news of it reached Rome. In no case is there any reason to deny that Tychicus and Onesimus journeyed from Rome to Asia Minor somewhere about the autumn of 62. Then Paul would have thought of the spring of 63 when he wrote Philem. 22.

§ 26. THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

This is the only letter in the N.T. which gives us a glimpse into a Christian household of that time. The father, Philemon, was converted (ver. 19) through the influence of Paul, with whom he became acquainted probably in Ephesus (above, p. 447). The wife and son were also Christians. While Archippus in some regular way served the Colossian Church (Col. iv. 17, p. 446 f., n. 1), his father, Philemon, appears to have assisted more generally in spreading the gospel in his vicinity, because of which service Paul calls him the fellow-worker of Timothy and himself (ver. 1). He must have been a well-to-do citizen of Colossæ, which was at that time a flourishing commercial city. His house served as the meeting-place for a part of the local Church (n. 1). He was in a position where he could show the loyalty of his love to his fellow-believers by a rather wide-reaching beneficence (ver. 5). Only recently he had offered new proof of this practical love to "the saints" (n. 2), of which Paul is able to think only with joyful gratitude.

This liberality on the part of Philemon is emphasised so strongly because Paul is about to make a further demand upon his generosity. His request concerns Onesimus, who, in addition to being unprofitable to his master (ver. 11), had run away, apparently stealing the money necessary for the journey (ver. 18). Now, however, he has been converted through Paul's ministry in Rome, and the apostle seeks to restore him to his Master's house. This made it natural for him to direct the letter to the wife and son and the other Christians accustomed to gather there as well as to Philemon himself (ver. 2 f.), although elsewhere throughout the letter he addresses only the head of the house, with whom the decision of the matter rested (n. 3). All that Paul asks in the letter is that Philemon receive in a kindly spirit the penitent refugee who had now become a fellow-believer with him. He does not ask this in any authoritative way, although he had a right to do so, but in a brotherly spirit (vv. 8-10). No question is raised as to Philemon's right of possession in the future, recognition of which right prevented Paul from retaining Onesimus, to whom he had become attached, and who was peculiarly adapted to serve his personal needs (ver. 13 f.). This is a "fleshly" bond which, far from being annulled by the fellowship "in the Lord" established by faith, is rather sanctified by it. This "fleshly" bond serves also to render their Christian fellowship more individual and hence more intimate (ver. 16). At the most, Paul no more than hints his desire that Philemon give Onesimus his freedom, when he expresses the expectation that Philemon will do more than Paul requests (ver. 21). This expectation, however, is one with his hope that the letter may fully accomplish its purpose. For Paul by no means thinks that at once and of his own accord Philemon will receive the guilty slave with kindness, but uses every means in his power so to dispose him. At the very beginning, where he praises Philemon for his generous brotherly love, by which Paul is encouraged to prefer his request, he does not fail to intimate that he would like to see Philemon make still further progress in this direction (ver. 6, n. 2). The indignation which Philemon had felt at Onesimus' conduct should be mitigated, among other things, by the consideration that now instead of a worthless he has a useful servant (vv. 11, 16). For the money which Philemon had lost through Onesimus' unfaithfulness Paul makes himself personally responsible, this letter in his own hand being formal security for the debt (n. 4). Although, as the added remark indicates, Paul had no idea that Philemon would hold him strictly responsible for the payment of the sum in question, undoubtedly he did intend a humorous thrust at the weak side of this man, who possibly was liberal enough in large matters (vv. 5-7), but inclined to reckon closely in small affairs. Paul continues the same humorous vein, when he adds, "Yes, my brother, I should like to profit at your expense" (n. 5). Some of the salt with which he seasons his own words (Col. iv. 6) he takes for granted in his readers. We observe the same humorous spirit in the request which Paul makes of Philemon, now to make ready for him quarters in his house, when, as a matter of fact, he was anticipating a protracted continuance of his preaching in Rome (Col. iv. 3 f.; Eph. vi. 19 f.), and had said nothing about an immediate journey to Asia in the two contemporaneous letters. The apostle gives himself an invitation to visit the stern householder. It is as if he had said, "I shall find out shortly whether Onesimus, my 'child' (ver. 10), my 'heart' (ver. 12), my beloved brother, has been received by you in the way I requested."

The letter is a striking example of that unaffected art by which Paul was able to touch the heart so as to win to himself and his cause everyone not entirely devoid of feeling (n. 6). The humour of the letter does not lessen its earnestness, nor does its irony affect its warmth. It combines politeness and dignity, recognition of the hard rights of this world with defence of the highest demands for the fuller exercise of Christian love.

The fact that this letter has been declared spurious notwithstanding its wealth of original material (n. 7), and in spite of the lack of all support from tradition and the impossibility of discovering any sufficient motive for its forgery, deserves only to be mentioned (n. 8).

1. (P. 452.) The "congregation in Philemon's house" (ver. 2) cannot be identical either with the ordinary household or with the local Church of Colossæ. In the latter case the address of this letter and of Col. would be the same. Since Colossæ at that time, though surpassed by Laodicea, was by no means decadent (above, p. 448), there is nothing improbable in the Christians' meeting for worship in various houses, as was done in other still larger cities, Ephesus (1 Cor. xvi. 19) and Rome (Rom. xvi. 5, above, p. 430, n. 1). This was the case also in the neighbouring city of Laodicea (Col. iv. 15). The reading αὐτῶν NACP, Copt. (see Lightfoot, 256) is thoughtlessly moulded after Rom. xvi. 5; 1 Cor. xvi. 19; the brethren in Laodicea must have had more than one house. The reading αὐτῆς, B, 67 presupposes that Νύμφαν, as Lachmann for this very reason wished to have it accented, indicates a woman. In the Coptic fragments of the old Acts of Paul (ed. C. Schmidt, p. 30. 19 ff., German trans. p. 54 ff.) a woman is called Nympha, who, together with her husband Hermocrates, had been baptized by Paul in Myrrha (Myra in Lycia). But Nympha is only a Doric form for νύμφη, and no more than this can it be shown elsewhere to be a personal name. Rather should we read Νυμφᾶν (= Nymphodorum, Nymphodotum, etc.), and then αὐτοῦ, with DG and the Antioch recension. The rarity of this masculine name (C. I. Att. iii. 1105, Νυνφας; cf. C. I. G. 1290; C. I. Lat. ii. 557, Nymphas?) occasioned the alteration. Likewise the σοῦ, in Philem. 2, which on other grounds seems peculiar, has been altered, now into αὐτῶν, to imitate Rom. xvi. 5, 1 Cor. xvi. 19; now into αὐτοῦ, from stylistic considerations.

2. (Pp. 452, 454.) In itself οἱ ἅγιοι, ver. 7 (cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 1; 2 Cor. viii. 4, ix. 1, 12), might mean the Jerusalem Christians (Hofmann); but this seems unnatural here so soon after πάντες οἱ ἅγιοι (ver. 5 = all Christians). Besides, if Paul and Timothy had merely heard of a remittance of money to Jerusalem by Philemon, they would hardly have failed to say so (cf. ἀκούων, ver. 5; Eph. i. 15; Col. i. 4, 9; cf. per contra, Phil. iv. 10). The expression, as we have it here, gives the idea that Paul had himself recently perceived the love which Philemon had shown, and which was refreshing the saints. We might have had τῶν ἀδελφῶν here (1 Cor. xvi. 11, 12; 2 Cor. ix. 3; 3 John 3). Philemon knew whom Paul meant. He may have aided with money Christians who were travelling from Asia to Rome, or he may have sent the money by them to help needy ones of his own land and faith in Rome; see also n. 3. According to the correct reading (ἀγάπην before πίστιν), ver. 5 treats of the love and faithfulness which Philemon shows with regard to the Lord Jesus (and) toward all saints. Consequently also the wish (ver. 6), which makes up the content of Paul's prayers for Philemon (ver. 4), can only be that "Philemon's faithful disposition to impart may become effectual by virtue of a knowledge of all the good which it lies in the power of Christians generally (ἐν ἡμῖν) or of him and his house (ἐν ὑμῖν), to do toward Christ."

3. (P. 453.) Aside from the textually uncertain ὑμῖν, ver. 6, the plural address does not appear until ver. 22*b*, and then again in ver. 25, which corresponds to the opening greeting, ver. 3. The reasons for its use are in all cases clear. The joint authorship of Timothy is revealed nowhere but in vv. 1, 2 (ἡμῶν) and again probably in ver. 7 (ἔσχομεν, D* Orig. iii. 889; Jerome vii. 754, from which the Antiochian ἔχομεν has arisen by assimilation to the present tenses before and after it, and ἔσχον by assimilation to the singulars around it. The aorist proves that a single experience of the most recent past is meant; cf. Phil. iv. 10; 2 John 4; 3 John 3; Polyc. ad Phil. i. 1, xi. 1; Forsch. iv. 250). In Col., too, Paul does not simply mention Timothy as one of those who send greetings, but makes him to a certain extent joint-author of the letter (Col. i. 1, 3, 9, hence ἐγὼ Παῦλος, i. 23). But he has a particular reason for so doing in Philem., namely, Timothy's personal acquaintance with Philemon—perhaps also the fact that the matter in question was of a somewhat legal nature. For signing a bond and for drawing up a recommendation for the runaway slave recourse was had to a second witness (2 Cor. xiii. 1).

4. (P. 454.) Concerning autograph writing, see above, p. 172, n. 4. It might be possible, indeed, that ver. 19*a* was a remark written in Paul's own hand on the margin after the letter had been all dictated. In this case ἵνα μὴ λέγω σοί would connect with ver. 18 even more easily than if with Hofmann we take ver. 19*a* as a parenthesis. At all events the σοί after λέγω cannot be a thoroughly superfluous enclitic dative, governed by the verb, but must emphatically express just what Paul could indeed say, but will not say directly (cf. 2 Cor. ix. 4, also 2 Cor. ii. 5). The antithesis required is not, however, to be found in ver. 19*a*, but simply in the ἐμοί, ver. 18. Paul says; "Charge it (not to Onesimus, but) to me," but adds that he could properly say that Philemon should charge it to his own account, and for this reason that he owed Paul not only such trifling sums of money, but also his own self besides, i.e. every personal sacrifice. This somewhat strange thought rests perhaps on the notion that in Philemon's account-book there was no page at all on which Paul was represented as debtor, and that, therefore, it was more natural to enter a little debt of Paul to him upon the page on which his many debts to Paul were registered. He would then quickly see that the balance in favour of Paul was hardly diminished by this little sum.

5. (P. 454.) In all likelihood the words in ver. 11, ἀχρηστος, εὐχρηστος, are suggested not so much by the vulgar pronunciation of Χριστός, Χριστιανός = χρηστός (Baur, Paulus, ii. 91), as by the meaning of the name Ὀνήσιμος. Likewise it is hardly to be doubted that δναίμην, ver. 20, is a play upon the sound of the name. Cf. Ign. Eph. ii. 2, δναίμην ὑμῶν, at the end of an exhortation to obey the bishop, whose name was Onesimus (ibid. i. 3, ii. 1). There are similar plays upon proper names in Theophilus, ad Autol. i. 1, Θεόφιλος—τὸ θεοφιλὲς ὄνομα τοῦτο = Χριστιανός, Eusebius, H. E. iii. 27. 6, Ebion, the poor man; v. 24. 18, Irenæus, the man of peace. Regarding Rev. iii. 1, see § 73, n. 8. There are still other examples in Lightfoot, 340. Paul does not use the polished phrase in the usual sense, "May I have joy in thee," but means it literally.

To confirm the demand hinted at in ver. 19*b*, he openly avows (vai), and says to the strict householder or the carefully calculating merchant, that he on his part would like to make a profit in the transaction with Philemon, instead of letting Philemon get the better of the bargain, as was his wont.

6. (P. 454.) Among the means which Paul uses to induce Philemon to comply with his request belongs also the way in which he refers to his present situation. Four times in this short letter he alludes to his imprisonment (vv. 1, 9, 10, 13), and in the very opening greeting he designates himself, in contrast with the other letters written at the same time, simply as Paul a prisoner of Christ Jesus. In ver. 9, to be sure, it would be unexceptionable grammatically to take τοιούτος—ὥς as correlatives—the view of the ancient Greek commentators (cf. Kühner-Gerth i. 413 A. 11; ii. 493. 4, and Lightfoot). But in that case the present writer could see no reason for ὥς Παῦλος instead of οἷός ἐμι (cf. Acts xxvi. 29); for the name indicates no particular characteristic or situation. Moreover, τοιούτος requires no such correlative when all that is needed is to draw attention to a person's character or situation which was known before (2 Cor. ii. 6; Hofmann, ad loc., compares appropriately, Odyssey, 16. 205). Philemon knows what sort of man Paul is and how circumstanced, and as such Paul makes his plea for Onesimus. This τοιούτος, which thus points by implication to the character of the pleader in all its detail, is explained in the three appositives which follow; for since πρεσβύτης has no article, it cannot be construed as in apposition simply to Παῦλος. He pleads, as Chrysostom (xi. 780) long ago rightly distinguished—(1) as Paul, the friend whom Philemon has known so long and so well; (2) as an old man; (3) as one who now also wears fetters for Christ's sake. But neither the name, nor the great age, nor the imprisonment would show his right to command (ver. 8), in this matter at all events; they are rather intended to characterise the pleader as one whose plea cannot well be refused. Thus Paul here waives altogether his official dignity and the authority growing out of his services. Bentley's conjecture (Crit. Sacra, ed. Ellies, p. 73), πρεσβευτής, which Hort, NT, Appendix, 136, adopted; or Lightfoot's proposal, in which Westcott, in distinction from his fellow-worker, acquiesced, to take πρεσβύτης, after all manner of doubtful analogies, in the sense of πρεσβευτής, sc. Χριστοῦ (cf. 2 Cor. v. 20; Eph. vi. 20), introduces a foreign element which would have been in place only in ver. 8, and even there would have required much clearer expression. The πρεσβύτης as such, and especially when he pleads, has primarily something touching about him; cf. Clem. Quis Div. xli (the plea of the gray-haired John to the erring youth); Passio Perp. v, vi (the gray hair of the father and the helplessness of the child combine to produce an effect). We do not know the year of Paul's birth. If, according to the conjecture expressed above, p. 69, his parents were carried away from Palestine in 4 B.C.,—Paul, however, not being born until after they settled at Tarsus,—still his birth may have taken place in 1–5 A.D. Considering the part which he played in 35 A.D. (Acts vii. 58–viii. 3, ix. 2), he probably was then not a "youth" of twenty, but a young man of about thirty. Consequently in 62 A.D. he must have been at all events near the sixties. His wearing life and long imprisonment may have made him old beyond his years. It was all the more natural, then, to represent himself to his friend expressly as πρεσβύτης.

7. (P. 455.) The circumstances and facts presupposed connect themselves in no way with such of Paul's Epistles as are held by most critics to be genuine or with Acts. The names alone would arouse suspicions in every critic. Philemon and Apphia occur nowhere else in the N.T. Onesimus and Archippus are mentioned in Col. iv. 9, 17. But what is said about them in the one letter touches at no point what is said in the other; it is thus impossible that one of these two Epistles was invented on the basis of the other, or that both were forged by the same man. Some of the names have a local colouring, however. The present writer is unable, indeed, to verify for Phrygia by inscriptions from the time of the Cæsars the ancient names Philemon and Archippus, or the later Epaphras (e.g. C. I. G. 2284; C. I. L. iv. 1384a, 1787, 1816, 1916, 1926, 1936, 2374, 2450, vi. 17174-17180, xv. 2542, contracted form for the very common Epaphroditus, which Ephr. Syr. p. 169 inserts in place of it). Yet cf. Philemon and Baucis in Ovid. Metam. viii. 631; also Aristoph. The Birds, 763. The name Onesimus, which was used especially for slaves, is to be found as often perhaps in Rome (C. I. L. vi. 23459-23484) and Pompeii (C. I. L. iv. 222, 1330, 1332, 2477a, 2777, 3163) as in Phrygia and the bordering regions (C. I. G. 2743, 2840, 2932, 2933, 3827b, t. u., 3859; Sterrett, Wolfe Exp., No. 366, line 108, No. 376, lines 32, 39; cf. Ign. Eph. i; Melito quoted in Eus. H. E. iv. 26. 13). On the other hand, Apphia is a Phrygian name, and has nothing to do with Appius, Appia. The spelling varies between Αφφια (C. I. G. 2775b, 2782, 2835, 2837b, 2950, 3432, 3446; Ramsay, Cities and Bishop. i. 391, 470, Nos. 254, 309), Αφφια (C. I. G. 3814, 4141; Le Bas-Waddington, iii. Nos. 799, 911; Ramsay, pp. 394, 473, 559, 662, Nos. 276, 324, 445, 624), and Αφια (C. I. G. 2720, 3826; Wolfe Exp. Nos. 482). Likewise the diminutive form Αφφιον (C. I. G. 2733, 2836; Ramsay, pp. 385, 391, 520, 525, Nos. 228, 254, 257, 361, 369) or Αφιον (Le Bas-Waddington, No. 832). Derived feminine forms are Αφφιας (C. I. G. 3697, 3983) and Αφφιας (see below), like Αμμιας (=Αμμια, Forsch. v. 95, according to which also C. I. G. 9916 should be read without emendation). Of especial interest to us are C. I. G. vol. iii. p. 1168, No. 4380, k 3, 'Αφφιάδι . . . γένει Κολοσσηνῇ, and Wolfe Exp. No. 482, 'Ονήσιμος 'Αφφία γυναίκι. A legend of Titus mentions an Apphia healed by Paul in Damascus (James, Apocrypha Anecd. i. 55). Outside of Phrygia and the neighbouring regions the name seems to be rare, cf. C. I. L. v. 5380 (Como), ix. 290 (Bari: Apphiadis). The conclusion that Onesimus became a diaconus Jerome drew simply from Philem. 13 (Epist. lxxxii. 6, Vall. i. 516, cf. vii. 755, minister apostoli). The real Euthalius (Zacagni, Coll. mon. 528; cf. Ignatii Mart. MS. Vatic. chap. x. p. 314, 30 in the writer's Ignatius von Antiochien) knew of a martyrdom of Onesimus, according to which he suffered death under an exarch Tertullus in Rome by having his legs broken. However, it does not pay to unravel the confused statements of martyrologies and legends (Acta SS. Febr. ii. 855-859, cf. Acta Xanthippæ et Polyxenæ, cap. xxxviii, in James, Apocr. Anecd. i. 84).

8. (P. 455.) Baur, Paulus, ii. 88-94, brought forward essentially nothing against the genuineness of this Epistle except its close relation to Eph., Col., and Phil. (S. 89), which he rejected on other grounds. He rested satisfied with the possibility that it was the "embryo of a Christian work of fiction," just as the pseudo-Clementine Homilies are really a Christian romance (S. 93). Weizsäcker rejects it as a "production designed to illustrate a new doctrine of Christian living, and betraying its allegorical character in the very name Onesimus," as if the letter propounded a doctrine of the "usefulness" of a Christian slave, or of the "profitableness" of running away. Concerning the names see nn. 5 and 7. Moreover, cf. Deissmann, Bibelst. 237 (Eng. trans. 44), "to a large extent doctrinaire want of taste." Steck (JhfPTh. 1891, S. 571) takes offence, among other things, because this little note about a private matter has all the form of an epistle to a Church. He does not refute, or even consider the very simple explanations of the mention of Timothy, and of the household congregation (above, pp. 453, 456, n. 3). Moreover, without even reflecting that a knowledge of Latin literature was something very rare among the Greeks, Steck will have it (S. 576) that his pseudo-Paul drew in imitative fashion from Plin. Ep. ix. 21 (intercession for a freedman, cf. ix. 24), which Grotius, on Philem. 10 and 17, adduced as a parallel, and that he did this in the second quarter of the second century (S. 582). Marcion forbids a later date for its composition; for he "is believed to have known it" (S. 575), which is Steck's incomparably delicate way of stating the fact that Marcion admitted it unchanged into his Apostolicum. Holtzmann (ZfWTh. 1873, S. 428-441) extended his view of Col. (see below, § 29) to include Philem. also. A genuine letter to Philemon was interpolated by the same man who interpolated Col. and forged Eph. The difficulty of the construction in vv. 4-6 (above, p. 455 f., nn. 2, 3), which Holtzmann exaggerates without even attempting an explanation of his own, is due, he holds, to the fact that vv. 4-6 (= Eph. i. 15-17) were inserted later. This, at least, seems to be the meaning of the discussion, S. 433-435, though according to S. 439, where it is remarked in favour of the genuineness of ver. 7, that that verse connects naturally with ver. 4, ver. 4 seems to pass for genuine. A motive for the interpolation, which certainly could not consist in making the text hard to understand, is not to be found; nor is it explained what occasioned the remarkable position of ἀγάπη before πίστις (apparently no trace of this in Eph. i. 15), or the reference of ἐπίγνωσις to something altogether different from that in Eph. i. 17. The real parallel to this is to be found in Phil. i. 9 f. Further, if the words, "Timothy the brother," and "our fellow-worker," and "Archippus our fellow-soldier" were inserted in order to conform Philem. to Col. (S. 437 f.), this very object needs a further object as a means to which it should serve. Now, according to Holtzmann, Col. iv. 15-17 was inserted there by the same editor who enriched Philem. by these additions; so that the whole figure of Archippus is a creation of this interpolator's. But who will admit that he is satisfied with the statement (S. 438) that Archippus was invented simply as "a sort of personal connection between the situations in the two Epistles"? And why should not the alleged interpolator have rather taken persons whom he found in the letters, Jesus Justus, Col. iv. 11, and Apphia, Philem. 2, and, by carrying them over from one letter to the other, have used them to link the two Epistles together? "Nemo tam otiosus fertur stilo, ut materias habens fingat" (Tert. adv. Valent. v).

§ 27. THE EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS.

Simultaneously with the letter to the portion of the Colossian Church accustomed to gather at the house of Philemon, Paul despatches a communication to the Church as a whole. It is natural to assume that both letters reached their destination at the same time. This could have happened if this letter to the Church, like the letter to Philemon, was brought by Onesimus, who did not, like Tychicus, have commissions to carry out elsewhere, but was certainly directed by Paul to return to his master by the shortest route.

Inasmuch as Paul directs the Church to see that this letter is read also in the Church at Laodicea (iv. 16), and since, moreover, in the passage where he passes from more general statements to the discussion of special conditions, Paul speaks of the Christians of Laodicea and Colossæ together (ii. 1), the inference is natural that the letter was intended originally for both these neighbouring Churches. From the absence of a similar remark with reference to the Church in Hierapolis, which was in the same neighbourhood, and just as near as Laodicea and Colossæ to the heart of Epaphras, the missionary of this region (iv. 13), it is supposable that the special conditions and dangers which led Paul to send this letter to Colossæ, and indirectly to Laodicea, were not yet present in Hierapolis.

Paul was not personally acquainted with the Churches in the vicinity of Colossæ any more than with the Colossian Church itself. In fact, with the exception of individuals like Philemon and Epaphras, he was personally unknown to them all (i. 4, 8, 9, ii. 1, 5). Nevertheless, he reckons them, as it were, in his apostolic diocese, for in organising them Epaphras had acted as his representative (i. 7, above, p. 449, n. 3). His vocation, and the sufferings which this vocation involves, are consequently on their behalf also (i. 24). They are objects of his thanksgiving and petition not merely in the sense in which all Christians are (i. 3, 9), but he is solicitous for their welfare in the same way as Epaphras, their founder (ii. 1 v. 12).

Since, now, he has been more definitely informed concerning these Churches by Epaphras, and had learned also that they feel a "spiritual" love for him though he is personally unknown to them (i. 8), it would appear that the necessity for deepening this relation were sufficient occasion for a letter. Such an occasion might explain adequately the contents of Col. i. 3, 4; but it does not explain why Paul did not address the letter to all the Christians in Colossæ, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, and perhaps also other cities in that region (ii. 1); or, if Colossæ was the centre of this group of Churches, why he did not at least address the neighbouring Churches and the principal Church together, using some such general expression in the salutation as that in 2 Cor. i. 1. And, as will be shown later, simultaneously with the letter to the local Church in Colossæ and the letter to the Church in Philemon's house, Paul despatched by Tychicus to this region still a third Epistle, which was intended for more general circulation. There must have been special conditions, therefore, existing only in Colossæ and to some extent also in Laodicea, which called for the writing of the Colossian letter. What these conditions were we learn in chap. ii., the special contents of which are led up to in various ways by chap. i. and echoed in chap. iii. In chap. i. Paul designated himself not only a διάκονος τοῦ εὐαγγελίου (i. 23), i.e. a missionary, but also a διάκονος τῆς ἐκκλησίας (i. 25), which is something quite different. When, in this connection, he speaks of the stewardship of God committed to him, he cannot mean his commission to preach the gospel, but only some calling that has reference to the existing Church. More definitely stated, it is a commission to declare fully the word of God which the Church had received by faith, and, more specifically still, to declare fully the secret of God made known to the saints, and especially revealed in all its fulness to the Gentile Church (n. 1). This πληρῶσαι τὸν λόγον, like the first λαλεῖν τὸν λόγον, i.e. the missionary preaching, is a making known of Christ, who in His person is this μυστήριον of God (i. 26–29, cf. ii. 2). Still this is not the preaching of an unknown person, but primarily the unfolding of the forces and norms of the moral life contained in the gospel which has been believed, and such instruction in varied knowledge as will bring the Christian personality to a well-rounded perfection. In view of the fact that Paul declares with emphasis here, and three times elsewhere, in the letter that this commission affects everyone,—naturally every Christian, and more specifically, according to ver. 27, every Gentile Christian (i. 28),—and that he makes every effort in his power to fulfil it (i. 29), it is evident that here, at the very outset, he is answering the criticism that he is satisfied to leave the Churches in his field of labour with only an imperfect declaration of the divine word; that he is not careful enough to instruct new converts in the full richness of Christian knowledge, and to guide them in the development toward Christian perfection; that, in relation to at least many of the Churches for which he is responsible, he shows a lamentable lack of concern in this matter.

What he meant by these apologetic remarks, and what his object was in making them, Paul states very clearly in ii. 1–5, which is intended to explain what precedes (n. 2). He will have the Christians in Colossæ and vicinity know that he has always recognised the obligation of Christian nurture in relation to all the Churches within his sphere of labour, and that, as is evidenced by his zealous effort in general, he is now very much concerned for them, to the end that their hearts may be strengthened through loving instruction received, and by their introduction to the full richness of Christian understanding, namely, the full knowledge of the secret of God, which is Christ. The expression used (ἀγῶνα ἔχω, ii. 1 = κοπιῶ ἀγωνιζόμενος, i. 29, cf. iv. 12, 13; 1 Tim. iv. 10) cannot properly be limited in meaning to prayer (i. 9). There are circumstances in which the person absent in body (ii. 5) cannot do much more than pray for the loved ones at a distance. But Paul has other means of showing that he is anxious to develop these far-distant Churches to the highest point of Christian knowledge and morality, e.g. by the present sending of Tychicus and the writing of the letters which Tychicus and Onesimus were to bring (iv. 8). From his remark in ii. 4 that he makes this statement in order that none of the Colossians may be deceived by persuasive words, we learn that effort had been made to induce the Church to believe that Paul did not concern himself about their Christian nurture. It does not require much imagination to conceive how the matter was put. There was no need to slander the apostle. All that was necessary was to point out how in the early years of his ministry he had no sooner founded a Church than he restlessly pressed forward to some new mission station, and how now for a number of years he had been in prison, first in Cæsarea, and now in the more distant Rome. We can see also how such remarks were well adapted to prepare the way for a doctrine which promised to lead beyond the crude beginnings of faith which had resulted from the preaching of Paul and of Paul's disciple, Epaphras, to a deeper knowledge and a fuller sanctification. Paul opposes this teaching in ii. 8-23.

The most obvious conclusion to be drawn from this series of warnings is that the false teachers, whose dangerous influence Paul here opposes, had given the Colossian Christians regulations, more especially negative rules about food and drink, and commandments about the observation of fasts, new moons, and Sabbaths (ii. 16, 20 f.). At the same time they criticised the Colossians for not having observed these regulations heretofore, declaring that if they persisted in their former way of living they could not attain blessedness nor indeed Christian perfection (n. 3). In opposition to this derogatory judgment of the Colossians' Christianity, Paul assures them that in Christ, as He has been preached to them and received by them through faith, they possess all essential blessings (ii. 10), and that this Christ is at once the source and the foundation of a life well pleasing to God (ii. 6 f.). Although they do need the prayers and the care of the apostle and of his helpers in order to attain the fullest Christian knowledge and the highest moral culture (i. 9-11, 28 f., ii. 1-5), there is, on the other hand, no necessity that they be brought to this state of full knowledge and true morality through doctrines entirely new to them.

The very mention of the Sabbath proves that the representatives of this doctrine belonged to Judaism. And only by assuming that he is speaking in opposition to such representatives of the circumcision, is it possible to explain why Paul reminds these Colossian Christians, who had been converted from heathenism, that in baptism they have received a circumcision which in comparison with that of the Jews is much more comprehensive and more fundamentally sanctifying (ii. 11-13, cf. i. 21). Similarly, what he says in ii. 14 about the setting aside through the death of Christ of the law as evidence of our guilt and as an accusation against us, and in ii. 17 of the ordinances of the law as being only the foreshadowing of the real blessings which have appeared in Christ, is manifestly directed against a Judaism which held firmly to the law. That the representatives of this propaganda were at the same time Christians, or pretended to be, is self-evident, otherwise they could never have come to exert a dangerous influence in a Gentile Christian Church. This is clear also from ii. 19. For only one who acknowledged Christ to be the head of the Church (i. 18) could be criticised for not retaining his connection with this head. Similarly, the criticisms of Paul, and of the defec-tiveness of the Christianity of the Pauline Churches (above, p. 462 f.) to be inferred from ii. 1-5, presuppose the Christian profession of the false teachers. They were Jewish Christians. But they did not teach simply the obligation of Gentile Christians to keep the Mosaic law. If, like the false teachers in Galatia, they had demanded of the Gentile Christians submission to the law, and the unconditional acceptance of circumcision, it is certain that Paul would have fought this radical demand directly and fundamentally, instead of contenting himself as he does with the statement of certain incidental consequences of their principal demand. The emphasis which Paul lays upon the spiritual circumcision of the Gentile Christians (ii. 11) is fully explained, and in its setting can only be explained on the assumption that the false teachers made the Gentile Christians feel the superiority of their Jewish training, religious and moral (Rom. ii. 17-29; 2 Cor. xi. 22). Furthermore, the regulations which they laid upon the Gentile Christians and by which they criticised the manner in which the Gentile Christians had been living, were not simply the Mosaic commandments and restrictions (n. 4). The reference is rather to regulations which, though derived from the Mosaic law in their most essential parts, were less comprehensive than the law, while in other parts they were more elaborate. This was why Paul was able to call these δόγματα (ii. 20, δογματίσεις), commandments and teaching of men (ii. 22 after Isa. xxix. 13, cf. Matt. xv. 9), thereby distinguishing them from the δόγματα (ii. 14) of the revealed law, and in general to treat them with the contempt that he does in ii. 20-23.

The means by which this doctrine of men works its treacherous effects is declared in ii. 8 to be philosophy. In the same passage also it is said that the traditions of men, which those who would lead them astray establish as a norm, have as their standard not Christ, but the elements of the world (n. 5). Assuming in the light of ii. 16-23 that by παράδοσις τῶν ἀνθρώπων in ii. 8 is meant a summary of moral-ascetic rules (cf. Mark vii. 3-13; Matt. xv. 2-6; 1 Cor. xi. 2; 1 Thess. ii. 15, iii. 6), it follows that the false teachers must have based their demands for abstinence from certain foods and drinks upon some theory relative partly to the materials out of which they were composed, and by which their consistency was maintained, and partly to the effects of these materials upon those who used them. Their regulations regarding abstinence they derived from their theory that even the life of the Christian was interwoven with that of nature, and that mental and spiritual life were dependent upon matter (ii. 20). Only by asceticism, they argued, was it possible for the Christian to obtain the adequate freedom from matter and the forces by which matter is ruled. If these ascetic tendencies were like those common in antiquity, particularly if they resembled those with which Paul has to do in Rom. xiv., there can be little doubt that chief among the things forbidden by the false teachers were meat and wine, the forms of nourishment which were the heartiest and which tended most to arouse the passions. A further element in their teaching is disclosed by the fact that, in the midst of his polemic against these teachers, Paul takes occasion to emphasise the truth that Christ is exalted above all spiritual powers (ii. 10, cf. i. 16), and by his further statement that the God who has become manifest in Christ has stripped off from Himself the ruling spirits which hitherto had concealed Him from the gaze of men, and has openly shown as a conqueror would do in a triumphal procession that these spirits have been subdued and are subordinate to Him (ii. 15). It is evident that the false teachers claimed that the power of the spirit-princes, deified in the heathen world, continued to be exerted over Christians. Their harmful influence is not limited to idolatrous worship (1 Cor. x. 14-22; 2 Cor. vi. 14 f.), but the connection between them and matter in general, or the separate elements of matter, is so close that the Christian who lives in the world, particularly the Christian who lives in the unclean heathen world, is able to escape the destructive influence of these spirit-powers that rule over matter only by stern asceticism and merciless mortifying of the body (ii. 23). It was with this in view that Paul testified to the Colossians earlier in the letter (i. 12 f.) that through the call of the gospel, which they had accepted by faith, God had made them capable of sharing the heavenly inheritance of the Church, at the same time releasing them, as He did all Christians, from the dominion of the powers of darkness, and translating them into the kingdom of His beloved Son. Consequently what is said further with reference to Christ (i. 14-23) is not a speculative outburst, more or less relevant, but in every particular is determined by opposition to this unwholesome teaching about sanctification and to the dualistic view of the world underlying it, and is designed to remind the readers of the common principles of the Christian faith. Christians have no further need to redeem themselves, for in the forgiveness of sin bestowed upon them by Christ they have redemption (i. 14). Nor is there any world independent of Christ and of the God who finds His image in Christ, and who dwells in Him. The worlds of matter and of spirit alike are in Christ, the first-begotten of all creatures, and were created through Him and for Him (i. 15-17). True, this ideal relation established at creation is not yet entirely realised. But in the Church, which is the existing form of the kingdom of Christ, the risen Christ has now a body of which He is the sole head, and this is the hopeful beginning of the restoration of the world to harmony under His headship (i. 18). By the same death of Jesus on the cross through which the Gentiles, who once were strangers to God and

hostile to Him, have been brought into relations of peace with Him (i. 21), all discord in the world has been fundamentally overcome (i. 20). Consequently, in order to be holy in the sight of Christ, blameless and unaccused, Christians only need to hold fast without wavering their faith in the gospel which offers the hope of a final consummation of all things (i. 22 f.). Thus the statements of i. 12-23 are seen to be in harmony with the picture of the false teachers who had come among the Colossians, which we get from the clearer statements of chap. ii.; whereas to admit that the old interpretation is correct, according to which these teachers are represented in ii. 18 as worshipping angels, would be to introduce into the picture an incongruous element (n. 6). In the first place, it is hardly conceivable that Paul should have merely mentioned incidentally what to him and to every orthodox Jew and Christian of the apostolic age must have seemed a form of idolatry as being simply a hobby of these false teachers, instead of warning the Colossians against such idolatry. It is hard to see, moreover, how the charge of angel-worship could be associated with the charge of groundless vanity and worldly arrogance, without, at least, a hint that there was no connection between the two. Equally difficult to explain is the fact that when he comes to speak of this θρησκεία a second time (ii. 23) the angels are not mentioned at all, but this supposed cult is simply charged with arbitrariness. Finally, in both passages θρησκεία is very closely connected with ταπεινοφροσύνη, being dependent upon the same preposition. Naturally the meaning here cannot be that feeling of humility so highly praised by Paul (Col. iii. 12; Eph. iv. 2; Phil. ii. 3; cf. Acts xx. 19; Phil. ii. 8; Matt. xi. 29), but only an outward demeanour which could be associated with the worldly haughtiness of which these same persons are accused. The word is not used by Paul in this sense, and if taken by him from the sayings of the false teachers (n. 7), we should naturally expect it to be qualified in some way, especially where he uses it for the first time, i.e. we should expect τῶν ἀγγέλων to go with ταπεινοφροσύνη as well as with θρησκεία. This is the most natural construction grammatically, for otherwise the ἐν would be repeated before θρησκεία. Therefore the genitive τῶν ἀγγέλων stands in the same relation to both conceptions. But now if by ταπεινοφροσύνη τῶν ἀγγέλων can be meant such a demeanour as is adapted to or possible for angels, and for this reason is not adapted to men who have bodies, the same is true also of θρησκεία τῶν ἀγγέλων. The former denotes self-mortification, the latter a form of devotion, a manner of living in which men endeavour as far as possible to imitate spirits, which neither eat nor drink (n. 7). Whoever undertakes to do this certainly attempts a dangerous feat and betrays an unreasonable vanity, because he undertakes what in the nature of man and the conditions of his life is impossible. Although these ascetic practices are supposed to honour God, as a matter of fact they honour no one; they simply serve to gratify that worldly pride in which they have their source (ii. 23, cf. 18). Jewish pride, heightened by an ascetic austerity, by means of manifold judgments, verdicts, prescriptions, and instructions, had made a moral impression upon the uncircumcised Christians in Colossæ from which Paul endeavours to free them.

It has already been shown that this purpose not only dominates the discussions of chap. ii., but also determines the progress of thought in chap. i. in many ways, also the choice of language. It also dominates entirely the exhortations of iii. 1-17. In contrast with the misleading instructions regarding sanctification, against which the Church was warned in chap. ii., Paul now sets forth wherein genuine Christian sanctification consists. It is based not upon speculative investigation and arbitrary distinctions between the material elements and forces in the world, but upon fellowship with the Christ who has been raised from the dead and exalted to share with God dominion over the world (iii. 1-4). In the Christian life the significant thing is not the distinction between circumcised Jews and uncircumcised Greeks or barbarians, but a second birth or new creation constantly appropriated anew (iii. 9-11). The readers must not permit themselves to be disturbed by outside criticisms (ii. 16, 18), but are to let the peace which comes from Christ have exclusive rule in their hearts, where He dwells, and allow all questions to be decided under its influence (iii. 15). If they give the word which comes from Christ proper chance to unfold in all its richness, they will not need to be instructed from outside by worldly wisdom (ii. 8), but will be able adequately to instruct and to correct one another (iii. 16). And the consciousness of the grace which they have experienced will produce not only proper feelings for the government of their intercourse among themselves (iii. 12-14), but also a sense of gratitude to God which will find joyful expression in inward thanksgiving and in all that they say and do (iii. 15*b*, 16*b*, 17). That in the exhortations which follow relative to mutual obligations within the home, by far the most space should be given to the discussion of the relation between slaves and their masters (iii. 22-iv. 1), is natural in view of the contents of the letter to Philemon which was sent simultaneously with that to Colossæ. But, taking the section (iii. 18-iv. 6) as a whole in its exhortation against all bitterness, especially against everything that might cause bitterness (iii. 19, 21, iv. 1), its further reminder of the necessity of thanksgiving which is to be a part of every prayer (iv. 2), and its exhortation to the use of polite language in their intercourse with their non-Christian neighbours (iv. 6), there is presented the attractive picture of a joyful Christian life lived in the midst of an evil world, which contrasts favourably with the gloomy asceticism which Paul has been combating in the earlier sections of the letter. Between the tendency opposed in chap. ii., indeed throughout this entire Epistle,—and the Judaisers who once disturbed the Churches in the adjacent province of Galatia, or the followers of Peter who carried on their work in Corinth, there is no discoverable relation. There is nothing to indicate that the teachers who caused confusion in Colossæ came from abroad. It is altogether improbable that members of the Jewish monastic order of the Essenes, who were settled in Palestine, would have come to Colossæ (n. 8). False ascetic movements, such as Paul combats in Col. ii.,—movements quite independent of these orders,—are to be found among the Jewish Christians in Rome (above, p. 366 f., 376) and the readers of Hebrews. Of the large Jewish population in the district of Laodicea (above, p. 448, n. 2), there were probably some who became members of the Christian Church in Colossæ, and among these there may have been those who were ascetic in their tendencies, who had some philosophic training, and who were dissatisfied with the simple gospel preached by Epaphras, and with the resultant type of life among the Gentile Christians. Possibly there was an individual of some importance (n. 9) who started the whole movement that caused Epaphras so much trouble, and that it was this that influenced Paul to send a special letter to Colossæ, at the same time he despatched a circular letter of a more general character to the larger group of Churches, of which this Church was one.

1. (P. 461.) The metaphor of οἰκονομία, οἰκονόμος is applied in 1 Cor. ix. 17 to the calling of the missionary preacher; on the contrary, it refers here, as in Tit. i. 7 (cf. 1 Tim. i. 4, iii. 4f., 15; Luke xii. 42; Matt. xvi. 19, xxv. 45) to a service to the Church. The two ideas are not distinguished in 1 Cor. iv. 1; Eph. iii. 2–9. The expression πληρῶσαι τὸν λόγον τοῦ θεοῦ, i. 25, finds its analogy, so far as form is concerned, in Rom. xv. 19; 2 Tim. iv. 17. But there the fulness of the gospel or of the preaching which is attained, or is to be attained, refers to the extent of territory in which the gospel is to be preached. Here the matter in hand is not missionary preaching to the unconverted at all, but the word of God, as the “servant of the Church” should offer it to the members of the Church, and as these should constantly appropriate it (cf. iii. 16; Jas. i. 21; 1 Pet. ii. 2; 2 Pet. ii.

12; 1 Cor. ii. 6, xii. 8; 2 Tim. ii. 15, iv. 2). The antithesis to the incompleteness which πληρῶσαι indicates is expressed also by the διδάσκειν ἐν πίσσῃ σοφίᾳ, i. 28 (cf. ii. 2, iii. 16), and the moral aim of this complete introduction to the knowledge of Christianity was expressed before, i. 9 f.

2. (P. 462.) Since Paul is not sending a treatise to the Colossian Church, but is writing them a letter, the present writer takes it as self-evident that the general statements in i. 25-29 are there for the sake of the particular statements in ii. 1-5, and not vice versa. Naturally the connection by means of γάρ does not hinder this interpretation, and the phrase θέλω ὑμᾶς εἰδέναι (1 Cor. xi. 3; Phil. i. 12)=οὐ θέλω ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν (Rom. i. 13, xi. 25; 1 Cor. x. 1, xii. 1; 1 Thess. iv. 13), gives to the statement thus introduced a peculiar weight. In ver. 2 συμβιβασθέντες ἐν ἀγάπῃ cannot mean "knit together in love" (cf. ii. 19; Eph. iv. 16); for (1) it would have to be taken at best as a result of the encouragement, which, however, is not permitted by the syntax of the sentence; (2) the conception of a loving union of the members of the Church is entirely foreign to the thought in the context; (3) we should not know what to do with the following καί, the genuineness of which is undoubted. Here, then, συμβιβάζειν with a personal object has no essentially different meaning from the common one, "to teach, advise" (Ex. iv. 12-15; Lev. x. 11; Isa. xl. 13, 14; cf. 1 Cor. ii. 16), and so "to induce" to a particular act or motion (Acts xix. 33). At the same time, the basic meaning of βιβάζειν, "to cause to go," is brought out, so that συμβιβάζειν means "so to set one in motion that he shall choose and keep to a definite way, without turning to right or left" (cf. Ps. xxxii. 8). Hence also a goal may be mentioned (εἰς πᾶν πλοῦτος) to which one is directed, or a region into which he is led. καί must mean "also," cf. Hofmann, iv. 2. 51. Since the mere assurance that all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge were hidden in Christ, guards in no way against the danger of being misled by a speculation which ignored Christ, and since this misleading is not discussed at all until ver. 8, ver. 4 cannot refer to the subordinate clause in ver. 3, but to the main sentence, vv. 1, 2. In no other way can the progression in ver. 5 be explained.

3. (P. 464.) The reading in ii. 16, presupposed probably by the ancient Syrians (S¹, Ephr. Comm. in Epist. Pauli, Lat. ed. Mechith. p. 175), κινῶν instead of κινέτω, which Lagarde, Proph. Chaldaïce, p. li, recommended, has against it not only the analogy of Rom. xiv. 3, 4, 10, 13, but also the construction ἐν βρώσει instead of περὶ βρώσεως κτλ. Moreover, καταβραβεύειν, ver. 18, is also a sort of κρίνειν. It indicates originally, at any rate, like βραβεύειν (Col. iii. 15) and παραβραβεύειν (Plutarch, Mor. 535 C, the unfair decision of an umpire; Polyb. xxiv. 1. 12, of any judge), an action of the βραβεύς, βραβευτής, or ἀγωνοθέτης, and that, too, of a character unfavourable to the contestant. This word, which occurs very seldom in literature (Demosth. c. Midiam, p. 544; Eusthat. Schol. in Il. i. 402 f., p. 93, ὡς οἱ παλαιοὶ λέγουσιν; ibid. De Thessal. Capta, ed. Tafel, 277), and which Jerome wrongly considered a Cilician provincialism (Epist. cxxi, Vall. i. 879), may have been used to denote various other relationships without much regard for its original meaning; but we have no cause for assuming that such was the case here; for Paul elsewhere, in using figures taken from the games, shows what a lively conception of these he had (1 Cor. ix. 24-27; Phil. iii.

14; 2 Tim. ii. 5, iv. 7 f.). Taking this word alone, we might conclude, quite consistently with this view, that Paul was here exhorting members of the Church not to allow themselves to be actually robbed of the blessedness set before them, for which as a prize they were wrestling or running (cf. Rev. iii. 11); for the umpire's judgment decides whether or not the prize shall be received. But this interpretation is here excluded by the connection and by the nature of the question. In the spiritual contest God or Christ alone in reality confers the βραβεῖον (1 Cor. ix. 24; Phil. iii. 14), the στέφανος (1 Cor. ix. 25; 2 Tim. iv. 8; Jas. i. 12; Rev. ii. 10). Men who arrogate to themselves the κρίνειν, βραβεύειν, καταβραβεύειν, and δογματίζειν, can, by presuming thus to deprive a contestant of his prize, render him in the highest degree discouraged, fearful—in general, confused. The Colossians should let no one treat them thus.

4. (P. 465.) The priests must abstain from wine and other intoxicants before serving in the sanctuary (Lev. x. 9), likewise the Nazarites as long as their vow lasted (Num. vi. 2-4); cf. Luke i. 15, and above, p. 376 on Rom. xiv.; though general restrictions as to drink are not given in the Law.

5. (P. 466.) Although τὰ στοιχεῖα frequently denotes heavenly bodies, especially planets (cf. Valesius on Eus. H. E. iii. 31. 3; perhaps 2 Pet. iii. 10, certainly Just. Apol. ii. 5, τὰ οὐράνια στ.; Dial. xxiii; Theoph. ad Autol. i. 4, 5, 6, ii. 15; Clem. Hom. x. 25), it cannot denote these in ii. 8, 20; Gal. iv. 3, 9, because of the added τοῦ κόσμου. Further, it is not the observance of festivals, which, it is true, depends upon the course of the heavenly bodies, but the abstinence from certain kinds of food, a custom having nothing whatever to do with sun, moon, and stars, which is designated in ii. 20 f. as incompatible with ἀπεθάνετε ἀπὸ τῶν στοιχείων τ. κ., ii. 20 f. Paul understands by τὰ στοιχεῖα τ. κ., nothing else but the κόσμος itself, and this as composed of manifold material elements. This is shown by the exchange of the one expression for the other in ii. 20 (cf. iii. 2), and confirmed by a comparison of this passage with Gal. vi. 14. Latterly the view has been constantly gaining ground that Paul means here and in Gal. iv. 3, 9 the elemental spirits, or particularly the spirits animating the heavenly bodies (Klöpffer, Kol. 360-389; Spitta, Zw. Petr. 260-270; Ebeling, Paul. Angelologie, 65-74, 92-96. Whom also Diels unfortunately followed in his otherwise so instructive writing, Elementum, 1899). But this meets an insuperable obstacle in the expression itself; for while it is quite conceivable that "substances, elements," came to mean "bodies, heavenly bodies," it is incredible that it should serve to indicate its opposite, the spirits animating the substances or ruling the bodies. The confused late Christian Testament of Solomon (Fabric. Cod. pseudep. vet. Test. 1047, cf. Ebeling, 70; Schürer, iii. 304 [Eng. trans. ii. iii. 154]), in which the evil spirits call themselves τὰ λεγόμενα στοιχεῖα (Col. ii. 8), οἱ κοσμοκράτορες τοῦ κόσμου τούτου (Eph. vi. 12), and also στοιχεῖα τοῦ κοσμοκράτορος τοῦ σκότους, is palpably dependent upon misconstrued passages of the N.T., and for this reason alone cannot attest a usage which Paul may have followed. Cf. ZKom. Gal. 195 ff., 208 f. From Col. ii. 15 and the other passages in which Paul speaks of (good or evil) spiritual powers (i. 13, 16, 20, ii. 10), it follows simply that the false teachers ascribed to these a power to which Christians also were subject as inhabitants of the material world, in spite of their redemption through Christ. Since these false teachers were Jews, it becomes certain that they regarded material nature as the spirits' special province, and that therefore they viewed asceticism as a means of emancipation, not only from matter, but also from the power of the spirits who ruled in it. The exegetical difficulties of ii. 10-15, which Hofmann was the first to handle, on the whole happily, can be touched upon here only lightly. The "better commentators" (Klöpper, 422), among whom none of the Greeks from Origen down are reckoned, nor Lightfoot and Hofmann—at whose head rather Ambrosiaster and Jerome are placed—are of the opinion that ἀπεκδύεσθαι, ii. 15, contrary to all usage (Col. iii. 9, ii. 11, cf. iii. 10 and ἐκδύεσθαι, ἐνδύεσθαι, δύνεσθαι everywhere else), means here to strip from another his clothing or armour, to disarm him. This opinion, beyond all others, seems to the present writer an inexcusable caprice. God did not rob the spiritual powers of their clothing or their weapons, but stripped from Himself these spirits who were enveloping Him as a garment or a mist, and were hiding Him from the sight of men. It was not, however, to Israel, but to the Gentile world, that God was veiled by these spiritual powers, these λεγόμενοι θεοί (1 Cor. viii. 5). It was in the Gentile world, then, that God put these away from Himself and showed Himself in His true form to the Gentiles who had been too blind to see Him, thus at the same time setting these sham gods in their true light, while in Christ He celebrated a triumph over them, and bade them also march as captives behind Him. But this naturally did not happen at the crucifixion of Jesus; it came about through the preaching of the gospel among the Gentiles, attended as it was by signs and wonders (cf. e.g. Acts xvi. 16-18, xix. 11-20). Since Paul is seeking to guard a Gentile Church (cf. i. 21, 27, ii. 13a, iii. 5-7) against being led astray, he begins and ends the exposition of the grace shown by God to mankind in and through Christ (ii. 11-15) with what has been experienced in the sphere of the Gentile world on the basis of the work of redemption accomplished in Israel. If in the midst of this he passes from the address to Gentile Christian readers to a statement about himself and those like him, which fits only Christians who have come out of Judaism, it is no digression. For the working of saving grace in the Gentile world depends upon what has happened in Israel. In fact, Paul says just this in ii. 14. He regards the law first as a bond or a bill of indictment testifying against the Jews, then as a wall of partition between Jews and Gentiles. The law became the former, since Israel, on the one hand, by his solemn vow to keep the law (Ex. xxiv. 3; Deut. xxvi. 16-28, 69) had made it, as it were, a bond written or signed by his own hand (Luke xvi. 6; Philem. 19); but, on the other hand, Israel has not met the obligation thereby assumed, has not paid the sum of money thus recognised as due, and, moreover, has no prospect of ever being able to pay off the debt. This bond God has blotted out; He has stricken out, as we would say, the statement of debit written thereon. But He has also taken the "handwriting" itself out of the "midst" by nailing it to the cross. Paul distinguishes the bond itself from what stood written upon it and was blotted out by God, i.e. the law itself from the duties of Israel written in it, in so far as these, by being left undone, have come to indicate an equal number of debts of Israel. Quite separate from this significance of the law as a bond testifying against Israel, the law was in itself a dividing barrier, a hedge between Israel and the Gentile peoples (Eph. ii. 14). From this position which the law occupied in the midst of mankind, as was well known (hence ἐκ τοῦ μέσου with the article), and from the earth altogether, on which it formed a dividing wall of partition, God has removed the law, nailing it to the cross of Christ. Beneath the cross Jews and Gentiles who believe on the Crucified now join hands, the barrier of the law not being able to sunder them any more (Col. i. 20, iii. 11; Eph. ii. 11-22). The division of the sentences causes difficulties. Probably Paul originally intended to say all that stands between ἐν φῶ, ii. 11, and ἐν αὐτῷ, ii. 15, in a single relative sentence. But on being developed this proved so rich that after συνηγέρθητε, ii. 12, three independent sentences arose (συνεζωοποίησεν — ἦρκεν — ἐδειγμάτισεν). The present writer translates: "For in Him dwelleth the whole fulness of the Godhead in bodily fashion, and ye are filled (fully) in Him who is the head of all principality and power; in whom ye also were circumcised with a circumcision not performed by hand through the putting off of the fleshly body, through the circumcision of Christ, buried with Him in baptism, in which ye were also awakened with Him (shared in His resurrection). Through faith in the working of God, who awakened Him from the dead, hath He (God) made you also (Gentile Christians), who were dead by reason of your lapses and your fleshly uncircumcision, alive with Him (Christ). After He (God) in grace forgave us (Jewish Christians) all our lapses, by blotting out the bond (which testified) against us, which was opposed to us on account of the statutes, He took this itself (the bond) out of the midst, nailing it to the cross. After He (God) put away from Himself (as a garment) the lordships and authorities, He made an exhibition of them (set them before the gaze of all as that which they really are), while He led them in triumph openly in Him (in Christ)."

6. (P. 468.) The usual conception of Col. ii. 18, together with an exaggeration of the thought in Gal. iv. 8-10, first meets us in the Κήρυγμα Πέτρου, written perhaps as early as 100 (cf. GK, i. 823, ii. 822-832). According to Clement, Strom. vi. 41, Peter preached in this production as follows:—μηδὲ κατὰ Ἰουδαίους σέβεσθε· καὶ γὰρ ἐκεῖνοι, μόνοι οἰόμενοι τὸν θεὸν γινώσκειν, οὐκ ἐπίστανται, λατρεύοντες ἀγγέλοις καὶ ἀρχαγγέλοις, μηνὶ καὶ σελήνῃ. καὶ εἰ μὴ σελήνη φανῇ, σάββατον οὐκ ἄγουσι τὸ λεγόμενον πρῶτον οὐδὲ νεομηρίαν ἄγουσιν οὔτε ἄζυμα οὔτε ἑορτὴν οὔτε μεγάλην ἡμέραν. Aristides, who says something similar in Apol. xiv. 4, is plainly dependent upon the Preaching of Peter (GK, ii. 823; Seeberg in Forsch. v. 216, 393). The Gnostic Heracleon (quoted in Orig. in Jo. xiii. 17) cites the passage in the Preaching of Peter. Celsus (in Orig. c. Celsum, i. 26, v. 6) charges the Jews with praying to the angels and also to the heavens; but this charge probably rests simply upon a superficial knowledge of Aristides' Apology (cf. Seeberg, Forsch. v. 233-237). Origen could reject this as a slander against Judaism that betrayed its own ignorance, not only on the basis of the O.T., but also in virtue of his wide and varied acquaintance with the Judaism of his time. He was right with respect to orthodox Judaism; cf. Hamburger, Realenc. i. 507, who only should not have adduced as an exception to the rule Tob. iii. 26 (iii. 16f.), in which he adopted a senseless reading (see Fritzsche, Libri Apocr. p. 116 in the Apparatus). After Jesus had unreservedly professed adherence to the strict monotheism of His people (Mark xii. 29, John xvii. 3; Matt. iv. 10), His true worshippers also, who had been brought up in Judaism, could but turn away from every act of adoration of the spirits subordinate to God (Rev. xix. 10, xxii. 8 f.), and Paul in particular could not judge such worship otherwise than as idolatry (cf. Rom. i. 25 with Col. i. 16; further, 1 Cor. viii. 4-6). Even among the Essenes, who, on account of their alleged abstinence from flesh and wine (above, p. 376), have been cited so often to explain the tendency opposed in Col. ii., no such angel cultus can be proved to have existed. It may be, indeed, that their secrecy about angels' names (Jos. Bell. ii. 8. 7) was connected with all sorts of speculation about the angels, and that their botanical and mineralogical investigations (Bell. ii. 8. 6) served speculative as well as medicinal ends. But how far this was from worship of the angels is seen from the fact that next to the name of God that of Moses was the most sacred (Bell. ii. 8. 9, 10). The Jewish Christian sects also, which seem related to Essenism, held fast to the exclusive worship of the one God. To know the angels' names (Clem. Hom. iii. 36) may be a valuable esoteric science (cf. even Ign. Trall. v). But if we infer angelolatry from the statement of the Book of the Elkesaites (Hippol. Refut. ix. 15; Epiph. xxx. 17), that among other things "the angels of prayer" also should be invoked as witnesses of baptism, we should infer from the same ritual that salt and oil were worshipped. Whoever concludes from Just. Apol. i. 6, or from the representations of angels in the Shepherd of Hermas, that there was angelolatry in the Church, proves too much, and therefore nothing at all. So long as we take θρησκεία τῶν ἀγγέλων as a θρησκεία which has the angels for its object, we must understand by it simply a cult devoted to the angels, and not also a speculative pursuit of the doctrine of angels or a superstitious veneration of them. It was an arbitrary weakening of the conception (cf. n. 7) when Chrysostom (Montfaucon, xi. 323, 372; cf. Severianus in Cramer's Catenæ, vii. 325) thought of a mediation of our intercourse with God through the angels, or when Theodore (ed. Swete, ii. 294) understood an indirect veneration of them through observance of the law given by angels and the fear of the wrath of angels who watched over the observance of the law. Ephrem came to a view related essentially to these in that he took τῶν ἀγγέλων as subjective genitive, but, in accordance with Syrian tradition, understood by the angels the priests, and here the Jewish priests (Comm. in ep. Pauli, p. 175, "Ne quis . . . seducat vos neque transmutet in legem angelorum, in doctrinam nimirum sacerdotum"; cf. p. 57 on 1 Cor. vi. 3; Carm. Nisib. xlii. 10; Aphraates, Hom. xxii, p. 432, under appeal to Mal. ii. 7). The Latins, plainly at variance with the context, understood by superstitio or religio or cultura angelorum a direct or indirect deification of nature, not by Jews, but by Gentiles (Ambrosiaster, in Col. ii. 18; Augustine, Epist. cxlix. 27, ad Paulinum). These explanations and the silence of the ancient writers against heresies concerning angelolatry in heretical circles (Epiphanius alone gives any hint of it. He mentions, Her. lx., a party of Ἀγγελικοί, but knows nothing more of them than their name) show that circa 360-400 no angel cult carried on by Christians which could be related to the error refuted in Col. ii., was known in wider circles. Theodoret on Col. ii. 18, p. 290, whom many moderns have followed (e.g. Lightfoot, 67, 71; Henle, 91), was the first to seek to re-establish an historical connection between that error of apostolic times and the canons of the Council of Laodicea, circa 360 (GK, ii. 196). But certainly those decrees of this Council are not pertinent which forbid celebrating the Sabbath with Jews by resting from work (Can. 29), and receiving from Jews the presents which they were accustomed to send during their feasts, in particular the mazzoth (Can. 37, 38). The question there was plainly not about an heretical tendency, a Judaistically coloured Christian doctrine or sect, but about real Jews. We see that the numerous Jews of that region (above, p. 448 f., n. 2) carried on intercourse with their Christian neighbours, and induced them to make concessions to Jewish customs, in very much the same way as they do it elsewhere in the twentieth century. The heretics, however, who are once classed with the Jews (Can. 37), but are elsewhere treated separately (Can. 6-10, 32-34), are anything but Judaists (Can. 7, 8). The command (Can. 35) not to forsake the regular church worship for meetings in places where angels are adored, which is condemned as "secret idolatry," concerns neither Jews nor heretics. Theodoret is probably right when he connects this command with the fact that in his time, about seventy to eighty years after the Synod of Laodicea, there existed in Phrygia and Pisidia, or particularly in Colossæ and the neighbourhood, chapels of St. Michael. According to a legend (Narratio de miraculo Chonis patrato, ed. M. Bonnet, 1890; Acta SS. Sept. viii. 41-48), the apostles John and Philip, on visiting this region, foretold future miracles by the archangel, which, according to this same legend, are said to have taken place there; and, many years after their death, a heathen priest built a small chapel to Michael as a thank-offering for the healing of his daughter, which took place there. What was condemned as idolatry by the Council of Laodicea, and still later by Theodoret and Augustine (De Vera Relig. lv. 110; Conf. x. 42. 67), was soon appropriated, even by the Church. A church built by Constantine not far from the Bosphorus was later named after St. Michael, on account of his appearances there in healing power (Sozom. H. E. ii. 3). In Byzantine times especially, the archangel was honoured in the interior of Asia Minor (cf. Batiffol, Stud. patr. i. 33 ff.; Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, 477, 480; Cities and Bishop. i. 541, 558, 741, Nos. 404, 441, 678). But what could this angel cult have to do with the Judaistic error of Paul's time? The decree of Laodicea shows clearly enough that the matter in hand was a heathen superstition in Christian garb and a merely local cult, which arose long after the time of the Apostles. Also the legend mentioned above must be taken, in spite of the author's intention, as confirming this view.

7. (Pp. 468, 469.) The strong Hebraism θέλων ἐν ταπεινοφροσύνῃ κτλ. (cf. Ps. cxii. 1, cxlvii. 10; 1 Sam. xviii. 22; 1 Chron. xxviii. 4; θέλειν, with infin., Mark xii. 38 = φιλεῖν, Matt. xxiii. 6), suggests the conjecture that Paul is here repeating expressions of the Judaists which Epaphras may have told him. This view is supported by the fact that ταπεινοφροσύνῃ, even if it is connected with τῶν ἀγγέλων (see above, p. 469), could not mean, according to Paul's individual usage, anything reprehensible or any external conduct corresponding to θρησκεία. On the contrary, in Jewish phraseology ταπεινοῦν τὴν ψυχὴν, Lev. xvi. 29, 31, xxiii. 27, 29, 32; Isa. lviii. 3; Ps. xxxv. 13, and ταπεινοῦσθαι, Ps. xxxv. 14; Ezra viii. 21; Sir. xviii. 20, xxxi. 26, mean "to mortify one's self" = νηστεύειν, which a scholion on Lev. xxiii

27 substitutes for it (Field, Hexapla, i. 207); ταπείνωσις, Ezra ix. 5 = πηγὴ νηστεία. The same meaning is attached to ταπεινοφρονεῖν, ταπεινοφροσύνη, ταπεινοφρόνησις, in the earliest speech of the Church (Herm. Vis. iii. 10 6f., Sim. v. 3. 7; Tert. Jejun. xii, xiii, xvi). To this expression so conceived is joined θρησκεία—a word used nowhere else by Paul—as a related idea; for this also indicates not a disposition, but an external religiosity, displayed especially in particular customs and a peculiar manner of life (above, p. 68, n. 3). The originally intransitive concept (Herodotus, ii. 18, 37, 64, 65) is used by later writers indeed transitively also, and then indicates the cult devoted to an object, essentially like λατρεία, λατρεύειν, with dat. (Wisd. of Sol. xi. 15, xiv. 16; Herodian, i. 11, 1, θρησκειν, with acc.). θρησκεία τῶν ἀγγέλων could then indicate a cult devoted to the angels, just as εἰδῶλων θρησκεία, Wisd. of Sol. xiv. 27, means εἰδωλολατρεία. But this meaning is here excluded on stylistic, exegetical, and historical grounds (above, p. 469). There is therefore nothing to prevent taking τῶν ἀγγέλων as subjective genitive, and to connect it with both concepts as their necessary qualification. The subject in question is an ἄσκησις ἀγγελική, as the severe manner of life of the pious Archippus is called in the legend of the miracle at Colossæ (Bonnet, pp. 7. 11, 8. 7). The angels do not need to discipline themselves by abstaining from bodily enjoyments; but this did not hinder Paul from speaking thus any more than the circumstance that God does not grow, or that Christ did not Himself experience the baptism and circumcision of heart instituted by Him, or that we know nothing of the angels' speech, hindered him from speaking of γλῶσσαι τῶν ἀγγέλων (1 Cor. xiii. 1), or of περιτομή τοῦ Χριστοῦ (Col. ii. 11), or of αὔξησης τοῦ θεοῦ (Col. ii. 19). The false teachers probably taught that the Christian should become, as far as possible, an ισάγγελος (Luke xx. 36), a wrong striving after immateriality, which induced Paul elsewhere to call such doctrines διδασκαλίας δαιμονίων (1 Tim. iv. 1). This interpretation finds its strongest support in ii. 23; for certainly after the analogy of similarly formed words ἐθελοθρησκεία cannot denote a cult which chooses its objects of worship arbitrarily; in this case these previously chosen objects must also have been mentioned. It may not be reprehensible in all circumstances to be a θρησκός; but he who makes it his aim to lead a peculiarly pious life beyond what God has commanded, i.e. of his own volition without higher commission and calling, is for this very reason to be blamed (cf. Jas. i. 26). Probably the ἐθελο- bears logically also upon ταπεινοφροσύνη, here so closely connected with θρησκεία. This pair of concepts is defined more closely by ἀφειδία σώματος, the meaning then being just this; an apparently pious manner of life, consisting essentially in an unsparing treatment of the body, that is, if with a few good authorities we strike out καί before ἀφειδία. The obscure words also which in ii. 18 are joined to the same pair of ideas seem to contain similarly a closer definition. Perhaps the only thing certain about them is that μή is a subsequent insertion (among the Syrians also, for Ephrem, p. 175, knew nothing of it) and that ἃ ἑώρακεν ἐμβατεύων gives no sense. Translations like that of von Soden (HK, iii. 55), "flaunting about with things that he has seen," are of course undeniably beautiful. The textual corruption which is surely here was found by so early a writer as Marcion, who read τῶν ἀγγέλων with this clause (GK, ii. 527). Among the various conjectures, that of C. Taylor, ἀέρα κενεμβατεύων, is the most probable (Westcott-Hort, Appendix, 127; Lightfoot, ad loc.). This could mean the bold flight of an unfounded speculation (ἀεροβατεῖν, Aristoph. The Clouds, 225; Lucian, Twice accused, 33, or αἰθεροβατεῖν, Lucian, Philopatris, 25) quite as well as the vain effort by means of asceticism to break loose from earth and soar into higher regions. Acta Andr. chap. xiii. (Lipsius-Bonnet, ii. 43. 21): οὐ κενεμβάτησεν (sic cod.), ἀλλ' οἶδεν ὁ εἰπεν.

8. (P. 471.) Among the more recent commentators on Col., Lightfoot, pp. 73-113, who also added a valuable treatise on Essenism, 349-419, and Klöpper (1882), S. 58-119, have gone into special detail in trying to establish a closer connection between the errors combated here and Essenism. The chief reasons against this are:—(1) On comparing Col. ii. and Rom. xiv. we can hardly doubt that the false teachers in Colossæ forbade the use of flesh and wine; but the Essenes set them no such example (see above, p. 376). (2) The most characteristic features of Essene customs and morality, such as the ablutions, the abstinence from marriage (cf. in brief, Schürer, ii. 568 [Eng. trans. ii. ii. 200]), the absolute community of goods, the abolition of all slavery, the use of only such food as was prepared by the priests of the order, and all that is peculiar to this sect as a monastic order, could not have failed to leave a trace in Col. ii. if any of them had appeared among the false teachers there. Since they are all wanting, there is no discernible connection with Essenism to be found. (3) Moreover, the alleged angelolatry is not Essene (above, p. 476). (4) Pride in circumcision (ii. 11) and observance of feast days (ii. 16) were common to all Jews.

9. (P. 471.) In comparison with the way in which reference is made to the Judaists in Gal. i. 7, iv. 17, v. 12, vi. 12 (along with the collective singular, v. 10), and to the Cephas party in 2 Cor. ii. 17-iii. 1, v. 12, xi. 12-23 (above, pp. 167, line 17 f., 306), it is worth noting that nothing in Col. ii. 8, 16-23 points to a plurality of false teachers. Especially, the singulars μηδεὶς . . . θέλων, ἐμβατεύων, φυσιοῦμενος, κρατῶν, ii. 18 f., instead of which μηδεὶς . . . τῶν θελόντων κτλ. could have been written (cf. 1 Tim. vi. 5), seem more natural if Paul had in mind a single influential person.

§ 28. THE DESTINATION OF THE EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.

In the same passage in which Paul charges the Colossian Church to see to it that the letter directed to them be read also to the congregation of the Church in Laodicea, he speaks of a "letter from Laodicea" which the Colossians were not to leave unread (Col. iv. 16, n. 1). Since Paul does not deem it necessary to say who wrote this letter, it is evident that, like Colossians, it was written by himself. Those who on the strength of this passage assumed that it refers to a letter directed by Paul to the

Laodiceans, and in the absence of such an Epistle composed the apocryphal Epistle to the Laodiceans (n. 2), failed to give due weight to the peculiar expression τὴν ἐκ Λαοδικείας. Marcion made the same mistake when he identified the alleged letter to the Laodiceans with the canonical Epistle to the Ephesians, and changed its title to πρὸς Λαοδικέας (n. 3). If at the same time that he wrote Colossians, Paul directed a special letter to the Laodiceans, it is difficult to explain why he instructed the Colossians to convey greetings to the entire Laodicean Church together with one of the household Churches in that place (iv. 15). The reference must be, rather, to a letter which he directed to be sent among other places to Laodicea and "from Laodicea" to be forwarded to Colossæ, i.e. it was a circular letter to the group of Churches to which Laodicea and Colossæ belonged. That such a letter from the apostle should be read in all the Churches whither it was brought by Paul's messenger, and read before the assembled congregations (iv. 16, ἐν τῇ Λαοδ. ἐκκλ.; cf. 1 Thess. v. 27), we can readily understand. But having received beforehand a private letter from Paul, the Colossian Church might have thought that this letter to the larger group of Churches of which they were one was of no special importance to them. In iv. 16 it was taken for granted that the Colossians would receive the letter directed to them before they received the one from Laodicea, otherwise the Colossians naturally would not have failed to read the circular letter directed to them with other Churches. Furthermore, if Paul or Tychicus directed Onesimus, who was going directly to Colossæ, to deliver Colossians as well as Philemon (above, p. 459 f.), Colossians would necessarily have reached Colossæ before the circular letter which was to be read to the congregations of all the Churches to which it was directed. Of this circular letter Tychicus must have been the bearer, for otherwise he would not have had occasion to go to Colossæ, and in all probability he would not have been mentioned at all in iv. 7 f. Now, from Eph. vi. 21 f. we learn that Tychicus was actually to visit on his journey other Christians besides those at Colossæ, to inform them concerning Paul, and to deliver to them the letter at the conclusion of which this notice stands. Putting together the inference from Col. iv. 7-ix. 16 and the clear statement of Eph. vi. 21 f., the conclusion follows inevitably. Marcion's explanation of Col. iv. 16 is not exactly correct, but for having discovered in the verse the so-called Epistle to the Ephesians he deserves the title, diligentissimus explorator, which his opponent gives him, not without a touch of contempt. In taking this position Marcion broke with a tradition of the Church thoroughly established in his time and persistently held afterwards. Marcion's criticism of the traditional title *πρὸς Ἐφεσίου*s, and his substitution of the title πρὸς Λαοδικέας (or Λαοδικεῖς) were not made on the ground of any tradition, but for critical reasons which may have been set forth in his Antitheses. Even Ignatius seems to have known the letter by its Ephesian title (GK, i. 819). In view of the unanimity on this point of the tradition of the Church which can be traced back to the beginning of the second century, we are justified in assuming that the Epistle had this title when it was incorporated into the collection of Pauline letters which afterwards came into general circulation in the Church. At the same time, this title is not only without support from the original text of the Epistle, but stands in irreconcilable contradiction to the entire character of the letter. Neither Tertullian nor Marcion read the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ in i. 1, which would have disagreed with Marcion's title, since Tertullian does not criticise Marcion for changing here the text of the Epistle as he did so many other passages, but only for altering the title of the letter on the basis of alleged careful investigations and against the authority of ecclesiastical tradition, regarded by Tertullian as trustworthy (n. 3). Neither did Origen, who never questioned in the least the Ephesian destination of the letter, read ἐν Ἐφέσῳ in i. 1, as is proved by his interpretation of this passage, and, indeed, he seems never to have heard of such a reading (n. 4). Jerome, whose commentary on Ephesians is little more than a free reproduction of a commentary by Origen with here and there a criticism (GK, ii. 427), thinks that Origen's explanation of Eph. i. 1 is over-refined, and is inclined to accept the opinion of those who "with more simplicity" think that the salutation ought not to be read "to those who are there," but "to those in Ephesus who are saints and believers." The latter reading Jerome, in 387 A.D., cites simply as the opinion of some scholars which seemed to clear up an exegetical difficulty. On the strength of Jerome's statement alone, we would not be justified in claiming that at that time the reading had found its way into Bible MSS. The MSS. which have come down to us from this time do not read ἐν Ἐφέσῳ (n. 4); and Basil, who reproduces Origen's interpretation, gives as authority for the text without ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, presupposed in Origen's interpretation, not only the early theologians, but ancient MSS. in existence in his own time (n. 4). From this statement we infer that in 370 A.D. Greek MSS. of recent origin read ἐν Ἐφέσῳ. By that time it had already been incorporated in the Latin text, perhaps also in the Egyptian and Syriac texts, and so had come to be widely circulated. In view of all this evidence, there can be no doubt that ἐν Ἐφέσῳ did not belong originally in the text. Furthermore, the author of the Epistle would not have placed the words τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Ἐφέσῳ in their present position, but would have put them either before ἀγίοις (Rom. i. 7; Col. i. 2) or after Χριστῷ (Phil. i. 1). Such an unnatural order of the words can only be due to a corrector who found τοῖς οὖσιν in its present place and so was compelled to insert his addition at this point. For this same reason it is impossible to assume that the author left a space after τοῖς οὐδυν, which, as the several copies of his letter were made, was to be filled in with the names of different places. In this case we should expect also to find in the original, in the copies of which the destination of the letter to various local Churches was to be indicated for the first time, an ἐν after οὐδυν. Only by means of such a preposition, which requires something to be supplied, as is to-day prefixed on our [German] postal cards and in similar forms, could sufficient care be taken that the necessary addition should be inserted, and indeed in the right place. It is a question whether our oldest MSS. preserve the original text intact (n. 4 end). This, however, may be regarded as certain, namely, that the late ἐν 'Εφέσῳ in Eph. i. 1 did not give rise to the very old title πρὸς 'Εφεσίους, but the reverse.

This false title has not only had an injurious effect upon the text of Eph. i. 1, but has interfered seriously with the right understanding of the letter in its historical relations. Holding that the letter was meant for the Ephesian Church, we must conclude from Eph. i. 15 f., iii. 1-4, that Paul wrote the Epistle before he went to Ephesus and became acquainted personally with the Church there. Then we must either claim, in direct contradiction to Acts, that John not Paul was the founder of the Church, or assume that Paul wrote the letter prior to the events described in Acts xviii. 18-xx. 38, which disagrees not only with Acts but with the letter itself (n. 5). When Paul first came to Ephesus (Acts xviii. 19), no Christian Church existed there. In the interval between the first arrival and the final settlement of Paul in Ephesus, Aquila taught exclusively in the synagogue, as did also the apostle himself for three months (Acts xviii. 19-26, xix. 8). A small number of persons who confessed Jesus had to be instructed and baptized before they could become members of an organised Church

(Acts xix. 1-7). The building up of an independent Church in Ephesus was the result of his two years of teaching in the lecture-room of Tyrannus (Acts xix. 9 f.). Paul was thus able to claim as his own even the preliminary work of the year that preceded his coming, while he assumed the care of the new converts made during the two years and more of his residence in the region (Acts xx. 18, 31). In view of these facts, it should always have been taken for granted as self-evident that Ephesians was not intended for this local Church. For Paul writes to the readers of this letter, just as he does to the Colossians (Col. i. 3-9), that ever since he heard of their faith and their love they had been the object of his thanksgiving and petitions (i. 15 f.). Up to this time they had known, not from experience, but only from hearsay, that he had received a commission from God which authorised his ministry to them also (iii. 2), and their first conception of his view of Christianity they derived from this letter (iii. 3 f.). He speaks here of the preaching to which they owed their Christianity (i. 13, iv. 20 f.), just as he does in Col. i. 5 f. 23, ii. 6, as if he had no personal share in it. He does not, as in Col. i. 7, mention the missionary who had brought the gospel to the readers, the inference being that while Epaphras was with Paul and told him of his concern for the Colossians, no such personal bond existed between Paul and the readers of Ephesians. All is very clear if Ephesians was not intended for a single Church at all, but for a number of Churches, the origin of which was due to the preaching of different missionaries. And this assumption is favoured by the fact that not only in this one particular, but in every way, Ephesians is more general in character than any other of Paul's Epistles, especially Colossians. There is nothing in Ephesians corresponding to the numerous personal notices of Col. iv. 10-18. The only point by which the readers seem to be distinguished from other

Christians is their Gentile origin (ii. 1 f., 11 ff., iii. 1-13, iv. 17-24, v. 8). The greeting and concluding benediction of the letter are general enough for a communication addressed to the entire Gentile Church. This, however, is impossible, not merely because a journey which would have taken Tychicus to every place where there were Gentile Christians (vi. 21 f.) would have been out of the question, but mainly because what has been said above in arguing against the Ephesian destination of the letter would apply to all other Churches that were organised by Paul and had come into personal contact with him. Even a pseudo-Paul, who certainly would have known that the Churches in Galatia, Ephesus, Macedonia, and Greece were founded by Paul's personal preaching, would not have been so foolish as to make the great apostle to the Gentiles write a letter in which the entire Gentile Church is spoken of as if he had had no part in its organisation. The gifted disciple of Paul's, to whom the authorship of the letter has also been attributed, assuming that such a person wrote it, makes very clear reference to the contrast between Churches to which Paul was known and those to which he was a stranger, when he writes (vi. 21) that Paul sends Tychicus to them in order that he may bring them full reports about Paul and his surroundings, so that they also may learn the state of Paul's affairs and how he is, they also, who up to this time have had no personal intercourse with Paul, they also, as well as the Churches which he had founded, and which since this organisation have had various communications with him, either personally or through letters, or by messengers (n. 6). In short, the readers of this Epistle are not simply such persons as the Christians in Colossæ, Laodicea, and Hierapolis who have "not yet seen Paul's face," but they are made up of the entire group of Churches in which, according to Col. ii. 1, the two Churches of Colossæ and Laodicea belonged. If, now, it be accepted as certain that Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, assuming their genuineness, were despatched simultaneously (above, p. 439), there can be no doubt that Ephesians is the circular letter which, according to Col. iv. 16, Paul directed to be sent from Laodicea to Colossæ. The three concentric circles to which Paul despatched simultaneously these three letters were the Church in Philemon's house, the local Church in Colossæ, and all the Churches in the province of Asia to which up to this time he had remained unknown, i.e. all the Churches of the province except Ephesus and Troas (Acts xx. 6-11; 2 Cor. ii. 12).

The very subordinate question as to the order in which the Epistles were written neither Eph. vi. 21 nor Col. iv. 16 enables us to decide. In the former passage the reference is not to a letter of Paul's (n. 6); in the latter, while two letters of Paul's are spoken of, there is nothing to indicate whether, at the time when this statement was written, the letter which was to go "from Laodicea" to Colossæ was already composed, or whether its composition, despatching, and final arrival in Colossæ were all to take place in the more or less remote future. All that can be inferred from Col. iv. 16 is that Paul expected Colossians to reach Colossæ before the circular letter. That this was actually the case, and how it happened, has been shown above, p. 459 f.

As soon as there came to be a collection of Paul's letters of any considerable size, the necessity arose at once of providing the several parts with brief titles indicating their destinations. In the case of the other Epistles this title was suggested at once by the geographical notice in the greeting. Thus naturally from ἐν Κορίνθῳ, 1 Cor. i. 2, came πρὸς Κορινθίους. But, like other letters of this kind (James, 2 Pet., Jude), this communication, which Tychicus was to deliver to the Churches of the province of Asia lying inland from Ephesus, has in the greeting no geographical hint whatever as to its destination. The fact that, notwithstanding this circumstance, it did receive a title like the other Pauline letters, and that the inappropriate πρὸς Ἐφεσίου was chosen, shows that those who made the collection did not have the aid of any clear and trustworthy tradition as to the letter's destination. How the error that the letter was intended for the Church at Ephesus arose, and how it could be perpetuated, is not without explanation. Ecclesiastically as well as politically, Ephesus was the metropolis of the province of Asia. Communications between the Asiatic Churches and the Churches of other countries were sent for the most part through Ephesus. So that from Ephesus this letter reached all the Churches which lay across the sea. If it was circulated as "a letter from Ephesus," it was natural for it to be regarded as a letter to the Church in Ephesus, just as Marcion thought it self-evident that a "letter from Laodicea" must be a letter "to the Laodiceans."

1. (P. 479.) Doubt cannot be cast on the reading, Col. iv. 16, ἐκ Λαοδικείας (-ίας) by a senseless ἐν Λαοδικίας (G), and by inexact translations like "eam quæ est Laodicensium" (Ambrosiaster, Priscillian, Pelagius, not corrected by Jerome). S¹ translates: "and that (letter) which was written from Laodicea (according to another vocalisation, 'from the Laodiceans') ye are to read." The same explanation was given by Theodore (Swete, ii. 310) and Theodoret (Noesselt, 501), with the qualification that it was a letter of the Laodiceans to Paul, about the contents of which, indeed, only vague conjectures were possible. Chrysostom also (xi. 413) mentions this view. Others thought that they had discovered 1 Tim. here; see GK, ii. 567 f. It goes without saying that whoever considers Col. genuine but Eph. not, cannot recognise the latter in Col. iv. 16, especially if, like von Soden (HK, iii. 88), he holds, in spite of the mention of Tychicus (Eph. vi. 21 f.), that Eph. was addressed to all Gentile Christendom (against this see above, p. 484 f.). The same critic, S. 87, thinks it an argument against identifying the letter from Laodicea with Eph., that this designation is confusing. But confusing for whom? Certainly not for the Colossians, who either received the circular letter at the same time as their own, or else by asking which letter was meant could find out from Tychicus or Onesimus that a circular letter was on the way, or, if it came to the worst, had simply to be patient until the letter so announced arrived "from Laodicea." The further question why then Colosse was not included in the circle of Churches to which Eph. was addressed is idle, since Col. iv. 16 itself shows that Colosse was included from the start (above, p. 480). The question why a similar instruction as regards Col. was not given in the letter to the Laodiceans is thus explained, that this was not a letter just to the Laodiceans, but to the Churches of Asia; and that Col. was to be read not in all these Churches, but simply in Laodicea.

2. (P. 480.) Concerning the apocryphal Epistle to the Laodiceans, cf. GK, i. 277–283, ii. 83 f., 566–585.

3. (Pp. 480, 482.) Tert. c. Marc. v. 17, writes under the title, De epistula ad Laodiceños, which he took from Marcion's Apostolicum: “Ecclesiæ quidem veritate epistolam istam ‘ad Ephesios’ habemus emissam, non ‘ad Laodiceños’ sed Marcion ei titulum aliquando interpolare gestiit, quasi et in isto diligentissimus explorator. Nihil autem de titulis interest, cum ad omnes apostolus scripserit, dum ad quosdam.” Before this, in v. 11, he says incidentally: “Prætereo hic et de alia epistula, quam nos ad Ephesios præscriptam habemus, hæretici vero ad Laodiceños.” There is no occasion to think of other heretics than Marcion's adherents. Cf. GK, i. 623 ff., ii. 416. By titulus in distinction from ipsum corpus of a writing (c. Marc. iv. 2; Oehler, ii. 162), Tertullian regularly understands the outside title of the book (GK, i. 624 A., cf. i. 83). That such is the case here is the more certain since the peculiarity of Marcion's treatment of this letter is, according to Tertullian, the falsifying of its title. The salutations he had altered elsewhere also, e.g. Gal. i. 1–5, GK, ii. 495, but the outside title in this instance only. This “title,” in place of which no one but the Marcionites knew any other, is found in the literature first in Iren. v. 2, 3; Clem. Strom. iv. 65, p. 592; Can. Mur. l. 51, cf. Iren. v. 8. 1, 14. 3; Clem. Pæd. i. 18, p. 108.

4. (Pp. 482, 483.) Catenæ, ed. Cramer, vi. 102, Ὁριγένης δὲ φησιν· ἐπὶ μόνων τῶν Ἐφεσίων εὐρομεν κείμενον τὸ “τοῖς οὖσιν,” καὶ ζητοῦμεν, εἰ μὴ παρέλκει προσκείμενον τὸ “τοῖς ἁγίοις τοῖς οὖσιν,” τί δύναται σημαίνειν, ὅρα οὖν, εἰ μὴ ὥσπερ ἐν τῇ Ἐξόδῳ ὄνομά φησιν ἑαυτοῦ ὁ χρηματίζων Μωσεί τὸ “ὦν” (Ex. iii. 14), οὕτως οἱ μετέχοντες τοῦ ὄντος γίνονται ὄντες, καλούμενοι οἰονεῖ ἐκ τοῦ μὴ εἶναι εἰς τὸ εἶναι. Then follows 1 Cor. i. 28 as proof text. Not only the ἐν Ἐφέσῳ but also the salutation (ver. 2) is wanting in the Mt. Athos MS. (von der Goltz, S. 75, see above, p. 396, n. 3). Origen presupposes the address to be πρὸς Ἐφεσίουσ, not only in the beginning of this scholion, but elsewhere also, e.g. as quoted in Cramer, vi. 119; c. Celsum, iii. 20. Jerome in Eph. i. 1 (Vallarsi, vii. 544 f.): “Sanctis omnibus qui sunt Ephesi.” Quidam curiosius, quam necesse est putant ex eo, quod Moysi dictum sit ‘Hæc dices filiis Israel: qui est, misit me,’ etiam eos qui Ephesi sunt sancti et fideles, essentiae vocabulo nuncupatos, etc. Alii vero simpliciter, non ‘ad eos qui sint (al. sunt)’ sed ‘qui Ephesi sancti et fideles sint’ scriptum arbitrantur.” Jerome does not say “istam epistolam scriptam esse arbitrantur,” a phrase, indeed, quite inapplicable to Origen, who never doubted this; he says rather scriptum arbitrantur, and hence must be speaking simply of the text with ἐν Ἐφέσῳ as contrasted with the text without it, over which Origen had puzzled; cf. Hofmann, iv. 1, 3. It is certainly strange if this is the only hint that Jerome gives of a textual variation, for Origen's interpretation can be discussed only on the pre-supposition of his text (without ἐν Ἐφέσῳ); and we may conjecture with Vallarsi that Jerome himself prefaced his discussion by a text without Ephesi, and that it was only copyists who substituted the Vulgate text with omnibus and Ephesi, neither of which was known to Origen. Basil, c. Eunom.

ii. 19 (Garnier, i. 254), reproduces Origen's thought and text with the addition : οὕτω γὰρ οἱ πρὸ ἡμῶν παραδεδώκασιν καὶ ἡμεῖς ἐν τοῖς παλαιοῖς τῶν ἀντιγράφων εὐρήκαμεν. Ambrosiaster and Victorinus are about contemporary with Basil. From the former's exposition we cannot tell whether or not he really found here "sanctis omnibus qui sunt Ephesi et fidelibus," etc., as the text in his commentary now reads. Victorinus (Mai, Script. vet. n. Coll. iii. 2. 88, after a previous less exact citation, p. 87) read, "sanctis qui sunt Ephesi et fidelibus in Christo Jesu" (at all events without omnibus). The older Syriac text, on which Ephrem wrote a commentary, expressed, as it would appear, neither οὕσιν nor ἐν Ἐφέσῳ (p. 141, "Sanctis et fidelibus, baptizatis videlicet et catechumenis"). On the contrary, S¹ literally retranslated τοῖς οὕσιν ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, ἀγίοις καὶ πιστοῖς. The essential agreement of this text with the Greek text of Antioch proves that Lucian gave it this form. Could he have been its originator? The text of Eph. i. 1 is transmitted quite variously : (1) τοῖς ἀγίοις τοῖς οὕσιν (οὕσι N) καὶ πιστοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ I. is found in NB and the scholiast of min. 67. Whether Marcion read just this in his exemplar, and Tertullian, Origen, and Ephrem in their N.T., cannot be established. (2) τοῖς ἀγίοις (without τοῖς) οὕσιν ἐν Ἐφέσῳ καὶ πιστοῖς κτλ., D, min. 46 ; (3) τοῖς ἀγίοις πᾶσιν τοῖς οὕσιν ἐν Ἐ. κ. π., AP, corrector of N, Cyrill. AL, 2 min., Copt., Ambrosiaster (?), Jerome in his commentary (?), Vulg. (sometimes omnibus before sanctis), Theod., Lat. as the text (Swete, i. 118 ?) ; (4) τοῖς ἀγίοις τοῖς οὕσιν ἐν Ἐ. καὶ π., GKL, Chrys. (probably Theodore), Theodoret, Victorinus (see above) ; (5) the same with τοῖς (instead of καὶ) πιστοῖς, pseudo-Ign. ad Eph. ix ; καὶ is thought to be lacking also in min. 37 and some MSS. of the Vulg. The reading (1) "to the saints who are also believers in Christ" is not quite satisfactory ; since, according to this, faith in Christ appears to be either a qualification of the sainthood in distinction from other saints who are such even without faith in Christ or an inference from this sainthood, neither of which meanings is very clear. The reading (2) after we expunge the ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, which is certainly not genuine, would be more likely. The origin of πᾶσιν in reading (3) is puzzling. Is it originally a variant competing with οὕσιν ? Or are both genuine (cf. 2 Cor. i. 1) ? Or has a τῆς Ἀσίας been lost in the one or the other ? Or, with P. Ewald, ZKom. Eph. 16, is τοῖς ἀγαπητοῖς οὕσιν καὶ πιστοῖς ἐν Χρ. I. ? Cf. Rom. i. 7 above, p. 394 f.

5. (P. 483.) The older commentators, being fettered by the title "To the Ephesians," have not for the most part seriously faced the insoluble problem which thus arises. Victorinus can think of nothing to say on i. 15, iii. 1 ff. that might serve to adjust these passages to the traditional title, and asserts in the Introduction (Mai, Script. vet. nova coll. iii. 2. 87) : "Ephesii a pseudoapostolis depravati videbantur, judaismum jungere Christianæ doctrinæ." Ambrosiaster remarks in the prologue at least : "Ephesios apostolus non fundavit in fide, sed confirmavit," without, however, grounding this more particularly on i. 15, iii. 1 ff., or reconciling it with Acts. So also writes the real Euthalius (Zacagni, i. 524), who classes the Ephesians with the Romans as Christians who were known to Paul only by hearsay. Chrysostom in his Introduction (Montfaucon, xi. 1), and on i. 15, iii. 1 ff., avoids the historical question altogether. Ephrem, p. 140, with whom Severianus also (Cramer, Cut. vi. 97) seems to agree, represents the apostle John as founding the Church of Ephesus, and writing his Gospel there before Paul wrote Eph. This historically impossible view is probably traceable to some version or other of the legend about John. See especially the Syriac History of John the Son of Zebedee (Wright, Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, i. 1-65, also the writer's Acta Joannis, xxxix., lvi., cxxviii.). Theodore Mops. (Swete, i. 115 ff.) shows in opposition to this legendary view that John's stay in Ephesus does not fall earlier than the time between the outbreak of the Jewish war and Trajan's reign; but, on the other hand, he holds fast to the conclusion drawn from exegesis, that Eph., just like Rom. and Col., is addressed to Christians whom Paul has not yet seen (pp. 112, 253). Naturally Theodore admits the truthfulness of the account in Acts xviii. 18-xx. 38, according to which Paul laboured several years in Ephesus long before his protracted imprisonment (p. 117). But the task of discovering a point in Paul's life previous to Acts xviii. 18, when he could have written as a prisoner this letter to the Church of Ephesus, and the further task of making intelligible the origin of such a Church before Acts xviii. 18, and of bringing it into harmony with Acts, are avoided by the great commentator. To amend his text by conjecture, as the present writer sought to do in Acta Jo. xl., is needless pains in view of the complete Latin text of his commentary, then unknown to him. Theodoret (Noesselt, p. 398) certainly must have Theodore in mind when he mentions, along with earlier commentators who considered John the first teacher of the gospel in Ephesus (i.e. Ephrem and Severianus), others also who claimed, indeed, that Paul had not yet seen the Church at the time when he wrote to them, but at the same time asserted that certain nameless persons were the first preachers of the gospel in Ephesus. Both views would be easy to refute from Acts. All the more inadequate, then, seems that which Theodoret remarks on i. 15, in order to make it conceivable that the letter is addressed to one of the Churches founded by Paul. In commenting on iii. 2 f. he is quite silent about this matter.

6. (Pp. 485, 486.) Hofmann, iv. 1. 266, thought that he could explain the καὶ ὑμεῖς, vi. 21, as an antithesis to the καὶ γὰρ, i. 15. But what reader who has reached vi. 21 has still in mind a sentence from the opening of the letter? Still more inadmissible is the common view that the contrast here is with the Colossians, to whom Paul at the same time sends news about himself by Tychicus (Col. iv. 8), or indeed with Col., which already lay before the writer (so Holtzmann, Kritik der Eph. und Kolosserbriefe, 1872, S. 25). The latter view is objectionable, if for no other reason, because Eph. vi. 21 f. does not treat of a letter or of several letters at all, but simply of the sending of Tychicus. Besides, Eph., if indeed it is meant at all in Col. iv. 16, was originally intended for the Church at Colossæ as well (above, p. 479). The Christians of Colossæ belong to the multitude addressed throughout Eph., and hence to those addressed in Eph. vi. 21 f. How then can they be conceived as forming a contrast to the "ye also" of Eph. vi. 21? Nor does Paul say that he is sending Tychicus also to the readers of Eph.; he says of this one mission of Tychicus, which will bring him to all the readers of Eph. (Eph. vi. 22), the Colossians among the rest (Col. iv. 7), that it should serve to inform these Churches also about his (Paul's) situation. The contrast can be formed only by such Churches as do not belong to this circle, Churches to which Tychicus is not now sent, or at least not with this aim, and which, as was well known, heard frequently from Paul; cf. Klostermann, JhfDTh. 1870, S. 161. Cf. also in the matter Ewald, ZKom. Eph. Col. Philem. 263, but on the basis of the supposition that Eph. and Philem. were written and sent somewhat earlier than Col. (KZom. Eph. 20 ff.).

§ 29. THE GENUINENESS OF THE EPISTLES TO THE EPHESIANS AND COLOSSIANS.

Among earlier critics many accepted the Pauline authorship of Colossians, but often questioned the genuineness of Ephesians, while only occasionally the opinion was expressed that Colossians was forged on the basis of Ephesians (n. 1). Later, Baur, followed with some divergencies by Hilgenfeld and Weizsäcker, interpreted both Epistles as products of the second century (n. 2). Hitzig made the suggestion that Ephesians was copied from a genuine Epistle to the Colossians, but that later Colossians itself was interpolated by the same author and in the same spirit. This suggestion was worked out by Holtzmann, who concluded that these changes were made either at the close of the first or the beginning of the second century (n. 3).

When the fact is taken into consideration that those inclined to this hypothesis have tended more and more to accept both the unity and genuineness of Colossians, the favour of the critics seems to have been very unequally bestowed upon these two very closely connected letters. Indeed, the Epistle most attacked is supported by the better external evidence. Whereas, with the exception of a misinterpretation of Col. ii. 18 in the Preaching of Peter (above, p. 475, n. 6), there are no clear traces of Colossians before the time of Marcion, even as early as the time of Clement and Hermas we begin to have traces of the circulation of Ephesians in the Church, which become clearer in Ignatius and Polycarp (GK, i. 817 f., 825 f.). It is hard to believe that letters which were incorporated by Marcion in 145 into his Apostolicon as genuine letters of Paul were not written until shortly before 140 (Hilgenfeld, Einl. 680). Still less is it possible to suppose that the writer was influenced by Montanistic ideas (Baur, Paulus, ii. 25).

Another definite point, which cannot be overlooked in the historical criticism of these letters, is the title πρὸς Ἐφεσίου, which was known to Ignatius and corrected by Marcion. In its present form this title cannot be older than the incorporation of this Epistle into a collection of Pauline letters. On the other hand, in view of its wide circulation and the fact that it is the only title by which the letter was known, it cannot be later than the formation of the collection of Pauline letters which Marcion found circulating in the Church, and which was in Ignatius' hands. In order to account for the historical inaccuracy of this title, an interval must be assumed between the letter's composition and its incorporation in this collection sufficient for its original destination to have been forgotten. Now this interval is allowed for, and the perpetuation of the error in the title easily explained if Paul sent the Epistle in the year 62 by Tychicus by way of Ephesus to the inland cities of the province of Asia (cf. above, p. 480 f.). When, some twenty or forty years later, the collection of Pauline letters in which this Epistle had the title πρὸς Ἐφεσίου came into circulation in that region, no one had longer any interest in correcting the error. Because of its circular character, no single Church was in a position to claim the honour of having received the Epistle from Paul, and to contest its claim with that of the metropolis of the province. On the other hand, if it be assumed that the letter was forged in Paul's name, the origin of the πρὸς Ἐφεσίου is inexplicable. This error as to the letter's destination could not have originated in Ephesus and the province of Asia. And even if the letter was written in this region, the error could not have been circulated from this centre with the letter; while, if it be assumed that the spurious letter was written and first circulated elsewhere, we have the still more difficult task of explaining the origin of the opinion that the letter was directed to Ephesus. For there is absolutely nothing in the letter itself which would point to a Church that had been organised by Paul, and cared for by him during the early years of its growth. If someone had been influenced in selecting a definite title by his observation of the close resemblance between this letter and Colossians,—and this was not the usual manner in which mistakes originated in the early Church,—he would have been more likely to think of Hierapolis or Laodicea (Col. ii. 1, iv. 13–16) than of Ephesus. Moreover, it is to be borne in mind that up to the present time no one has shown with any degree of plausibility that this letter was forged during Paul's lifetime, or shortly after his death. But if it had not been composed until the year 100 or shortly thereafter, there is no time for the rise and establishment of the error which had been associated with the Epistle ever since it began to have a wider circulation, indeed from the time when it was incorporated into a collection of Pauline letters.

While in the case of Ephesians it is the strong external evidence which stands in the way of the assumption of spuriousness, in the case of Colossians it is the impression necessarily made by the contents of the letter. Even the choice by a forger of Colossæ as the destination of his letter is inexplicable. In the entire literature of the ancient Church Colossæ is not once mentioned, and it is hard to see why this Church should have been chosen rather than one of the more famous Churches mentioned in Rev. i.–iii., or in Acts, or in the Epistles of Ignatius, or in the traditions about John and the daughters of Philip. The notices in chap. iv. would be a masterpiece without parallel in epistolary literature known to be spurious, comparable only to 2 Tim. iv. Assuming that Philemon is genuine, someone might have taken from ver.

23 f. the five names of persons sending greetings which recur in Col. iv. But what would have influenced such a person to add to these five the name of Jesus Justus, who is not mentioned anywhere else in the ancient Christian literature that has come down to us? This character must have been invented; yet it is scarcely conceivable that a Christian of the post-apostolic age should have given to a character invented by himself the name "Jesus." What is said and implied in Col. iv. 11 with reference to the activity of Jewish Christian missionaries in Paul's vicinity, with whom Paul was not altogether satisfied, is confirmed by Phil. i. 15-17, but could not have been derived from the latter passage. For it is not said in the Philippian passage that the missionaries hostile to Paul were of Jewish origin, which is the point in Colossians; nor does the language in Colossians betray the slightest dependence upon Philippians. A pseudo-Paul might have taken the name Onesimus from Philemon, but he could not have inferred from this Epistle that Colossæ was the home of the slave and of his master (Col. iv. 9). On the other hand, there is no trace in Colossians of any of the contents of Philemon, e.g. of Onesimus' condition of slavery, of his flight, of his conversion by Paul and restoration to his master. No mention is made of Philemon nor of his wife. It is not the Church in the house of Philemon at Colossæ which we find mentioned in Col. iv. 15, but the Church in the house of Nymphas at Laodicea. In Col. iv. 17 a ministry in the Church is ascribed to Archippus, of which there is no suggestion in Philem. 2. If Colossians is spurious, chap. iv. shows that the author is very anxious, by inserting numerous personal notices, to give his forgery the appearance of lifelikeness. How is it, then, that for this purpose he has not made use of Philemon, assuming that the letter is genuine? If he composed them both, how could he have avoided repeating himself in two letters which are represented to have been despatched simultaneously to the same destination? The organisation of the Colossian Church is not attributed to Paul's distinguished helper Timothy, although the writer makes him share Paul's apostolic calling, as this calling is related to this particular Church (Col. i. 1, 7, above, p. 449, n. 3), and although from Philemon he must have known that Timothy as well as Paul was quite intimate with a prominent member of this Church. The place that we should expect to be occupied by Timothy is taken by Epaphras (Col. i. 7, iv. 12), who is not mentioned in the other sources, and from whose mention in Philem. 23 it could not be guessed that he had preached the gospel and organised Churches in these regions. In short, while the letters are entirely independent, their personal and historical notices are mutually supplementary, without being at any point in the slightest degree contradictory. That there is a resemblance between these two letters, as regards historical details, is not to be denied; but it is not the resemblance that exists between two spurious letters, nor between one genuine and one spurious letter, but a resemblance such as ordinarily exists between two genuine documents, and such as in the nature of the case is possible.

The objection that there is no sufficient occasion for the letter (Hilgenfeld, 663) ought not to have been made unless the critic was in a position to show a plausible reason for its forgery, or to prove that the letter was written from pure love of writing, without any special purpose, and especially unless he was ready to show that the urgent occasion for the letter which the author himself indicates (above, p. 461 ff.) was inherently improbable. Now it cannot be denied that Paul, in addition to the responsibility which he felt for preaching the gospel to the entire Gentile world still unconverted (Rom. i. 14), bore anxiously also upon his heart the Churches already in existence (2 Cor. xi. 28). If he devoted a lengthy letter to a Church like that in Rome, which did not properly belong within the sphere of his missionary labours, but simply lay upon the route of future journeys which were to be made in connection with his work, it is evident that he must have felt himself under obligation to watch over and to promote the development of the Churches in the province of Asia which through three years of labour he had founded, and which, moreover, had received the gospel from the Ephesian Church that he himself had organised. And he would have felt this obligation all the more when it was being rumoured in Colossæ and Laodicea, as it was, that he was unable or not disposed to fulfil this obligation, when, moreover, the Christians in these two places were in danger of being led away by an unsound form of Christianity.

The claim that Colossians was not written by Paul, or that the genuine Epistle was interpolated by a later hand, cannot be upheld, save by convincing proof that historical facts or conditions are referred to in the letter which did not exist until the post-apostolic age, or by evidence of thought and language which do not harmonise with the thought and style of Pauline letters admitted to be genuine. Neither has been shown to be true. In its practical aims the movement combated in chap. ii., opposition to which, as we have seen, influenced all the didactic statements of the Epistle, was very closely allied to the movement which Paul had opposed earlier in Rom. xiv. No traces of such a movement are to be found in the post-apostolic literature. Assuming that an angel cult is really referred to in Col. ii. 18, one might search the heresy histories of the second century in vain for another reference to it (above, p. 475 f.). But when this passage is rightly interpreted, it is found to have no connection with any heretical movement of the post-apostolic age, especially those which, according to existing accounts, were influential in Asia Minor. From the Nicolaitans of the Book of Revelation the Jewish Christian ascetics in Colossæ are the opposite extreme. According to trustworthy accounts, Cerinthus, the contemporary of John, was anything but a Judaiser. He was made such only by the ignorance of heresy writers after the close of the fourth century, and there is no trace in Colossians of Cerinthus' real view of the person and history of Christ (n. 4). On his journey through the province of Asia, Ignatius met wandering teachers, who insisted that the Gentile Christians there should observe the Jewish law, e.g. the law of the Sabbath, and who at the same time held Docetic views regarding Christ, especially regarding His sufferings. But there is nothing said by Ignatius about ascetic rules which were based upon certain theories of matter and the nature of angels, nor is there to be found in Colossians any suggestion of the fantastic Christology which Ignatius was especially anxious to refute.

On the surface there would seem to be points of connection between Colossians and the so-called false teachers of the Pastoral Epistles. But the latter are to be dated in Paul's lifetime (§ 37).

Baur found in both Ephesians and Colossians a Gnostic theology and phraseology suggesting the speculation of Valentinus, but without any "trace of even an indirect polemic against Gnostic teachers," so that, according to Baur, they must date from a time when Gnostic ideas were just beginning to appear, and seemed as yet to be harmless Christian speculations (Paulus, ii. 25). On the other hand, Hilgenfeld (Einl. 660, 666 ff.) makes the writer attack Gnosticism, which is called by him philosophy (ii. 8). He thinks that what is said in i. 19, ii. 9 ff., is directed against the Gnostic doctrine of the πλήρωμα, that i. 15 ff. is designed to oppose the doctrine of the creation of the material world by spirits greatly inferior to God, and that the presentation of Christianity as a mystery

(i. 27, ii. 2, iv. 2) and gnosis (i. 9, 10, ii. 2 f., iii. 9) is intended to offset the esoteric teaching of the Gnostics. A polemic of this sort, in which the error opposed is not so much as characterised, to say nothing of being logically refuted, would be manifestly childish. And that the error clearly designated by Paul, and really combated, has nothing to do with Gnosticism, with its doctrine of the pleroma and æons, is proved by the vain efforts which have been put forth either to prove that there are two different parties in Colossæ which are combated, or that the writer confuses the alleged Jewish Christian Gnosticism of Cerinthus with movements of an entirely different character. That the words πλήρωμα and αἰῶνες, the use of which in Colossians and Ephesians is mainly responsible for conjectures of this kind, were widely used in Gnostic circles before Valentinus, cannot be proved (n. 5). But the supposition that the teaching of Valentinus himself is either combated or appropriated in Colossians and Ephesians is ruled out, because it is chronologically impossible, in view of Marcion's acceptance and revision of the latter Epistle. Indeed, the theory is refuted by the practice of the Valentinian school, all branches of which made special use of 1 Cor., Ephesians, and Colossians in constructing their doctrine, endeavouring to show that it was derived from the esoteric teaching of the apostles. While Valentinus and his followers certainly did not derive their ideas from Paul, they did use his language for the expression of their thoughts, in order to render them less objectionable to the ordinary reader. They make the same use of the conceptions ὁ λόγος τοῦ σταυροῦ, θεοῦ σοφίαν λαλοῦμεν ἐν μυστηρίῳ, πνευματικός, ψυχικός (1 Cor. i. 18, ii. 7, 14 f.) that they do of πλήρωμα, Col. i. 19, ii. 9; Eph. i. 10, 23, iii. 19, iv. 13, and αἰῶνες, Eph. iii. 21. But since the caricatures of these Pauline conceptions constitute the basis of the Valentinian system, and are used in the technical language of all branches of the school, it is certain that Valentinus himself derived his doctrine, among other sources, from Ephesians and Colossians.

But if the genuineness of Colossians is unimpeachable, the critical question with reference to Ephesians is very much simplified; for if the latter is spurious, the numerous points of resemblance between it and Colossians prove beyond question that it is based upon this Epistle. Moreover, since mention is made in Col. iv. 16 of a contemporaneous Epistle of Paul's which was to be read, among other places, in Laodicea and Colossæ, there is no doubt that it was this passage which led to the composition of Ephesians. The relation of Ephesians to Col. iv. 16 would be the same as that of the apocryphal correspondence of Paul with the Corinthians to 1 Cor. v. 9, vii. 1. Of this possible motive for the alleged forging of Ephesians, Hitzig and Holtzmann (op. cit. p. 167) deprive themselves, when they explain Col. iv. 15-17 as an interpolation made by the writer of Ephesians, with the intention of making iv. 16 refer to the circular letter which he had written. But why does he do this in such unintelligible language? The reference would be intelligible only to the Colossians, who knew beforehand or learned at the time that a letter was to be sent from Laodicea to Colossæ. Only if Col. iv. 16 is genuine are there analogies from which to argue that Ephesians is a probable forgery. As a matter of fact, there was a letter forged in the second century on the strength of this passage (above, p. 488, n. 2). Although, compared with the richness of thought in Ephesians, this letter is a poor piece of patchwork, its title, ad Laodiceños, and its greeting, fratribus qui sunt Laodiciæ, are much more sensible and intelligible than the greeting of Ephesians, if the latter Epistle be likewise a forgery made on the strength of this Colossian passage. Anyone who missed the letter mentioned in this passage, and on the strength of its non-existence wrote a fictitious letter of his own, could not have left his readers to guess its destination, but, like the persons who wrote the apocryphal letters to the Corinthians and Laodiceans, he must have betrayed clearly the origin of his invention.

In attempting to prove the spuriousness of Ephesians, a special point cannot be made of its close resemblance to Colossians, both in thought and language. For this is what we should expect if the two letters were despatched simultaneously, possibly not more than a single night intervening between their composition, and if the Church in Colossæ, to which a special letter is devoted on account of the danger threatening this Church and its nearest neighbour, was one of a larger group of Churches to which the other letter was directed. A literary man, concerned about the opinion of his critics and the judgment of posterity, in such a case might have taken special pains to secure variety of thought and language; a great man, concerned mainly with his subject, does not take such pains (n. 6). Such a man was Paul. Moreover, it is a peculiarity of Paul's style, that having once employed a significant word he is apt soon to repeat it, or to make use of a related word (n. 7). This is true even of words that do not occur elsewhere in his writings. If, owing to the closeness of their composition, the two letters may be regarded as being in this respect a unit, the occurrence in both of expressions more or less peculiar only serves to confirm this fact. It is also to be remembered that between the composition of Romans and these letters not less than four years had elapsed, during which time Paul, torn away from his accustomed missionary work, had been receiving the greatest variety of impressions, first in Cæsarea, then for six months at sea, and finally in Rome. Under these conditions it would not be strange to find him influenced by ideas and using forms of expression with which we do not meet in the earlier Epistles.

In order to prove that Ephesians is a forgery, based either entirely or for the most part on a genuine letter to the Colossians, conclusive evidence must be adduced to show that ideas and words in Colossians were misunderstood or intentionally misinterpreted by the imitator, or clumsily copied and used in the wrong place. For these are the characteristics of all known forgeries of this sort, at least of all ancient forgeries. Consequently in handling a genuine Epistle of Paul's, whose letters were so difficult for outsiders, and so especially difficult for later generations to understand (2 Pet. iii. 16), a forger would certainly have betrayed himself in some way. Indeed, the details of Ephesians have been held to be so slavishly dependent upon Colossians as to render its composition by Paul impossible (n. 8). But this view presupposes on the part of the alleged pseudo-Paul a degree of stupidity and a lack of thought which cannot be harmonised with the unquestionable fact that the author of Ephesians was a man of profound thought, breadth of view, and no little literary power. Furthermore, the contents and plan of Ephesians cannot be said to so strikingly resemble those of Colossians as to arouse suspicion. Paul begins Colossians with the assurance that since the reception of the news of the planting of Christianity in Colossæ he and Timothy have not ceased to give thanks (cf. 1 Cor. i. 4; 1 Thess. i. 2); in Eph. i. 3 he breaks at once into praise of God, with an emotional fervour without parallel in any other of Paul's letters, not even excepting Rom. i. 8. In the Epistle intended for the group of Churches in the province of Asia the predominating tone is that of joy for the results of the gospel accomplished in his field of labour, though without his aid, which gives the Epistle throughout a solemnly exalted, soaring, even exaggerated tone that frequently passes over into praise of God (i. 3, 12, 14, 16, iii. 14 ff., 20 f., v. 20); the tone of Colossians, on the other hand, is influenced by the deep anxiety which both the apostle and Epaphras felt on account of the special peril to which the Christians in Colossæ and Laodicea were exposed (ii. 1, iv. 12 f.),—an anxiety that accounts for the moderate joy of its thanksgiving (i. 3), as well as for the preponderance and varied character of its petitions (i. 9, cf. i. 23 with Eph. i. 16 f.). The thanksgiving in Eph. i. 3–14 is for the redemptive grace of God, eternally shown to the Church, primarily to the Jewish Christian Church, of which grace the Gentiles have now been made partakers (i. 13). Not until i. 15 f. do we have thanksgiving for the readers themselves, with which Colossians begins. The discussions of Col. i. are entirely determined by opposition to the ethical error and confusion by which the Church was threatened, clearly characterised in Col. ii., whereas Eph. i.–iii. is concerned entirely with the contrast between the former limitation of salvation to Israel and its present extension to the Gentiles. The first main division of Ephesians concludes with a doxology ending in “amen” (iii. 20 f.), which resembles Rom. xvi. 25–27 (a resemblance all the more striking because of the similarity in thought between the latter passage and Eph. iii. 3, 5), which may also be compared to Rom. xi. 36 and the benedictions in 1 Thess. iii. 11–13; 2 Thess. ii. 16 f. A transition is then made with παρακαλῶ οὖν ὑμᾶς, iv. 1, to a second hortatory section of the letter (cf. Rom. xii. 1). All this is wanting in Colossians. Although there is much similarity in the language of these hortatory sections, the ethical discussion discloses a number of new points of view. There are enough independent thoughts in Ephesians to enable us to understand why Paul wanted this letter to be read by the Colossians, for whom it was intended, as well as for the other Churches (Col. iv. 16); on the other hand, it was so general in character that the apostle did not feel that it was sufficient to meet the needs of the Church in Colossæ.

The lexical proof of the spuriousness of Ephesians, which has been thought possible, will not bear examination (n. 9). Passing by specific defects in the argument, this general remark is to be made concerning it. There is error in every effort of this sort which proceeds on the hypothesis that in and of itself the occurrence of rare words, particularly words that are not to be found elsewhere in the N.T., or more specifically in the admittedly genuine Pauline letters, is sufficient reason for suspecting an Epistle. Are we to suppose that boldness in the construction of words and independence of the vocabulary of the author whose writings he designs to multiply by his forgery are the characteristics of the forger? So far as we are able to determine from the Latin version (GK, ii. 584), in the Epistle to the Laodiceans, there is not to be found a single word, scarcely a combination of words, not to be found in the genuine Epistles. Galatians, which is a little shorter than Ephesians, has just as many peculiar words (n. 10). It has been claimed that Ephesians does not show Paul's dialectic and syllogistic style. With double force could this objection be made to 2 Cor., in which there occurs not a single one of those logical connectives characteristic of Romans and 1 Cor. ($\eta\ \sigma\upsilon\kappa\ \sigma\acute{\iota}\delta\alpha\tau\epsilon$; $\eta\ \alpha\gamma\gamma\omega\epsilon\acute{\iota}\tau\epsilon$; $\tau\acute{\iota}\ \sigma\upsilon\nu\ \epsilon\pi\omicron\upsilon\mu\epsilon\nu$; $\acute{\alpha}\rho\alpha\ \sigma\upsilon\nu$), whereas in Eph. (e.g. ii. 19) we do find an $\acute{\alpha}\rho\alpha\ \sigma\upsilon\nu$. It has also been claimed that the thought is not Pauline. The real Paul, it is claimed, dealt only with individual Churches; this alleged Paul is dominated by the idea of the one Church. But it is not to be forgotten that from the beginning to the end of 1 Cor. Paul reiterates the truth that the individual Church cannot disregard its relation to the whole Church and still maintain its character as a Church of God (above, p. 281 f.). Not only does he speak of the whole body of Christian believers as worshippers of Jesus (1 Cor. i. 2; Rom. x. 12), as saints (Rom. xii. 13; 1 Cor. vi. 2; so also Eph. iv. 12), or all the saints (1 Thess. iii. 13; Philem. 5; Col. i. 4; so also Eph. i. 15, iii. 8, vi. 18), or of all the Churches (Rom. xvi. 16 ; 1 Cor. iv. 17, vii. 17, xi. 16, xiv. 33), but he speaks of all the Churches together as one Church. It is not the local Roman Church which in Rom. xii. 5 is called the body of Christ, but all the Christians upon earth ; for he includes himself among them. If possible, this is even clearer in 1 Cor. xii. 12 ff. In 1 Cor. xii. 28, Col. i. 18, 24, probably also in 1 Cor. x. 32 (above, p. 297, n. 7, cf. also Gal. i. 13, Phil. iii. 6, 1 Cor. xv. 9, with Gal. i. 22 ff.), this entire organism is called ἡ ἐκκλησία. The fact that this word, which occurs only rarely elsewhere, is found nine times in Ephesians, would be critically significant only if the terms which Paul commonly uses elsewhere to designate the Church as a whole were wanting in Ephesians. This, as we have seen, is not the case. The idea that the conception of an organic Church occurred to Paul only in the process of a later development, or that the idea did not originate until after Paul's time, is not only refuted by the use of ἐκκλησία in 1 Cor. xii. 28, but the notion itself arises from a misunderstanding of Paul's position which is scarcely conceivable. It is self-evident that even the possibility of speaking of the Church in Corinth as the temple of God and of Christ, and the only foundation of the work of God that had been laid in Corinth (1 Cor. iii. 10-17), and the possibility of calling this one Church the body of Christ (xii. 27), were conditioned upon their being a microcosm of the whole Church, and upon Christ's standing in the same relation to their communion as He did to the whole body of believers. Paul knew only one Christ who had died for all men, and only one gospel which was intended for the whole world. It is consequently self-evident that the idea of a Church founded upon this Christ and through this gospel could not have originated from a collective survey of the local Churches ; on the contrary, this idea is the presupposition of all that he says regarding the individual Churches. The special prominence of this idea in Ephesians is due to the fact that in this letter, and in this letter alone, he is addressing a group of Churches which, unlike those in Galatia, had not been organised by his own effort, with whose special conditions he was unacquainted, save as he had learned from Epaphras and Onesimus respecting the conditions in Colossæ, and for which he was concerned as a group of Churches constituting a large section of the Gentile Church of which he was the head. His obligation to these Gentile Christians—an obligation which he designs to fulfil by writing this letter—arises from his commission (iii. 2, 7 f.), which puts him under obligation to all the Gentiles. Because of a lack of personal relations to the Apostle of the Gentiles, they are not to feel that they are excluded from the Gentile Church for which he labours and is in bonds (iii. 1, 13). “They also,” who heretofore have had no personal intercourse with him, are to learn more concerning him (vi. 21, above, p. 490, n. 6) than they had learned from rumours (iii. 2). His design is to protect them from the danger of becoming isolated and lost—a danger to which they were exposed quite as much as the Corinthians, though for other reasons—by making them realise more strongly that they are a part of the great Gentile Church; and since this Gentile Church with the body of Jewish Christians, built upon the same foundation, constitutes the whole Church, that they are members also of the body of Christ, and parts in the building of God.

The designation of apostles and prophets in iv. 11, as first among those who by reason of their special gifts are called to special service in this great organism, is exactly parallel to 1 Cor. xii. 28. Consequently there is nothing strange about the conjunction of these two offices in ii. 20, iii. 5. Assuming as self-evident that in all three passages by prophets Christians are meant, it is hardly likely that prophet is only a second designation of the persons who are first called apostles, for the two are clearly distinguished in iv. 11 (likewise in ii. 20, iii. 5). The use of a single article covering both the words simply indicates the closeness of their connection. And they naturally belong together, where the design is to describe the original organisation of the Church, especially the rise of the knowledge regarding the entire equality of Gentiles and Jews in the Church. In certain instances prophetic revelation and the apostolic office might blend. It was not his consciousness of apostolic duty, but a revelation, which lay outside the sphere of his apostolic office, that influenced Peter to take the first decisive steps in this direction (Acts x. 10, 34, 46, xi. 15, xv. 7). The Magna Charta of the Gentile Church was issued not by the apostles alone, but with the co-operation of the mother Church and its head (Acts xv. 22 ff.); it was proposed by James, who was not an apostle, while the author of the decree is declared to be the Holy Spirit (Acts xv. 28). The prophets Judas and Silas, acting as the ambassadors of the mother Church, strengthened the impression made by the document which they brought through their own eloquent oral exposition of it (xv. 32), and one of these, working as a missionary in conjunction with Paul, had endeavoured to actualise his prophetic knowledge that the Gentiles were fellow-heirs with the Jews of redemption. The designation of the apostles and prophets as ἄγιοι (iii. 5) certainly cannot be interpreted as self-exaltation, which would be out of place in one who called himself an apostle (i. 1); for, as is well known, Paul very frequently designates all Christians without distinction as οἱ ἄγιοι, not because of their piety or morality, which, in certain respects, were still very deficient, and to a large extent unknown to the apostle, but simply to indicate that, by their reception into the Church, they had been separated from the world and dedicated to God. He uses the expression also in a narrower sense with reference to the body of Jewish Christians in Palestine to indicate their special distinction as belonging to God's holy people (Rom. xv. 25 f. ; 1 Cor. xvi. 1 ; 2 Cor. viii. 4), a usage which is found also in Eph. ii. 19. And why should he not use the same word, not as a special designation of the apostles and prophets,—which, in fact, is not done here, nor in Col. i. 26, nor anywhere else,—but simply to indicate through the attribute ἅγιοι that these men were endowed beyond the majority of Christians with the knowledge of the universality of redemption, and commissioned to be the representatives of this knowledge, especially in a sentence where as here he is striving for fulness of expression, as is indicated by the superfluous ἐν πνεύματι. As far as the criticism of the passage is concerned, it makes no difference whether Paul includes himself or, as in 1 Cor. xv. 7, Rom. xvi. 7, means by οἱ ἀπόστολοι the twelve apostles not including himself. The former is the more natural inference from iv. 11 (cf. i. 1) ; the latter, from ii. 20, especially in view of the historical reference of the latter passage. The same is true of iii. 5, since he has just spoken in iii. 3 of the personal revelation to him of the same mystery, since, moreover, in iii. 7 he speaks of himself as being only the chief personal agent through whom the knowledge revealed to the apostles and prophets has been practically realised, and since, finally, in iii. 8 he speaks of himself as less than the least of all Christians, not, as in 1 Cor. xv. 9, as the least of the apostles, scarcely worthy of the name. The fact that he mentions in iv. 11, besides apostles and prophets, a third class, namely, evangelists, would be ground for suspicion only if in the post-apostolic age εὐαγγελιστής was a common designation of an office in the Church, which was not, however, the case. In Paul's writings, εὐαγγέλιον always means missionary preaching (above, p. 171, n. 2). Hence by evangelists he means those preachers who, without belonging to the apostolic body proper, are engaged in spreading the gospel among those who are still un-evangelised. When such persons happened to locate either temporarily or permanently in communities where Christian Churches were already in existence (Acts xxi. 8; 2 Tim. iv. 5), their calling brought them, quite as little as did that of the apostles and prophets, into relation with existing Churches, or with the local Church. This was the particular relation sustained by pastors (Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. v. 2) and teachers (1 Cor. xii. 28; Rom. xii. 7; Acts xiii. 1; Jas. iii. 1), who for this reason are designated as one class. From this it is not to be inferred that at the time when Ephesians was written the teaching office and the office of leadership in the Church were regularly combined, any more than it is to be inferred from ii. 20, iii. 5 that apostles and prophets were always the same persons. All that can be said is that the language used is more natural if frequently the head of the Church performed also the office of teacher (1 Tim. iii. 2, v. 17; Tit. i. 9; Heb. xiii. 7; Acts xv. 22, 32).

Only on the assumption that it is a characteristic of Paul, in season and out of season, always to say the same thing, can it be argued that Ephesians is spurious on the ground that there are new thoughts in this Epistle in addition to those which are emphasised by Paul elsewhere, such as the ideas of election and predestination (i. 4, 5, 9, 11, iii. 9, 11) of the ἀπολύτρωσις through the blood of Christ (i. 7; cf. Rom. iii. 24 f.), of salvation not by works but by faith (ii. 8 f.), of the reception of the Gentiles among God's ancient people (ii. 11-19; cf. Rom. iv. 1-12, xi. 16-24), of the old and new, and of the inner man (ii. 15, iii. 16, iv. 22-24). The fact that Paul identifies himself with Jewish Christians and opposes himself to Gentile Christians certainly cannot be made an argument against the genuineness of the Epistle; for, in the first place, exegetes are not agreed in their interpretations of the interchange of "we" and "ye" in Eph. i. 12, 13, ii. 2-10—in fact, the text is not altogether certain (ii. 8); and, in the second place, quite apart from these difficulties, Paul could never have so far forgotten his Jewish origin as to identify himself with the Gentile Christians in this one point which distinguished them (cf. Gal. ii. 15; Rom. vii. 5 f., ix. 1 ff., xi. 1-7; cf. also the contrast between "we" in Gal. iii. 13, 23-25, iv. 3-5, and "the Gentiles" or "ye" in Gal. iii. 14, 26-29, iv. 6-11). In view of what is said in Gal. ii. 20, Rom. viii. 35, 37, it seems quite unlikely that the idea that Christ loved us, v. 2, 25, should be interpreted as indicating a type of thought transitional between Paul and John, or that the same interpretation should be made of the idea of love to the Lord in v. 2, 25 (cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 22; Philem. 5), or of the contrast of light and darkness (cf. Rom. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. vi. 14; 1 Thess. v. 4 f.), and similar conceptions (HK, iii. 99 f.). If it could be shown that the idea of the parousia has practically disappeared from Ephesians, and that its place has been taken by the idea of a long continuance of the present order of things (HK, 94), it would prove that the Epistle is not Paul's, but would at the same time take us beyond the post-apostolic age into the third or fourth century. If this is the thought expressed by τοῖς αἰῶσι τοῖς ἐπερχομένοις in ii. 7, then we have the same idea expressed in εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας (Rom. i. 25, ix. 5), certainly in εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων (Gal. i. 5; cf. Eph. iii. 21); for, without any question from the point of view of the Christian who expresses praise in this language, these æons are future. When, moreover, it is expressly said in ii. 7 that these æons are yet to come, there is implied a contrast with the αἶων οὗτος (Rom. xii. 2; 1 Cor. ii. 6; Eph. i. 21), to be terminated by the day of redemption and of judgment, i.e. the return of the Lord (Eph. iv. 30, v. 6).

It has frequently been argued that Ephesians is spurious, because of the enlarged significance given to Christ by which he is made to include the whole creation, even the world of spirits (i. 10, 21, iii. 10),—an argument that certainly ought not to be advanced by those who admit the genuineness of Colossians, which contains even bolder statements of this kind (i. 16, 20, ii. 15). From 1 Cor. viii. 6 we know that Paul held the universe to have been created and to be preserved through Christ. Assuming that the δι' οὗ in the Corinthian passage is only a more exact definition of the δι' αὐτοῦ in Rom. xi. 36, which refers to God, it is evident that Christ is not to be excluded from the εἰς αὐτόν of Rom. xi. 36. When Christ is described as the second Adam (1 Cor. xv. 22, 45), the characterisation means, not only that He is the goal of humanity, but of the universe, which was created for humanity's sake, and is, in principle, subordinate to humanity. Since it was through the sin of humanity that death became a ruling power, and the general condition of the universe became one of bondage to that which is perishable (Rom. v. 12, viii. 18 ff.), it is evident that, with the removal of sin and of its consequences not only will humanity be restored to its place of entire dominion in the person of the second Adam, but the whole disordered organism will be restored, and, finally, the dominion of death, wherever it has reigned, will be destroyed (1 Cor. xv. 24-28; Rom. viii. 19, 21). Even if it were not affirmed in so many words (1 Cor. vi. 2 f., xv. 24), yet, from the general biblical view of the relation sustained by angels to the natural world, it would be self-evident that the spirit-world was to have part in this general apocatastasis (Acts iii. 21). In accordance with this, the following statements contain no new thought. The universe, including the world of invisible spirits, was created not only in and through Christ, but also for Him (Col. i. 16). In Him or under Him as its head the universe was to be gathered into one (Eph. i. 10). The reconciliation to God of an estranged humanity, which had been accomplished by Christ's death on the cross, involved the restoration of the relation between the universe and Christ, which was a law of creation, but had been disturbed by sin and its consequences (Col. i. 20). It involved also the restoration of harmony within the universe, a harmony likewise based upon Christ and disturbed by sin (Col. i. 20), just as it involved the restoration of the ties between different branches of the human race, which had been broken (Eph. ii. 14–16); in other words, the bringing together of the Gentiles, who had been separated from God, and the people of His revelation to share the benefits of this revelation (Col. i. 21; Eph. ii. 12 f.). In the nature of the case, the world of spirits, which operated in the secret background of the world's life, must have been aware of these influences emanating from Christ (Eph. iii. 10), and have been able to detect them before it was possible for men to do so, who must learn of them gradually, as they heard and accepted the gospel. For the exaggerations of these statements by a later age Paul is not responsible (n. 11). Similarly, the statement that by the victorious march of the gospel through the world God has stripped from Himself the spirit-powers which concealed Him from the Gentile world in order to reveal Himself in His true nature (Col. ii. 15, above, p. 473 f.), is only an original way of expressing the thought of 1 Cor. viii. 5 f. In view of the circumstances under which the two letters were written, what Paul says on these subjects in Ephesians and Colossians,—more emphatically in Colossians than in Ephesians, as was natural in view of the false doctrine which he here opposes,—and the echoes in Ephesians of thoughts suggested by this contest in Colossæ, are not unnatural.

How impossible it is to accept the results of this negative criticism of Ephesians, is shown by the inability of this criticism to furnish a plausible motive for the forgery of the letter. According to Baur (Paulus, ii. 39 f.), the purpose of the two letters is not so much the theoretical purpose “to expound the higher conception of the person of Christ which they both contain,” as the practical purpose to prepare the way for adjustment between the Gentile Christian and Jewish Christian parties, and so to bring about the establishment of a single Christian Church, and again and again the primary purpose, at least of Ephesians, is declared to be the complete union of Gentiles and those of Jewish birth within the Church in a firm fellowship (HK, iii. 84). Opposition and conflict between the two are presupposed by Holtzmann (Krit. 303, cf. S. 208, 272) when he makes this Paulus redivivus sound the note of triumph and of peace in the Churches founded by Paul. But where is the evidence that with reference to the relation of Jews and Gentiles in the Church there was need for an exhortation to peace? While it is true that in ii. 11–22 mention is made of the hostility between Gentiles and Jews which existed prior to the advent of Christ and was removed by His death, there is no indication that where the gospel was accepted within single Christian communities, which embraced both Jews and Gentiles, this hostility was revived, or continued to exist in a new form of hostility between Jewish and Gentile Christians. Throughout the letter, like a dominant tone, one hears naught but the note of entire restoration of peace and of the continued equality and unity of those who had formerly been Gentiles and Jews. Nothing is said about events tending either to imperil or to promote harmony between Jewish and Gentile Christians, as in Gal. ii. 1–14 or Acts xv., nor are there exhortations to mutual concessions on the part of Gentiles and Jews, as in Rom. xv. 1–13. The exhortation to harmony, because of their common interest in the benefits of redemption, and in view of the diversity of their gifts (iv. 1–16), concerns the mutual relations of the readers (iv. 2, 25, v. 21). But inasmuch as the readers are everywhere addressed collectively as native Gentiles (ii. 11, iii. 1), with nothing to indicate that there were Jewish Christians in their circle or even in their vicinity, this exhortation can have nothing to do with hostility between Jews and Gentiles within the Church. As regards the relation of these Churches to the Church as a whole, nothing is said of the obligation of Gentile Christians to the mother Church, as in Rom. xv. 27; 2 Cor. viii.-ix.; nor is it even mentioned that it was a matter of significance to the Churches in Asia to know that a portion of the Christians outside of Jerusalem were Jews by birth. Only two things are said: They are to love all the saints (i. 15; Col. i. 4; Philem. 5), and they are to pray for all the saints (vi. 18). Such a purpose as this cannot be rightly attributed to the forger of the letter. If so, then we must conclude that he used every means in his power to conceal his purpose and none to realise it. Neither could this pseudo-Paul have meant to express triumphant joy at the success which had crowned Paul's life-work in spite of all the opposition that he had met; for if so, how came it that he addressed the letter to Churches with the organising of which Paul had nothing to do? As a matter of fact he does not praise Paul's success in any special way; and had he wanted to do so, being without ideas of his own, he would have borrowed them from passages like 1 Thess. i. 2-10, ii. 19 f., iv. 9; 2 Thess. i. 3 f.; Phil. i. 5, iv. 1, 15, which it must be assumed he had read. That Paul had heard of these Churches (i. 15), and that they had heard of him (iii. 2), is nothing significant; and that what they had heard had been mutually favourable, is nothing to be triumphantly proclaimed. In fact, where do we hear anything about a preceding conflict without which it would be impossible to speak of victory? The list of these groundless inventions is complete only when a third alleged purpose in the composition of the letter is added, namely, reproof and punishment (Holtzmann, 304). But where in Ephesians is there any indication that the moral and religious conditions in these Churches were unsatisfactory, or where do we discover a word of reproof? Their former heathen life and the conduct of the Gentiles among whom they were living are condemned (ii. 1, iv. 17 f.); but the readers themselves are exhorted only in the most loving way to walk according to their calling, the teaching which they have received, and the love of Christ which they have experienced (iv. 1, 20 f., 32, v. 1), involving naturally as it does the avoidance of sins inherited both by birth and training. What it meant to "reprove and punish" a pseudo-Paul might have learned from Galatians or 2 Cor., or, better still, from the apocalyptic letters to which he is supposed to reply, if indeed he did not say to himself that it was unnecessary in his composition to say anything about heathen immorality in addition to what was to be found in the genuine apostolic writings expressed so trenchantly and so true to life.

1. (P. 491.) For the history of the criticism applied to both Epistles, cf. Holtzmann, Kritik der Epheser- und Kolosserbriefe (sic), 1872, S. 2 f., 18 f. In comparison with the objections raised against Eph. by Usteri, Paul. Lehrbegriff, 1824, S. 2 f., de Wette (from his first edition of the Einkl. 1826 on, more and more decided against its genuineness), and Schleiermacher (Einkl., ed. Wolde, S. 163 ff., 166, "the whole situation of the Epistle doubtful. . . . All positive hypotheses lack foundation," hence even his own conjecture in the first draft that Tychicus or some other disciple wrote it after the pattern of Col., and with Paul's approval, cf. S. 172), Mayerhoff (Der Br. an die Kol. mit vornehmlicher Berücksichtigung der Pastoralbriefe, 1838) sought with considerable method to establish his hypothesis that Col. arose on the basis of Eph., which also was not written until after Paul's time.

2. (P. 491.) Baur, Paulus, ii. 3-49, and Weizsäcker, 541-545, without more precise dating; Hilgenfeld, Einkl. 680, shortly before 140 A.D. Regarding the arguments for the post-Pauline origin of the Epistles, drawn mostly from their theological content, see above in the text. Hilgenfeld, 663, finds it strange that Paul should have remained personally unknown to the Churches at Colossæ and Laodicea, since he had twice travelled through Phrygia (Acts xvi. 6, xviii. 23). But Paul seems to have touched this part of Phrygia on neither his second nor his third missionary journey; above, pp. 188, 190, 449 f. Yet even had he done so, we should have to conclude from Eph. and Col. that he did not succeed either time in founding Churches in this part of Phrygia, but that these arose only after he was established in Ephesus. The placing of the Greek before the Jew, Col. iii. 11, which Mayerhoff (S. 15) had already adduced as a proof of unguineness, has no significance, since Paul here is stating this contrast in a sentence addressed to Gentile Christians. The precedence of the Greek here was just as natural as of the Jew in 1 Cor. xii. 13, a sentence in which Paul the Jew classes himself with the Gentiles of Corinth. In the independent sentence, Gal. iii. 28, there was nothing to prescribe which should come first.

3. (P. 491.) Hitzig, Zur Kritik paulinischer Briefe, 1875, S. 22-33. Holtzmann (title in n. 1) illustrates the criticism which he applies to Col., S. 325 ff., by printing the whole Epistle in two kinds of type to distinguish the genuine from the spurious. Aside from a few individual words, the interpolations are, according to him, i. 9b-12, 14-24, 26-28, ii. 2b-iii. 7a, 9-11, 15, 17-19, 22 f., iii. 1, 2, 4-11, 14-16, 18-25, iv. 1, 9, 15-17. In the JbPTh, 1885, S. 320-368, von Soden held i. 15-20, ii. 10, 15, 18 to be interpolations by another than the author of Eph.; but in the HK, iii. 33, these suspected passages are reduced to i. 16b, 17. As an analogy for Hitzig's hypothesis is adduced the procedure of that obscurantist, who about 370 or 400 interpolated the seven genuine letters of Ignatius and added six new ones of his own devising; perhaps the same man who from the old Didascalia manufactured the Apostolic Constitutions.

4. (P. 497.) Accounts of Cerinthus that are comparatively reliable, and that are not in themselves contradictory, are found in Iren. i. 26. 1, iii. 3. 4 (cf. iii. 9. 3, 11. 7, 16. 5-6); Hippol. Refut. vii. 33, x. 21: pseudo-Tert. Her. x. Epiphanius, Her. xxviii. 1, 2, 5, and Philaster, Her. xxxvi., who is here dependent upon him, were the first to ascribe to Cerinthus a legalistic Judaism altogether incompatible with this representation, being misled by the way in which Irenæus joined him to Ebion and Karpocrates (Iren. i. 26. 2, where, according to Hippolytus, similiter or consimiliter should be read instead of non similiter). This passage may have been repeated in Hippolytus' Synagma, referring, however, only to the denial of the virgin birth of Christ. The story of the sensual chiliasm of Cerinthus (GK, i. 230), started by the Alogi and spread abroad since the time of Caius of Rome, may remain unnoticed here. We come upon difficulties only in Iren. iii. 11. 1, which mentions as the false teachers, against whom John wrote his Gospel, not only the Cerinthians, but along with them the older Nicolaitans, who are designated as an ἀπόστασμα τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως, the oldest Gnosticism. For this very reason we could not conclude that the incidental hints here of an æon-doctrine (Pleroma, Monogenes, and the Logos, distinguished from this as its son), refer to Cerinthus also. Further, since the æon-doctrine hinted at here presupposes the prologue of John (GK, i. 736 ff.), the assumption is a likely one that Irenæus classed with the teachings of Cerinthus and the Nicolaitans, which were being propagated in John's time and against which he wrote, other later doctrines, the weapons for opposing which John is said to have forged in advance (iii. 16. 5, previdens has blasphemus regulus). Moreover, the passage which follows, iii. 11. 2, confirms this assumption; cf. Himpel, De errore christol. in ep. Joannis impugnato, Erlangen, 1897.

5. (P. 498.) We know from Iren. i. 11. 1, 30. 15, ii. 13. 8, that Valentinus did not invent all his doctrines, but worked up the raw speculations of an older Gnosis into an ingenious system; the very concept πλήρωμα, however, is peculiar to the phraseology of his school, so far as we know. This seems to be true also of the peculiar designation αἰῶνες, for the individual beings to be distinguished in the Pleroma. It is the more certain that this arose from an allegorical interpretation of N.T. passages where measures of time, æons, years, or hours occurred (Iren. i. 1. 3, iii. 1-6); for its use cannot be explained at all from the nature of these intermediate beings as they were conceived by the Valentinians. Since Irenæus in his account of the Barbelo-Gnostics (following, to be sure, one of their own writings; cf. C. Schmidt, Berl. Akad. Sitzungsber. 1896, S. 842 f.), uses æonem quendam and magnum æona (i. 29. 1, 2, cf. xxx. 2), expressions which he avoids in his account of Simon, Menander, Cerinthus, Saturninus, and Basilides, we must conclude that this sect was not independent of Valentinus. Concerning Iren. iii. 11. 1, see above, n. 4.

6. (P. 500.) On April 1, 1895, in Friedrichsrub, the present writer heard two speeches by Bismarck, separated only by a breakfast, the first addressed to twenty-one professors; the second, in the presence of four or five thousand students. No one who heard the first could fail to see that the main thoughts, and many of the expressions, whole sentences indeed, were the same in both speeches; but no one on that account listened with impatience to the second, for its tone was much warmer and was artlessly adapted to the changed audience.

7. (P. 500). Examples of the characteristics of Paul's style mentioned above, p. 500, are here cited; an asterisk designates those which, outside the letter cited in any particular instance, do not occur in any of the letters pretty generally recognised as Pauline, or sometimes anywhere else in the whole N.T. outside of the letter quoted at the time: *πρὸς καθάαιρεσιν, 2 Cor. x. 4; καθαιρεῖν, x. 5; εἰς καθάαιρεσιν opposed to οἰκοδομήν, x. 8, xiii. 10.—*ἐν ἐτοίμῳ ἔχειν, 2 Cor. x. 6; ἐτοίμως ἔχειν, xii. 14 (nowhere else except Acts xxi. 13 [speech of Paul]; 1 Pet. iv. 5).—*οἱ ὑπερλίαν ἀπόστολοι, 2 Cor. xi. 5, xii. 11.—*καταναρκεῖν, 2 Cor. xi. 9, xii. 13, 14.—βαρεῖσθαι, 2 Cor. i. 8, v. 4; ἐπιβαρεῖν, ii. 5; βάρος, iv. 17; ἀβαρῇ ἐαυτὸν τηρεῖν, xi. 9; καταβαρεῖν, xii. 16 (cf., besides, βάρος, Gal. vi. 2; only 1 Thess. ii. 6, ἐν βάρει εἶναι; ii. 9; 2 Thess. iii. 8, ἐπιβαρῆσαι).—*ἐξαπορεῖσθαι, 2 Cor. i. 8, iv. 8.—λογίζομαι (not in the sense of "to impute," as fourteen times in Rom. and in 1 Cor. xiii. 5; 2 Cor. v. 19; 2 Tim. iv. 16, but of the estimation of a person), 2 Cor. x. 2, 7, 11, xi. 5, xii. 6 (in this sense only in 1 Cor. iv. 1; Phil. iii. 13 besides).—φυσιοῦν six times, 1 Cor., elsewhere only Col. ii. 18.—συνίστημι, 2 Cor. iii. 1 (here συστατικός also), iv. 2, v. 12, vi. 4, vii. 11, x. 12, x. 18 (twice), xii. 11; in all other Epistles together only four times.—παρακαλεῖν seventeen times, παράκλησις eleven times in 2 Cor.; the former three or four times in Rom., six times in 1 Cor., the latter three times in Rom., once in 1 Cor.—βασιλεύειν, Rom. v. 14, v. 17 (twice), v. 21 (twice), vi. 12; this occurs elsewhere only in 1 Cor. iv. 8, xv. 25.—οὐκ οἶδατε, with or without ἦ preceding, 1 Cor. iii. 16, v. 6, vi. 2, 3, 9, 15, 16, 19, ix. 13, 24; out of all the other Epistles, only in Rom. vi. 16, xi. 2, and the substitute for it ἡ ἀγνοεῖτε, only in Rom. vi. 3, vii. 1.—*οὐδέν (μοι) διαφέρει, Gal. ii. 6, iv. 1.—*ἀνατίθεσθαι and προσανατίθεσθαι, Gal. i. 16, ii. 2, 6.—*ταράσσων, Gal. i. 7, v. 10.—*πορθεῖν in conjunction with διώκειν, Gal. i. 13, 23.—*τί οὖν with a question following Rom. iii. 9, vi. 15, xi. 7, and τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν, Rom. iv. 1, vi. 1, vii. 7, viii. 31, ix. 14, 30, cf. iii. 5; only a distant parallel in 1 Cor. x. 19, νόθευσις, Rom. viii. 15, 23, ix. 4, each time in a different connection; only other occurrences, Gal. iv. 5; Eph. i. 5.—ἄρα οὖν, Rom. v. 18, vii. 3, 25, viii. 12, ix. 16, 18, xiv. 12, 19; only other occurrences, Gal. vi. 10; 1 Thess. v. 6, and in the suspected Epistles, 2 Thess. ii. 15; Eph. ii. 19. One observes the same thing, however, in the case of Col. and Eph. also, whether they be taken separately or conceived of together as having been written one right after the other: ἀπαλλοτριοῦσθαι, Eph. ii. 12, iv. 18; Col. i. 21.—εἰς ἔπαινον τῆς χάριτος or δόξης αὐτοῦ, Eph. i. 6, 12, 14.—σύνδεσμος, Eph. iv. 3; Col. ii. 19, iii. 14.—συνεγείρειν, Eph. ii. 6; Col. ii. 12, iii. 1.—δόγμα*, Eph. ii. 15; Col. ii. 14; δογματίζειν, Col. ii. 20.—παροργισμός*, Eph. iv. 26; παροργίζειν, vi. 4; perhaps also Col. iii. 21 (Rom. x. 19 from LXX).—ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις*, Eph. i. 3, 20, ii. 6, iii. 10, vi. 12=ἐν (τοῖς) οὐρανοῖς, 2 Cor. v. 1; Phil. iii. 20; Col. i. 5, 16, 20, while ἐπουράνιος by itself occurs also 1 Cor. xv. 40, 48 f.; Phil. ii. 10; 2 Tim. iv. 18.—μεθοδεία*, Eph. iv. 14, vi. 11.—συναρμολογεῖν*, Eph. ii. 21, iv. 16.—συμμέτοχος, Eph. iii. 6, v. 7.—καταβραβεύειν*, Col. ii. 18; βραβεύειν, Col. iii. 15 (above, p. 472, n. 3), with which also ἀγών, ἀγωνίζεσθαι belong, Col. i. 29, ii. 1, iv. 12.—σύνδουλος*, Col. i. 7, iv. 7.—ἀπεκδύεσθαι* and ἀπέκδυσις, Col. ii. 11, 15, iii. 9.—ἀρχαὶ καὶ ἐξουσίαι, Eph. iii. 10, vi. 12; Col. i. 16, ii. 15, cf. Eph. i. 21; Col. ii. 10 (only other comparable instances Rom. viii. 38; 1 Cor. xv. 24).—κεφαλὴ of Christ, Eph. i. 22, iv. 15, v. 23; Col. i. 18, ii. 10 (1 Cor. xi. 3 is hardly comparable); hence ἀνακεφαλαιώσθαι, Eph. i. 10 (different in Rom. xiii. 9).—αἰσχροῦς ἢ μωρολογία*, Eph. v. 4; αἰσχρὸς λέγειν, v. 12; αἰσχρολογία, Col. iii. 8.—οἰκοδομή, Eph. ii. 21, iv. 12, 16, 29.—πληροῦν, Eph. i. 23, iii. 19, iv. 10, v. 18; Col. i. 9, 25, ii. 10, iv. 12, 17 (in the four "main Epistles" only seven times), and πλήρωμα, Eph. i. 10, 23, iii. 19, iv. 13; Col. i. 19, ii. 9 (instances in all the other Epistles are, disregarding the quotation 1 Cor. x. 26, confined to Rom. xi. 12, 25, xiii. 10, xv. 29, i.e. here also within very narrow limits).—ὀφθαλμοδουλεία and ἀνθρωπάρεσκοι, Eph. vi. 6; Col. iii. 22.

8. (P. 501.) An instance of this dependence would be the origin of the salutation, as Holtzmann, Krit. 131 f., cf. 55 f., conceives it. The author who made up this letter on the basis of Col. pictured to himself the seven Churches of Rev. i. 4, 11, from Ephesus to Laodicea (S. 13 f., 245, 307), as those addressed. The error of this assumption is obvious; the author did not have in mind Ephesus (above, p. 484 f.), which stands at the head of the list, Rev. i. 11, ii. 1, but, on the contrary, did include in his thought from the first Colossæ, which is not mentioned at all in Rev. i.–iv. (above, pp. 480 f., 486). Besides, Col. iv. 13, where the forger found Hierapolis mentioned, leaves no doubt that he intended Eph., which was composed by him, for the Church in Hierapolis also, another place not mentioned in Rev. If, however, he thought that he must address the seven Churches of Rev., though in a different sense from that of the letters there, why did he not make this plain to his readers by a salutation modelled after Rev. i. 4? He preferred to copy Col. i. 1, so far as it suited him. The words as far as θεοῦ suited, but then he struck out "Timothy the brother," since his "universal and ecumenical aim" required him to strip away all "individual and local limitations in the original" (Holtzm. 131); just as if Timothy was not mentioned as joint author in the letter addressed to all the Christians of all Achaia, a letter, therefore, which had an aim just as much and just as little ecumenical as Eph. (2 Cor. i. 1). He then copied τοῖς, and, since he could not use ἐν Κολοσσαῖς, passed at once to ἀγίοις. Why he copied this and not καὶ πιστοῖς immediately after is not explained. While he could not yet decide upon a fitting address—as ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ, perhaps—to insert at the place where he found ἐν Κολοσσαῖς, so useless to him, it was only after he had copied all of the next word ἀγίοις that he reflected “that at any rate the letter must go somewhere” (Holtzm. 132). But now his patience gave out before he could copy the καὶ πιστοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ, which belongs to ἀγίοις, and to which any number of names of places could be conveniently annexed by means of a τοῖς οὖσιν; so he straightway decided to insert a local address in the most unsuitable place conceivable, and wrote τοῖς οὖσιν as preliminary thereto. According to Holtzm. 132, he decided, after longer meditation “over the mode of the address,” to write “τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν, leaving the name in question to be filled in later.” How Holtzmann thinks he knows this remains a mystery. Whether the author in his autograph originally left a space after ἐν, where his secretary was supposed to insert in the copies intended for the individual Churches the names of their respective cities, and perhaps did so insert them, or whether he himself prepared seven exemplars each with a different address after ἐν, in either case it is equally incomprehensible that the whole ancient Church until after Origen should have possessed no exemplars with ἐν, followed by a gap or by some one or other of these seven names. The ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, which has prevailed since the fourth century, is certainly, according to all extant testimony, direct and indirect (Marcion, Tertullian, Origen, Basil, Jerome, above, p. 488 f.), inserted into an older text which contained neither an ἐν nor a local address. The result of the deep reflection of this writer, who “could not at once specify [his readers] with local exactness,” was therefore this: that he gave up trying to find a local designation for his letter, and then went merrily on to copy what is written in Col. i. 2. Why he omitted ἀδελφοίς, and on the other hand inserted an Ἰησοῦ, and at the end again a καὶ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, which is unquestionably spurious in Col. i. 2, Holtzmann has failed to explain from the “ecumenical” character of the Epistle, or more properly from its designation for the seven Churches of Rev. But without this we have gone far enough to see clearly that the author of this Epistle, which, as no one denies, is rich in great thoughts and sustained by a lofty enthusiasm, was a wretched bungler, unable even to write a salutation suited to his purpose.

9. (P. 503.) Holtzmann, Krit. 100 f., counts in Eph. thirty-nine words which occur elsewhere indeed in the N.T., but not in Paul’s writings, and thirty-seven which occur nowhere else in the N.T., i.e. seventy-six un-Pauline words. The same total is given by von Soden, HK, iii. 88, though he assigns only thirty-five to the second class. The lists need sifting. (A) καταβραβεύειν should be stricken out, since it occurs only in Col. ii. 18, not in Eph.; further, either ἀπελπίζειν or ἀπαλγεῖν, since we cannot read both in iv. 19; also ἅπας, vi. 13, which is likewise well attested in Gal. iii. 28 (quite apart from the fact that πᾶς, which Paul uses everywhere else, occurs fifty-one times in Eph.). Then all exact and inexact quotations from the O.T. should be excluded from the calculation, unless we make the absurd claim that Paul corrected on principle the text of the LXX according to his own vocabulary. Consequently without further debate fall out of consideration αἰχμαλωτεύω, αἰχμαλωσία, ᾤψος, iv. 8 (Ps. lxxiii. 19, Paul himself uses αἰχμαλωτίζω, Rom. vii. 23; 2 Cor. x. 5; 2 Tim. iii. 6); ὀργίζεσθαι, iv. 26

(Ps. iv. 5); σωτήριον, vi. 17 (Isa. lix. 17, instead of this, 1 Thess. v. 8, more freely ἐλπίς σωτηρίας); τιμᾶν, vi. 2 (Ex. xx. 12); ἐπιφάσκειν, v. 14 (GK, ii. 804). Further, words which occur in 1 and 2 Tim. and in Tit. should not be reckoned unqualifiedly as un-Pauline, such as ἀπατᾶν, v. 6 (1 Tim. ii. 14; aside from this, the presence of this word is without significance in view of ἀπάτη, Col. ii. 8; 2 Thess. ii. 10; Eph. iv. 22); ἄλυσις, vi. 20 (2 Tim. i. 16); διάβολος, iv. 27, vi. 11 (1 Tim. iii. 6, 7; 2 Tim. ii. 26); εὐαγγελιστής, iv. 11 (2 Tim. iv. 5); παιδεία, vi. 4 (2 Tim. iii. 16). (B) Designations of things, qualities, or relations, for which there is but one ordinary expression, are of no significance in determining a man's style, unless it can be shown that elsewhere he uses an uncommon expression instead; thus ἄνεμος, iv. 14; ὕδωρ, v. 26; ὁσφύς, περιζώννυμι, ὑποδεώ, vi. 14 f.; μῆκος and πλάτος, iii. 18 (in conjunction with ὕψος, iv. 8, see under A, and βάθος, Rom. viii. 39, xi. 33); μέγεθος, i. 19 (neither has Paul μεγαλειότης, μεγαλωσύνη); μακράν, ii. 13, 17 (in conjunction with ἐγγύς, Phil. iv. 5); ἀμφοτέροι, ii. 14, 16, 18; ἀπειλή, vi. 9; perhaps also ῥυτίς, σπίλος, v. 27; κρυφῇ, v. 12 (as over against a single ἐν τῷ κρυπτῷ, Rom. ii. 29). Also θυρεός, the large shield of the Roman soldiers, and the βέλῃ, against which the shield served as a protection, belong here, unless we are inclined to find fault with the apostle, who had lived for years constantly in the custody of soldiers, and who even before that had borrowed many figures from military service, because he once mentions the shield in addition to the breastplate and helmet (1 Thess. v. 8), or sums up all the weapons of defence and offence as πανοπλία, vi. 11, 13. Since in letters very widely separated in time he is accustomed to draw figures from the games also, it can have no significance that he once, instead of the race and boxing match (1 Cor. ix. 24 ff.; Phil. iii. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 7 f.), makes use of the wrestling match, and writes πάλη, vi. 12. von Soden classes among the pet words of Eph. which, he holds, never slipped from Paul's pen elsewhere (HK, 89), δέσμος, iii. 1, iv. 1; but in doing so he forgets ver. 9 of Philem., a letter which he acknowledges to be genuine (cf. 2 Tim. i. 8); nor does he consider that it was only as a prisoner that Paul could so designate himself and talk of his δεσμοί, Phil. i. 7, 13-17; Philem. 10-13; Col. iv. 18; 2 Tim. ii. 9. (C) Equally of no significance are words related in derivation to other words of Paul used outside of Eph. and Col., and in place of which he elsewhere never or very seldom uses other expressions. So a solitary ἄγνοια, iv. 18, as over against a solitary ἀγνωσία, 1 Cor. xv. 34; ἀγνοεῖν occurring thirteen or fifteen times; or παιδεία, vi. 4 (2 Tim. iii. 16); related to παιδευτής, Rom. ii. 20; παιδεύεσθαι, 1 Cor. xi. 32; 2 Cor. vi. 9; παιδαγωγός, 1 Cor. iv. 15; Gal. iii. 24; or προσκαρτέρησις, vi. 18; along with προσκαρτερεῖν, Rom. xii. 12, xiii. 6; Col. iv. 2; or ἀνοιξίς, vi. 19; from ἀνοίγειν, Col. iv. 3; also with στόμα as object, 2 Cor. vi. 11; or χειροποιήτος, ii. 11; along with ἀχειροποίητος, 2 Cor. v. 1; Col. ii. 11; or φρόνησις, i. 8, as compared with φρόνημα, which has a somewhat different meaning (only in Rom. viii. 6, 7, 27), and the frequent φρονεῖν; or καταρτισμός, iv. 12, as against a solitary κατάρτισις, 2 Cor. xiii. 9, καταρτίζειν being often employed similarly; or αἰσχροτής καὶ μωρολογία, v. 4, as compared with αἰσχρὸς λέγειν, v. 12; αἰσχρολογία, Col. iii. 8; αἰσχρὸς (unseemly), 1 Cor. xi. 6, xiv. 35 (Tit. i. 11); cf. also, as regards the formation of the second word, χρηστολογία, Rom. xvi. 18; and πιθανολογία, Col. ii. 4, each of which occurs but once. If in iv. 23 ἀνανεοῦν stands instead of ἀνακαινοῦν (Col. iii. 10; 2 Cor. iv. 16, cf. Rom. xii. 2; Tit. iii. 5), Paul likewise has along with καινὴ κτίσις, 2 Cor. v. 17, νέον φύραμα, 1 Cor. v. 7, which means essentially the same; and the collocation of ἀνανεοῦσθαι and καινὸν ἄνθρωπον (Eph. iv. 23 f.) has its counterpart in νέον ἀνακαινούμενον, Col. iii. 10. In 1 Cor. ix. 7, ποιμένη and ποιμαίνειν serve as a figure of labour in the Church; hence ποιμένες, iv. 11, should cause no surprise, and from this standpoint there would be no reason to object to Bentley's endeavour to read this word instead of δυνάμεις in 1 Cor. xii. 28, 29 (Ellies, Bentleyi Critica Sacra, 37), especially since unquestionably the figure was very common in apostolic times (1 Pet. v. 2 f.; Acts xx. 28 f.; John x. 9, xxi. 15-17). If Paul represents the Church of the O.T. as well as of the N.T. under the form of a πόλις (Gal. iv. 25 f.), he must have dared to use πολιτεία also, ii. 12, and συμπολίτης, ii. 19, when occasion offered, just as elsewhere he uses πολίτευμα, πολιτεύεσθαι, Phil. i. 27, iii. 20. So also it is of no moment whatever, that of the concepts opposed to these, ξένοι, πάροικοι, ii. 19, the latter is not used by Paul elsewhere, and the former only in Rom. xvi. 23, and then with a different meaning. If in 1 Cor. iii. 10-17 he regards the individual Church as a building in process of erection and as a temple, it is no mark of lexical peculiarity for him in Eph. ii. 20 ff. to apply the same figure to the whole Church, and thus in addition to οἰκοδομή, θεμέλιος, ναὸς ἅγιος, ἐποικοδομεῖν, used elsewhere by him, to use also συνοικοδομεῖν, ἀκρογωνιαίος, κατοικητήριον, συναρμολογεῖσθαι. Since he represents Christians as forming a σῶμα (1 Cor. xii. 12-28; Rom. xii. 4 f.), σύσσωμος, iii. 6, cannot surprise us, even if Paul coined this word himself. This word shares the fault of being used by Paul only once, with those of similar formation, συμφυλῆτης, σύμφυτος, σύμφωνος, σύμφυτος, σύζυγος, συνηλικιώτης (σύμμορφος twice), and a hundred others in the older Epistles. It is possible that Paul, who earlier as "a Hebrew" wrote σατανᾶς regularly (Rom. xvi. 20; 1 Cor. v. 5, vii. 5; 2 Cor. ii. 11, xi. 14; 1 Thess. ii. 18; 2 Thess. ii. 9), and along with this perhaps only ὁ πειράζων (1 Thess. iii. 5), later became accustomed to say ὁ διάβολος. But all that can be adduced in support of this, outside of Eph. vi. 11, is 2 Tim. ii. 26; for Eph. iv. 27, 1 Tim. iii. 6, 7 plainly treat of human slanderers; and along with it we find ὁ πονηρός, Eph. vi. 16; cf. 2 Thess. iii. 3; and ὁ σατανᾶς, 1 Tim. i. 20, v. 15. Similarly uncertain would be the claim that ἀγρυπνεῖν, Eph. vi. 18, which takes the place of the older γρηγορεῖν, 1 Cor. xvi. 13, 1 Thess. v. 6, 10, indicates a later usage; for the former is found nowhere else in the later Epistles, while on the other hand the latter occurs in Col. iv. 2. The remaining words in the list are ἀνίεναι, vi. 9; ἄσοφος, v. 15; ἀσωτία, v. 18 (elsewhere only in Tit. i. 6); ἐκτρέφειν, v. 29, vi. 4; ἐνότης, iv. 3, 13; εὖσπλαγχνος, iv. 32; ἐξισχύειν, iii. 18; ἐπιδύειν, iv. 26; ἐτοιμασία, vi. 15; εὐτραπέλια, v. 4; κατώτερος, iv. 9; κληροῦν, i. 11; κλυδωνίζεσθαι, iv. 14; κοσμοκράτωρ, vi. 12; κυβεῖα, iv. 14; μεστότοιχον, ii. 14; ὁσιότης, iv. 24; πολυποίκιλος, iii. 10; προελπίζειν, i. 12; σαπρός iv. 29; συγκαθίζειν, ii. 6; φραγμός, ii. 14; χαριτοῦν, i. 6. Likewise the vocabulary of Col. has been treated statistically. In his enumeration of un-Pauline words (48=33+15) Holtzmann, 105, A. 3, 106, A. 8, has tacitly left out of account those which occur also in Eph. (see above, p. 518 f.), and which are therefore, according to him, as un-Pauline as those which occur only in the Pastoral Epistles; others, like θρησκεία, καταβραβεύειν, are wanting for no imaginable reason. In the light of the foregoing remarks on the vocabulary of Eph., the great part may be dropped out as having no significance, e.g. ἄλας, ἀνεψιός, ἀνταπόδοσις (iii. 24, cf. ἀνταποδοῦναι, aside from quotations, 1 Thess. iii. 9; 2 Thess. i. 6; ἀνταπόδομα only in the quotation, Rom. xi. 9; but ἀντιμισθία also occurs but twice, Rom. i. 27; 2 Cor. vi. 13), ἀποκρίνεσθαι, ἀπόκρυφος (ii. 3, along with ἀποκεκρυμμένος, i. 26; 1 Cor. ii. 7; Eph. iii. 9), ἀρέσκεια (ἀρέσκειν occurs thirteen times; also ἀνθρωπάρεσκος, iii. 22; cf. Eph. vi. 6; as over against ἀνθρώποις ἀρέσκειν, Gal. i. 10; 1 Thess. ii. 4), ἀρτύνειν, βραβεύειν, καταβραβεύειν (along with βραβεῖον, 1 Cor. ix. 24; Phil. iii. 14), δυναμοῦν, i. 11 (ἐνδυναμοῦν instead of this, leaving out of account Eph. vi. 10; Phil. iv. 13; 1 Tim. i. 12; 2 Tim. ii. 1, iv. 17; also only once, Rom. iv. 20), εἰρηνοποιεῖν (i. 20, as against ποιεῖν εἰρήνην, Eph. ii. 15), ἐξαλείφειν, κρύπτειν (iii. 3; 1 Tim. v. 25; but κρυπτός five times), μετακινεῖν, i. 23 (instead of this perhaps μετατιθέναι, which also occurs but once, Gal. i. 6, or in the suspected Epistle, 2 Thess. ii. 2, σαλεύειν; on the other hand, ἀμετακίνητος, 1 Cor. xv. 58), μόμφη (iii. 13, μέμφεσθαι also only once, Rom. ix. 19, more frequently ἁμεμπτος), νουμηνία (μῆν, Gal. iv. 10, likewise solitary, denotes the same thing), όρατός (i. 16, as against άόρατος, cf. Rom. i. 20), παρηγορία, πλουσίως (iii. 16, as against πλούσιος, Eph. ii. 4; 2 Cor. viii. 9), προακούειν, προσηλθῶν, σκιά, σύνδουλος, σωματικῶς (σωματικός also only in 1 Tim. iv. 8), φιλοσοφία, χειρόγραφον (ii. 14; cf. Philem. 19). Certain expressions are only apparently otherwise expressed outside of these letters: θεότης, ii. 9, expresses a different concept from that of θειότης, which also occurs only once, Rom. i. 20. He chooses ἀνταναπληρῶν, i. 24, instead of ἀναπληρῶν, which he uses elsewhere, since he wishes to express at the same time that he is suffering for the Church in Christ's stead, or in return for what Christ also has endured for him; ἀπεκδύεσθαι, ἀπέκδυσις, ii. 11, 15, iii. 9, double compounds like ἐπενδύεσθαι, 2 Cor. v. 2, 4, instead of the simple ἐνδύεσθαι and ἐκδύεσθαι, 2 Cor. v. 3, 4, because the question here was not of the contrast between being naked and being clothed, but of the removal, putting away of that which has adhered hitherto. Paul puts in the mouth of the false teachers γεύεσθαι, θιγγάνειν, and it is possible that not only here, but in his whole polemic against them, he has reference to their own catch-words, and that in this way we may account for certain quite remarkable expressions, such as ἐν μέρει ἑορτῆς, θέλειν ἐν ταπεινοφροσύνῃ καὶ θρησκείᾳ τῶν ἀγγέλων (above, p. 478, n. 7), from which in turn ἐθελοθρησκεία, ii. 23, is formed. Certain words are left over which Paul could have found occasion to use in the letters which are admitted to be his: ἀθυμείν, ἀποκαταλάσσειν, i. 20 f. (Eph. ii. 16); ἀποκεῖσθαι, i. 5 (2 Tim. iv. 8); ἀπόχρησις, ἀφειδία, δειγματίζειν, ἐμβατεύειν (? above, p. 478 f., n. 7), εὐχάριστος (ἀχάριστος, 2 Tim. iii. 2), παρалоγίζεσθαι, πιθανολογία, πικραίνειν, πλησμονή, πόνος, iv. 13 (instead of κόπος, usual elsewhere, yet not with quite the same meaning); πρωτεύειν, στερέωμα, συλαγωγεῖν (cf. δουλαγωγεῖν, 1 Cor. ix. 27). To these should be added certain rarer words which Col. has in common with Eph.; see above, p. 516, n. 7.

10. (P. 503.) Following the method of our critics, the present writer has compiled an idioticon of Gal., which may be of use also in later investigations. In this list, however, words appearing only in O.T. quotations are omitted. Cf. Ewald, ZKom. Eph. 37. (A) Words which occur nowhere else in the

N.T. : ἀλληγορεῖν, βασκαίνειν, δάκνειν, ἐθνικῶς, εἴκειν (cedere), ἐκπτύειν, ἐπιδιατάσσειν, εὐπροσωπεῖν, Ἰουδαῖζειν, Ἰουδαϊκῶς, Ἰουδαῖσμός, ἱστορεῖν, κατασκοπεῖν, κενόδοξος, μορφοῦν, μυκτηρίζειν, ὀρθοποδεῖν, πατρικός, παρείσακτος, πεισμονή, προευαγγελίζεσθαι, προθεσμία, προκαλεῖν, προκυροῦν, προσανατίθεσθαι, στίγμα, συνηλικιωτής, συνυποκρίνεσθαι, συστοιχεῖν, φθονεῖν, φρεναπατᾶν. (B) Words which occur in no other letter under Paul's name : ἀκυροῦν, ἀναλίσκειν, ἀναστατοῦν, ἀνατίθεσθαι, ἀνέρχεσθαι, ἄνωθεν, ἀποκόπτειν, διαμένειν, ἐγκράτεια, ἐκλύεσθαι, ἐνέχειν, ἐνευλογεῖν, ἐνιαυτός (elsewhere ἔτος), ἐξαιρεῖν, ἐξαποστέλλειν, ἐξορύττειν, ἐπίτροπος, εὐθέως, Ἱεροσόλυμα, καταγινώσκειν, κατάρα, κρέμασθαι, μετατιθέναι, μεταστρέφειν, μὴν, ὅμοιος, παιδίσκη, παρατηρεῖν, πηλίκος, πορθεῖν, προῖδεῖν, προστιθέναι, συμπαραλαμβάνειν, τάρασσειν, ὑποστέλλειν, ὑποστρέφειν, φαρμακεία, φορτίον, ὠδίνειν. (C) Words which occur besides only in the strongly assailed Epistles (Eph., Col., 2 Thess., 1 and 2 Tim., Tit.) : ἀναστροφή (Eph.), ἐξαγοράζειν (Eph., Col.), ζυγός (1 Tim.), μεσίτης (1 Tim.), οἰκείος (Eph., 1 Tim.), παρέχειν (Col., 1 Tim., Tit.), στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου (Col.), στύλος (1 Tim.). To these should be added (D) peculiar phrases which occur nowhere else in the N.T., such as εὐαγγέλιον τῆς ἀκροβυστίας καὶ τῆς περιτομῆς, ii. 7 ; δεξιὰ κοινωνίας, ii. 9 ; προγράφειν, iii. 1 (in an altogether different sense from Rom. xv. 4 ; Eph. iii. 3) ; οὐδέν (μοι) διαφέρει, Gal. ii. 6, iv. 1 ; κόπους παρέχειν, vi. 17 ; ἢ ἄνω (or νῦν) Ἱερουσαλήμ, iv. 25 f. ; ὁ Ἰσραὴλ τοῦ θεοῦ, vi. 16. Thus, apart from the phrases last mentioned, which are of much more significance for a truly critical inspection than the threefold list of bare vocables, there are to be found in Gal. (A 31 + B 39 + C 8 =) seventy-eight suspicious words, and among them seventy which are decidedly "un-Pauline."

11. (P 511.) Ign. Smyrn. vi. 1 : "The judgment falls upon the heavenly beings also and the majesty of the angels and the rulers visible as well as invisible, if they believe not on the blood of Christ." Concerning Col. ii. 15, above, p. 473 f.

§ 30. THE HISTORICAL PRESUPPOSITIONS AND THE OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

Confident that now at last, after many unsuccessful attempts, he had found the way which God wanted him to follow, and accompanied by Silvanus, Timothy, and Luke (Acts xvi. 10 ff.), for the first time Paul touched the soil of Europe in the autumn of the year 52. Without delaying at the port town of Neapolis, he went at once to Philippi, the most important city of Eastern Macedonia (n. 1). Its character was more Roman than Greek ; but this was no hindrance to the apostle's work, since a knowledge of Greek was a necessity for everyone there. Here he found an organised Jewish congregation, which, though small, had among its worshippers a number of "God-fearing Gentiles," mostly women. Naturally, therefore, as was always his custom, Paul made this the centre from which to begin his preaching. To this congregation belonged a dealer in purple, a native of Thyatira, Lydia by name (possibly so called simply from the name of the place from which she came), who asked the honour of entertaining the missionaries at her house (Acts xvi. 14 f., 40). With reference to the other Christian household in Philippi, that of the unnamed jailer, there is nothing to indicate that prior to conversion its members had had anything to do with the Jews. Although it is not stated that Paul taught elsewhere than in the Jewish προσευχή, Acts xvi. 16-23, 39 gives the impression that his coming was followed at once by important results among the Gentiles, of which element the Church in Philippi seems mainly to have consisted.

The meeting with the maid possessed by the spirit of divination—a meeting which was repeated for a number of days afterward—occurred when the missionaries were on their way to the Jewish προσευχή for the first time, and the command of Paul by which she was silenced led to the interference of the authorities, which ended in the expulsion of Paul and Silvanus from the city. Consequently their entire stay in Philippi could not have occupied more than a few weeks. Apparently, however, Timothy, who rejoined Paul and Silvanus in Thessalonica,—at the latest in Berea (above, p. 203),—and Luke, of whose whereabouts during the years immediately following we know nothing, were left behind to carry on the work which had been thus forcibly interrupted. In fact, Phil. i. 1, ii. 19-23 point to an intimate relation between this Church and Timothy. The appeal for protection which Paul made on behalf of Silvanus and himself on the ground of their Roman citizenship, after they had suffered ignominious treatment at the hands of the police (1 Thess.

ii. 2 ; Acts xvi. 22 f.), was not for their own safety, since the command to leave the city, which Paul did not ask the authorities to revoke, was assurance enough that at least, so far as the authorities were concerned, they were not to be further molested. On the other hand, the fact that the highest officials in the city (στρατηγοί = prætores, duumviri) visited the missionaries personally in the prison, apologised for their unfortunate blunder, and politely requested them to leave the city, could react only to the advantage of the teachers and adherents of the new doctrine who remained behind. There may have been subsequent persecutions (Phil. i. 28–30), but on the whole the relation of the Church to those outside seems to have been comparatively peaceful. Six years later, at the time when 2 Cor. was written, Paul had been for some months in Macedonia, and no inconsiderable part of this time must have been spent with the Philippian Christians, who were especially dear to him (i. 7 f., ii. 16, iv. 1). Also on the last journey prior to his arrest he seems to have enjoyed a rest of several days there (Acts xx. 6). In the intervals there were frequent communications between Paul and the Church. A few months after the Church was organised, Timothy was sent back from Athens to Macedonia (above, p. 205). Whether he reached Philippi on this journey we do not know. He certainly did touch at Philippi when he was sent by Paul at the beginning of the year 57 from Ephesus to Corinth by way of Macedonia (above, p. 259 f.). Twice within a few weeks after the Church was organised, while Paul was still at Thessalonica, they had sent him money, and after Paul had left Macedonia continued to contribute to the support of the apostle and his missionary work with greater regularity than any other Church (n. 2). The account of these gifts, which Paul represents as containing credit and debit entries (iv. 15, 17), could in reality hardly have been anything but a written communication between the givers and the receiver. To this communication Paul himself refers in iii. 1. Warnings such as those introduced by the words, "To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not irksome, but for you it is safe," we do not find in any earlier passage of the extant Epistle. Consequently Paul must have written these warnings in at least one earlier letter; and if the allusion was to be understood by his readers, it must have been in a letter written not very long before the present Epistle. The fact that apart from this statement of Paul's we have no trustworthy information regarding more than one Epistle of Paul to the Philippians, is no sufficient reason for denying that there were others (n. 3).

Regarding the frequent communications between Paul and the Church which took place just before this letter was written, Paul himself gives us more definite information. For a time the contributions of the Philippian Church to Paul's support had been intermitted, which was excusable in view of a temporary stringency in their financial condition. But some time prior to the composition of this letter they had again sent to the imprisoned apostle a considerable sum of money, at least enough to meet all his needs, despatching it by one of their own members, Epaphroditus by name, who seems also earlier to have been in the service of the Church or mission (n. 4). Upon his arrival in the place where Paul was, Epaphroditus was taken dangerously ill, as implied in Phil. ii. 30, because of the efforts which he had made to discharge the commission of the Church. When this letter was written he had so far recovered as to be able to take it back to Philippi. Meanwhile, considerable time had elapsed. Not only had the news of Epaphroditus' illness reached Philippi, but the news had come back to Paul and Epaphroditus from Philippi that there was great anxiety there for Epaphroditus' life; for, when he learned how the Church felt, Epaphroditus was very de-siours of returning to Philippi, and Paul felt under obligation to send him as soon as possible with this letter (ii. 25-28). With these interchanges which took place between the arrival and departure of Epaphroditus, it is self-evident that other news also was interchanged between Philippi and Rome and Rome and Philippi. As the messengers came and went, they would naturally be entrusted with letters. The news that Epaphroditus was ill in Rome may have reached Philippi with the report of his arrival there. But whether this announcement was made by Epaphroditus himself, or by Timothy, or by Paul, certainly Paul could not have failed to acknowledge the gift of money which the Philippians had sent, and to express his thanks, or to request the others to do so for him. If it has been rightly inferred from iii. 1 that Paul had written to the Philippians only a short time before, then the most probable assumption is that this letter contained the announcement of Epaphroditus' arrival and of his illness, Paul's first expression of thanks for the gift of money, warnings such as those in iii. 2 ff., and naturally also numerous other communications. We are able to gather from the extant Epistle to the Philippians a fairly definite idea of the manner in which they had replied recently to the letter of Paul's which has not come down to us; for throughout our Epistle is a direct reply, not to the communications received some weeks or months before through Epaphroditus, but to a letter which had just arrived from Philippi. When, contrary to his usage elsewhere, Paul emphasises strongly at the beginning of the letter the fact that he, for his part, has only occasion to thank the Lord Jesus for the substantial interest which they had always taken in him and his work, of which interest they had now furnished additional proof, and that he joyfully fulfils the obligation of petition on their behalf (i. 3-7, n. 2), there is manifestly implied a contrary view of the same facts and conditions. This contrary view cannot very well be that of Timothy, whom Paul mentions in the greeting as joint-writer with him of the letter; for then it would be difficult to understand how possible dissatisfaction with the Philippians on the part of Timothy could be so silently taken for granted and yet be made so much of. Moreover, had this been the case, Paul would certainly have added a Παῦλος to the ἐγὼ μὲν (1 Thess. ii. 18; 2 Cor. x. 1; Philem. 19). Rather must this have been the view of the Church which he addresses (1 Cor. v. 3). The Philippians must recently have expressed their dissatisfaction with what they had done to support Paul and his work, and their doubt as to whether Paul had been satisfied with the same. The tone in which Paul speaks of the matter throughout the letter (ii. 17, 25, 30, iv. 10–20) is natural only on the supposition that this feeling had been very strongly expressed, and the Church had lamented and apologised for the smallness and tardiness of their last remittance. Again and again throughout the letter he assures the Philippians not so much of his gratitude, which he had expressed before, but of his unclouded joy and full contentment with his condition, inward and outward. What he desires and asks of them in the matter of charity is not more sacrifice, in which regard the Macedonian Churches had already distinguished themselves (2 Cor. viii. 1 f., xi. 9; 1 Thess. iv. 9), nor that simplicity in giving which he so often commends (Rom. xii. 8; 2 Cor. ix. 13; Jas. i. 5; Matt. vi. 3), but rather the opposite—a clear insight into and a careful consideration of the circumstances and conditions under which their charity may be exercised consistently with uprightness and good order (i. 9–11). Probably the unfortunate condition of their financial affairs, hinted at in iv. 10, 19, was connected in some way with their deficiency in these virtues (above, p. 220 f.).

A second matter with regard to which Paul found it necessary to set the minds of the Philippians at rest was his own condition at the time. He does not leave it to Epaphroditus to give them an oral account of his state, as he did to Tychicus in his letters to the Churches in Asia (Eph. vi. 21 ; Col. iv. 7). On the other hand, he does not speak of it as if he were telling them something new ; he is simply endeavouring to set in their right light facts with which the Church was already familiar, and with regard to which they had expressed to him opinions differing from his own. The discussion begins in conversational abruptness with the words, " I will have you know, my brethren, that my affairs have fallen out rather to the furtherance of the gospel " (n. 5). As shown by this sentence, as well as by the entire discussion that follows, Paul is speaking here not of various facts and circumstances connected with his own condition and work, but specifically of his trial (ἀπολογία, i. 16). From i. 7, consequently, we must infer that the Philippians had heard of this trial some time before, and had recently expressed their sympathy with him in it. They had done so, however, with more goodwill and love than insight and discrimination (i. 9). They believed not only that the apostle's life, but also the cause of the gospel, was in extreme peril. In answer to this ungrounded fear and the expressions of deep depression resulting from it, Paul shows them that this very trial about which they were so anxious furnishes justification for entertaining the most sanguine hopes both for the cause and for him personally, and that already it has borne fruit for the cause of the gospel (§ 31). It is easy to see how anxiety about the fate of the apostle, to which was now added concern for Epaphroditus' life, together with the feeling that the sending of Epaphroditus and the gift which he carried from them had not been an adequate expression of their love for the apostle, who was now face to face with death, nor had come up to Paul's expectations — how all this had produced a feeling of utter depression in the Church. We can also understand why Paul used every means in his power to dispel this feeling and to make the Church rejoice. Hence his repeated and cordial recognition of their generosity to him (i. 3-7, ii. 17, iv. 10-20), the assurance that he is satisfied with the Church and proud of it (i. 4, ii. 16 f., iv. 1), the repeated exhortation to joy (ii. 18, 28 f., iii. 1, iv. 4) and to freedom from anxiety (iv. 6, 19, iii. 15), and the most favourable representation possible of his present condition and outlook into the future (§ 31). From the noticeable circumstance that he emphasises frequently the fact that he includes all the members of the Church in his remembrances, petitions, thanksgivings, and greetings (i. 1, 4, 7, 8, 25, ii. 17, 26, iv. 21), we must infer that the opinion had been expressed that, while Paul continued to entertain friendly feelings toward individual friends of his in Philippi, he was not so satisfied with others, and consequently not so satisfied with the Church as a whole. And yet it had been the Church which, to the full extent of its ability, had shown this sympathy with him. So it is that the letter is addressed to them in their collective capacity, with special mention of their overseers and officers (i. 1). The condition within the Church was not one of complete harmony, which may have led to emphasis upon the unity of all its members. This assumption could not be made simply upon the basis of what is said in i. 17, ii. 1-5, were not certain persons expressly exhorted in iv. 2, in terms closely resembling ii. 2 f. (n. 6), to work in harmony with others. There were two women who had rendered great service to the Church at the time when it was organised, and who, when this letter was written, seem to have been engaged in some sort of work for the Church; for some unnamed person, whom Paul addresses directly as a sincere companion, probably Epaphroditus, who brought the letter to Philippi, is directed to help these two women in their work. The same is expected also of a certain Clement in Philippi, and of others whom Paul calls his fellow-workers, but does not mention by name. Consequently it could not have been purely personal differences nor differences of opinion about religious matters that made it seem necessary to exhort these two women to harmonious effort and labour, as is evidenced by the peculiar repetition of the word παρακαλῶ. Rather must it have been a matter of Church business, such as had taken Epaphroditus to Rome, in which Euodia and Syntyche had had to contend with difficulties, and had failed to agree entirely between themselves. The sense would be complete if iv. 2 were joined immediately to ii. 29 f.; what stands between in a measure interrupts the thought. After indicating by τὸ λοιπόν in iii. 1 that the discussion of the principal topic of the letter is complete, and that he is about to conclude (1 Thess. iv. 1; 2 Thess. iii. 1), it occurs to Paul—there is indication that he was in doubt for a moment whether he ought to do it or not (n. 3)—to repeat a warning against certain persons which he had already expressed in an earlier letter. The same reasons which led him to overcome his hesitation about repeating the warning influenced him also to dwell upon the subject somewhat at length, and to depart further from the original plan of the letter than the τὸ λοιπόν in iii. 1 would lead us to expect. This had so far fallen into the background, that when he really comes to conclude the letter in iv. 8 he is able to repeat it. If these persons to whose harmful activity he directs the attention of the Church in iii. 2 had already secured a footing in Philippi, especially if they had secured a following in the Church there, Paul would not have hesitated, but it would have been his plain duty to warn the Church, and he would not have called this warning a precautionary warning. There is not a word of regret or complaint for any influence which the Philippians had allowed them to gain over them, nor any formal warning against their seductions.

“Beware of them,” he says once and again. Naturally the Philippians were to do this in order not to be taken unawares. The danger is not immediate. But it is well that their work be known and recognised, as Paul had learned to know it from long experience. These persons are the old enemies, against whom he had warned the Romans in similar manner in anticipation of future troubles (xvi. 17). He calls them “those of the concision,” playing upon the word circumcision, and contrasts them with himself and Timothy, likewise circumcised (i. 1; Acts xvi. 3, above, p. 182), who are of the true circumcision (n. 7), thereby indicating that these persons are Jews unworthy of the name (Rom. ii. 28). This contrast and the whole exhortation would be without point if these persons were only Jews, who possibly had it in their power to persecute the Christian Church. Rather must they have been Jewish Christian teachers, like those who claimed at least the same right to preach the gospel as the true apostles who had founded the Churches in Corinth and Galatia. This is clear from their characterisation as κακοὶ ἐργάται (cf. 2 Cor. xi. 13, ψευδαπόστολοι, ἐργάται δόλιοι). Finally, Paul calls them dogs, not with the design of applying to these unworthy Jews in the name of the Gentile Christians the opprobrious title which the Jews applied to the unclean Gentiles, but having in view the troublesome obtrusiveness and roving character of ownerless dogs, such as one is accustomed to see in the streets of an Oriental city. This threefold characterisation is severe and curt, so that the persons in question could not have been Jewish Christian preachers who merely refused to carry on their missionary work in harmony with Paul and his helpers, whose lack of confidence in him grieved the apostle (Col. iv. 11; Phil. i. 15; § 31). They must have been, rather, sworn enemies of the apostle and undoers of his work, of whom he cannot say, as he does of himself, that they have broken with their Pharisaic past

(iii. 7-14), but when they became Christians they continued to be Pharisees, boasting the legal righteousness to which they had attained, and exercising genuine Pharisaic zeal for making proselytes (Matt. xxiii. 15; Pirke Aboth i. 1); engaged not in preaching the gospel among the Gentiles, but in disturbing the Gentile Christian Churches (n. 8). That there was occasion enough to warn a Church, which as yet had not been attacked by them, against their disturbing influence, Paul was well aware from earlier experience. The real occasion and purpose of the letter, however, are not to be found in this incidental warning, nor in the other exhortations which are also incidental (i. 27-ii. 18, iii. 17-iv. 9), but in the actual statements of fact and opinion in i. 3-26, ii. 19-30, iv. 10-20.

1. (P. 522.) For historical and geographical matter and inscriptions, see HEUZEY ET DAUMET, Mission archéol. de Macedoine, 1876, pp. 1-161; C. I. L. iii. 120, and Nos. 633-707, 6113; C. I. G. Nos. 2010*b* and 2010*c* (p. 995). The mining town Φίλιπποι, founded by Alexander's father on the site of the old Κρηνίδες, received a Roman colony after the battle of 42 B.C. (Strabo, vii. fragm. 41). This in turn was considerably augmented after the battle of Actium (31 B.C.) by settlers from Italy, who had been forced to surrender their own estates to Octavianus' veterans (Dio Cass. li. 4). Thereafter it was Colonia Augusta Julia Philippi with Jus italicum (Dig. li. 15. 6, and 7. 8). For that reason the inhabitants regarded themselves as Romans (Acts xvi. 21). Difficulties meet us in Acts xvi. 12, ἥτις ἐστὶν πρώτη τῆς μερίδος Μακεδονίας πόλις κολωνία; so Tischendorf, following SAC al. On the other hand, B πρώτη μερίδος τῆς M., E πρώτη μερὶς M., D κεφαλὴ τῆς M. πόλις κολ. (cf. S¹, "which is the capital of Macedonia, and is a colony"; also several min., among them 137, Ambrosianus; in Blass, ed. min. = M. om. μερίδος), πρώτης μερίδος τῆς M., conjecture of Blass. (ed. maj.), supported by Lat., Paris, 321 (in prima parte), and the Provençal Version. Hort's conjecture, put forth only tentatively, τῆς Πιερίδος M. (Append. p. 97, cf. Steph. Byz. on Κρηνίδες; Herod. vii. 212; Thuc. ii. 99), has met with no favour. The impulse to all the changes has been given by μερίς, which must be retained. It often indicates a rather large district of a still larger province (Strabo, iv. 3, p. 191 = Cæs. Bell. Gall. i. 1; Strabo, xii. 37, p. 560; xvi. 2, p. 749; frequently in the Egyptian documents, cf. Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, 158; an article by the same author, in answer to the present writer, in the Expos., Oct. 1897, p. 320). The Romans had divided this province into four such districts (Liv. xlv. 29; Marquardt, *R. Staatsverw.*² i. 317). But "the first city" of the district to which Philippi belonged was not Philippi, but Amphipolis. But it is also very improbable that Luke should have called Philippi "a first city of a district," or indeed "of the district of Macedonia." We should rather read with Blass πρώτης, and paraphrase: "a city belonging to the first of those four districts of Macedonia, i.e. the first which Paul touched on his journey, and besides this, a colony, which is the reason for its importance." So far as place and time are concerned, the port Neapolis (now Kavala) was the first city of the province of Macedonia to which Paul came; but without stopping there he journeyed on forthwith by the Via Egnatia, which touches the coast at Neapolis, to the much more important Philippi. To judge by the inscriptions, at least half the population were Latin in origin and speech. There among other things was a Latin theatre, maintained, it would seem, by the town (Heuzey, p. 145, No. 76; C. I. L. iii. No. 6113, archimimus latinus et officialis, etc.). VALENS, the name of the presbyter of Philippi who made considerable stir fifty to sixty years after the Church was founded (Polyc. ad Phil. xi. 1), occurs seven times in a single inscription from the neighbourhood of Philippi, which contains many names (C. I. L. iii. No. 633; cf. also Nos. 640, 671, 679, 680. In No. 633 CRESCENS also occurs twice (cf. Polyc. ad Phil. xiv). The names EUODIA and SYNTYCHE (Phil. iv. 2) do not occur in the inscriptions from Philippi, but are common enough elsewhere. Εὐδία (Latin also Euhodia, in Victorinus on Phil. iv. 2 Euchodia, elsewhere even written Heuodia), C. I. G. Nos. 3002, 5711, 5923, 6390; Inscr. Att. iii. (from the time of the empire) Nos. 1795, 1888, 2079, 3160; Inscr. Gr. Sic. et It. Nos. 855, 1108, 1745; Ägypt. Urk. des berl. Mus. No. 550; C. I. L. iii. Nos. 1388, 2314, 2435; v. No. 1173; vi. Nos. 17334-17339; viii. No. 8569. Εὐδία also (Duchesne et Bayet, Mission au mont Athos, p. 40, No. 50) is different perhaps only in spelling; it is written so even in Phil. iv. 2 in some MSS. The corresponding man's name is Εὐδός, more rarely Εὐόδιος (Philo, c. Flacc. x; Eus. H. E. iii. 22), also Εὐόδιος, Äg. Urk. No. 793. Συντύχη, C. I. G. Nos. 2264m, 2326, 3098, 3865k; Le Bas-Waddington, Asie min. No. 722; Inscr. Gr. Sic. et It. No. 1369b; C. I. L. iv. No. 2666; v. Nos. 1073, 2521, 8125, 8858; vi. Nos. 9662, 10243, 15607, 15608, 23484; viii. No. 7962; ix. Nos. 102, 116, 156, 369, 1817, 2676, 3363, 6100. It is uncertain from Phil. iv. 3 whether both these women supported Paul in the spreading of the gospel as early as his first stay in Philippi; for at the time also when 2 Cor. was written Paul remained several months in Macedonia. He may have spent a part of this time in Philippi and utilised it among other things for an ἀθλεῖν ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ. It may appear strange that Lydia (Acts xvi. 14, 40) is not mentioned in this connection. But we should remember that Lydia is not a real name, but a cognomen derived from the name of her native place; cf. Renan, St. Paul, 146. The Roman poets use it only of those who belong to the demi-monde, who hardly possess a name of their own (Hor. Odes, i. 8, 13, 25, iii. 9; Mart. Epigr. xi. 21). Λύδη also, which denotes the same thing, is very rare as a proper name (C. I. G. Nos. 653, 6975; C. I. Att. iii. Nos. 3261, 3262; Hor. Odes, iii. 28). Just as Omphale is called the Lydian (Sophocl. Trach. 432, cf. 70), so this dealer in purple, who had removed to Philippi from Thyatira, hence from Lydia, probably was often called the Lydian, though she had always borne a personal name besides—perhaps Euodia or Syntychē? Moreover, we are reminded of the purpuraria (Acts xvi. 14, Vulg.) by a mutilated inscription at Philippi (C. I. L. iii. No. 664), and even more definitely by a Greek inscription on a tomb at Thessalonica which the guild of purple dyers erected to the memory of a certain Menippus from Thyatira (Duchesne et Bayet, Mission au mont Athos, p. 52, No. 83). Thyatira, a Macedonian colony (Strabo, xiii. p. 625), had a guild of purple dyers (C. I. G. Nos. 3496-3498). The name Clemens (Phil. iv. 3) is also attested for Philippi, C. I. L. iii. No. 633, Valerius Clemens. In itself it would not be impossible to conjecture that the jailer in Acts xvi. 23 ff. was named Clemens. However, see n. 6. Moreover, the indices to Tacitus, Pliny's Epistles, and the collections of Latin and Greek inscriptions, show that Clemens is such a common cognomen in the first three centuries A.D. that it is a hopeless venture to base any hypothesis whatever upon it alone. Merely to indicate its wide currency, some examples are adduced from the time of the Empire: C. I. Att. iii. Nos. 1094, 1114 (at the end), 1138 (col. 3, line 23), 3896 (all these from Athens, likewise the birthplace of Clemens Alex.); C. I. G. Nos. 3757 (Asia Minor), 4557 (near Damascus), 4801 (Egypt, cf. Berl. Ägypt. Urk. No. 344, four bearers of this name, Oxyrh. Papyri ii. 185, 313, No. 241, 376); 5042 (Ethiopia); 1829c (under the Additamenta from Apollonia in Illyricum); C. I. L. iii. Nos. 1739 (Epidaurus), 5211-5216 (Cilli in Styria). The river outside the town, on the bank of which the Jews and proselytes of Philippi were wont to assemble for Sabbath worship (Acts xvi. 13), is the Angites (Herod. vii. 113, now Angista, perhaps identical with the Γάγγας or Γαγγίτης, Appianus, Bell. civ. iv. 106, 107). It flows past Philippi about half a mile west of the gates of the city, and empties into Lake Cercinitis, through which the Strymon flows, just before reaching the sea. Since προσευχή in Acts xvi. 16, at any rate, denotes the place of prayer, the present writer sees no reason to change the text in xvi. 13 (Blass, ἐνόμιζον ἐν προσευχῇ εἶναι). Though elsewhere προσευχή is used interchangeably for συναγωγή (Schürer, ii. 447 f., cf. 444 [Eng. trans. II. ii. 72 f., cf. 68 f.]), yet Luke, who uses everywhere else the latter word only, seems to express by the former an idea for which συναγωγή did not seem a suitable expression. There were seats there (Acts xvi. 13). But that it was only a makeshift for a regular synagogue is also expressed by οὐ ἐδόκει (so D, Vulg., Gigas, ἐνόμιζεν N, ἐνομίζετο EHLF, ἐνομίζομεν BC) προσευχή (ABDEHLP, προσευχὴν NC) εἶναι. It may have been an open hall, with or without a roof, or some other plain building. There seems to be no support in the older tradition for the statements of the Acts of Paul (circa 170) about a sojourn of Paul in Philippi (Vetter, Der apokr. dritte Korintherbrief, 1894, S. 54; Acta Pauli, ed. C. Schmidt, 72 ff., 77; GK, ii. 599). The names occurring in this, which have been mangled in many ways by translators and copyists, are not poorly chosen. Stratonicē is an ancient Macedonian name (Thuc. ii. 101), and Apollonphanes occurs in an inscription at Neapolis near Philippi (Heuzey, p. 21, No. 5).

2. (Pp. 524, 526.) Phil. iv. 15 f. The καὶ ἐν Οσσαλονίκῃ adds force to the expression, and even when taken alone indicates that the same thing happened later also. But since the stay in Berea, whence Paul journeyed to Athens, was short, we can hardly understand ὅτε ἐξῆλθον ἀπὸ Μακεδονίας of the moment of departure, but as the pluperfect (Hofmann); so that we are to think of remittances to Athens and Corinth (2 Cor. xi. 8 f.). Moreover, Phil. i. 3-7 refers to the material support of the mission on the part of the Philippians, as the present writer thinks he has shown (ZjKW, 1885, S. 185-202) in a somewhat more thorough way than has been done before.

Also the reading of i. 3 there defended, S. 184, ἐγὼ μὲν εὐχαριστῶ τῷ κυρίῳ ἡμῶν, must be considered established so long as no one can explain better than Klöpper, 1893, how this original reading arose from the common one, which plainly resulted from assimilation to a well-known phrase of Paul's found especially at the opening of his Epistles (Rom. i. 8; 1 Cor. i. 4, 14, xiv. 18; Col. i. 3; Philem. 4; 1 Thess. i. 2). Klöpper (Komm., ad loc.) conjectures that the need was felt of freeing the apostle from the connection with Timothy implied in the "address," and that in this 1 Thess. ii. 18 served as model. Why has no one felt and satisfied this need in 1 Thess. i. 2; 2 Thess. i. 3; 1 Cor. i. 4; 2 Cor. i. 3; Col. i. 3? and how could 1 Thess. ii. 18, where it was necessary to distinguish between Paul and his helpers, and where, moreover, ἐγὼ μὲν is followed by Παῦλος, have served as a model for the opening of a letter, where nothing is said which necessarily excludes Timothy? (see above, p. 210). The correct text is attested not only by D*G and their Latin parallel texts, but also by Ambrosiaster, Cassiodorus, and, in a crucial point, another ancient Latin text (Italafragm., ed. Ziegler, p. 74, "gratias ago domino meo"), and the imitation in the apocryphal Epistle to the Laodiceans (GK, ii. 584, "gratias ago Christo"). We should probably translate: "I for my part thank our Lord for all your substantial remembrance (of me, and indeed), always, in each of my prayers, offering up my prayer for you all with joy on the ground of your participation for the purpose of the gospel (i.e. your co-operation in the missionary work) from the first day until now, being confident for this very reason that he who began (such) a good work among you will (also) bring it to completion until the day of Christ Jesus; just as, in fact, it is my duty to be mindful of this for you all (to care for you thus through joyful, continual, hopeful prayer), since I have you in my heart (must ever think of you) as those who are all comrades in my grace both (for years) in my imprisonment and also (now) in the defence and confirmation of the gospel."

3. (Pp. 525, 530.) That τὰ αὐτά, Phil. iii. 1, refers to iii. 2 ff. and not back to χαίρετε ἐν κυρίῳ (cf. ii. 18), surely needs no further proof. Further, since δκνηρός, like φοβερός or our "doubtful, fearful," and the like, is used not only of persons, but also of things which awaken in a person the mood in question, the meaning here (cf. Oed. Rex. 834) must be: "It seems to me unobjectionable; I do not hesitate to write the same to you (Theod. Mops. ἐμοὶ . . . γράφειν ὅκνος οὐδεὶς; cf. Plut. Mor. 11 D, πολλὸς δ' ὅκνος ἔχει με, and the frequent οὐκ ὀκνήσω, e.g. Papias, quoted in Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 3). Further, since the emphasis falls on τὰ αὐτά, not on γράφειν, we cannot complete the thought like Theod. Mops.: "I do not hesitate to say to you in writing also what I said to you orally." We are therefore shut up to the conclusion that Paul is referring to similar warnings of earlier letters still present in his memory and in that of the readers. In saying that it seems to him unobjectionable to repeat the same things, he acknowledges that the repetition might seem superfluous, but that he has overcome this objection or similar ones. It is a question whether Polycarp really knew of several letters of Paul to the Philippianians when he writes, ad Phil. iii. 2: οὔτε γὰρ ἐγὼ οὔτε ἄλλος ὅμοιος ἐμοὶ δύναται κατακοινοῦσθαι τῇ σοφίᾳ τοῦ μακαρίου καὶ ἐνδόξου Παύλου, ὅς γενόμενος ἐν ὑμῖν κατὰ πρόσωπον τῶν τότε ἀνθρώπων ἐδίδασκεν ἀκριβῶς καὶ βεβαίως τὸν περὶ ἀληθείας λόγον, ὅς καὶ ἀπὸν ὑμῖν ἔγραψε ἐπιστολάς, εἰς ἃς ἐὰν ἐγκύπτῃτε, δυνηθήσεσθε οἰκοδομεῖσθαι εἰς τὴν δοθεῖσαν ὑμῖν πίστιν; cf. GK, i. 814 ff. In another place, chap. xi. (retained in Lat. only) he writes: "Ego autem nihil tale sensi in vobis vel audivi qui estis in principio epistolæ ejus; de vobis etenim gloriatur in omnibus ecclesiis." For a discussion of more recent efforts to explain or emend the senseless epistolæ ejus, see Forsch. iv. 252. Better than all others is the suggestion of E. Nestle, communicated to the present writer in a letter, that we assume in the original ἐν ἀρχῇ τῆς ἀποστολῆς αὐτοῦ. Just as ἀποστέλλειν and ἐπιστέλλειν were not infrequently confounded (Acts xxi. 25; 1 [3] Kings v. 8; Neh. vi. 19), so here ἐπιστολῆς grew out of ἀποστολῆς. Even in Gal. ii. 8 the latter word denotes not the act of sending forth, but, quite like the modern "mission," the work committed to the one sent forth, and the performance of this commission. Polycarp renders freely and not badly the ἐν ἀρχῇ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, Phil. iv. 15; but in the following sentence he refers to the Philippians the contents of 2 Thess. i. 4 also. It is the more improbable that this is a temporary oversight, since before in chap. i. 2 he seems to refer 1 Thess. i. 8 f. in like manner to the Philippians, while Tertullian per contra adduces in one instance (Scorp. xiii) several passages of Phil. as addressed to the Thessalonians. The three letters to the Macedonian Churches were classed together by many writers: Clem. Protr. 87; GK, i. 174; Vict. Petav., in the genuine conclusion of his Commentary on Rev., cf. Hausleiter in the ThLb, 1895, S. 196, "Paulus ad ecclesiam Macedoniam ita dixit=1 Thess. iv. 15-17; Jerome, Comm. in Gal. lib. ii. præf. (Vallarsi, vii. 430, probably following Origen, cf. GK, ii. 427 ff., 1002), "Macedones in caritate laudantur et hospitalitate ac susceptione fratrum," which is confirmed by 1 Thess. iv. 9. They were also joined frequently in the MSS. (GK, ii. 344, 349, 353 ff.). It is in this way, then, that Polycarp also knows of several letters of Paul to the Philippians, i.e. the Macedonians. Following an older source, also Georgius Syncellus, Chronogr. ad annum 5576, ed. Bonn, i. 651, may have written in reference to Clement of Rome: τοῦτον καὶ ὁ ἀπόστολος ἐν τῇ πρὸς φιλιππησίους μέμνηται πρώτῃ ἐπιστολῇ. Regarding a second epistle to the Philippians in a Syrian Canon, about 400 A.D. (Studia Sinait., ed. Lewis, i. 11 ff.), see NKZ, 1900, S. 795, 799 f.; W. Bauer, Der Apostolos der Syrer (1903), S. 36 ff., and the writer's Grundriss der Gesch. d. Kanons, 2te Aufl. 49 A. 11.

4. (P. 525.) The references in Phil. ii. 25-30, iv. 10-20, are clear in all essential features. It has been remarked already (n. 2), that in i. 3-7 the Church's very recent active fellowship with their apostle is combined with all their similar conduct before this. But the same is true of ii. 17 also; cf. ZfKW, 1885, S. 290-302. The present writer translates ii. 14-18: "Do all things without murmuring and doubting, in order that you may present yourselves free from blame and impure admixture, as spotless children of God in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, among whom you shine as lights, holding forth the word of life [in] the world, a matter of glorying to me until (and on) the day of Christ, since (in this case, on the presupposition that you follow this exhortation) I (shall) not have striven in vain nor laboured in vain, but even in case my blood is actually poured forth as a libation (cf. 2 Tim. iv. 6), I rejoice over the offering and service of your faith (cf. ii. 25, 30, iv. 18), and delight in you all. Even so do you also rejoice and delight in me!" We might better read simply κόσμῳ instead of ἐν κόσμῳ, which cannot possibly be dragged into the relative sentence alongside of ἐν οἷς (cf. Hofmann). Could Ephrem have read thus (Comm. p. 162, apparebitis mundo)?

5. (P. 528.) Instead of his ordinary οὐ θέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν, Paul writes in i. 12, γινώσκειν δὲ ὑμᾶς κτλ., with stronger emphasis upon the first word, and with reference to ἐπίγνωσις, i. 9. The reading τὰ κατ' ἐμέ incurs the suspicion that it has come in from Eph. vi. 21; Col. iv. 7. We should read τὰ κατ' ἐμέ with GS¹ (which, quite at variance with its rendering of those passages, translates as if the original had read τῇ κατ' ἐμέ πράξει) S³ on the margin, Arm. With regard to τὸ μᾶλλον = potius, not magis or plus (emolumentū, quam detrimento), cf. the writer's Essay, ZfKW, 1885, S. 201.

6. (P. 529.) With τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν, iv. 2, cf. ii. 2, 5, but not 1 Cor. i. 10. It does not mean the same thing as ὁμόνοια, ὁμοδοξία, but always denotes agreement for the accomplishment of practical aims; cf. ZfKW, 1885, S. 193 f. Regarding the names Euodia, Syntyche, and Clemens, see n. 1. With Ἀμβροσίастερ, Lightfoot, Hofmann, et al., we should take μετὰ καὶ Κλήμεντος κτλ. as the continuation not of the relative clause, but of the main clause (συλλαμβάνον), for αἵτινες introduces a motive for that request, namely, the signal rewards which these women deserve for their help in the first organisation of the Church; but they would be only depressed if Clement and many others besides shared these rewards. Moreover, if it really should be thought that Paul's fellow-labourers in the founding of the Church are named here, we should expect to find Timothy and Silas mentioned, instead of Clement and other nameless individuals. The persons in question, then, are men who are now in Philippi, still living, of course, and so in a position to aid these women, to take hold with them of the work which they are carrying on; for this is the meaning of συλλαμβάνεσθαί τι (Luke v. 7; Artemid. Oneirocr. iii. 9, 37, iv. 74, as in the Attic writers, occasionally with genitive of the thing), and not to give them spiritual counsel. In the Book of Life stand the names of those who while living upon earth are enrolled as citizens in heaven (Luke x. 20; Rev. iii. 5, xx. 15; Heb. xii. 23). Paul includes among his fellow-labourers those also who, though in a different place, are carrying on the same work as he (Philem. 1, above, p. 452). Ephrem paraphrases rightly: "quorum nomina ego non hic descripsi, quia multa erant, attamen scripta sunt in libro vite." Paul speaks in the third person of the three whose names are mentioned, and of the nameless co-workers added at the end, and that, too, though he has a request to make of them all. This fact alone makes it exceedingly probable that the single "comrade" addressed in the second person will indeed be present in Philippi at the time of the letter's arrival and thereafter, but is now at the time of the letter's writing present with Paul. Victorinus (Mai, Ser. vet. n. Coll. iii. 2. 80), also Lightfoot and Hofmann, rightly conjectured that Epaphroditus is meant. If this helper sat near Paul during the writing, or served him perhaps as scribe, it must have seemed unnatural to the apostle to have his request come to Epaphroditus in the same form as to those who were absent, mediated, so to say, by the Church to whom the letter was addressed (cf. Col. iv. 17). Rom. xvi. 22 is not a parallel case. Clem. Al. Strom. iii. 53, p. 435, thought that Paul was speaking here of his wife, whom, according to 1 Cor. ix. 5, he did not take with him on his journeys, thus differing from the other apostles. This view is adopted by Origen, who allegorises δοῦλος, Rom. i. 1, cf. 1 Cor. vii. 22 (Delarue, iv. 461), and appeals to a tradition which, to be sure, lacked universal acceptance (sicut quidam tradunt). It is also quoted by Eusebius without unfavourable criticism, H. E. iii. 30; and this must have been the cause of the further spread of the fable that Paul was married (propagated with peculiar zeal before Eusebius by Pierius, according to an excerpt in the Cod. Barocc. 142, cf. de Boor, Texte u. Unters. v. 2. 170; then by pseudo-Ign. Philad. chap. iv.; Epiph. Mon., ed. Dressel, p. 39; Solomon of Bassorah, Apis, chap. 1., tr. by Schönfelder, p. 83). Clement omitted the γνήσιε, a form incompatible, as Theodore Mops. long ago emphatically declared, with this interpretation of Phil. iv. 3, which would have required γνησία instead; and Renan, St. Paul, 148, who thought that Lydia should be understood, neglected to justify the masculine. This is not one of those adjectives which vary between two and three endings for gender (Kühner-Blass, i. 1. 536). Moreover, σύζυγος γνησία could hardly denote anything else than the legitimate wife in distinction from a concubine (Xen. Cyrop. iv. 3. 1). The ancient Lat. translation germane compar (e.g. Ambrosiaster, Vulg.) or germane unijuge (Victor. p. 79) led to the mistaken idea that Germanus was a proper name (Pelagius=pseudo-Jerome, Vallarsi, xi. 3. 377), which in this form forced its way even into the Greek text of Cod. G. In a similar way from the Greek γνήσιε, which perhaps the Syrians had previously written on the margin, arose the remarkable proper name Chenisi or Khenesis in the Armenian Ephrem, p. 166; cf. Vetter, Lit. Rundschau, 1894, S. 111. On the other hand, Laurent, Neutestamentliche Stud. 134, sought to defend σύζυγε as a proper name, though such a name has not yet been pointed out either in the literature or in inscriptions. Wieseler, Chron. 457 f. note, thought that Christ should be understood; Rückert, on 2 Cor. viii. 22, S. 265, an own brother of Paul's; Völter, ThTij. 1892, S. 124, Timothy. With regard to modern allegorical interpretations of the passage, see § 32, n. 4.

7. (P. 531.) Inasmuch as, in spite of his mention of Timothy, i. 1, Paul has spoken of himself in the singular uniformly throughout the letter, and a great many times too, the ἡμεῖς in iii. 3, 17b is all the more striking, especially since "I" stands immediately before and after it. It cannot group the apostle with the Christians addressed, like the "We" of iii. 15 f., or with all Christians, as in iii. 20 f. In iii. 17b both are alike impossible, and Paul can mean only himself and Timothy, whom he mentions along with himself in i. 1. Why is that not true of iii. 3 also? Timothy was also circumcised (Acts xvi. 3). It is incredible that Paul should be speaking here in the name of all Christians, much less of the Gentile Christians, with reference to baptism and the new birth; for (1) the Judaists were also baptized, and could thus appeal to the outward sign of spiritual circumcision (Col. ii. 11); (2) Paul the Jew is here speaking; (3) he speaks in iii. 5 of his circumcision in the literal sense; (4) he does not distinguish here between a spiritual and a carnal circumcision, in which case he must have disallowed the Judaists' claim to circumcision, i.e. the true one. He simply says that by reason of their evil mind their circumcision had lost its worth, has become merely a mutilation. Paul is not here giving utterance to the truth that Christians are the true Israel, a thought quite out of place in this connection; he is rather, as in Rom. ii. 25, 28 f., contesting the worth of being a Jew outwardly, on which basis the Judaists were able to win consideration for themselves, and is setting himself and his helpers, the founders of the Church, who sprang from Israel indeed, but who have broken with Pharisaic Judaism, as the real Jews over against these false brethren. The Philippians then need not be imposed upon by them. The change back to ἐγώ, iii. 4, from the ἡμεῖς, iii. 3, is fully explained by the fact that iii. 3 indeed, but not iii. 4 ff., could be said of Timothy, whose origin was only half Jewish, and who was not circumcised until adult age. Paul does not use the plural again to indicate himself until iii. 17, and even there such a transition was in itself no more necessary than in the similar passages, 1 Cor. iv. 16, xi. 1; Eph. v. 1. But since Paul prefers not to set himself before the Philippians as a model without at the same time mentioning others who may likewise serve as examples, it is indubitable that he means them to understand by these others the founders of the Church, just as in 1 Thess. i. 6; 2 Thess. iii. 7, 9, the only difference being that in 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1 all three are named as writers of the letter, in Phil. i. 1 only Paul and Timothy. We are thus to understand these two by the "we" in iii. 3, 17. With κύρις Hofmann aptly compares Ps. lix. 7, 15, xxii. 17, 21. Furthermore, the idea of uncleanness is more remote in this case, though elsewhere in the N.T. it is coupled with this word, Matt. vii. 6, xv. 26; Rev. xxii. 15; cf. Schoettgen, p. 1145.

8. (P. 532.) On a superficial comparison of Phil. iii. 19 with Rom. xvi. 18 and of Phil. iii. 18 with Gal. vi. 12, we might come to the conclusion that in Phil. also the reference is to the Judaists; moreover, the view that it was these of whom Paul had often spoken to the Philippians would agree very well with iii. 1 as rightly understood. However, what he was reminded to say about the Judaists has already come to a close in iii. 15. Here in a general exhortation to conduct modelled after that of the founders of the Church (cf. i. 27, ii. 12), there was need of a clear reference to iii. 2 if the thoroughly general description of the "earthly minded" was to be understood in such a special sense. On the other hand, indeed, this is not a description of Gentile immorality outside the Church (ii. 15; Eph. iv. 17), but of just such immorality on the part of many Christians (2 Thess. iii. 6, 11; 1 Cor. v. 1); for it is only because the missionaries' earlier exhortations have had no effect upon them that Paul must confess that now, even weeping, he calls them the enemies of the Cross of Christ. The words do not allow us to determine whether they have gone so far as an open renunciation of Christianity, or have simply shown by their un-Christian conduct that they will recognise none of the earnest life that the Cross demands; cf. 1 Tim. i. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 10. Polycarp, xii. 3, following Phil. iii. 18, speaks of the enemies of the Cross after he has mentioned the heathen kings, the persecutors and enemies of Christianity.

§ 31. PAUL'S SITUATION AT THE TIME WHEN PHILIPPIANS WAS WRITTEN.

The apostle was in prison (i. 7, 13, 14, 17), and must have been in Rome; for otherwise among the greetings sent to the Philippians by the whole body of Christians in the community where he was, he could not have specified as a special group those of the Christian servants belonging to Cæsar's court (n. 1). He could not have assumed on the part of his readers the knowledge of an accidental and temporary residence of royal servants in Cæsarea, among whom were a number of Christians, but must have made special mention of the fact and have explained why they were there. On the other hand, the Philippians, who had been in recent communication with Paul (above, p. 524), might very well have known that among the Christians in Rome there were servants of the imperial household (above, p. 419 f.). Moreover, Paul was in a place where there were a large number of missionaries at work, some of whom were friendly, others hostile to himself (i. 14-18), which suggests at once the situation in Col. iv. 11, and, like this passage, points to Rome (above, p. 443 f.). Finally, what is here said about Paul's trial suits Rome, but would have been impossible in Cæsarea.

Unlike the other imprisonment letters discussed, Philippians, besides mentioning the imprisonment of the apostle, speaks of his defence and confirmation of the gospel as if it were something associated with the imprisonment and yet to be distinguished from it (i. 7). The defence of the gospel was known, at least to his friends, to be the one purpose of his imprisonment (i. 16). From the repeated use of the word ἀπολογία and the usual meaning which this word has elsewhere (1 Cor. ix. 3; 2 Cor. vii. 11; 2 Tim. iv. 16; Acts xxii. 1, xxv. 16), it is clear beyond question that reference is had to the defence of an accused person before a tribunal, and not to that vindication of the gospel which accompanied its proclamation to non-Christians. That a trial was impending the Philippians had learned some time before, and had recently expressed their sympathy with Paul at this turn in his fortune (i. 7). Indeed, this turn of affairs had made them very solicitous about Paul and the cause of the gospel (above, p. 528). In answer to this feeling, Paul shows them in i. 12-18 that, so far as the cause of the gospel is concerned, it has suffered no harm whatever, but has only gained. One good result has been that "his bonds in Christ have become manifest throughout the whole prætorium and among all the rest." Since everyone at all interested in Paul's fate had known perfectly well, ever since the day of his arrest in Jerusalem, the fact of his imprisonment, this passage must mean (and this interpretation is favoured by the position of ἐν Χριστῷ) that it has now become clear to everyone that he had been imprisoned solely because of his relation to Christ, and not for any offences against public order (Acts xxi. 28, 38, xxiv. 5; 2 Tim. ii. 9). Of course, Paul's fellow-believers knew this from the first, and the procurator Festus had at once convinced himself of the fact (Acts xxv. 18 f., 25, xxvi. 31 f.). When, however, Paul continued year after year in prison under constant military guard, persons not intimately acquainted with him, who came in contact with him or heard of him, must have assumed that there were serious criminal charges against him. Not until the new turn in his affairs, which brought him to trial and gave him opportunity to defend himself, was this cloud removed; and naturally the imperial guard would be the first to understand the situation. To take "prætorium" (i. 13) as referring to a building, not to a group of persons, is practically out of the question, because of the co-ordination of ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ and καὶ τοῖς λοιποῖς πᾶσιν. To take it as referring to the prætorian guard is justified, both by linguistic usage and the actual circumstances of this case (n. 2). If, upon his arrival in Rome, Paul was handed over to the præfectus prætorii, the soldier who guarded him would have been a prætorian soldier (Acts xxviii. 16, n. 2).

With the frequent daily changes of the guard, in the course of two years Paul would have come into contact with hundreds of these praetorian soldiers. How natural that they should know about the progress of his trial, and that through them it should become more widely known among the populace! If through the trial it had become generally known that Paul had been accused by the Jews, and until now had remained in prison solely on account of his religious convictions, that was so much gained for the gospel.

A second gratifying result of the hearing which had taken place some time before is indicated in i. 14, namely, that the majority of the brethren had become confident in the Lord as to the outcome of the apostle's imprisonment (n. 3), and were venturing more than they had done heretofore to proclaim the word of the Lord fearlessly. Some there appear to have been in Rome, who, like the distant Philippians, feared the worst. From the fact, however, that the majority of the Christians about Paul who were engaged in spreading the faith were confidently expecting Paul's release, and on the strength of this confidence were preaching the gospel with increased courage and zeal, it must be inferred that on the occasion when Paul made his defence it became apparent that the Imperial Court was not inclined to suppress the gospel nor to punish men like Paul, against whom nothing could be proved except that they were engaged in spreading a new Jewish doctrine. The Roman judge must have taken the same attitude toward his case as had been taken by Gallio and Festus, and made that attitude known (Acts xviii. 15, xxv. 19). Nothing is said in Philippians about preaching activity on the part of Paul and the fellow-workers about him (Eph. vi. 19 f.; Col. iv. 3, 10-14; Philem. 10, 23 f.), just as the earlier letters of the Roman captivity or Acts xxviii. 16-31 are silent regarding any trial in progress. Evidently the trial had put an end to the preaching. When his trial began his active work ceased, being deprived as he was of the liberty required to carry it on. Others had taken his place in this work. Although the Philippians were troubled when they heard that Paul was no longer able freely to continue his preaching work, Paul himself looks upon it rather as advantageous to the gospel, and expresses his joy at the ample substitute which exists for his own preaching (i. 12, 18). He forces his noble heart thus to rejoice, although he cannot conceal the fact that this increased activity on the part of the missionaries about him is in part influenced by motives which can cause him no joy. A glance at Col. iv. 11 (above, p. 442) leaves no doubt that he had in mind Jewish Christian missionaries. From the fact, however, that he calls all the preaching which was being carried on about him a proclamation of Christ, expressing his own joy at the same, taking into consideration also his purpose to encourage the Philippians to take a hopeful view of the situation, we must conclude that he is not referring to false brethren, or evil workers, dogs, servants of Satan, like those he warned them against in iii. 2, and with whom he had had to contend in Corinth and Galatia. The persons of whom he speaks in i. 14–18 not only preach Jesus (2 Cor. xi. 4), but also the Saviour whom Paul preaches; so that their purpose, the governing motive of their work, must have been the proclaiming of Christ. But Paul discovers other motives and indirect purposes in this newly increased preaching activity about him. Now that Paul is hindered from working, there are many who labour with increased zeal, even actuated by ill-will toward him, καὶ διὰ φθόνον καὶ ἔριν, and governed generally by unworthy feelings (ἐξ ἐριθείας). They avail themselves of this opportunity to gain precedence over him, and to lay claim to the field which he is compelled temporarily to vacate. They have a certain malicious joy in seeing their great rival condemned to inactivity, and do not hesitate to add to the pain of his captivity by making him envious at their success, for such, they feel, must be the effect of their work (i. 17, οἰόμενοι); but they are mistaken. There are other Christians in Rome who have been stimulated to increased activity, both by their zeal for the cause of Christ and by their love for the friend who is now before the emperor's tribunal. No matter by whom the cause of the gospel is promoted, nor with what feelings toward himself its promotion is carried on, he is able to rejoice at its progress.

But even looking at the situation from a personal point of view, he is able to contemplate both the present and the future with joyful confidence (i. 19–26). This is the third hopeful aspect of the progress of his trial, by emphasising which Paul seeks to overcome the despondency of the Philippians. He certainly cannot approve nor share their feeling about his trial. For him the only life worthy of the name is Christ, and of Him no one nor anything, not even death, can deprive him; in fact, if he were consulting only his own blessedness, death would be pure gain, because thereby his longing for more intimate fellowship with Christ would be satisfied. On the other hand, he has a calling upon earth to fulfil which seems to render necessary a longer continuance in the flesh. He finds himself unable definitely to decide between the two. As a Christian he comforts himself with the thought that whatever the outcome of the impending trial may be, whether it ends with his execution or his acquittal, Christ will be glorified in his body. These considerations (i. 20–24) prove that such a state of discouragement as had taken hold of the Philippians, and the surrender of their joy in the Lord (ii. 18, iii. 1, iv. 4) in contemplation of Paul's possible martyrdom, have no place whatever in the Christian life. But, leaving this out of account, this anxiety of theirs is groundless, and the danger which they fear imaginary. Paul is firmly convinced that he is soon to be set at liberty. "I know that this shall issue in my salvation through your prayer, and through the supplying of the Spirit of Jesus Christ" (i. 19). Since the petitions of the Church for the apostle in prison, and now on trial, could not have been offered for his death but only for his release (Philem. 22; 2 Cor. i. 11; Acts xii. 5), the help of the Spirit must also relate to the same. The apostle is confident that the Spirit of Christ who has helped him heretofore will stand by him when he makes his defence, supplying everything that he needs in the emergency, preserving constantly his presence of mind, and enabling him to speak words which shall lead to his acquittal (Matt. x. 19 f.; Mark xiii. 11; Acts iv. 8). Accordingly, the salvation which he feels sure is to be the issue of his trial is not the blessedness nor the glorification of Christ through him, whether by life or by death, of which he speaks in i. 20, but his acquittal. That this is his meaning one is compelled to infer from his use of the words of Job to express this confident expectation (n. 3). And any possible doubt is removed by the second passage, in which he states with even greater definiteness what he feels sure will be the issue of his trial (i. 25). What he says in i. 22 about the advantage of his longer continuance in the flesh is stated only hypothetically; in i. 24 this continuance in the flesh he declares as his actual conviction, which would be impossible if his only ground of expectation were simply a conjecture from the preceding course of his trial that he was to escape with his life. With even stronger emphasis he claims again to know certainly that he shall continue to live, come to Philippi again, and have fellowship not only with individual members of the Philippian Church, like Epaphroditus, but with the whole Church (i. 25 f. n. 3). How this conviction was formed Paul does not state explicitly. Doubtless it was due in part to the favourable opinion as to the outcome of the trial which Paul and those about him had formed from its preceding progress, which led them confidently to expect his acquittal (i. 12-18), also to the feeling which Paul had that his life mission was not yet fulfilled (i. 22, 24). We shall not, however, be wrong—in fact, will be giving simply the impression gained from all Paul's statements about the matter—when we affirm an additional cause, namely, a longing desire on his part and a premonition which were not governed by any rational considerations (i. 19, 25). This third determining influence, which played an important rôle in Paul's life, as it does in the life of every great man and of all men having the habit of earnest prayer (n. 4), is suggested in i. 20; for it is not a common Christian experience confidently to hope that Christ may be glorified in one's body, whether this body continue longer to be a dwelling-place or be immediately dissolved. Paul's confidence is based upon past experiences (ὡς πάντοτε καὶ νῦν). Because in the past this frail and suffering body of his has been so often used as the instrument of Christ's miraculous power, he hopes that it will be so to the end. Therefore he cannot believe that death will come to him in the deep, or at the hands of robbers (2 Cor. xi. 25 f., i. 10; cf. above, p. 318 n. 4), or in feverish delirium, but he looks forward with longing and with hope to a death which itself will glorify Christ, i.e. to a martyr's death (John xxi. 19). Even more clearly does he direct attention in ii. 17 to this violent end, not as a possibility for which he and the Philippians must be prepared, but as the goal of his earthly life—not to be realised at once, to be sure, but certain to come in the end (above, p. 536 n. 4). While he speaks thus of his martyrdom only as something which he earnestly desires and hopes for (i. 20), he feels confident, for the reasons already given, that death is not now imminent, but that a period of activity lies before him. No trace of any doubt as to this outcome is to be detected in ii. 19-24.

The trial is not yet at an end. For the time being all that Paul can do for the Philippians is to pray for them (i. 4, 9), and by the sending of Epaphroditus (ii. 25–30), as well as through the letter which Epaphroditus was to bring for the quieting of their fears, to strengthen and encourage them. When he is certain how the case will go, i.e. when sentence has been passed, he does not plan to go at once to the East and to Philippi, but trusts that he shall then be able to send Timothy to Philippi (ii. 23). When, now, he expresses his confident expectation that he himself will shortly come (ii. 24), the ταχέως is not to be taken too strictly, since the point of comparison is the sending of Timothy immediately after his case has been decided (ii. 23, ἐξαυτῆς). Furthermore, the manner in which Paul speaks here of Timothy's relation to the Philippians and to his own apostolic work (ii. 20–22), shows that this man, who had helped to organise the Philippian Church, was not going back simply for the purpose of conveying a letter and news, but that temporarily he was to take Paul's place in Philippi while the apostle remained absent for some time longer. Finally, before he leaves Rome or goes to Philippi, Paul plans to await the return of Timothy from Philippi, hoping through him to receive good news from the Church there (ii. 19). Taking all these things into consideration, one must conclude that after the end of his trial Paul purposed to remain away from Philippi for at least some months, either intending after his acquittal to stay for some time in Rome, where he would then be able to prosecute his work with entire freedom of movement, or to carry out his long cherished plan of pressing out from Rome to the West (Rom. xv. 22–29). The former is the more natural supposition, since, if Paul had planned before returning to the East to take up a new work in the West, he could not have foreseen how soon he would be able to get release from it; so that for him to announce his early arrival in Philippi would have been strange (ii. 24, i. 25), particularly since some time before he had announced his intention of visiting Colossæ (Philem. 22, above, p. 454), which involved a journey from Rome to the East. Still these considerations are not decisive (see below, § 36).

It is very evident that the situation depicted in Philippians could not have preceded, but must have followed that presupposed by Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon (n. 5). When the latter were written Paul was engaged in preaching the gospel, supported by a considerable number of helpers; nothing is said of any external hindrances with which he had to contend. They quite confirm what is said in Acts xxviii. 30 f. He does not ask the Christians in Asia to pray that such hindrances may be removed, but only that his preaching of the gospel may be of the right kind and followed by larger results (Eph. vi. 19 f.; Col. iv. 3 f.; indirectly, also, iv. 5 f.). Since in Philippians there is no indication of preaching activity on Paul's part, indeed i. 14-18 can hardly be understood in any other way than as implying that other missionaries in Rome had taken advantage of the interruption in Paul's work (above, p. 592 f.), the inference is that the letter was written, not during the two whole years that followed his arrival in Rome (Acts xxviii. 30), but after their close, i.e. later than the spring of 63. This conclusion follows with even greater certainty from the positive facts of which we learn in Philippians. If the trial, upon the outcome of which depended Paul's fate and all his plans for the future, took place during these two years, then the entire representation of the case in Acts xxviii. 30 f. is misleading; for this passage gives throughout the impression that for two whole years after Paul was delivered to the commandant of the guard his condition remained practically unchanged, with no judicial investigation of his case. Moreover, assuming that the trial took place during these two years, it is difficult to understand why this trial, which at the time when Philippians was written was arousing the deepest sympathy on the part of those about Paul and of his distant friends in Philippi, and was being followed by all with the greatest interest,—why this trial had no apparent influence upon Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon. If Paul and all those about him, Christians and non-Christians alike, were correct in their judgment at the time when Philippians was written, he must have been set at liberty very shortly afterward, which excludes the possibility of Paul's having written later during the same imprisonment letters in which his condition seems uniformly to be that of a captivity of indefinite duration, in which only once reference is made to the prospect of liberation (Philem. 22, above, p. 454), and that in a way purely subordinate and incidental. The supposition of the earlier date of Philippians is just as impossible if it be assumed that Paul and those about him were totally deceived in their opinion, or that some unforeseen circumstance gave the trial an outcome different from that which they had expected. In that case he would have been either executed or banished to an island, or condemned to labour in the mines. Finally, another indefinite postponement of the trial after it had been begun in such earnest, and when it was so near decision, is extremely difficult to conceive. And even if such a delay did take place, which at the time when Philippians was written seemed entirely impossible, there could hardly fail to have been some trace of it in letters written later during the same captivity, as well as of the bitter disappointment of Paul and his friends caused by this delay. But the most difficult thing of all to explain is how Paul, some weeks or months after he and his friends had been deceived in the expectation which they had had of his ultimate release,—an expectation based upon good and sufficient grounds,—how Paul could have expressed again, even incidentally (Philem. 22), the hope of being set at liberty without having the strongest grounds for entertaining such a hope, and without stating to his distant friends the reasons why he felt that he and they would not be again deceived. Only one other possibility remains, namely, that the events upon which at the time when Philippians was written Paul based his definite expectation of being set at liberty, took place in the interval between the composition of Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon and the composition of Philippians. At the close of the two years (Acts xxviii. 30), during which Paul's case remained in statu quo, in the spring of 63 his trial began and soon took a turn most favourable to the accused, as set forth in Philippians. The indefinite hope which he had had of being set at liberty again, and of being able to visit the Churches in Asia (Philem. 22), has become a definite expectation. Whether this expectation was fulfilled must be determined primarily by the investigation of the other letters attributed to Paul which have not yet been inquired into.

1. (P. 540.) Phil. iv. 22, μόλιστα δὲ οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας. Concerning the somewhat doubtful δέ, cf. GK, ii. 939. Although domus Caesaris (Cesarum, Augusta, Augustana, Augustiana, later domus divina) is the ordinary designation of the imperial house in the sense of the ruling family with all its members, the expression which we have here (ἐκ τῆς οἰκίας, ex domo) never denotes relatives of the emperor. Such a meaning would be expressed by οἱ ἐκ γένους (or πρὸς γένους, Clem. Hom. iv. 8, xii. 8, 15), or ἀφ' αἵματος (Philo, Leg. ad Cai. xi; Jos. Bell. i. 18. 4), or βασιλικοῦ γένους (Dio Cass. ix. 1. 3), or συγγενεῖς τοῦ Καίσαρος (Acta Thecla, xxxvi). It denotes rather, according to constant usage, servants in the imperial household. In later times some of these might be of high rank, but earlier they were only slaves or freedmen (Philo, in Flacc. v, Mang. ii. 522; Acta Petri et Pauli, ed. Lipsius, 104. 9, 106. 15, 193. 5; Hippol. Refut. ix. 12 beginning; Inscr. R. Neapol. No. 6912, "ex domo Caesarum libertorum et servorum," etc.; C. I. L. vi. Nos. 8645, 8653, 8654; x. No. 1745). In Gregory's Testament (Migne, xxxvii. 389), ἐκ τῆς οἰκίας μου γενόμενος is "my former slave." We must also remember that from the earliest times οἰκέται, like domestici during the period of the Empire (Suet. Otho, 10 end; Tert. Apol. vii, xxxix), denotes the "domestics" (cf., further, Lightfoot, Phil. 19. 165, 169-176). It was not until after Nero's time that certain court positions were filled by knights instead of freedmen, and it was later still before this came to be the rule (cf. Friedländer, *Sittengesch.*⁶ i. 83 f.); consequently Phil. iv. 22 cannot refer to persons of knightly rank. The later tradition about equites Caesareani among the Roman Christians of that time (Clem. Hypot. on 1 Pet. v. 13, Forsch. iii. 83, 95) carries back into the times of Phil. iv. 22 conditions which did not arise until later.

2. (P. 541.) On τὸ πραιτώριον, Phil. i. 13, see Marquardt, *R. Staatsverw.*² ii. 411, 475 ff.; Mommsen, *R. Staatsr.*³ ii. 863 ff.; Lightfoot, 97-102. As a place it denotes originally the general's tent and the part of the camp where this stands—the headquarters; then the dwelling of any prince or chief official (Matt. xxvii. 27; Mark xv. 16; Acts xxiii. 35; Acta Thom. 3, 17, 18, 19; Tert. Scap. iii); finally, any particularly aristocratic, "princely" building (Suet. Aug. lxxii; Calig. xxxvii; Tib. xxxix in prætorio = Tac. Ann. iv. 59 in villa). When the emperor dwelt in such a building outside of Rome, it was occasionally so designated in the dating of an edict, as, e.g., C. I. L. No. 5050 Bais in prætorio; cf. Jos. Ant. xviii. 7. 2. The view of the Antiochian commentators (e.g. Theodorus, ed. Swete, i. 206), that the imperial palace in the capital which was called palatium in their times, went by the name of prætorium in Paul's time, is a worthless conjecture, unsupported by any examples. Still more untenable is the notion that ἡ Καίσαρος οἰκία (iv. 22, which, if for no other reason than the form of the phrase itself, οἱ ἐκ τῆς κτλ. cannot mean a building) is equivalent to τὸ πραιτώριον (i. 13) = τὸ πραιτώριον Ἡρώδου (Acts xxiii. 35). This is the view of O. Holtzmann, ThLz. 1890, col. 177, who is quoted approvingly by Spitta, Urchristentum, i. 34. But a palace built by Herod in Casarea was far from becoming ἡ Καίσαρος οἰκία simply by passing over into Roman hands or by serving presumably as the procurator's official residence; still less were the people employed in this building οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας. Proof is lacking also for Wieseler's view (Chronol. 403), that prætorium denotes the guardroom or barracks in or beside the palatium where one of the prætorian cohorts was regularly quartered (Tac. Hist. i. 24, 29 ["cohortis quæ in palatio stationem egit"], 38; Ann. xii. 69; Suet. Otho, vi). Dio Cass. liii. 16. 5, like Polyb. vi. 31. 6 f., translates prætorium by στρατήγιον; but his meaning is simply that the emperor lived in the palace and had his headquarters there, not at all that a part of the palace was called prætorium. Nor can it be proved that this is used here as a name for the castra prætorialia (Plin. H. N. iii. 9. 67) or castra prætorianorum (Tac. Hist. i. 31) outside of the Porta Viminalis, where since Tiberius' time the whole guard had been quartered (Tac. Ann. iv. 2, 7, xii. 36; Suet. Tib. xxxvii; Schol. on Juv. x. 95; Dio Cass. lvii. 19. 6). To begin with, we are not to think of a place at all as referred to in Phil. i. 13, since the combination "in the whole prætorium and (among) all the rest"—especially in view of the fact that the second expression has no preposition of its own—is correct and natural only if prætorium indicates a class of persons. Furthermore, this corresponds to an unquestionable usage; for prætorium, along with cohortes prætoriae, is the regular name for the imperial guard. Moreover, expressions like præfectus prætorio, militare in prætorio, have nothing to do with a particular locality, and passages such as Tac. Hist. iv. 46 ("militiam et stipendia orant . . . igitur in prætorium accepti") and Suet. Nero, ix ("ascriptis veteranis e prætorio"), which have been adduced to support the meaning castra prætorialia, simply establish the meaning "guard." Paul, from the time of his arrival in Rome, was probably guarded by soldiers from this body (Acts xxviii. 16). This passage in the other recension reads: ὅτε δὲ εἰσῆλθομεν εἰς Ῥώμην, ὁ ἑκατόνταρχος παρέδωκε τοὺς δεσμίους τῷ στρατοπεδάρχῃ· τῷ δὲ Παύλῳ ἐπετρέπη μένειν καθ' αὐτὸν ἔξω τῆς παρεμβολῆς σὺν τῷ φυλάσσοντι αὐτὸν στρατιώτῃ (cf. Blass, Comm. 287; ed. min. 94. 9f.). The ancient Latin translation of this text gives for τῷ στρατοπεδάρχῃ principi peregrinorum according to one MS. (g=the so-called Gigas in Stockholm), and prefecto according to another (p=Paris, lat. 321), with which a Provençal version agrees. Even before the latter variant was known, Mommsen (Sitzungsber. d. Berl. Ak. 1895, S. 495 ff.), following a suggestion of Harnack's, not only collected all that was hitherto known about the princeps castrorum peregrinorum, commonly called for brevity princeps peregrinorum, but also sought to show that the centurion Julius handed over Paul and the other prisoners to this princeps peregrinorum, declaring, on the other hand, that the traditional reference of στρατοπεδάρχης to the praefectus praetorio was "impossible historically as well as linguistically" (498). In answer to this the following must here suffice: (1) The existence of a princeps castrorum peregrinorum (C. I. L. vi. No. 354), and of the troops and barracks of which he was the commandant, has yet to be established for the time preceding the reorganisation under Septimus Severus. The occurrence of the title in a Latin text of Acts xxviii. 16 is no proof of an earlier date, for it is a hypothesis improbable and incapable of demonstration that there was any Latin translation of Acts before the death of Severus, 211 A.D. (cf. GK, i. 51-60). Besides, we do not know that praefectus or princeps peregrinorum dates from the first translator. (2) Inasmuch as this princeps peregrinorum occurs in a Latin text of Acts written at the very earliest a hundred and twenty-five years after the Greek original,—therefore, at any rate, not a translation resting on a knowledge of the events there related, and linguistically not a translation of στρατοπεδάρχης at all, but at best only a happily chosen quid pro quo, it cannot help us in our search for the meaning of the original writer. (3) As for the alleged linguistic impossibility of taking στρατοπεδάρχης as equivalent to praefectus praetorio, it is particularly to be emphasised that the Latin title in Luke's time and long afterwards was rendered by the Greeks in many different ways (cf. Mommsen, *R. Staatsr.*³ ii. 866, and the citations in Hirschfeld, Unters. z. röm. Verwaltungsgesch. i. 220-239). Josephus, Luke's contemporary, uses various renderings (Ant. xviii. 6. 6, xix. 4. 6, xx. 8. 2), once having recourse to ἦν ἐπὶ τῶν στρατοπέδων (Ant. xix. 1. 6), in which connection it should be remarked that τὰ στρατόπεδα does not here mean castra, but is synonymous with τὰ στρατεύματα (xviii. 6. 6, xx. 8. 2), and this in turn with οἱ σωματοφύλακες (xix. 4. 6); so likewise Luke (xxi. 20) understands by στρατόπεδα troops, while he terms their camp or barracks παρεμβολή (Acts xxi. 34, 37, xxii. 24, xxiii. 10, 16, 32, xxviii. 16). Herodian, a Syrian, and therefore fellow-countryman of the Antiochian Luke, uses regularly, besides the simple ἑπαρχος (i. 9. 10), ἐπαρχῶν τῶν στρατοπέδων, i. 16. 5 [in this one place ἑπαρχος τ. στ.], iii. 10. 5, xiii. 1, iv. 12. 1 [τοῦ στρατοπέδου], v. 1. 2. Philostratus renders it in various ways (Vit. Apoll. iv. 42, vii. 16), once (Vit. Sophist. ii. 32) as οἱ τῶν στρατοπέδων ἡγεμόνες. Why should not Luke have included in the one compound στρατοπεδάρχης what Josephus, Herodian, and Philostratus expressed by combining its various parts—especially since the word is used quite often to designate important commands (Dion. Hal. x. 36; Jos. Bell. vi. 4. 3; Luc. Conscr. Hist. 22; Eus. H. E. viii. 4. 3, ix. 5. 2; Mart. Palest. ix. 2)? (4) The eye-witness who is speaking in Acts xxviii. 16 may have been none too well informed about military matters, or at least not specially conversant with the official titles; but he is certainly not speaking here generally of some officer of rank or of any barracks whatever, but of the one particular στρατοπεδάρχης in Rome, and of the one particular παρεμβολή. Consequently the former term must mean the praefectus praetorio and the latter castra praetorianorum. From the third century onward it was a fixed rule that the emperor exercised his jurisdiction through the praefectus praetorio (Mommsen, R. Staatsrecht, ii. 972, 987, 1120); but even before this it was so exercised in very many cases, cf. Traj. ad Plin. lvii (with regard to one who had appealed from the sentence of the governor: "vinctus mitti ad praefectos praetorii mei debet"); Spartianus, Severus, iv. 3; Philostr. Vit. Sophist. ii. 32. Whoever was so sent from the province to receive final judgment at the hands of the praefectus praetorio certainly had to be brought before him or his subordinates; and who but the praefectus praetorio or his subordinates could have had the task of deciding where and how those under accusation and those held for examination should be lodged and guarded in Rome? Paul was not sent to the imperial tribunal without a report from the procurator Festus (Acts xxv. 26 f.). To whom could the centurion Julius have delivered the prisoners and the report respecting them but to the praefectus praetorio as judicial deputy of the emperor? Previously, Mommsen (*R. Staatsr.*³ ii. 972, n. 2) decided from Phil. i. 14 (read rather i. 13) that Paul, like other "accused persons sent from the provinces to Rome for final judgment, was given over to the praefecti praetorio to be guarded." Now that is "historically impossible," since, while the praefectus praetorio administered criminal justice, he had nothing to do directly with the superintendence of the prisons (Sitzungsber. 498, A. 1; 498, A. 2). But, as a matter of fact, Acts xxviii. 16 does not refer any of these things to the stratopedarch; it says simply that after Julius had reported with his prisoners to the commander-in-chief, and, as we are justified in adding, had delivered up the writ from Festus, permission was given to Paul, in distinction from the other prisoners, who were confined in the camp in question, to dwell outside the camp guarded by a soldier, that is, to find and rent quarters for himself (cf. xxviii. 30). The passive expression (ἐπετράπη) leaves it uncertain whether the praefect himself, or, as is more likely, one of his subordinates, decided upon the various dispositions to be made of the prisoners. The Roman expounder of Paul's Epistles in 370 A.D. (Ambrosiaster in his prologue to Eph. p. 231), who naturally had before him the old Latin text of Acts xxviii. 16, 30 (see above, p. 552, line 5 f.), says of Paul incidentally: "quia veniens ab Hierosolymis in custodia sub fidejussore intelligitur degisse, manens extra castra in conductu suo." To Paul, then, was granted at the outset a favour which was secured by Agrippa, later king Herod Agrippa I., only after long imprisonment of a stricter kind and as a preliminary to his final release (Jos. Ant. xviii. 6. 10; Niese, § 235, and Lightfoot's discussion of the same, 101, as against Wieseler's misinterpretations). This case is very instructive for the study of Paul's situation. By the emperor's order the praefectus praetorio Macro arrested Agrippa (Niese, § 190; cf. Hirschfeld, p. 219, No. 6)—the event occurring in Tusculanum (Niese, 179). From that time on Agrippa was constantly kept in chains and guarded by soldiers, naturally of the prætorian guard (Niese, 195, 196, 203, 204, 230, 233), and that, too, in the στρατόπεδον at Rome (235), i.e. the castra prætoria, until he was allowed after the death of Tiberius to go back to his former private dwelling, though still kept under guard (235). This latter was Paul's situation during the two years. What form his imprisonment took at the end of this period so sharply defined by Luke is a question. Tradition is here silent. Yet we must conclude from Acts xxviii. 30f. that Paul then ceased to live in his own hired house. He was not released, for at the time of Phil. he was still under arrest and in chains. On the contrary, his trial had now begun. If the præfectus prætorio as the emperor's deputy conducted this trial, Paul must have been lodged either in the castra prætoria outside the Porta Viminalis, or, since the præfectus prætorio had to stay in the palace as a rule (Mommson, *R. Staatsr.*³ ii. 864 ; Dio Cass. lxi. 18, 2, cf. above, p. 551, n. 2, line 26, on Dio Cass. liii. 16, 5), in the guardroom of the prætorian cohort stationed there. The latter assumption is strongly supported by Phil. iv. 22. The special greeting from Christians who belonged among the court servants, following the greeting from the narrower circle of his friends (iv. 21) and from all the Christians in Rome (iv. 22a), would then be explained by the nearness of the court. Still it is possible that for the "Romans" of Philippi (Acts xvi. 21) it would be of itself peculiarly interesting and a matter of encouragement to receive a greeting from Christians in the neighbourhood of the emperor. It would thus be borne in upon the anxious hearts of the Philippians that the Christian confession and thus also Paul himself at that time were not so much in danger at Rome as they had supposed. But be that as it may, it was not for a short time merely, but ever since his arrival in Rome, that Paul had had to do with the "Prætorium," and indeed with very many soldiers of that body one after the other. Thus, and thus alone, can Phil. i. 13 be explained satisfactorily. Mommsen (Sitzungsber. 498, A. 1) holds it as indubitable that πραιτώριον should be understood as "the judicial board, the præfecti prætorio [there was only one at that time, Acts xxviii. 16] with their numerous assistants and subalterns"; but one would like very much to see examples from the usage of the first century which would confirm such a view. It does not agree well with the expression ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ, which suggests a large body such as the guard was (from Tiberius until Vespasian it consisted of nine cohorts of a thousand men each, Tac. Hist. ii. 93), and is at variance with the facts related above, which shows that Paul for more than two years had had relations with hundreds of prætorians in the ordinary sense of this word.

3. (Pp. 542, 545.) It is not merely the words τοῦτο μοι ἀποβήσεται εἰς σωτηρίαν, i. 19, which Paul borrows from Job xiii. 16, LXX ; as usual, he has in mind the whole context out of which he takes the expression ; xiii. 18f. especially in his thought, and in his οἶδα we can even hear an echo of the words οἶδα ἐγὼ ὅτι δίκαιος ἀναφανοῦμαι ("that I shall be acquitted in the trial"). This determines the meaning of τοῦτο = "the legal process in which I am involved" (essentially the same as τὸ [αἰ. τὰ] κατ' ἐμέ, i. 12 ; cf. ii. 23), and of σωτηρία = "preservation of life" (Acts xxvii. 34), which in this case could be only acquittal by the judge. Cf., further, the writer's essay, ZfKW, 1885, S. 300 f., also S. 108, 201, with reference to i. 7, 12. In i. 25, τοῦτο πεποιθώς can hardly be translated "firmly convinced of this," "sure of this," or "relying upon this." Appeal to Bernhardt's Syntax, 106; Kuhner-Gerth, i. 309, A. 5; or to πέπεισμαι τῇ, Heb. vi. 9; or to πέποιθα, Rom. ii. 19 (acc. with inf.); Phil. ii. 24 (ὅτι), cannot make up for the lack of examples of πέποιθα, with acc. In Phil. i. 6, αὐτὸ τοῦτο="for this very reason." Consequently the certainty expressed in i. 25 is not based upon the confidence in the judgment of i. 24; but along with this judgment, which is quite possibly only an erroneous judgment, is expressed the conviction: "And this I know assuredly, that." (Cf. ii. 24, πέποιθα, of the same thing; Rom. xiv. 14, οἶδα καὶ πέπεισμαι.) The frequent recurrence of πεποιθέναι (in Phil. six times, in all the other letters seven times) is in keeping with his mood and situation. The construction with the dative, i. 14 (cf. Philem. 21; 2 Cor. x. 7), does not express the idea that these brethren put their confidence in Paul's chains, which of itself would be hard to comprehend, but that they now took a hopeful view of these chains, and awaited an outcome of his imprisonment favourable both for Paul and for the progress of the gospel. Joined to μενῶ (=ἐπιμένειν τῇ σαρκί, i. 24) in i. 25 is καὶ παραμένῶ, besides (needlessly amended in the Antioch text to read συμπαραμένῶ) added to introduce πᾶσιν ὑμῖν. It does not mean, however, "to remain with you all," for Paul was not yet in Philippi; but παραμένειν retains its meaning "to continue in life" (Herodot. i. 30; Iren. iii. 3. 4), and not infrequently in this connection (Plato, Phaed. p. 115; Iren. ii. 22. 5 παρέμεινε γὰρ αὐτοῖς μέχρι τῶν Τραϊανῶν χρόνων; ii. 32. 4, παρέμειναν σὺν ἡμῖν ἱκανοὶ ἔτεσιν); therefore, "I shall continue in life, and, what is more, in fellowship and intercourse with you all."

4. (P. 546.) The supernatural agencies operating in Paul's decisions and actions are emphasised not only in Acts, especially those passages where the narrator shows that he himself was present (xvi. 6-10, 18, xx. 23, xxi. 8-14, xxiii. 11, xxvii. 23; cf. ix. 3-18, xiii. 2, 9, xviii. 9, xxii. 17), but also by Paul himself (Gal. ii. 2; 2 Cor. xii. 1-9, 12, i. 17; Rom. xv. 19). What he means by magnifying Christ in his body may be gathered from 2 Cor. ii. 12-16, iii. 18, iv. 11, vi. 9, x. 3-6, 11, xii. 7-10, 12, xiii. 3-10; 1 Cor. v. 5, xv. 30-32; Gal. iv. 13-15, or from the narratives of miracles in Acts.

5. (P. 548.) Since Bleek, Lightfoot in particular, pp. 29-45, has advocated the view that Phil. was written earlier than Eph., Col., and Philem. He holds (38) that the outward condition of Paul at the time of Phil. is in no-wise different from that described in Acts xxviii. 30 f., and to be inferred, it may be added, in Eph., Col., and Philem.; but this, as has been once more demonstrated (above, p. 540 ff.), is as untenable as the assumption that Paul's prospect of release is not more strongly expressed in Phil. than in Philem. 22 (39). If Paul had had a definite prospect of release when he wrote Philem., he could not have left it wholly unexpressed in his other letters of that date, Eph. and Col. (above, p. 545); but aside from this, is ἐλπίζω then (Philem. 22) really equivalent to οἶδα, πεποιθὼς οἶδα, πέποιθα ἐν κυρίῳ, Phil. i. 19, 25, ii. 24? Further, we must regard the letters written at the same time and addressed to Christians of the same place, Col. and Philem., and in a measure also Eph., as a single reflection of a definite situation; how then can we compare the solitary line occurring, not in the Epistle to the whole Church, but among some remarks at the close of a private letter, with the detailed description and argument in Phil. i. 12-26, with the further assurance in Phil. ii. 24, and with the repeated reference to the contrast between absence and personal presence in Philippi, i. 27, ii. 12? Lightfoot's single positive argument lies in his theory of a gradual development in Paul's writings in respect of theological thought, polemic antitheses, and style, according to which he judges that Phil. has more in common with the older letters, Rom. especially, than with Eph. and Col. Here also this theory is plainly incompatible with the facts (see above, p. 200 f.). After what has been said in notes 1-3, it seems to the present writer to need no further proof that we cannot think of Phil. as having been written at a still earlier time, namely, in Cæsarea, especially as it must be accepted as proved that Eph., Col., and Philem. also were written, not in Cæsarea, but in Rome. The arguments used above, p. 443 ff., to prove this latter point, only gain force when applied to Phil. Spitta (Urchristentum, i. 34) finds in Phil. i. 30 a proof that Paul has only lately become a prisoner. But Paul's battle, of which the Philippians have lately heard, is not one which arises from his imprisonment, but from the change in his fortune denoted by the ἀπολογία (i. 7, 16)—those very events with regard to which he has enlightened the troubled Philippians in i. 12-26. A still stronger argument for the composition of the letter in Cæsarea is held to lie in iv. 10 ff.; but such an opinion is overthrown by the ἡδὴ ποτέ, which points to a long interruption of the financial aid on the part of the Philippians (above, p. 525 f.).

§ 32. THE GENUINENESS OF THE EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

One would suppose that the inimitable freshness of feeling betrayed in every line of this letter, the naturalness, even carelessness of its style (n. 1), the large number of facts hard to invent, regarding which the readers are not definitely informed, but which are touched upon and elucidated in a conversational way under the presupposition that they are already known, together with the strong external evidence, particularly the evidence of the Philippian letter of Polycarp, a disciple of one of the apostles—might have safeguarded Philippians more even than the other Epistles of Paul against the suspicion of being the product of a later period. Hitzig, indeed, saw (Zur Krit. paulin. Briefe, 24) that Baur's criticism lacked exegetical basis, and Holsten actually endeavoured by a new interpretation of the letter to secure such a basis for his own criticism, which in essentials agreed with that of Baur (n. 2). Baur directed his attention mainly to the passage so much discussed by theologians, ii. 5-11, which with all its beauty really has in the letter as a whole a very subordinate place, and contains scarcely more dogmatic material than is to be found in a sentence like 2 Cor. viii. 9. According to Baur, the author of Philippians here denies of Christ what Valentinus had taught concerning his σοφία (Paulus, ii. 51-59), although, as a matter of fact, Valentinus' σοφία did not grasp after likeness to God, but sought to unite itself with the divine First Cause; while, between the sinking of the baser part of this σοφία into matter and the self-emptying of Christ, there is nothing in common except the fact that both the Pauline κενοῦν ἑαυτὸν and the Valentinian name for matter (κένωμα) are derived from the word κένος. According to Baur's representation, the author of Philippians, like the pseudo-Paul of Ephesians and Colossians, was influenced and governed by the very Gnostic ideas which he here seems in some measure to oppose; and this view is maintained notwithstanding the fact that Philippians was adopted with some changes by Marcion into his N.T. (S. 51, 59, cf. above, p. 497 f.). Instead of admitting the natural agreement between Phil. iv. 15 and 2 Cor. xi. 8 f., Baur finds (S. 62-65) the repeated relief of Paul by the Philippians, which he thinks had been arranged beforehand, to be in contradiction to the principles laid down in 1 Cor. ix. 6-18, apparently forgetting that the same contradiction exists between 1 Cor. ix. and 2 Cor. xi., and that to allow one's self to be supported and paid by those who hear one's preaching is, in fact, a very different thing from accepting the freewill offerings of a grateful Church towards the carrying on of new missionary work, that is, towards defraying the expenses of travel and making the preaching of the gospel without cost in other places. The indifference to false teachers shown in Phil. i. 15-18 is also found to be un-Pauline (Baur, ii. 72; Hitzig, S. 15). As a matter of fact, this expression of unselfish joy on the apostle's part for the spread of the Christian faith in Rome shows that the preaching of all the missionaries who were working there, even those who were hostile to Paul, was in his judgment really a proclamation of Christ. The thing which he shows himself magnanimous enough to overlook is not the corruption of the gospel, but the unfriendly, to him painful, rivalry of certain preachers (above, p. 543).

If, now, it be asked, what purpose there was in the forgery of the letter, a twofold answer is given. Baur—and at this point Hitzig agrees with him—finds this purpose to be—(1) the glorification of the extraordinary success of Paul's preaching in Rome, and (2)—and at this point it is Holsten especially who follows in Baur's footsteps—to lessen the opposition between the Jewish Christian and Gentile Christian parties. The former purpose is inconceivable, since throughout the entire letter nothing is said about Paul's preaching in Rome. Neither the imperial guard nor the larger group to whom reference is made in i. 13 owed their conversion to the knowledge, secured through Paul's trial and from contact with him, to the effect that he was not a violator of the laws of the State, but the representative of a religious doctrine relating to a certain Christ (above, p. 541). Furthermore, reference is made in i. 14–18 not to the spiritual success of the preaching, but to the favourable impression made by Paul's defence before the court, and to its effect, not so much upon those who had heard Paul's preaching before his trial began, as upon the missionary activity of other teachers, some of whom were ill-disposed toward Paul. There is nothing to indicate that the royal servants (iv. 44, above, p. 550, n. 1), whom Baur makes relatives of the imperial house (ii. 65 f.), were converted through Paul's influence, and a pseudo-Paul of the second century would not have regarded the privilege of conveying greetings from some servants of the court as any special honour.

to the apostle. This supposition, namely, that the author of Philippians meant to glorify Paul at the expense of historical accuracy, was further supported by Baur and others, by assuming as self-evident that the Clement mentioned in iv. 3 was identical with the distinguished head of the Roman Church at the close of the first century, or was so represented, and by assuming that the latter was, or is here, represented to be the same as T. Flavius Clemens, related to the Flavian royal family, and consul in the year 95 A.D., who was likewise a man of some note (n. 3). The latter identification is a fiction of the pseudo-Clementine Romances, which were written certainly not earlier than the year two hundred, and has no basis whatever in fact. Even if the identification were possible, it would have no significance with reference to Philippians, since the person referred to in Phil. iv. 3 was an influential member not of the Roman, but of the Philippian Church, and so cannot be identified with Clemens Romanus.

That the purpose of the author was to lessen the opposition between Gentile and Jewish Christians is likewise inconceivable; because in the one passage, where Jewish Christians are clearly referred to (iii. 2), they are spoken of in the severest tone of disapproval, and declared to be base enemies of Christianity. And those who are opposed to them as being real Jews both in feeling and by circumcision are not the Gentile Christian party, but Paul and his helpers (above, pp. 531, 538 f., n. 7). There is not a single passage in the letter containing exhortations to harmony or to co-operation among the members in which there is indication that there were differences of faith and doctrine in the Church which needed to be overcome (above, p. 529 f.). In order to discover such opposition and an attempt to overcome it in iv. 2 f., one must have recourse to an allegory of the most fantastic sort, and to an interpretation of words contrary to their natural sense (n. 4).

Not more successful in discovering a plausible motive for the composition of the letter have been the efforts of those who think that Philippians is made up of a number of letters or fragments of letters, some of them genuine, others spurious (n. 5). Before the original unity of the letter can be called in question, essential contradictions must be shown to exist with reference to the facts referred to in the letter; and before the genuineness of the whole or of single parts of the letter can be regarded as in doubt, it must be shown that there are ideas in the letter out of harmony with the Epistles generally conceded to be Paul's. Like Corinthians and Thessalonians, this Epistle is not an essay, but a real letter, in which the succession of ideas is not always strictly logical. We should certainly be able to understand its details better if our knowledge of the correspondence between Paul and the Philippians which preceded it were derived from existing documents and historical reports, not simply from inferences drawn from the Epistle itself. However, what we do have is enough to show that Philippians is the product of actual conditions, which could not have been invented, and which are only partially reflected by the letter itself.

1. (P. 556.) Genuine epistolary style is to be seen in the passages where reference is made to remarks of the Philippians without any quotation of them, or even a statement to the effect that they are the occasion of the discussion which follows, as in 1 Cor. vii. 1. The most striking of these are i. 3, ἐγὼ μὲν (above, p. 535, n. 2; i. 12, μᾶλλον, above, p. 528), also iv. 10. Observe the carelessness in sentence construction in i. 22, 27, 29, iii. 8, 14. It is also genuinely Pauline (cf. above, p. 516, n. 7) that certain expressions should recur very frequently in this short letter: πέποιθα (above, p. 555, n. 3); φρονεῖν ten or eleven times, in all the other letters twelve times; πλὴν three times, elsewhere only twice; κοινωνία, κοινωνεῖν, συγκαινωνός, συγκαινωνεῖν six times altogether; χαίρειν, συγχαίρειν, χαρά sixteen times in all; δέησις four times, in Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., Gal., Col., 1 and 2 Thess., and Philem. altogether only three times, in Eph. twice, in 1 and 2 Tim. three times.

2. (P. 556.) Holsten in JhPTh. 1875, i. S. 425 ff.; 1876, ii. S. 58 ff., 282 ff. The arguments of the Tübingen school are judged (i. 425, ii. 329 f.) to be in part incomplete, in part unfortunate, and on the whole deserving oblivion. The demand for a new interpretation (i. 426) is met by the conclusion (ii. 372), "I have brought criticism back again to the basis of exegesis." How it fares with this reconstructed criticism the present writer has shown by the citation of characteristic examples (cf. his Abhandlungen, ZfKW, 1885, S. 183, 186, 188, 189, 194, 201, 291).

3. (P. 559.) Baur (Paulus, ii. 66-72, 85 f.), Hitzig (11 ff.). In the groundless identification of this Clement of Philippi with Clement of Rome the moderns have been anticipated by Origen (tom. vi. 36, in Jo. ed. Preuschen, p. 163), who also recognised Hermas, author of the Shepherd, in Rom. xvi. 14 (Delarue, iv. 683), and Luke the Evangelist in 2 Cor. viii. 18 (see below, Div. ix.). But Origen certainly did not base his conjectures on such a monstrous assertion as that of Baur (S. 66), that "neither history nor legend knows of any other Clement at this time" (cf. above, p. 534). With regard to the relation between Clement of Rome and the consul T. Flavius Clemens, the present writer can no longer appeal unconditionally to what he wrote thirty-eight years ago in his Leben des Hermas (S. 44-69). Lightfoot has the best discussion of the whole question, St. Clement (1890), i. 14-103. When it was brought to Baur's attention that there is no hint that the Clement of Phil. iv. 3 had any connection with Rome, but that we should rather seek him in Philippi, he made a point out of this very thing against the genuineness of the letter (S. 86), holding that we cannot tell where the persons whom it mentions belong; as if the letter were to blame for this, and not rather its inattentive readers. There is not the slightest unclearness as to the whereabouts of Paul, Timothy, Epaphroditus, Euodia, Syntyche, Clement, the bishops and deacons (i. 1), the imperial guard (i. 13), or the brethren who were preaching Christ (i. 14-17). The Judaists alone, against whom the Philippians are warned in iii. 2, are mentioned without a hint of their local habitation; and for the simple reason that reference is made not to individual persons, but to a whole class, which had its representatives throughout Asia and Europe.

4. (P. 559.) Schwegler (Nachapost. Zeitalter, ii. 135), whom Baur (ii. 72, 86) followed, found in the women Euodia and Syntyche the Jewish Christian and Gentile Christian parties respectively, and in the "true comrade," Peter. Volkmar (ThJb. 1856, S. 310 ff.) on this theory explained Εὐδοία (from ἰδός=doctrine)=ἁρθοδοξία, ῥρθοδοξία, the Jewish Christian party, which considered itself as alone orthodox, Συντύχη=consors, the Gentile Christians, who had become partakers of salvation. Unsatisfied with this distribution of the characters, Holsten (ii. 71), without mentioning Hitzig, who (S. 10) considered that he had refuted Schwegler's view by showing that the rôles could be reversed, declared Euodia to be the Gentile Christian party, which has always been on the right way, Syntyche the Jewish Christian party, which has met the former upon the right way, and the Synzygos, as his name implies, the one who yokes together (!), i.e. who has the task of uniting the Churches. Finally, Völter (ThTij. 1892, p. 123) left the question open again as to how the two women's names shall be divided between the two parties in question, and tacitly made the copyist's error Εὐδοία (instead of Εὐδοία, above, p. 533, line 17) the basis for his interpretation of these names. But Hitzig (S. 5-10) had proved long before that the names in question came rather from Gen. xxx. 11, 13, namely, Συντύχη from Leah's exclamation at the birth of Gad, Εὐδοία from the name Asher. Since the LXX gives only an uncertain support (ἐν τύχῃ) for the formation of the first name and none at all for Euodia, the author must have drawn from the Hebrew text. According to Hitzig (S. 9), he drew even the name of the mother of these sons of Jacob, Zilpah, into his etymological investigations, which included derivations from Armenian, Aramaic, and Arabic. Her name signifies "the foreskin." Her daughters (sons they were in the history) Euodia and Syntyche are, then, two classes of Gentiles into which the Church was divided, the Roman or Latin and the Greek. The author, according to Hitzig, xiii.-xxi., belonged to the former class; for, in addition to his acquaintance with Oriental languages and his easy handling of Greek, he was very familiar with the latest productions of Latin literature. Though writing no later than Trajan's time, he had read, in particular, the Agricola of Tacitus, perhaps also the letters of Seneca and of Pliny. The only passages that can be compared are i. 16 with Agric. xli, "optimus quisque amore et fide, pessimi malignitate et livore"; or ii. 3 with Agric. vi, "vixerunt mira concordia per mutuam caritatem et invicem se anteponendo." The presupposition of all these fantastic conceits is the claim that Euodia and Syntyche are unheard of proper names (made with especial emphasis by Hitzig, 6); but cf. the twenty-three or twenty-four instances of Euodia and the twenty-five of Syntyche above, p. 533. A longer search might perhaps yield double that number. Moreover, it was shown above, p. 537, n. 6, that the nameless comrade was not to reconcile these women who were at variance, but to help them in their work. Even if Phil. were not a letter addressed by its founder to the Church in Philippi and received by it, but a literary fiction, and if there had never been in Philippi a Euodia and a Syntyche, a Clement and another comrade of Paul's, who would have understood immediately what he wished to say to them, no reader could have found in the simple words of iv. 2 f. the secrets which the critics have sought to find beneath their surface with such various results. This supposed pseudo-Paul must have intended at least to make himself understood. Holsten (i. 431) had no trouble in finding even in Phil. i. 5 the author's endeavour to bring about the unity of faith which the Philippians lacked. The fellowship among the Philippians in the matter of the gospel, which, if we are to believe this passage, had existed since the founding of the Church, Holsten makes the subject of Paul's prayers for them. To contend continually against such exegesis seems to the present writer as superfluous as it is vain (cf. the writer's Abhandlungen, S. 189 ff.). To characterise Holsten's treatment of the Epistle as over-critical (P. W. Schmidt, Neutestamentl. Hyperkritik, 1880), seems uncalled for.

5. (P. 560). After many suggestions had been offered which met with little response, D. Völter (ThTij. 1892, S. 10-44, 117-146), sought to establish in detail the hypothesis that Phil. consists of a genuine and a spurious letter of Paul to the Philippians, combined by a redactor with the aid of a few additions of his own. The genuine letter embraces, i. 1 (without σὺν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις), vii. 12-14, 18b-26, ii. 17-20, 22-30, iv. 10-21, perhaps also iv. 23. The spurious letter, likewise addressed to the Philippians, and perhaps furnished with similar opening and closing greetings, embraces i. 8-11, i. 27-ii. 16, iii. 1b-iv. 9, 22. To this should be added, perhaps, a sentence to which Polycarp refers, ad Phil. xi. 3 (p. 29; see above, p. 535, n. 3). The redactor interpolated the Church officers in i. 1, also

i. 15-18a, ii. 21, iii. 1a. The spurious letter was written at the very earliest under Trajan, more probably not until Hadrian's reign (S. 146), let us say about 125. Völter does not think it worth while even to mention when the redactor made the combination which Marcion regarded as a genuine letter of Paul's about twenty-five years after the writing of one of its component parts. Nor does he point out any more clearly an idea which could have suggested to the redactor his remarkable work, or an aim which he might have thus sought to attain. For the desire to commend a certain form of Church polity, which, it is held (S. 24), gave rise to the insertion of the bishops and deacons in i. 1, is discernible again neither in the other alleged interpolations of the redactor, nor in the whole altogether aimless undertaking of making one letter out of two. The redactor, it is claimed, inserted iii. 1a as a transition to the section iii. 1b-iv. 9, introduced from the second letter. At the very moment, then, when he was preparing to insert into the exemplar, which he had been using, an exceedingly significant section, whereby the conclusion must be deferred, he is made to declare expressly by the use of τὸ λοιπὸν that he really had nothing more of importance to say, but was hastening to the conclusion; and he is made further to use as a transition to the insertion from the second letter an exhortation to joy in the Lord, which certainly is not adapted to introduce the warning against Judaists. And it is this stupid compiler we have to thank for our Phil.! The postponement of the conclusion is explained naturally enough when we regard Paul as the sole author, and follow the hints which he himself has thrown out (see above, p. 529 f.). There is no trace of two conclusions to the letter, which, of course, if they existed, would have to be assigned to two different letters. At any rate, the second alleged conclusion cannot be made to begin with iv. 10, where sentences follow which in themselves could stand just as well at the beginning of a letter (Polyc. ad Phil. i. 1, imitates this very passage). It should rather begin with iv. 4, or with iv. 8, where the χαίρετε and λοιπὸν respectively of iii. 1 are taken up again after the matters have been discussed which for a time delayed the apostle when he was already hastening to a close. Likewise the assertion, that in i. 3-7 and i. 8-11 there are two introductions of similar content, can be made only by one whose linguistic knowledge is such that it can allow him to characterise the translation of i. 4 f. (S. 33) ("while I . . . remember in prayer your fellowship with regard to the gospel"), as adequate (cf. in refutation, above, p. 534, n. 2, and the writer's Abhandlungen, KfKW, 1885, S. 188). While in iii. 1 there is in reality an interruption of the thought which is indicated by Paul himself, Völter (S. 16) laboured vainly to point out a wide gap before i. 27. As in Gal. ii. 10, v. 13, μόνον introduces the mention of a duty upon the performance of which the applicability of what has been said before is conditioned. It is only on condition that the Philippian walk in a manner worthy of the gospel, and that, too, whether Paul is there to see it or is absent and only hears of it (cf. ii. 12), that their pride and joy will be increased by his intended visit to Philippi (i. 26). In the opposite case his visit would only bring shame to them and pain to himself (cf. 2 Cor. xii. 20-xiii. 10). In this way, as in Gal. v. 13, Paul makes a transition to an extended exhortation of independent significance (i. 27-ii. 18). But this comes in very fittingly between the description of his present situation and mood (i. 3-26) and the statements about what he intends to do in the future in order to make his relation to the Philippians again a more personal one (ii. 19-30, sending back of Epaphroditus, sending of Timothy, his own coming); for the exhortations are plainly intended for this interval primarily. At first sight we might call iv. 10-20 a doublet of i. 3-8; but even if this were the proper designation of the relation of these two sections, analogies to it are not lacking even down to the trivial formula, "Thanking you again," at the end of modern letters which have begun with an expression of gratitude. As a matter of fact, we see that the money which the Church had sent by Epaphroditus was kept in mind by the apostle throughout the letter; again and again he refers to it (ii. 17, 25, 30). But in i. 3-8 this is combined in such a way with other similar actions of the Philippians, that no one could tell that this was specially implied here unless he were acquainted with the facts, or at least had read iv. 10-20, thus coming to understand also ii. 17, 25, 30; indeed, only a purpose on Paul's part to express elsewhere in the letter due appreciation of this last gift of the Philippians, can explain why in i. 3-8 he merely refers to this along with other similar acts of the Philippians, and then only to say that on his part the prevailing mood was not depression, least of all dissatisfaction, which might lessen his confiding love for them, but rather thankful joy.

INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT.

VII.

THE LAST THREE EPISTLES OF PAUL.

§ 33. THE FACTS PRESUPPOSED IN THE SECOND EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY.

It seems best to consider the Second Epistle first, because it records more tangible facts than do either 1 Tim. or Titus, and because it is natural to attempt to establish an historical connection between this letter, which was written in prison, and the four letters which have just been investigated.

When it was written Paul had been for some time in chains (i. 8, 16, ii. 9) and in Rome (i. 17). The primary cause of this imprisonment was his fulfilment of his apostolic calling (i. 12). His situation, however, is essentially different from that which obtained when Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, and even Philippians, were written. When he comforts himself and his friend regarding his present captivity by remarking that the word of God is not bound, but can and must continue its course (ii. 9), he does not refer at all to his own preaching activity as if it were practically unhindered by his captivity; for this remark stands at the close of an exhortation to Timothy, not only to continue to preach the gospel unweariedly as Paul had done, but also to make provision for the further propagation of this preaching through other trustworthy teachers (ii. 1-8). It is primarily because Paul himself is unable longer to preach, and because he will never be able to resume his preaching, that Timothy is urged to carry on the work with even greater zeal than heretofore (iv. 1-8). The other notices regarding Paul's condition at the time also indicate that when 2 Tim. was written, preaching activity on his part was practically impossible. He is bound with chains like a criminal (ii. 9). A certain Onesiphorus from Asia Minor, who went to Rome to visit the imprisoned apostle and to alleviate his condition, had difficulty in reaching him. It required great devotion on Onesiphorus' part even to ascertain Paul's whereabouts, and unflinching courage, when he had found him, to visit him repeatedly, and to minister to his wants (n. 1). For some time at least intercourse between Paul and the other Christians in Rome must have been broken off. Probably one result of Onesiphorus' self-sacrifice in seeking him, and placing his personal services or his means at the apostle's disposal, was the restoration of communication between Paul and his friends by letter and by personal intercourse (n. 1). Luke is with him constantly (iv. 11). He had been able some time before to send Tychicus to Ephesus (iv. 12). He is able to convey the greetings of certain Roman Christians, and formally to extend those of all the Christians in the place where he was (iv. 21, n. 2). Paul seems to have no doubt as to his ability to receive the visit and to accept the services of Timothy and Mark, if they reach Rome in time (iv. 9, 11, 21). The isolation, therefore, in which Onesiphorus had found Paul was relieved, but his personal condition, however, remained essentially the same. It was such that his friends near and far were tempted to break off and to deny their relations with him. Demas, who in Col. iv. 14, Philem. 24, is mentioned with the faithful Luke as a fellow-labourer of Paul's in Rome, has now through love of the world deserted the apostle and gone to Thessalonica (iv. 10). Even Timothy needs to be earnestly exhorted not to be ashamed through cowardice of the testimony of the gospel or even of the imprisoned apostle, but, following his teacher's example with strength and love, to endure the sufferings which the preaching of the gospel and his relation to the apostle might bring upon him (i. 8, cf. i. 7, 12, ii. 3, 12, iii. 10-12, iv. 5). Inasmuch as Onesiphorus, who meanwhile had died, is evidently held up to Timothy as a model in this regard (i. 16-18, n. 1), mention of the conduct of certain persons in the province of Asia, with which Timothy was familiar (i. 15), can only be designed as a terrible warning. Paul charged, naturally not all the Christians in Asia, but all of the group known to Timothy, as that of Phygelus and Hermogenes, with having turned away from him and having refused to have anything to do with him. From the context it is clear that here, as in the preceding exhortation to Timothy, and the praise of Onesiphorus which follows, the reference is to relations with the apostle, who at the time was in close confinement and serious danger. But we would have to know what Timothy knew (oïdas, i. 15), in order to state what occasion Phygelus, Hermogenes, and their friends had for either acknowledging or denying their relationship with Paul; and in order to say whether their unworthy conduct was due, as in Timothy's case, to lack of courage, or, as in Demas' case, to love of the world and desire to escape suffering, or whether their renunciation of Paul was the outcome of differences of opinion of a more serious character and of long standing (n. 3). However, from what has been said this much is certain, namely, that Paul had been for some time in prison, which at first had cut him off from all communication with the outside world, and finally was considered so dangerous that all his friends not absolutely trustworthy deemed it advisable to sever their connections with him lest they should become involved in his fate. This condition had apparently existed for several months, since it had not only worked this effect upon the feelings of Christians as far away as Asia, but the apostle in Rome had also been informed of the same, possibly by Onesiphorus.

Difference of condition greater than that between the one described in Philippians and that which meets us in 2 Tim. can scarcely be imagined. In the former letter the state and progress of Paul's trial gave new courage to all the Christians gathered about the imprisoned apostle to proclaim their faith; and even those who had little kindly feeling toward him were making abundant use of the favour shown the gospel through the trial of its foremost preacher (vol. i. 542 f.). In 2 Tim. nearly all of Paul's friends are withdrawing in fear. Even a person like Timothy, whom Paul praises so highly in Phil. ii. 20, is tempted in a cowardly manner to desert the apostle, and in so doing to forsake his calling. Just as striking is the contrast between Philippians and 2 Tim. as to Paul's judgment concerning his present situation and his forecast of the future. Then he thought it certain that the trial which so far had proceeded favourably to him would soon end in his acquittal. Now he is just as certain that his present imprisonment can only terminate with his martyrdom. Using the same figure that he had then used to describe the violent death which he thought he was destined to meet after a period of liberty and of new and varied labours (Phil. ii. 17; vol. i. 456), he now writes (iv. 6): "I am now being poured out as a drink-offering." He is no longer in the midst of a heated and restless conflict (Phil. i. 27, 30, iii. 12-14); he has ended this conflict and has run his course (iv. 7, cf. Acts xx. 24). All that remains now is for him to receive the victor's crown, which is ready in the hands of the righteous judge to be placed upon his head in the day of judgment (iv. 8). He seems to expect that the decisive day will or may possibly be postponed for several months. If upon the reception of this letter Timothy sets out at once upon the long journey to Rome and reaches his destination before the beginning of winter (iv. 9, 21), probably he will find the apostle still alive, and the latter may be able for some time yet to make use of the articles which Timothy is instructed to bring (iv. 13). Any permanent change, however, in his present condition seems to be out of the range of possibility. For the brief span of earthly life that remains he relies also upon the protection of his Lord; the only deliverance, however, from the evil of this world which he expects at the hands of Christ is a translation into His kingdom above (iv. 18).

It is on account of the near approach of his martyrdom that Paul exhorts Timothy so earnestly to be unremitting in his efforts to preach the gospel (iv. 1-5 and iv. 6-8). Exercising all the powers that he has, Timothy is to fill the place of the departing apostle. Mindful of the future, when Paul will be no longer alive, Timothy is to bear in mind his own calling (ii. 17, iii. 1-9, iv. 3), and to see to it that in his own time and afterwards there shall not be lacking other faithful representatives of the doctrine which he has received from his teacher, also men to take his own place when he is gone (ii. 2). In view of the fact that, during the hasty journey to Rome upon which presumably he would set out as soon as possible after receiving the letter, Timothy could not very well have acted upon the exhortations to be found in 2 Tim. i. 6-iv. 5, which form the main contents of the letter, it is clear that Paul was by no means certain that Timothy would find him still alive. It may have been his desire to cheer this discouraged disciple that kept Paul from mentioning expressly the possibility of his demise before his arrival. But the letter which he writes is of the character of a last testament. In case of his death before Timothy's arrival, this "beloved child" (i. 2) of his is not to be left without a solemn, affecting, written statement of the last will of his spiritual father. It is this peculiarity of the letter and the imminence of the apostle's death which leads him more than once to reflect upon his own past and that of his disciple. Just as Paul regards his own Christian piety as an inheritance from his Pharisaic forefathers, so does he consider Timothy's faith to be an inheritance from his Jewish mother and grandmother (n. 4). Timothy is reminded of the fact that, from his earliest youth, long before he came into contact with Paul and the gospel, he had been introduced to the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures by his pious mother (iii. 15). He is reminded also of his conversion, his instruction by Paul, and his confession made before the assembled congregation at the time of his baptism (ii. 2, cf. 1 Tim. vi. 12), also of his dedication to missionary service by the laying on of the apostle's hands (n. 5), and of the long series of years during which he had shared Paul's labours and sufferings (iii. 10), special mention being made of the persecutions which Paul had endured at the time of Timothy's conversion in Lystra, Timothy's native city, and shortly before at Iconium, and Antioch in Pisidia (iii. 11, cf. Acts xiii. 50, xiv. 5, 19). In this retrospect is to be included not only passages like i. 15-18, where it is expressly stated that the contents were known to Timothy, but also such a passage as iv. 16 f. That this latter passage is not to be considered as giving new information is clear from the lack of concrete and definite expressions, the somewhat figurative character of the language, and the rhetorical quality of the style, which is strikingly unlike that of the short notices and business directions that precede (iv. 9-15) and follow (iv. 19-22). The only related passage is iv. 18. Just before concluding the letter with a statement of the only thing which in existing circumstances he could hope for from the Lord, Paul himself recalls and reminds Timothy of an earlier occasion when he had been in similar danger. In his first defence no one had stood by him, but all those who might have given him aid left him. Paul does not consider this conduct praiseworthy, nevertheless he does not threaten his enemy with divine judgment, as in the verse just preceding (iv. 14). On the other hand, speaking in a tone strikingly different from that which characterises other remarks apparently similar (i. 15, iv. 10), he attributes this desertion to weakness, and prays God to forgive his friends. This incident is mentioned primarily in order to exalt the faithfulness of the Lord in contrast to the untrustworthiness of men (cf. ii. 13). The Lord alone stood by him then and strengthened him, and he was delivered out of the mouth of the lion. Because of the use of this figurative language it is not to be assumed that some definite person is referred to who might be compared to a lion, as the emperor Nero or the praefectus praetorii, who represented the latter as judge, or Satan (n. 6). It means rather that at that time, by reason of the help which the Lord supplied him in his defence before the court, Paul was delivered out of extreme danger. This proves that by πρώτη ἀπολογία cannot be meant the first stage of a legal proceeding still in progress when this letter was written. If after such an ἀπολογία Paul continued in prison under charges, particularly in the severe imprisonment and the hopeless condition in which he was at the time of 2 Tim. and had been for some months preceding, then the words καὶ ἐρύσθην ἐκ στόματος λέοντος are meaningless. No matter how successfully, with the Lord's help, he had defended himself in a first hearing, and no matter how strong the expectation of an acquittal aroused by it in himself and others may have been, if, now, he were languishing in a dungeon with the definite expectation of being executed as a criminal, he had not been delivered out of the mouth of a lion, but only painfully disillusioned. Hence the first ἀπολογία must refer to a defence which Paul had made at an earlier trial, which by reason of his successful defence had ended in his acquittal and actual release. Consequently it could not have been his defence before Festus and Agrippa (Acts xxv. 1–xxvi. 31), nor a defence before the imperial court at Rome, which left him under arrest and increased his hardships, as these are described in 2 Tim. and in no other of the captivity letters.

The same conclusion follows, if possible with even greater certainty, from a consideration of the purpose of his deliverance stated in iv. 17. In standing by him and strengthening him in that trial which ended in his deliverance from extreme danger, the Lord designed, so the apostle thinks, that the proclamation of the gospel should be carried to its completion, so that all peoples should hear it. At the time of this defence this purpose had by no means been accomplished, either by Paul or by other missionaries. That, however, it would necessarily be accomplished, Paul and every other Christian, on the strength of the promise of Jesus, fully believed. The only question was by whom. If Paul succumbed in the trial, and was devoured by the lion, then it must be accomplished by others after his death. But in order that it might be accomplished by Paul—by him and not by someone else, as shown by the strong emphasis upon the δι' ἐμοῦ—the Lord had stood by him, and enabled him successfully to defend himself; and in order that this purpose might be actually accomplished, he had been saved out of the lion's jaws. It is very evident that nothing which followed upon his deliverance from the fanaticism of the Jews, through his appeal to Cæsar (Acts xxv. 11), is in any degree commensurate with the divine purpose here indicated. As a result of that deliverance he had been sent a prisoner to Rome; and it is possible that his skilful defence before Festus and Agrippa, and the report of it which Festus made (Acts xxv. 26, xxvi. 31), contributed much to his comparative freedom in Rome, and his unhindered preaching of the gospel for two years. But through that preaching no nation heard the gospel which had not heard it before. To the mixed populace of Rome, which Paul looks upon as an ἔθνος Ῥωμαίων (vol. i. 373, n. 3), the gospel had already been brought at the time when Romans was written. This is even more true if, some time subsequent to the writing of Philippians, in consequence of his powerful defence before the imperial court, Paul was permitted to resume the work in Rome which he had carried on during the two years prior to the writing of Philippians, and which had been broken off. Unless he did more than obtain through his labours "some fruit" in Rome (Rom. i. 13; vol. i. 373, n. 3), where a Christian Church had long existed, and where numerous independent missionaries were at work (Col. iv. 11; Phil. i. 14-18; vol. i. 441, 543), he could not claim to have completed the Christian preaching. Rome was not the end of the world, nor the goal of the missionary plans which had been in Paul's mind for so many years. On the other hand, he could not, at the time when 2 Tim. was written, have thought that the great purpose which the Lord had in view when He stood by him in the first defence, namely, the spreading of the gospel to all peoples by Paul, was yet to be fulfilled. For now all that he expects from the Lord is a blessed death (iv. 18). He has just said (iv. 7), and everywhere the tone of the letter implies, that his course is ended. Since, now, a pious man could not ascribe to the Lord a purpose which neither had been realised in the past nor in his judgment could be realised in the future, it follows that the purpose for which Christ had so powerfully sustained him in the earlier trial had been accomplished. Subsequent to the successful issue of his trial and his acquittal, Paul had resumed his missionary work, and had preached the gospel in regions where heretofore it had not been preached, either by himself or by other missionaries.

A similar conclusion follows from iv. 7. When Philippians was written, Paul was full of energy and of the thought of progress, not only as regards his own moral and religious life (Phil. iii. 12-14), but also with reference to his work; and one reason why he believed he would be acquitted in the trial then in progress, and begin his course anew, was his knowledge that the cause of the gospel demanded a continuance of his life and his further labours (vol. i. 541, 545). Now his course is ended. Just as his statements in Philippians were not due to any specially joyous mood, so it is impossible to explain those in 2 Tim. as due to a discouraged and gloomy state of mind. Indeed, the whole tone of 2 Tim. gives an opposite impression. While Paul does write with deep feeling, it is a feeling which uplifts him, and is designed to enhearten with him the discouraged Timothy. The great difference between the two letters in their outlook upon the past and future is due, not to feeling, but to fact. Now, from Rom. xv. 15-29 we know that at the beginning of the year 58 Paul felt that his work in the regions about the eastern part of the Mediterranean was done, and it was under the influence of this feeling that he entertained the purpose and hope of carrying out a plan which he had had in mind for some years, namely, of continuing his work west of the Adriatic. Rome was to be only a stopping point on the way; the goal which he had primarily in mind was Spain (Rom. xv. 24, 28). How could Paul say that he had finished his course if he had remained continuously in Rome, where he is now about to be executed! If Paul wrote both Rom. xv. and 2 Tim. iv., then from 2 Tim. iv. 7 it may be certainly concluded that Paul regained his liberty as he expected when he wrote Philippians, and visited, among other places, Spain.

The language in which Paul describes the purpose which the Lord had in standing by him in his earlier trial, which purpose, as we have seen, had actually been accomplished in the interval between his trials (iv. 17), seems somewhat exaggerated. It is to be judged, however, in comparison with Paul's language elsewhere, and by that of his contemporaries. It was considered that the gospel had been preached to a people or a country when it had been received in a number of places, and Churches had been organised (n. 7). Thus, for example, in the year 58 Paul felt that there was no further room for missionary work (at least for missionary work of the kind that he was specially commissioned to do, namely, the laying of the foundations) in all the region from Jerusalem to Illyricum (Rom. xv. 19, 23). There is no consideration of the regions lying inland from the civilised countries along the coast, nor of barbarians outside of the Roman empire, it evidently being taken for granted that the work of preaching the gospel in these vast regions, as yet very little known, should fall to the Churches that had been organised in the more civilised provinces. It is also to be borne in mind that, as is indicated by the letters to the Churches in the province of Asia, Paul regarded as his own the work done from centres where he laboured by helpers associated with him, considering the Churches thus organised as under his jurisdiction (vol. i. 449, n. 3). This throws light upon the statement in 2 Tim. iv. 10, that Titus at that time had gone to Dalmatia, and a certain Crescens to Gaul (n. 8). There is no indication that they, like Demas, had deserted the apostle and sought safety for themselves; or that, like Tychicus, they had been sent by the apostle upon some special errand (iv. 10*a*, 12). In either case it would be a question why they went to these particular countries, with which, so far as we know, Paul, up to this time, had never had anything to do. The probability is that Titus, who had long been associated with Paul (Gal. ii. 3), who, as his commissioner, had executed difficult offices in Corinth (2 Cor. vii.-ix. ; vol. i. 308 ff., 329 f.), and who, as we shall see, not very long before 2 Tim. was written had completed some missionary work in Crete that had been begun by others, had gone as a missionary and as Paul's representative and helper to Dalmatia. It is also probable that the unknown Crescens went for a similar purpose to Gaul. If, by this means, beginnings of Church organisations had been made westward, north-westward, and north-eastward from Rome, in Spain by Paul himself, in Gaul by Crescens, in Dalmatia by Titus, then, in reality, the missionary map had been very much changed since Paul's first defence. Mention is made of these facts in a purely incidental way, without any intention on the writer's part of giving his readers information. Consequently to us they lack in clearness. To attempt from such incidental hints to estimate what actual events lie behind the sonorous words of 2 Tim. iv. 17 would be presumptuous. The omission, for example, of any reference to preaching in the province of Africa is less strange than the failure to mention Alexandria and Egypt in Rom. xv. 19, 23, although, as a matter of fact, we know that Paul never visited these places (vol. i. 377, n. 11). We know enough, possibly, to render 2 Tim. iv. 7, 17 intelligible, but by no means enough to test the passage by actual history.

By "apology" in 2 Tim. iv. 16 (cf. Phil. i. 7, 16) is to be understood not a single hearing nor a single speech of defence made at this hearing, as distinct from subsequent hearings and speeches in the course of the same trial, but an entire legal defence made at an earlier trial, now ended, and to be distinguished from the trial in which Paul was involved at the time when 2 Tim. was written. What Paul says in this letter about the conduct of his friends at the time of his first defence does not contradict what is said in Philippians. The joyful and courageous state of mind which at that time had taken possession of those about Paul (Phil. i. 12-18; vol. i. 542) was only the result of a favourable turn which, contrary to expectation, his trial had recently taken because of his successful self-defence. When the trial began and Paul was deprived of the liberty which he had enjoyed for two years, the mood of the Christians in Rome must have been very different. From Philippians we learn something of the apprehensive reports which reached the Philippian Christians from Rome. Furthermore, it would have defeated the purpose of Philippians had Paul, instead of emphasising the favourable aspects of his trial, and the hope of release, which conditions at the time justified him in entertaining, complained that, at the decisive moment, which now fortunately was past, no one of his friends had had the courage to take sides with him before the court, either as a witness for him or as his advocate. This weakness he forgave at the time, as he confesses in 2 Tim. iv. 16. On the other hand, there is no indication that any of his friends had contributed aught to the successful progress of his trial (Phil. i. 12 f.). He and he alone seems at that time to have represented his own cause and that of the gospel before the court (Phil. i. 7, 16); while, for the final decision of the court, which he still awaits, and in the further hearings necessary to this end, he depends only upon the petitions of his fellow-Christians and the fact that the Holy Spirit will put the right words into his mouth (Phil. i. 19; vol. i. 544). This is in perfect keeping with the retrospect in 2 Tim. iv. 16 f. Considering the trial as a whole, Paul can say, "The Lord alone stood by me, and strengthened me; and so I was delivered out of the lion's mouth." If 2 Tim. is genuine, it follows that the imprisonment in which Paul found himself at the time when it was written was not a continuance of that during which Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, and, somewhat later, Philippians were written, so that the expectation so strongly expressed in Philippians must have been realised and that after the ensuing acquittal by the imperial court, he had used his regained freedom, among other things, to resume his missionary labour, and in carrying out his original plan to preach the gospel in the West.

During this interval Paul was also in the East, as he expected to be when he wrote Philippians (Phil. i. 25 f., ii. 24). If it be clear both from the connection and tone of iv. 9-13 and iv. 19-21 that the facts here mentioned were not already familiar to Timothy, but that the communications and reports were quite as new to him as were the accompanying instructions, then special importance attaches to the notice that Paul had left Trophimus behind in Miletus sick (n. 9). This man, who was an Ephesian, had accompanied Paul upon the journey from Macedonia through Miletus to Jerusalem, which ended with the apostle's arrest, and had reached Jerusalem with him (Acts xx. 4, 15-38, xxi. 29); so that on this journey he could not have been left behind at Miletus sick. Even if, on this point, the account in Acts, which in other respects is credible enough, be considered entirely untrustworthy, it is quite impossible to understand how, five years later, Paul could communicate this as a piece of news to Timothy, who, together with Trophimus, had accompanied the apostle on this journey, and had since resided with him in Rome (Col. i. 1; Philem. 1; 1 Phil. i. 1, ii. 19-23). We therefore assume that, after he was set at liberty from his Roman imprisonment, and not very long before 2 Tim. was written, Paul must have been with Trophimus at Miletus. From the close connection between this communication and the statement that Erastus remained in Corinth, it is necessary also to assume that on this same journey Paul touched at Corinth, being accompanied as far as this point by Erastus, who, as we learn from Rom. xvi. 23, was treasurer of the city of Corinth, and, from Acts xix. 22, a temporary helper of the apostle. That the present

notice does not have reference to the journey of Erastus from Ephesus to Corinth about Easter 57, mentioned in Acts, and to the departure of Paul from Corinth for Jerusalem about Easter 58, is clear from the close connection between this notice and the news about Trophimus. It is also shown by the fact that Erastus was accompanied by Timothy on that journey to Corinth, and that Timothy accompanied Paul on his return from Corinth to Macedonia and thence to Jerusalem, so that if Erastus, who is not mentioned in Acts xx. 4, failed on this occasion to accompany Paul and Timothy and the representatives of the contributing Churches, but remained behind in Corinth, Timothy must have known it at the time. Of course it was perfectly possible for Paul to remind Timothy of this fact at some later time, if there was any clear reason for it, or if he wanted to use it for some practical purpose. But merely to state a fact with which Timothy was perfectly familiar, five years after the event in question took place, would be senseless. For the same reasons the sending of Tychicus from Rome to Ephesus, iv. 12, is not to be identified with the sending of the same person to the province of Asia, of which we learn in Eph. vi. 21; Col. iv. 7; for, in the latter case, Timothy was with Paul at the time (Col. i. 1; Philem. 1). The reference must therefore be to a later journey of Tychicus. Similarly the sojourn of Paul in Troas, presupposed in iv. 13, must have been of very recent date, and cannot be identified with the visit the account of which is given in Acts xx. 6-12. On the latter occasion Paul was accompanied by Timothy, of which there is no hint in 2 Tim. iv. 13. Moreover, the nature of the errand with which Timothy is here charged argues against the assumption that at least five years had elapsed since Paul was in Troas. Timothy is to bring with him from Troas, at which point he will touch on his journey to Rome, a cloak, certain books and leaves of parchment, which the apostle had left there in the hands of one Carpus. From the exact enumeration of the articles, the special mention of the parchments, which probably contained written notes (GK, ii. 938 f.), it is to be inferred that the things in question were especially needed by the apostle. Evidently he needed the warm cloak for the coming winter (iv. 21), and how is it conceivable that he would allow himself to be any longer than necessary without books and notes which were important enough to be taken with him on his journeys and to be sent for from Rome to Asia. That Paul should have left them for more than five years in the hands of Carpus without making any effort to get them, is inconceivable. Paul's intercourse with the Churches in Asia, during his two years' imprisonment in Cæsarea, which was nearer than Rome, was at least as frequent as it was during his Roman imprisonment. Tychicus was sent from Rome to visit most of the Churches in the province of Asia (vol. i. 481), so was probably in Troas, afterward returning to Rome. Sometime before this Onesiphorus had journeyed from Asia Minor, perhaps from Iconium, to Rome. His way thither would have led him through Troas and Philippi, a route which was taken by Timothy soon afterwards, according to Paul's supposition, and some fifty years later by Ignatius. Other friends of Paul's, e.g. Epaphras (Col. i. 7, iv. 12), may have travelled by the same route. During the course of these five years or more he must have had abundant opportunity to get back the things that had been left behind in Troas. Consequently, the only natural supposition is that Paul had been in Troas not long before 2 Tim. was written, and had left these things there. This conclusion is confirmed by a consideration of what follows in iv. 14 f. Since the remark about the smith Alexander ends with a warning to Timothy against him, and since, as soon as possible after receiving the letter, Timothy is to set out upon a journey to Rome, Alexander could not have been in the place where Timothy was, and which he was about to leave. Neither could he have been in Rome, for in that case Paul could have warned Timothy against him much more effectively after the latter's arrival. He is to be sought, consequently, in one of the places at which Timothy is to touch on his way to Rome; and since Troas has just been mentioned as one place at which Timothy is to stop and perform an errand for Paul, the natural supposition is that Alexander was to be found there. This explains the sequence of thought. The errand which Timothy is to perform in Troas makes Paul think of his own last residence there, and recalls the opposition he had encountered from Alexander. It is natural to suppose that this hostility had compelled him to leave Troas in haste, and so had caused him to leave his things behind. There follows very naturally the exhortation to Timothy to beware of this hostile person, a warning which is emphasised by the statement that Alexander had resisted the preaching of Paul and his helpers to the utmost, consequently was not so much a personal enemy of Paul's as a sworn foe of the apostolic doctrine (n. 3). Therefore, Timothy also is to beware of him. From the contrast between "me" and "thou also" we infer that Timothy had not shared with Paul this hostility of Alexander in Troas, and so was not with Paul in Troas at the time. Consequently, whether he had heard of the matter before or learned of it now for the first time from Paul's letter, so far as he was concerned personally he had had no occasion to encounter Alexander's enmity. We conclude, therefore, that, after being released from his long imprisonment, Paul had gone to Troas, Miletus, and Corinth, in each case unaccompanied by Timothy.

But that Paul did not see Timothy at all on this journey is altogether unlikely. When Phil. ii. 19 was written, Paul was planning to send him to Philippi. From 1 Tim. i. 3 (cf. 2 Tim. i. 18) we learn that subsequent to this visit he remained continuously in Ephesus, and from 1 Tim. iii. 14, iv. 13, that Paul was intending to visit him there (§ 34). In the meantime Paul had been in Troas and Miletus (2 Tim. iv. 13, 20). Very extraordinary circumstances, therefore, must be assumed in order to maintain that Paul was prevented on this occasion, as he had been on a previous occasion (Acts xx. 16), from visiting Ephesus, or that Timothy, in case he left Ephesus in the meantime against Paul's wishes, or in case Paul was prevented from coming to Ephesus, was unable to arrange a meeting with him somewhere else. It is also to be noticed that in connection with the longing expressed in 2 Tim. i. 4 to see Timothy again, Paul mentions his sorrowful recollection of Timothy's tears. The only natural inference is that not long before Timothy had taken tearful leave of Paul; a scene which will not be forgotten until, as Paul hopes, he shall greet Timothy again in Rome. Where this painful separation took place we do not know, only, as has been shown, it could not have been in Troas, or Miletus, or Corinth.

Furthermore, where Timothy was at the time 2 Tim. was written we can only conjecture. If on his journey to Rome he was to pass through Troas (2 Tim. iv. 13-15), he must have been somewhere in Asia Minor, but hardly at Ephesus (n. 10). Nothing is said in 2 Tim. about the oversight of the Church, such as Timothy is represented as exercising at Ephesus in 1 Tim. Moreover, if Timothy had been at Ephesus, Paul could not have failed to mention in 2 Tim. iv. 12 that Tychicus, whom he had sent to Ephesus, would see him, particularly if Tychicus brought 2 Tim. (cf. Col. iv. 8; Eph. vi. 22; Phil. ii. 19, 25; 1 Cor. iv. 17). If, however, as is more probable, Tychicus left Paul after 2 Tim. was despatched, it is difficult to understand why Paul did not inform Timothy of Tychicus' coming, provided that Paul expected Tychicus to meet Timothy in Ephesus. Furthermore, the report that Trophimus had been left behind in Miletus (iv. 20), and the manner in which Paul speaks of the events that had taken place in Troas (iv. 13-15), are most naturally explained, if at the time when these things happened and subsequently Timothy was living at some distance from the coast cities. If Onesiphorus' home was Iconium (n. 1), the greeting sent to him (iv. 19) would indicate that at the time Timothy was at or near Iconium, possibly at his home in Lystra. In order to convey such a greeting, Paul could not have urged Timothy to take so long a journey as that from Ephesus to Iconium.

Quite different is the case with reference to the greeting to Prisca and Aquila (iv. 19). Since coming into contact with Paul, this couple had already changed their place of residence twice in the interest of his missionary work and of the Churches. They had gone from Corinth to live in Ephesus, and thence back to Rome, whence they had originally come to Corinth (vol. i. 389 f.). If they were now in the East again, it is at least likely that they had returned to Ephesus, where earlier they had spent at least three years. Journeying from Iconium or Lystra by way of Troas to Rome, Timothy would touch at Ephesus, and so could convey the greeting which Paul sent to Prisca and Aquila.

The investigation of the trustworthiness of all these statements, and the endeavour to bring them into an historical connection with one another and with other known facts, must be deferred until the facts to be found only in 1 Tim. and Titus have been stated.

1. (Pp. 2, 3, 19.) Cf. Acts xi. 25 with 2 Tim. i. 17; in the latter, however, the stronger expression σπουδαίως ἐζήτησεν points to even greater difficulties which had to be overcome before the well-nigh lost apostle could be found. The ἀναψύχειν, i. 16 (cf. Ign. Eph. ii. 1, where it occurs along with the Pauline ἀναπαύειν, 1 Cor. xvi. 18; 2 Cor. vii. 13; Philem. 7, 20; cf. Ign. Trall. xii. 1; Mag. xv.; Smyrn. ix. 2, xii. 1) can of itself indicate bodily as well as spiritual refreshing. The aim of such a long journey, however, can only have been to ascertain Paul's outward condition, and to ameliorate it as far as possible (cf. Phil. ii. 25, 30, iv. 10-20; Acts xxiv. 23, xxvii. 3). This certainly involved gifts to the jailers to make sure that they would give him friendly treatment and all reasonable liberty. Paul would not have suffered him to bribe the judge even if it had been possible (Acts xxiv. 26). But even a Christian like Ignatius, who so passionately longed for martyrdom, does not conceal the fact that the soldiers who were conducting him were induced to treat him well by gifts and entertainment, ad Rom. v. 1; cf. Mart. Polyc. vii. 2; Passio Perpetuæ, chap. iii. 16 (ed. Robinson, 64. 15, 84. 22 ff.); Acta Pionii, xi. 3 f. (Acta mart. selecta, ed. Gebhardt p. 104 f.); Lucian, Peregrin. 12; Const. apost. v. 1. We do not know whether Onesiphorus was commissioned by some Church to do this or not; equally uncertain is it whether it was on this journey or earlier that he found occasion to do a service to someone in Ephesus, such as he had just done to Paul (i. 18). All that we know of his home is that it was somewhere in Asia Minor, i. 15-18, iv. 19. The Acts of Paul (Acta Theclæ, i.-vii., xv., xxiii., xxvi., xlii.), represents Onesiphorus as a citizen of Iconium, in whose house Paul found quarters and preached to the Church. The author of this work certainly could not have gathered this from 2 Tim., nor even have conjectured it from this source, and it is true that elsewhere he combines independent traditions with statements from the N.T. (GK, i. 788, ii. 892-910; Forsch. v. 97, A. 1). The Jew Onesiphorus, the host of Peter and Andrew in Ancyra, or in the land of the barbarians, is a worthless imitation of this representation (Suppl. cod. apocr., ed. Bonnet, ii. 9; Acta apost. apocr., ed. Lipsius et Bonnet, ii. part 1. 123 ff.). Since Paul sends greeting, not to Onesiphorus, but only to his family (iv. 19), and in praying that the Lord will reward his devotion speaks of his family first (i. 16), and mentions him only in connection with the judgment day (i. 18), it follows that Onesiphorus had died since his arrival in Rome, and that Timothy already knew of it. Certain minuscules (Tischendorf, 2 Tim. iv. 19) have borrowed from the Acta Theclæ, chap. ii., the names Lectra, the wife of Onesimus, and Simmias and Zeno, his sons. Amphilochius of Iconium (in Ficker, Amphilochiana, i. 56 f. cf. S. 111-135) mentions the house of Onesiphorus at Iconium as an example of the fact that the Apostles often used a heathen house as a church.

2. (P. 2.) Of the four names in 2 Tim. iv. 21, Linus is the only one upon which history throws any light. Considering the great rarity of this Greek mythological name (Herodot. ii. 79) as a proper name for persons (C. I. Gr. No. 8518, p. 261, line 53; I. Gr. Sic. et It. No. 2276), we can hardly doubt that here, as Irenæus directly asserted, the same Roman Christian is meant who, according to ancient tradition, became, after Peter (and Paul), the first bishop of Rome (Iren. iii. 3. 3; Eus. iii. 2, v. 6; pseudo-Tert. c. Marc. iii. 277; Epiph. Hær. xxvii. 6; Lib. pontif., ed. Duchesne, i. 3, 53, 121, where is found also a discussion about a sarcophagus found in the seventeenth century, having, as alleged, the inscription Linus; cf. V. Schultze, Arch. Stud. 235-239; Erbes, ZfKG, vii. 20). His name does not occur in the remains which are left us of the older Acts of Paul and those of Peter. However, a Latin recasting of the closing part of the Gnostic Acts of Peter was ascribed to him, also of the last part of the Catholic Acts of Paul, though less definitely (Acta Petri, etc., ed. Lipsius, pp. 1-44; cf. GK, ii. 833 ff., 872). Among the mythical characters in Const. ap. vii. 46 occurs Λίνος ὁ Κλαυδίας, who is declared to have been ordained by Paul as the first bishop of Rome. He is thus represented as the son (or husband) of the Claudia whose name comes after his in 2 Tim. iv. 21. These meagre statements have been enlarged upon by English investigators. The Claudia mentioned here is, they hold, identical with the one who, according to Martial, Epigr. iv. 13, married a certain Pudens (85–90 A.D.), and she in turn with the Claudia Rufina from Britain in Epigr. xi. 53, who is then made out to be a daughter of the British king Cogidumnus (Tac. Agric. xiv.) or [Titus] Claudius Cogidubnus (C. I. L. vii. No. 11). For a refutation of these assumptions, which even chronologically considered are impossible, see Lightfoot, St. Clement, i. 76–79. As a matter of course there were countless Claudiae in Rome at the time of 2 Tim., cf. e.g. C. I. L. vi. 15335–15664; also under Claudius, Nos. 14858–15334. Among these occur some that are joined with the names of others of the earliest Christians in Rome, or with their derivatives (vol. i. 419 f.); No. 14913 Claudia Olympius (according to which also the name in a Greek inscription from the neighbourhood of Rome, I. Gr. Sic. et It. No. 1914, should be amended Κλαυδία Ὀλυμπιά[δι]), No. 14940 Ti. Claudius Olympus (cf. Rom. xvi. 15), No. 14918 Claudius Ampliatus (cf. Rom. xvi. 8), No. 15564 Claudia Sp. F. Priscilla (Rom. xvi. 3), No. 15066 Ti. Cl. Ti. Lib. “Pudens et Cl(audia) Quintilla filio dulcissimo et sibi” (i.e. a combination of two names from 2 Tim. iv. 21). Later legends tell of a Roman senator Pudens who had two daughters, Praxedis and Pudentiana, and two sons, Timothy and Novatus; but this gives a very slight basis for historical conjectures, cf. Baronius, Annales Eccles. ad annum 44, n. 61; Acta SS., Mai, iv. 296 ff.; Tillemont, Mém. i. 172, ii. 314, 658 ff.; Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelgesch. ii. 1. 207, 418 ff., ii. 2. 399. It must be said, however, that the cognomen Pudens occurs among the higher classes from Martial’s time down (Epigr. iv. 13; Klein, Fasti cons. for the years 165, 166; Tert. Scap. iv.; C. I. G. No. 4241, cf. 5142).

3. (Pp. 3, 17.) Tradition has nothing to say about Phygelus (i. 15), but Hermogenes and Demas (iv. 10) are mentioned in the Acta Theclæ, cc. i. iv. xi.–xiv., which represents them even as early as Paul’s first visit to Iconium (chap. i., cf. Acts xiii. 51) as false friends of Paul, who love money and a luxurious life, and, at the same time, develop the false doctrine hinted at in 2 Tim. ii. 18, though there attributed to others. In the Acta Theclæ, chap. i., Alexander’s epithet ὁ χαλκεύς (2 Tim. iv. 14) is transferred to Hermogenes; cf. GK, i. 789, ii. 901, 903. It is uncertain whether this combination of Demas and Hermogenes has been carried over into Leucius’ Acts of John, cf. the writer’s Acta Jo. p. lxii; Epiph. Hær. li. 6. The name Alexander is so common that the designation of an Alexander as ὁ χαλκεύς is much less striking than the ὁ ἱατρός in Col. iv. 14. It is very possible that he is identical with the Alexander in 1 Tim. i. 20 whom Paul had delivered over to Satan with a view to his chastisement and improvement (cf. 1 Cor. v. 5). Hymenæus, who is joined with him in this connection (1 Tim. i. 20), is mentioned again in 2 Tim. ii. 17, along with a certain Philetus, as the champion of a heresy. According to this, Hymenæus, Philetus, Phygelus, Hermogenes, and the Alexander in 1 Tim. i. 20 must have belonged for a time to the Christian Church, at least in name. But it also agrees best with the tone of 2 Tim. iv. 14 f. if we take the man there mentioned to be within the Church. At all events, τοῖς ἡμετέροις λόγοις refers not to some chance saying of Paul, but to the teaching which Paul jointly with others has proclaimed or defended in the presence of this Alexander; cf. iii. 8. In itself, ἡμετέροις might very well include Timothy; but the whole drift of

iv. 13-15 forces us to conclude that Timothy had not shared in the experiences of Paul there reported. The Antiochian reading ἀνθέστηκεν may have arisen through a misunderstanding, it being assumed that the reference is to resistance which Alexander is now making to Paul, possibly as prosecutor, or witness for the prosecution; but this does not agree with the fact that Alexander was in Asia at the time, probably in Troas. There is not a hint that he was ever in Rome and opposed Paul in his trial there. If he was an opponent of Christian doctrine as Paul preached it, his identity with the Alexander in 1 Tim. i. 20 is exceedingly probable. On the other hand, there is nothing to support the conjecture that he is identical with the Alexander in Ephesus, Acts xix. 33. This man was a Jew, and seems to have had the purpose of repelling the charge that he and his compatriots were enemies of the heathen cult like Paul, whose race his accusers must have emphasised (Acts xvi. 20); or perhaps his aim was rather to defend Paul and the Christian teaching against the charge of ἀθεότης, which would imply that he was also a Christian.

4. (P. 6.) In the light of Acts xvi. 1, it is perfectly natural that in 2 Tim. i. 5 only Timothy's mother and grandmother are mentioned, and not his Gentile father. The parallelism between Paul (i. 3) and Timothy (i. 5) runs throughout the whole section i. 3-14 (ἐπαισχύνεσθαι, i. 8 and 12; παραθήκη, i. 12 and 14, and purely formal δὲ ἦν αἰτίαν, i. 6 and 12); and this of itself makes it probable that it is not the Christian faith of the two women that is here praised. Since Timothy was chosen by Paul to be his assistant on Paul's second visit to Lystra, Timothy's home (Acts xvi. 1; vol. i. 209, n. 2), and since he owed his conversion to Paul himself (1 Tim. i. 2; 2 Tim. i. 2, ii. 1, iii. 14), he must have been converted during Paul's first visit (Acts xiv. 6-23; Gal. iv. 13). He was no neophyte (1 Tim. iii. 6, v. 22) when Paul chose him as his helper in the mission work, and to this end had him circumcised and ordained; he was already an approved member of the Church (Acts xvi. 2). Therefore Lois and Eunice could not have become believers earlier than he. All that we can gather about the women from Acts xvi. 1 is that Eunice was still living at the time of Paul's second visit, and was a Christian. She was converted, therefore, at the same time as her son. The πρῶτον, then, in i. 5—if Acts here deserves credence—cannot mean that the women received the Christian faith earlier than Timothy. Nor, on the other hand, can it mean that "such faith did not exist in the family of Timothy until with these two women, and these alone, it came to dwell there" (Hofmann, vi. 226), for Lois did not belong to the family of his Gentile father at all. But what measure of faith these Jewesses possessed before their conversion to Christianity, they, like Paul, had inherited from their forefathers. The alleged contrast to Paul does not agree with the context, and must have been expressed by a reference to the heathen character of his father and his paternal ancestors. What his father and forefathers were for Paul (Acts xxiii. 6; Gal. i. 14; vol. i. 68, n. 15), Timothy's mother and grandmother were to him. Timothy's faith forms the contrast to πρῶτον, which here, as so often, is not appreciably different from πρότερον, and expresses priority to the action of the main statement (Matt. v. 24, vii. 5, viii. 21, xii. 29, xvii. 10; 2 Thess. ii. 3). Paul might also have written προενόκησεν. Paul could speak of the instruction in the O.T. imparted to Timothy at home, i.e. by his mother, and perhaps also his grandmother, before their conversion, as a preparation for his calling as preacher of the gospel (iii. 15); he could characterise his own Christian piety as the normal continuation of the Pharisaic piety of his earlier years, and of his Pharisaic ancestors (i. 3; Acts xxiii. 1, 6, xxvi. 5-7); and with just as good reason he could speak in praise of the sincere piety of these Jewesses, even though perhaps Lois died without hearing the gospel. Only in case he had opposed the revelation of Christ when it came to him (cf. Gal. i. 16; Phil. iii. 7; Acts xxvi. 19), and ignoring it had held fast to his Pharisaism, would his inherited piety have become hypocrisy—worship vitiated by an unclean and evil conscience. In a like case Paul would have passed the same judgment upon the pre-Christian piety of Lois and Eunice.

5. (P. 6.) As the sense of ii. 2 is to be explained and completed from 1 Tim. vi. 12 (cf. the writer's essay on the Apostol. Symbolum, S. 39 ff.), so 2 Tim. i. 6 should be viewed in the light of 1 Tim. iv. 14. Probably it was prophetic voices (διὰ προφητείας; cf. 1 Tim. i. 18, κατὰ τὰς προαγούσας ἐπὶ σὲ προφητείας) which suggested the choice of Timothy as assistant of Paul and Silvanus, and his consecration to this work with prayer and the laying on of hands (cf. Acts xiii. 2 f.). The laying on of hands by the presbyters (1 Tim. iv. 14) and by Paul (2 Tim. i. 6) are not mutually exclusive, especially since the former is mentioned merely as an accompanying circumstance of his endowment with special grace, the latter as the efficient cause of this endowment. The Churches in the neighbourhood of Timothy's home, according to Acts xiv. 23, had been furnished with a body of presbyters soon after their founding; see, further, § 37.

6. (P. 7.) The earlier Greek Fathers (Eus. H. E. ii. 22; the real Euthalius, Zacagni, p. 533; Chrysost. xi. 190, 658, 722; Theodore, Swete, ii. 230 f.; cf. i. 117, 205 f., and Theodoret) understood 2 Tim. iv. 16 f. on the whole correctly, though they referred the lion too definitely to Nero. The proverbial and figurative character of the expression (Ps. xxii. 21; cf. 1 Macc. ii. 60; Ps. vii. 3, xxxv. 17; Midrash Beresh. r. par. 64 at end), which we find so used in Amos iii. 12, would have been no hindrance to writing τοῦ λέοντος (Judg. xiv. 9; 1 Sam. xvii. 37; Dan. vi. 21) even if the intention were to liken a definite individual to a lion; but, apart from the prophetic announcement in Acts xxvii. 24, there is no hint in the N.T. of a single person upon whose decision Paul's fate in Rome depended. On the other hand, this expression and the fixed usage of ῥέσθαι (2 Tim. iii. 11, iv. 18; 2 Cor. i. 10; 2 Thess. iii. 2; Rom. vii. 24, xv. 31; 2 Pet. ii. 7) does not admit of interpretation as an inner protection from inclination to sin or unbelief. Even when deliverance from temptations is meant (2 Pet. ii. 9; Matt. vi. 13), it is actual rescue from definite situations in real life; and the devil too, when he is likened to a lion instead of a serpent (2 Cor. xi. 3), is represented as the persecutor who seeks the death of believers (1 Pet. v. 8). His terrifying roar is simply a prelude to opening his jaws and devouring the prey. The expression ἐνεδυνάμωσεν cannot justify the giving of this spiritual meaning to ἐρύσασθαι; this can be seen even from 1 Macc. ii. 61 (ὡς ἀρθενήσουσιν=σωθήσονται; cf. ii. 60) and still better from a passage similarly misinterpreted, Phil. i. 19 (vol. i. 545); it follows also from the simple consideration that rescue from the danger of condemnation and execution depends essentially upon how skilfully and energetically a man is defended or defends himself. Spitta at one time (ThStKr. 1878, S. 582 ff.)

returned to the correct interpretation of the passage. But later (Urchristentum, i. 43 ff.; cf. also Hesse, Entstehung der Hirtenbriefe, 29 ff.) he proposed again his earlier view, according to which ver. 17, in contrast with ver. 16, refers to all the divine assistance and deliverance experienced by Paul since his call to apostleship. In the sentence connected by δέ with ver. 16, ὁ κύριός μοι παρέστη plainly forms an antithesis to οὐδείς μοι παραγένετο; consequently, since no other time or occasion is mentioned, the force of the ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ μου ἀπολογία is continued. Even apart from this, the bare aorists in ver. 17 without a πάντοτε, πολλάκις, αἰεί ποτε (cf. ἐκ πάντων, iii. 11; ἐν τούτοις πᾶσιν, Rom. viii. 37), cannot possibly sum up all instances of the kind, especially after two single instances have been adduced, vv. 14, 16, in the same form. Besides, it is by no means in every case that rescue from great danger is conditioned upon being strengthened by the Lord or is brought about by this means, but only when the deliverance of the person in danger depends upon his presence of mind and his courageous words and deeds, as, e.g. in a legal trial. Nor can the correct interpretation be disturbed by the fact that the purpose clause in iv. 17 comes after the second verb, and not at the end after the third verb. It could even come after παρέστη without any essential change in the meaning. It stands where it does because the statement about the Lord's purpose naturally follows the completed account of His action. But the deliverance which was the final result of this support and strengthening by the Lord, Paul did not describe as the immediate act of the Lord, and for the simple reason that he was speaking, not of a miraculous deliverance, as, e.g. those in Acts xvi. 26, xxviii. 5, nor even of a strange combination of circumstances, but rather of the very natural result of his happy defence at the trial. As he stood at the bar, deprived of all human assistance, he could plainly trace the assistance of the Lord, the strengthening through Him, the supply of the appropriate means on the part of the Spirit (Phil. i. 19). At this point, then, naturally comes the reflection over the aim which the Lord had in this act of His. Since πληροφορεῖν is a synonym of πληροῦν, only more emphatic (cf. 2 Tim. iv. 5 with Acts xii. 25), what is said of Christian preaching in the eastern half of the Roman Empire in Rom. xv. 19, 23 is simply repeated here in a stronger expression with reference to Christian preaching in general; every limitation of this preaching, as, e.g. to that in Rome, is excluded by the added καὶ ἀκούσωσιν πάντα τὰ ἔθνη. To refer this expression to the corona populi, who, it is held, attended the trial and heard Paul's defence (Wieseler, Huther, et al.), is particularly out of place; for not only was the public excluded, as a rule, from criminal trials before the imperial court (Mommsen, R. Staatsrecht,³ ii. 965), but also and especially was the circle of the ἔθνη, to whom the preaching is here said to have been brought, widened even less by a legal defence than by Paul's missionary preaching for two years in Rome (see above, p. 8). Paul writes δι' ἐμοῦ (cf. 2 Cor. i. 19; Rom. xv. 18; 1 Cor. iii. 5) and not ὑπ' ἐμοῦ, which would have been hardly possible in connection with ἀκούσωσιν. But the former phrase, as well as the latter, makes it clear that Paul is speaking of a result to be effected through his personal activity, and cannot justify Hofmann's exegesis (vi. 301), according to which the Lord merely takes care that the nerve of the further propagation of the gospel shall not be cut by a weak defence of this gospel, or even a denial of it, on Paul's part.

7. (P. 11.) With regard to the tendency to idealise the results of missionary work, cf. Skizzen, 76-82, and vol. i. 415 f., n. 19 on Rom. xv. 19 f. Here belongs the use of "Macedonia" and "Achaia," as if they were Christian lands, 2 Cor. ix. 2 (viii. 1, 4); Rom. xv. 26; further, Acts viii. 14; also the exaggerated expressions Rom. x. 18; Col. i. 6.

8. (P. 11.) The reading Γαλατίαν, iv. 10 (Γαλλίαν, NC, Eriph. Horr. li. 11; cf. Eus. H. E. iii. 4. 8, ἐπὶ τὰς Γαλλίας), is by far the best attested; but even aside from this, it should be retained because the commentators have from the first understood by it European Gaul, and that, too, though at the time when our oldest Greek MSS. were written, the Greeks, following Roman precedent, regularly called the land ἡ Γαλλία, αἱ Γαλλίαι; cf. Theodorus, ii. 227, "Galatiam dixit quas nunc nominamus Gallias," and also Lightfoot on this point, Galatians, pp. 3, 31. The older Greeks regularly used until well down in Christian times Γαλάται, Γαλατία for Gaul and its inhabitants, along with the still older names, Κέλται, Κελτοί, Κελτική; so that on occasion the Asiatic Galatians and their land had to be more closely defined as οἱ ἐν Ἀσίᾳ Γαλάται (Plut. Mor. p. 258), ἡ κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν Γαλατία (Dioscor. Mat. Med. iii. 56, 62), Γαλλογραικοί, Γαλλογραικία (Strabo, pp. 130, 566). Epictetus is cited as the oldest witness for the Latinised form Γάλλοι; but he is really no witness at all, for he understands by this word, Diss. ii. 20. 17, the castrated priests of the Phrygian Cybele. Even Plutarch uses only Γαλάται, Γαλατία (along with Κελτοί, Κελτική), and generally leaves to his readers to decide from the context whether they are to be found in Western Europe (Camillus, cc. xv.-xviii.; Cæsar, cc. xiv.-xxv.; Pompeius, chap. xlviii.) or in Asia Minor (Lucullus, chap. xxviii.; Marius, chap. xxxi.; Pompeius, cc. xxxi. xxxiii.; Moralia, pp. 257-259). The oldest Greek witness for Γάλλοι, in the sense of the European Celts, would be the physician Dioscorides in the time of Nero (de Mat. Med. ii. 101, iii. 33, 75, 108, 117, 122, iv. 16, 42, 69, 71; nowhere else), if all the statements about barbarian names for medicinal herbs were not under suspicion of being later interpolations (Sprengel, tom. i. p. xvi). He would also be the oldest witness for Γαλλία (de Mat. Med. ii. 92, ἀπὸ Γαλλίας καὶ Τυρρηνίας), if only we did not read two lines farther down ἀπὸ Γαλατίας τῆς πρὸς ταῖς Ἀλπεσιν as a designation of the same land or a part of it; cf. iii. 25; and, per contra, ἐν τῇ κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν Γαλατίᾳ, iii. 56, 62. It was very easy for later scribes to change ΓΑΛΑΤΙΑ, which had become strange to them in this sense, into ΓΑΛΛΙΑ. So also, apparently, we should restore in the text of Jos. Ant. xviii. 7. 2, Bell. ii. 7. 3 the older Γαλατία, which Josephus uses commonly elsewhere (see Niese's apparatus, ad loc., and index under Γαλάται, Γαλατία). On the other hand, we actually find in the Acts of Paul, about 170 A.D. (ed. Lipsius, p. 104. 3, in the Lat. text Galilæa; as to the confounding here of Luke and Crescens, see GK, ii. 888), in the letter of the Lyonese, 177 A.D. (Eus. H. E. v. 1. 49), and in Theoph. ad Autol. ii. 32, αἱ (καλούμεναι, Theoph.) Γαλλίαι. Galen (de Antid. i. 14; Kühn, xiv. 80) is led by a quotation from Nero's time, in which Gaul was called ἡ Γαλατεία, to speak of the fluctuation in usage between Γάλλοι, Γαλάται, Κέλται, but without once thinking of the Galatians in Asia Minor. Appian's standpoint is the same, Proem. iii. and Iber. i. Herodian seems to be the first who distinguished consciously between ἡ Γαλλία (iii. 7. 1)=Gaul and ἡ Γαλατία (iii. 2. 6, 3. 1)=Galatia in Asia Minor. This usage is too late to be taken into account in connection with 2 Tim. iv. 10. Lexically considered, it may be here either Gaul or Galatia. But its position next to Dalmatia, which has its parallel in the famous Monumentum Ancyranum (Res gestæ D. Augusti, ed.² Mommsen, p. lxxxv, 124, ἐξ Ἰσπανίας καὶ Γαλατίας καὶ παρὰ Δαλματῶν; cf. pp. 98, 103), leaves no doubt that Gaul is meant. The circumstance that Galatia was nearer to Timothy than Gaul, is counterbalanced by the fact that to Paul, writing from Rome, Gaul was nearer. Indeed, this very nearness of Crescens to Timothy could hardly have been left unexpressed, especially if Timothy were then staying in Lystra or Iconium (above, p. 19, n. 1), i.e. in the province of Galatia. The lack of ancient tradition concerning Crescens as missionary to Gaul, and also concerning Titus as missionary to Dalmatia, is certainly to be regretted, but cannot be used as a basis for any historical conclusions. It was not until long afterward that the founding of the Church in Vienna was ascribed to Crescens, and, still later, that of the Church in Mayence (Tillemont, Mém. i. 615). It corresponds to the fluctuating usage of the time that Paul should write Δαλματία here, and, per contra, τὸ Ἰλλυρικόν in Rom. xv. 19 (Marquardt, *R. Staatsverw.*² i. 299); and, in particular, this variation proves that the statements in 2 Tim. iv. relating to missions and geography are independent of Rom. xv.

9. (P. 14.) Hug's suggestion (*Eínl.*³ ii. 418), adopted by many since his time, that we should take the ἀπέλιπον in iv. 20, in distinction from that in iv. 13, as third person plural, is inadmissible, since in that case the subject could not be divined. Erastus alone—mentioned just before—cannot be the subject. Nor can we find in iv. 19 one or more persons who can be joined with Erastus to make up the subject of ἀπέλιπον; for it was not the household of Onesiphorus, but only Onesiphorus himself, who had lately made a journey (i. 16–18, above, p. 2). Equally inadmissible is the proposal of Baronius (ad annum, 59, n. 1), supported also by Knoke (Prakt. theol. Kommentar zu den Pastoralbr. i. 116), to change Μιλήτωρ (al. μῆλιτω, μῆλητω, μῆλωτω) into Μελίτη, and thus to understand Malta as referred to (Acts xxviii. 1–10). For, in the first place, Trophimus (Acts xxi. 29) is not mentioned in Acts xxvii. 2, where the author's plain intention is to indicate Paul's companions on the journey to Rome. In the second place, such a communication would have been unintelligible to Timothy unless 2 Tim. were written in the very first part of the first Roman imprisonment, before Timothy arrived for the first time in Rome, and before Eph., Col., and Philem. were written. But in view of what has been said above (p. 1 f.) this is impossible. Even Baronius felt constrained to refute the view that a Miletus in Crete, now Milatò or Milata, is meant, and that, therefore, we are to think of Acts xxvii. 7–13. The arguments which hold against the preceding view are equally applicable here; but aside from these, this Miletus is situated on the north shore of the island, whereas Paul, on his journey to Rome, sailed along the south shore. Wieseler's opinion (Chronol. 467), that while Paul exchanged at Myra the Adramyttian ship for an Alexandrian vessel sailing to Italy direct (Acts xxvii. 5 f.), Trophimus may have continued his journey on the former ship as far as Miletus, where illness detained him; and that this is the meaning of the words in 2 Tim. iv. 20 needs no refutation.

10. (P. 18.) From the mere mention of Ephesus by name in 2 Tim. i.

18, iv. 12, we cannot conclude that Timothy was then living else; this Paul, when he was himself in Rome, wrote ἐν Ῥώμῃ, 2 Tim. i. 17, and when in Ephesus, ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, 1 Cor. xv. 32, xvi. 8, instead of ὧδε or ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ πόλει; and in like manner, when writing to Timothy in Ephesus, he used not ἐκεί, but ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, 1 Tim. i. 3 (cf. iii. 14 f.); and when he had occasion to speak of Corinth to the Corinthians he used εἰς Κόρινθον (2 Cor. i. 23). Nevertheless, Theodorus, ii. 190, is plainly right when he remarks with reference to 2 Tim. iv. 12: "dixisset utique 'ad te,' si Ephesi adhuc Timotheus moraretur, quando et hanc ad eum scribebat epistolam."

§ 34. THE FACTS ATTESTED BY THE FIRST EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY.

Unlike the shorter letter to Timothy, which on this account was placed after the longer one of the collection, and in which are found numerous notices concerning Paul's personal situation, 1 Tim. has very few such notices. It is, however, clear that when 1 Tim. was written Paul was at liberty, and somewhere in the eastern part of the empire. He mentions a journey to Macedonia, which had been made recently, as will be shown below (i. 3), and expresses the hope of coming shortly to Ephesus, where Timothy was at the time (iii. 14, iv. 13). Although the sentence with which the letter begins is left uncompleted (i. 3 ff.), and although the construction at the beginning is somewhat loose, its general meaning is clear (n. 1). Some time before, Paul had asked Timothy to remain a while longer in Ephesus, where Timothy was at the time the request was made. These instructions had been given by Paul to his disciple just as the apostle was setting out on a journey to Macedonia, or after it had been begun. The latter is more likely, since there were better ways in which to express the former thought than that which he here uses (ἐκπορεύεσθαι, Acts xxv. 4; Mark x. 46; ἐξέρχεσθαι, 2 Cor. ii. 13; Phil. iv. 15; cf. Acts xx. 1, xxi. 5). Since Paul does not say that he had left Timothy behind in Ephesus (cf. Tit. i. 5; 2 Tim. iv. 13, 20), he could not have been in Ephesus at the time, nor have set out on his journey to Macedonia from that point, but, when this instruction was sent to Timothy, must have been journeying to Macedonia from the West. Assuming—as the language seems to require—that Timothy was in Ephesus when he received the instruction, also that the apostle's directions take for granted an opposite intention or inclination on Timothy's part, the most natural supposition is that, in a letter written from Ephesus, Timothy had expressed to the apostle his desire to join him on this journey, which was to take him, among other places, into Macedonia, or to set out to meet him there. But from some point on his route Paul had written to Timothy to remain in Ephesus. It is probable that in this reply he expressed the intention of himself coming to Ephesus; for in iii. 14, iv. 13 he speaks of his coming as if it had already been announced. That Timothy did not refuse to obey this advice of the apostle's, and that when 1 Tim. was written he was still in Ephesus, is proved not only by the absence of all evidence to the contrary, but, more positively, by the way in which the exhortations and instructions, which constitute the main contents of 1 Tim., are all connected with this injunction that Timothy remain at his post. When he began to write he evidently intended merely to remind Timothy of the purpose for which he had been instructed to remain where he was; but this he afterwards enlarges into an independent statement (i. 3–8), the detailed character of which is accounted for by the fact that he here reminds Timothy of the tasks to the zealous performance of which this letter is meant to urge him. In accordance with Paul's earlier request, and the purpose which Paul had then set before him as most pressing, Timothy is to continue his work in Ephesus until the apostle himself comes.

It is, however, because the prospect of his coming to Ephesus is only a hope, and because he is not sure how long this coming may be deferred, that Paul writes this letter to Timothy. In case he is compelled to remain away longer, the instructions in the letter will serve to assist Timothy in the right performance of his duties in the Church (iii. 14 f., iv. 13). In view of the urgent character of the exhortations (i. 18, iv. 11, 14–16, vi. 3, 11, 20), and the solemn manner in which he is reminded of his duties (v. 21, vi. 3–16), it is to be inferred that Timothy was endeavouring to escape from the duty enjoined upon him. From iv. 12 we gather that he had urged his youth as an excuse for a certain lack of energy which the apostle thought he showed in the discharge of his office. Besides, there were constant physical disorders which made him anxious about his health, and had led him to abstain from wine and from the use of hearty foods (v. 23, iv. 8). More noteworthy is the fact that Timothy should be warned by the citation of terrible examples of the apathy of the religious and moral life (i. 19 ; cf. iv. 16, vi. 12), against the love of money (vi. 11 ; cf. vi. 5–10), and against having anything to do with useless and unfruitful theoretical discussions and investigations, which it was his duty to forbid other teachers to carry on (iv. 7, vi. 20 ; cf. i. 4, vi. 4).

The work which Timothy has to do in and about Ephesus is very different from his vocation in 2 Tim. Where Timothy may have been at the time of 2 Tim., whether in Iconium, or Ephesus, or Rome, or on his way thither, the one thing which he is to keep in mind is that the proclamation of the gospel is his distinctive and essential mission, as it is that of the apostle (2 Tim. i. 8, iv. 5 ; cf. i. 10, ii. 8). With this function was, of course, associated—in Timothy's case, as in the case of Paul himself and of all apostles and evangelists who happened to be for a time in localities where there were Christian Churches (vol. i. 507 f.)—a teaching function which ministered to the faith and life of the members of the Church, and, generally speaking, an administrative activity in the Church's affairs (2 Tim. ii. 2, 14-21, 24-26, iii. 16 f., iv. 2-4). But the fact is not to be denied, that in 1 Tim. this oversight of the Church by Timothy is the only function spoken of, and that no mention is made anywhere of his missionary calling. Not only do we miss the word "evangelist," which is used in 2 Tim. iv. 5 as a comprehensive description of Timothy's calling, but even the word εὐαγγέλιον occurs only once in 1 Tim., and then with reference not to Timothy's calling, but to the ministry of Paul (i. 11; cf. ii. 7). This explains why, in 2 Tim., Timothy's vocation is treated as a life-calling, whereas the task to which he is exhorted in 1 Tim. is limited to the time he shall be in Ephesus until Paul's arrival (1 Tim. iii. 14 f., iv. 13). From the time when Paul made him his helper in the prosecution of missionary work he had been an evangelist (2 Tim. i. 6). In manifold ways on his journeys with Paul he had proved himself such (2 Tim. iii. 10 f.). This work and service of an evangelist he is to continue to the end, even after the apostle's work on earth is finished (2 Tim. iv. 1-8). Of course, there is to be recognised a connection between the special task of which Timothy is reminded in the first letter and his consecration as a helper in missionary work, including the prophetic gifts which he then received, particularly that of pastoral teaching (1 Tim. iv. 14; cf. i. 18). But even leaving out of account the noticeable difference of language between 1 Tim. iv. 14 and 2 Tim. i. 6 (above, p. 23, n. 5), the marked distinction between the two offices cannot be explained by simply assuming that the special and temporary office which Timothy was to perform in Ephesus grew out of his life-calling as an evangelist and missionary, like similar temporary commissions performed earlier (1 Cor. iv. 17; Phil. ii. 19-23).

What in detail these duties were which Paul instructed Timothy to perform in the Church, will be discussed in connection with the question of the genuineness of the Epistle (§ 37). Here we are concerned with the character of these duties only as this throws light upon the question, at what time in Paul's life this letter could have been written. The description of these duties given in the middle of the letter, where Paul states its purpose, namely, that in case he is compelled to remain away longer than he anticipates, Timothy may know how persons ought to conduct themselves in the house of God, is very general (iii. 15, n. 2). From this passage we gather that Timothy's position in one portion of the Church was similar to that of the head of a household. The principal reason why Paul thought it necessary for Timothy to remain longer in Ephesus is stated in i. 3 f. and emphasised again from a different point of view in vi. 3-5, and is this, namely, the necessity of warning certain persons not to teach in a manner which to the apostle seems perverse, and, to put it mildly, not profitable to the Church. He is also to warn them against occupying themselves with profitless speculations instead of with sound Christian doctrine, evidently because their activity as teachers was prompted by such speculations (n. 3). He was also charged to a certain extent with the cure of souls; since his other instructions were such that their carrying out would for the most part involve personal intercourse with the people of his charge (e.g. v. 1-7, vi. 1-2, 17). On the other hand, it is self-evident that Timothy was authorised and bound to publicly exhort, advise, and reprove persons who assumed the rôle of teachers, the young widows, slaves, the rich, and elders. In one case he is expressly enjoined to do so (v. 20), and throughout the letter, where teaching as well as exhortation and injunction is spoken of (iv. 6, 11, 16, vi. 3), the reference is to public teaching in the Church. But this does not by any means place Timothy on the same footing with the member of the Church possessing special gifts for teaching and speaking, or with officials in the Church who exercised this office (v. 17). The fact that Timothy is to forbid false teachers to teach in their own way, presupposes that he exerted a determining influence over all that was taught in the public gatherings of the Church, and so over its entire worship. This is presupposed in the textus receptus of ii. 1, where, although it is not said in so many words that Timothy has charge of the matter, Paul enjoins that prayers of various kinds be offered for all men, particularly for rulers. The very fact that this is said in a letter directed to Timothy makes Timothy responsible for the observance of this rule in all public worship. Neither the offering of prayer nor teaching is official, but every male member of the Church is privileged to exercise both functions. Only Timothy is to see to it that both are exercised in a correct manner (n. 4). Since Paul does not define Timothy's duties in this letter, but simply reminds him of them, details are for the most part only indirectly and incidentally given. In iii. 1-13 are set forth the qualifications which must be had by a bishop or deacon; iii. 1 brings before us the situation where one desires the office of bishop; iii. 10 speaks of the examination which must precede entrance into the office; from all which it is to be inferred that the rules here laid down are those to be observed in connection with the induction of these officials into office. Since, however, these rules are given in a letter to Timothy, who neither is nor will become a bishop or a deacon, it follows that Timothy's influence was paramount with reference to these officials, and that he was to observe these rules in inducting them into office. Of Timothy's part in the appointment and consecration of Church officials, which was certainly one of importance and responsibility, we learn only incidentally from the warning that he is not to lay hands on anyone in consecration hastily or lightly (v. 22), which does not exclude the co-operation of others, any more than the laying on of Paul's hands excluded those of the presbytery (iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6). Quite as incidentally we learn from v. 19–21 that among other functions Timothy was to act as judge over the presbyters, and to see to it, on the other hand, that those presbyters who filled their office worthily received the honour due them (v. 17 f.). Further, he was to have oversight over the Church's care of widows, the reception of them into the fellowship, and the registering of those among them who were active in the service of the Church and deserving of special honour (v. 3–16). In short, there was no branch of Church life over which his authority did not extend; he is not, however, one of the ἐπίσκοποι or πρεσβύτεροι, but he is over them.

It is to be noted also that Timothy's office was not limited to the local Church. Paul had asked him to continue in Ephesus, merely because he had expressed a desire to join Paul on his journey (i. 3, above, p. 27 f.). The request does not imply that Timothy was not to leave the limits of the city, and that Paul's instructions were to be carried out only in this one Church. We saw in connection with ii. 1–15 (cf. also n. 4) that Timothy was to put into operation in a number of Churches Paul's principles with reference to public prayer. This is still clearer in the instructions regarding the appointment of bishops and deacons (iii. 1–13; cf. v. 22). Even if it be assumed that the time which these instructions were meant to cover (iii. 15, iv. 13), i.e. the time before his own arrival in Ephesus, might be extended over two or three years, as Paul thought it might, they are altogether superfluous if intended to apply only to the local Ephesian Church. In so brief a time within one Church there could not possibly have been more than one or two occasions when the apostle's regulations would have applied. It is quite possible, and the shorter the period the more probable it becomes, that during this interval there was no occasion in this Church—which had been organised some time—for the appointment of new bishops and deacons, and that no ordinations took place. Consequently it must have been a large group of Churches, the direction and oversight of which were committed to Timothy, in residence at Ephesus, and among them probably such as were in process of formation and therefore in need of ecclesiastical organisation (n. 5). Without any question, these were the Churches of the province of Asia (1 Cor. xvi. 19), of which Ephesus was the centre. That Paul felt himself responsible, as the founder of the Church in Ephesus, for the development of all the other Churches in the province, and for the oversight of the same, is abundantly proved by the first three letters of his imprisonment, while from Col. i. 7 it is clear that even at this time he regarded Timothy, who had been his helper in the planting of Christianity in the province of Asia, as sharing his relation to this large group of Churches (vol. i. 449 f., n. 3).

The position which Timothy occupied in Ephesus, as it is described in 1 Tim., cannot without doing the greatest violence to history be called that of a bishop (n. 6); for the office of bishop existed also where the one bishop, superior to the presbytery, represented the highest expression of the common Church life. The office was for life, and confined to the local Church. This was particularly the case in Asia Minor, where, although as early as the time of Revelation and the letters of Ignatius, bishoprics were numerous and closely adjacent, the office always retained its local character. On the other hand, Timothy's position at the head of the Churches of Asia was due to the position which he occupied as Paul's helper in missionary work. It was his part in the apostolic calling, as this calling involved the oversight of existing Churches. Timothy was acting as a temporary representative of Paul in his apostolic capacity at Ephesus, as he had done earlier in Corinth, and in Thessalonica and Philippi.

(1 Cor. iv. 17 ; 1 Thess. iii. 2 f. ; Phil. ii. 19-23). His relation was not closer to one Church than to the other Churches of the province ; its rise and disappearance did not affect at all the organisation of the local congregations.

Compared with 2 Tim., 1 Tim. contains few personal notices (n. 7). But the few that it does contain give the impression of genuineness. They show at least that Paul did not write the letter prior to his five years' imprisonment in Cæsarea and Rome. Since, however, Paul is at liberty, the letter and the events immediately preceding fall in the interval between the first and a second Roman imprisonment, of which we learn in 2 Tim. The journey spoken of in i. 3 cannot, as Hug (*Einkl.*³ ii. 377) assumes, be identified with that of Acts xx. 1 ; for at that time Timothy had not been, as is assumed in 1 Tim. i. 3, for a considerable time in Ephesus, nor could Paul at that time have requested him to continue there, for Timothy had just returned to Ephesus from a journey to Macedonia and Corinth, and soon afterward accompanied Paul on this journey to Macedonia and Greece (2 Cor. i. 1, 8, vii. 5 ; vol. i. 316, n. 3). He was also with him on the return journey from Greece, through Macedonia, to Troas, Miletus, and Jerusalem (Acts xx. 3 ff.). Even assuming that Timothy remained in Ephesus some time after Paul left, following later to Macedonia, or that he left the party, say at Troas (Acts xx. 5), and went to Ephesus to execute some commissions for the apostle, while Paul and the other members of the party did not stop at Ephesus (Acts xx. 16 f.), neither προσμείναι (i. 3), nor Paul's intention to come shortly to Ephesus (iii. 14), nor the tasks referred to in 1 Tim., agree with the representation of this journey which we have in Acts. For this reason it has been suggested that the letter, and the events presupposed by it as immediately preceding, belong in the period of Paul's labours in Ephesus, which covered approximately three years, more definitely, near the end of his stay there (n. 8). Then the journey referred to in 1 Tim. i. 3 would be the journey of Paul from Ephesus to Corinth not mentioned in Acts, but attested by 2 Cor. (vol. i. 263, 271 f.), and from this passage we should have to assume that on that occasion Paul went to Corinth by way of Macedonia. But the assumption which this involves, namely, that after having himself been for some time in Ephesus, Paul left Timothy behind, charged with the tasks mentioned in 1 Tim. i. 3 f., has against it, as has been shown (above, p. 271), the language of the passage. Besides, there is nothing to indicate that the prospective arrival of Paul in the place where Timothy remains (iii. 14, iv. 13), is a return of Paul to his place of residence after a temporary absence. It is also difficult to understand why Paul should have written Timothy a letter like 1 Tim., if in his capacity as Paul's helper he was simply to carry on the work which he had seen the apostle do for some time past, when Paul had already had ample opportunity, and the most urgent occasion just before setting out on his journey, to give Timothy instructions for the time during which he was to be absent. During this time Paul would have had no occasion to write Timothy except in answer to questions about individual cases that presented difficulty, of which, however, there is no suggestion. The instructions of the letter would be quite without point unless Paul assumed that Timothy would have to remain at his post in Ephesus alone for at least several months. Adding to this the time that had elapsed since the supposed departure of Paul to Macedonia and Corinth, the interruption of Paul's work in Ephesus caused by this journey is drawn out to a length which renders the silence of Acts with reference to it not only very strange, but its representation of Paul's work in Ephesus positively erroneous (xix. 8-10, xx. 18, 31). Moreover, the letter assumes the existence in the province of Asia of a considerable group of Churches, some of which at least had been in existence for some time. Since a newly baptized person is not to be made a bishop (i. 6), there must have been in Ephesus and vicinity a number of men who had been for some years members of the Church. But even as late as the third year after the beginning of missionary work in Ephesus there were no persons tested by a long period of Christian experience, but only neophytes. This would be even more true of the other cities of the province. Furthermore, at the time when this letter was written there were in these cities persons who had fallen away again from the faith (i. 19 f., v. 15), and Timothy is informed anew that Paul has given these persons over to Satan (i. 20); hence it could not have happened while Timothy was in Ephesus, nor could Paul have been there at the time when this was done. Finally, it is hard to see how, in a Church so recently organised as that in Ephesus, and until very recently under the personal oversight of the apostle, the unprofitable teachers, whom Timothy is especially instructed to oppose, could have secured such a footing; or if, in spite of his influence, they had acquired so much power, how in the circumstances Paul could have left Ephesus. Then the assumption has against it the close connection between 1 Tim. and 2 Tim., which certainly could not have been written before 63. The relation of 1 Tim. to Titus is closer, and, as will be shown, this letter could not have been written before the same year. Between the three letters there is an affinity of language, a similarity of thought, and a likeness of errors combated, which prevents our referring any of them to a period much earlier than the others. Certainly this assumption cannot be maintained on the ground of Timothy's youthful age, suggested by the statement that he is not to let anyone despise him on account of his youth (iv. 12), and by his apparent disposition to excuse himself from his duties on this ground (above, p. 29). Paul speaks of Timothy's youth (2 Tim. ii. 22) in the very latest of his letters; and in any case, Timothy, who became Paul's helper in missionary work in the year 52, was not in the year 64 necessarily more than thirty-five or forty years of age, and so still a juvenis, who on account of his immaturity might be regarded by himself and others as unsuited for the office in the Church described above. His task was really no easy one, especially if there were older men in the Churches, whether occupying official positions or not (v. 1, 19).

1. (P. 27.) Otto, Geschichtl. Verh. der Pastoralhr. S. 48, followed by Kölling, Erster Br. an Tim. i. 207-221, translated 1 Tim. i. 3: "Just as (in accordance with the fact that) I exhorted thee in Ephesus (i.e. while I was staying there), to hold out (to stand fast), so do thou, when setting out on the journey to Macedonia, command certain persons not to cleave to strange teachers, nor to give heed to endless fables and genealogies." The grain of truth in the elaborate discussions of these theologians is that in Paul's writings καθώς does not have just the same meaning as simple ὥς, ὥσπερ, so that, as has been admitted by others, in this respect passages like Gal. i. 9 are not altogether comparable. Paul points to the earlier request and exhortation which he had addressed to Timothy (cf. against Kölling, 211, with regard to παρακαλεῖν, Matt. viii. 34; Mark v. 17; Luke viii. 41; Acts xxviii. 14; 2 Cor. viii. 6) as the standard for what he has now to say to Timothy, and for what Timothy has now to do. For this very reason he reproduces not only this former request itself, but also its aim and real intention (ἵνα παραγγείλῃς—ἐν πίστει); and the more detailed he makes this reproduction, the more natural it seems that with his tendency to anacolutha he should leave unexpressed the new request, which was to be expected grammatically, but which would have been of essentially similar content and of quite the same sense. The προσμένειν here (in distinction from the cases where it occurs in connection with a dative governed by the πρός, Matt. xv. 32; Acts xi. 23; 1 Tim. v. 5) is used absolutely="to remain steadfastly, beyond the measure hitherto attained, still longer to persevere at one's post" (Acts xviii. 18; Herodot. viii. 4). But this cannot in any way prevent us from connecting ἐν Ἐφέσῳ with it as the designation of the place where Timothy shall longer remain. The case is the same with the essentially synonymous ἐπιμένειν, which likewise occurs, sometimes with the dative (Rom. vi. 1; 1 Tim. iv. 16), sometimes without such completion of the idea, but with the most various determinations of the place (Acts xv. 34, xxi. 4, αὐτοῦ; 1 Cor. xvi. 8, ἐν Ἐφέσῳ; 1 Cor. xvi. 7; Gal. i. 18, πρός τινα; Acts xxviii. 14, παρ' αὐτοῖς), the time (Acts x. 48, xxi. 10, xxviii. 12), or even the action in which one perseveres (Acts xii. 16; John viii. 7). The position of the words as imperatively demands that we connect ἐν Ἐφέσῳ with προσμένειν, as it forbids our connecting it with παρεκάλεσα. Moreover, it is an arbitrary assumption to claim that πορευόμενος must have stood before παρεκάλεσα, if the author's purpose had been to couple it with that verb as an attendant circumstance. In consideration of passages like Acts xix. 9, it would be more natural to ask if Paul's journey to Macedonia or departure thither, though in form it is mentioned as the attendant circumstance of παρεκάλεσα, did not in fact directly follow this exhortation. The position of these words, like the whole sentence structure, is unquestionably careless. It is only as an afterthought that Paul characterises the situation at that time by remarking that he was then on a journey to Macedonia, when he requested Timothy, against the latter's inclinations, to prolong his stay and his labour in Ephesus.

2. (P. 31.) The present γράφω, on the one hand (cf. per contra, Rom. xv. 15; 1 Cor. ix. 15; Gal. vi. 11; Philem. 19, 21; vol. i. 472, n. 4, 345, n. 5), and ταῦτα, on the other, forbid referring iii. 14 f. exclusively either to what precedes or to what follows. The instructions of i. 3–iii. 13 are followed in iv. 6–vi. 21 by others essentially similar. Here, as in 1 Cor. iv. 14, Paul stops in the middle of his letter to make a remark bearing upon the essential content of the whole Epistle. In both cases the remark is occasioned by what has just been said here, because the preceding instructions may have given the impression that Timothy must keep the post assigned him interminably, and that Paul had given up all thought of visiting him and releasing him. The σέ after δεῖ is abundantly attested (also Ephrem arm. 259 ?); and even if it is a gloss, it is a correct one. Elsewhere, ἀναστρέφεισθαι, ἀναστροφή may not differ essentially from περιπατεῖν, πολιτεύεσθαι (2 Cor. i. 12; Eph. ii. 3, iv. 22; 1 Tim. iv. 12); but the connection with ἐν οἴκῳ θεοῦ here suggests the idea of a manager or overseer engaged about the house, and moving hither and thither (cf. Heb. iii. 2–6; Zech. iii. 7; Ezek. xxii. 29 f.; and for οἰκονομίαν θεοῦ, cf. n. 3); for the member of the family as such (the private Church member) does not move about the house, but dwells, sits therein.

3. (P. 31.) The prohibition μηδὲ προσέχειν, i. 4, cannot apply to Timothy, for in that case we must have had μηδὲ προσέχης continuing the construction of ἵνα παραγγείλῃς. No further proof is needed. Nor does it refer to the Church members as hearers, but rather, like μὴ ἐτεροδιδασκαλεῖν, to the false teachers, as appears for the following reasons: (1) the very connection of the words compels us to take both warnings as addressed to the same persons, since there is no new dative object opposed to τισίν. (2) οἰκονομίαν θεοῦ, ver. 4, for which οἰκοδομήν and οἰκοδομίαν are ancient emendations intended to make an easier reading, indicates the exercise of the calling of an οἰκονόμος θεοῦ (cf. Tit. i. 7; 1 Cor. iv. 1, ix. 17; 1 Pet. iv. 10; Eph. iii. 2; Col. i. 25; vol. i. 471, n. 1; Ign. Eph. vi. 1); but this calling is exercised not by the hearing, but by the teaching member of the Church. (3) In Tit. i. 14 the same thing is said of mischievous teachers, and in 1 Tim. vi. 3, προσέχεται, which is most certainly the correct reading (N*, Latini omnes, Ephrem arm. ? Theod. Mops. ?), has the same subject as ἐτεροδιδασκαλεῖ.

4. (Pp. 32, 33.) In 1 Tim. ii. 1 we should read παρακάλει with the Westerns (DG, Hil., Ambrosiaster ?), with whom the Sahidic also agrees. It was natural for the copyists, whose task it was to prepare a text adapted for the edification of the Church, to make the apostle himself address this exhortation to the Church directly. Besides, a glance at ii. 8 (v. 14), where the verb indeed is not the same as παρακάλει, ii. 1, but has the same force and general meaning, would mislead them into writing παρακαλῶ. After the somewhat digressive remarks of i. 19–20, Paul in ii. 1 directs the thought back to i. 12 by means of παρακάλει οὖν, and then goes on to describe more in detail the commission given to Timothy, there expressed only in general terms. The teaching within the Church, with its practical application, consonant with the gospel, but by no means identical with it,—for this is what is meant by ἡ παραγγελία, i. 5, 18,—is recommended to his faithful care and diligent exercise. The instructions for guarding against false teachers, which have been given even earlier (i. 3 f.), do not belong properly to this commission. The positive development of its details begins rather in ii. 1. The exhortation here is not to assiduous prayer in general, whether in the closet or in the family circle, or in public worship (1 Thess. v. 17; Col. iv. 2; Eph. vi. 18; Phil. iv. 6; Rom. xii. 12), but simply to prayer in the congregation assembled for worship, as is perfectly evident. For (1) the passive expression, “Exhort therefore that above all prayers, etc., be offered for all men, for kings,” etc., shows that the regulation under discussion is a public one. (2) In a list of things for which Christians should pray in private as well as in public, we should certainly expect to see mention of their own spiritual and bodily welfare, and of the good of their fellow-believers. Here, however, we find merely directions to pray for all men, the vast majority of whom were still unconverted; and for rulers, who at that time were still heathen; together with elaborate reasons for such prayer. This can be explained only on the supposition that the prayer referred to was public. (3) In ii. 8 men are spoken of as those who offer this prayer, as if this were self-evident; consequently a kind of prayer must be referred to from which women were excluded, i.e. praying aloud before the assembled congregation. For the silent prayer of the individual is plainly a right and a duty of the women just as much as of the men, and Paul had not the least intention of excluding the women even from praying aloud in family worship (1 Cor. xi. 5, cf. vii. 5). It is only in public worship that they are to be silent (1 Cor. xiv. 34–36), i.e. neither leading in prayer nor teaching. The very same thing is enjoined here, ii. 11 f., in words which clearly recall 1 Cor. xiv. 35; and from this it follows again that in this whole context the reference is exclusively to Church worship. The man who raises his hands in prayer before the congregation, and is selected to voice their prayer, must see to it that the hands which he thus stretches forth to God before the eyes of all are pure from all unclean, dishonourable, and violent deeds (Isa. i. 15; Jas. iv. 8; Clem. 1 Cor. xxix. 1; Jos. Bell. v. 9. 4 [Niese, 380, 403]; Horace, Sat. i. 4. 68; and on ὁσῖος, Tit. i. 8; Heb. vii. 26; Luke i. 75; GK, i. 102 f.), and that his heart is free from anger at the persecutions inflicted by the heathen, and from questionings as to the rightfulness of the civil order, a disposition which would choke sincere prayer for all men and for the heathen rulers. The force of προσεύχεσθαι in ii. 8 grammatically cannot extend into ii. 9, since γυναῖκας has a predicate of its own, κοσμεῖν ἑαυτάς. It does continue the sense logically, but only to this extent, that ii. 9–12a still treats of the congregation assembled for prayer. The women are not here asked to pray in like manner as the men; else why the diversity in the two commands, or why at all the separation of those praying into men and women? Such a misunderstanding of the passage has led to the insertion of a spurious καί before γυναίκας. Simple ὡσαύτως does not justify ascribing to the women the same function as to the men, indeed, not even a similar one. It merely places (otherwise than in iii. 8, 11) the commands to the women, which follow on the same plane, with those to the men. "In like manner also I desire that the women," etc. Since this whole passage treats only of prayer before the assembled congregation, ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ cannot include all the various places where a Christian can pray, as, e.g. the closet, the family living-room, and the meeting-place of the congregation. Rather, as in 1 Cor. i. 2, 1 Thess. i. 8 (cf. 2 Cor. ii. 14), it means all the places where there are Christian congregations, and where Christian meetings for prayer are held. Paul will have these instructions carried out everywhere, in all congregations (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 17, vii. 17, xi. 16, xiv. 33, 36). But why should Paul speak thus universally when requesting Timothy to look after this matter in the part of the Church entrusted to his care? The only possible explanation is that this part of the Church embraced a number of places and local Churches.

5. (P. 34.) As an illustration, we may take, aside from Tit. i. 5, what Clement of Alexandria (Quis dives, xlii.) says of the apostle John: ἐπειδὴ γὰρ τοῦ τυράννου τελευτήσαντος ἀπὸ τῆς Πάτμου τῆς νήσου μετῆλθεν ἐπὶ τὴν Ἔφεσον, ἀπῆει παρακαλούμενος καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ πλησιόχωρα τῶν ἐθνῶν, ὅπου μὲν ἐπισκόπους καταστήσων, ὅπου δὲ ὅλας ἐκκλησίας ἁρμόσων, ὅπου δὲ κλήρω ἓνα γέ τινα κληρώσων τῶν ὑπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος σημανομένων.

6. (P. 34.) The notion that Timothy was the first bishop of Ephesus was firmly established even as early as the time of Eusebius (H. E. iii. 4. 6). According to the worthless Acta Timothei (ed. Usener, 1877; cf. GGA, 1878, S. 97-114; Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelgesch. ii. 2. 373 ff.; Ergänzungsheft, 86), which was written probably about 400-500 A.D. under the name of the very venerable bishop Polycrates of Ephesus, Paul had consecrated Timothy as bishop during Nero's reign on the occasion of a visit to Ephesus which they made in company. Then, under Nerva, Timothy suffers a martyr's death during a heathen festival, and while John is an exile on the island of Patmos; and it is not until after this that John suffers the bishops of Asia to transfer the See of Ephesus to him. In Const. ap. vii. 46 nothing is said about the apostle John being a bishop, as is in accordance with the method there pursued; but Paul consecrates Timothy as bishop of Ephesus, and (later) the apostle John consecrates another John to that office. The Johannine legends have altogether ignored Timothy's labours in Ephesus, and even those of Paul. It is a later hand that has inserted in the prolix narrative of Prochorus the section about Paul, and about Timothy's episcopate in Ephesus before John's arrival in that city; cf. the writer's Acta Jo. 166 f., xxxix. With better discrimination the ancient commentators Ephrem, Theodorus, and Theodoret recognised in their prologues the exceptional character of Timothy's position, e.g. Theodorus, ii. 67: "S. ap. Paulus beatum Timotheum Ephesi reliquit (per contra, above, p. 27), scilicet ut omnem peragrans Asiam universas quae illo (= illic) sunt ecclesias gubernaret." The contents of the letter, however, seemed to him useful for every bishop of his time (p. 68). The Vita Polycarpi, chap. ii., a work ascribed to Pionius, states, as if on good authority, that a certain Strataëas, the first (according to Const. ap. vii. 46 the second) bishop of Smyrna, was a brother of Timothy; cf. GA, 1882, S. 300. In 356 A.D. the emperor Constantine had what were supposed to be the bones of Timothy brought from Ephesus to Constantinople, and deposited in the Church of the Apostles (Jerome, Chron., ed. Schoene, ii. 195). Nevertheless Ephesus continued to be known as the city of John and of Timothy (Acts of the "Robber Synod" of 449 A.D., ed. Hoffmann, p. 81. 45).

7. (P. 35.) The Alexander in i. 20 may be identical with the one in 2 Tim. iv. 14, and hence to be found in Troas (above, p. 16 f.), in which case Hymenæus also must be somewhere in Asia at least (i. 20, cf. 2 Tim. ii. 17); but it does not follow from this that Paul had been lately in Troas, or indeed in Asia at all, for Paul could carry out the παράδιδόναι τῷ σατανᾷ even when absent in the body (1 Cor. v. 3-5). We should need to assume, however, that Paul, if it was on the basis of reports that he had passed such a sentence, communicated the same in writing to the persons concerned or to the Church to which they belonged. This, then, must have been the cause of Alexander's hostility to him when they met later in Troas (2 Tim. iv. 14; above, p. 21, n. 3). In any case the association of the names Alexander and Hymenæus, which is lacking in 2 Tim. iv. 14 and is replaced by another combination in 2 Tim. ii. 17, is unfavourable to the supposition that one of the letters was forged in imitation of the other, or that both were written by the same pseudo-Paul. One of the marks of individuality, which are not borrowed from the earlier letters of Paul at any rate, is found in v. 23. General truths, such as are elsewhere to be found (Rom. xiii. 14, xiv. 21; Eph. v. 18), could have suggested sentences like those in iii. 8, iv. 4, 8, but not this medical advice. Paul may have obtained this from Luke, who in that case would agree with another physician of his time, Dioscorides (de Mat. Med. v. 11), as to the usefulness of wine, especially for the stomach. The lack of personal greetings, in which respect this letter is like those directed to the Churches of Achaia (2 Cor. xiii. 12) and of Asia (Eph. vi. 23), may perhaps be explained on the ground that Paul presupposes that Timothy will communicate the contents of this letter to all the Churches under his charge. He had difficulties to contend with, his authority needed strengthening (iv. 12); so, when occasion required, he could exhibit this letter and read it publicly. Indeed, discussions such as those in ii. 1-iii. 13 are put in such objective form that they seem originally intended for wide circulation. The closing greeting, vi. 21, would point to the same thing were the reading ἡ χάρις μεθ' ὑμῶν to be retained. Yet not only is μετὰ σοῦ likewise excellently attested, but even the texts without any benediction are worthy of attention in spite of the slight external evidence in their favour. Still more suspicious is the close of 2 Tim. (iv. 22), where after πνεύματος σου we find the following variants: (1) nothing at all (?); (2) ἡ χ. μεθ' ὑμῶν; (3) ἡ χ. μεθ' ἡμῶν; (4) ἡ χ. μετὰ σοῦ; (5) ἔρρωσο ἐν εἰρήνῃ.

8. (P. 36.) Wieseler especially, Chron. 311 ff., sought to establish this hypothesis, following similar discussions by Mosheim and Schrader (Wieseler, 295 ff.).

§ 35. THE FACTS PRESUPPOSED IN THE EPISTLE TO TITUS.

From the first sentence which follows the elaborate and solemn greeting of the letter, "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that were wanting, and appoint elders in every city, as I gave thee charge," we infer, first, that not long previous to this Paul and Titus had been together on the island; secondly, that Paul had not been able at that time to effect such organisation of the Church as he had had in mind, the establishment of which was the chief purpose for which he had instructed Titus to remain there,—a task to which Titus was to devote himself for a considerable time (iii. 12). Whether Paul himself actually began the correction of the condition indicated by τὰ λείποντα, we do not know. At any rate, he here speaks of the appointment of elders in such a way as to imply that when he left Crete the Christians there were quite without Church organisation. The very resemblance between what follows (i. 6–9) concerning the qualifications for the office of headship in the Church, and similar instructions in 1 Tim., only serves to emphasise the different circumstances presupposed in the two cases. Nothing is here said of elders already appointed (1 Tim. v. 17–21), of a house of God over which the representative of the apostle is to exercise oversight (1 Tim. iii. 15), nor of Cretan Churches (cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 19); mention is made only of persons who had believed (iii. 8, 14, οἱ ἡμέτεροι; cf. Iren. v. 28. 4). Now, when we remember that in Thessalonica there were constituted officers of the Church (1 Thess. v. 12) after only three weeks of preaching (vol. i. 212, n. 5), and recall how promptly in other places the pioneer missionary preaching was followed by the appointment of elders (Acts xiv. 23), it is clear that Paul's stay in Crete must have been very short, so that he had probably just been able to proclaim the gospel for the first time in some of the cities, leaving Titus to organise the Christians in these places into Churches.

If it had been Titus who some time prior to Paul's coming had brought the gospel to Crete, and if it had been to Titus' work that the Christians in Crete owed their conversion, we should expect that to be referred to rather than Paul's own missionary preaching. We consequently infer that when Paul and Titus came to the island there were already Christians there, who may have received their faith through Christians who had come thither from Corinth or Athens. Since Paul himself was hindered by duties elsewhere from remaining for any length of time, he commissioned Titus in his stead to organise thoroughly the yet unarranged affairs of the Christians in Crete. It is taken for granted that, either because of its geographical position or the source from which Christianity was received, Paul reckoned Crete within his apostolic jurisdiction, although politically Crete was connected with Cyrene, not with Achaia. So he had done with the Churches of inland Asia, which, without personal co-operation on his part, had been organised through influences emanating from Ephesus (vol. i. 449, n. 3). Paul had been long enough in Crete to form a definite conception of local conditions, and of the special dangers which threatened to hinder the vigorous development of Church life there. Tit. i. 10-16 does not read like an echo of reports which Titus had sent to Paul, but like instructions to Titus based upon personal observation. Paul states his own impressions by quoting a verse from the Cretan poet Epimenides, in which the Cretan character is unfavourably judged, and expressly affirms that Epimenides' testimony is true (n. 1). Here, as in Ephesus (above, p. 31 f.), he considers the chief hindrance to the vigorous growth and good order of the life of the Church to be certain persons who persist in teaching doctrine which is unprofitable, unsound, and positively harmful. The worst of these persons he represents to be those of Jewish origin (i. 10 f., 14–16, iii. 9, n. 1). They resist sound doctrine (i. 9), are especially unruly (i. 10, 16), and by their teaching and disputation disturb the Christian households (i. 11, iii. 9). Some of them persist in maintaining their own views even to the point of creating schisms in the Church (iii. 10, cf. 1 Cor. xi. 19; vol. i. 284 f.). Those who go as far as this, Titus, after repeated warnings, is to leave to themselves and to the judgment of their own conscience; to the others he is to set forth strongly and sharply the wrongfulness of their action, and to silence them (i. 11, 13, ii. 15). The manner in which Paul speaks of these persons is very severe, and shows that he is greatly exasperated by them. From the character of the greeting which, at the close, iii. 15, he asks Titus to convey—"Salute them that love us in faith (or in faithfulness)"—it is to be inferred that Paul himself had met with opposition among the Cretan Christians, and that by no means all of them had given him a kindly reception, or recognised his apostolic rights (cf. 3 John 9–10, 15). The fact that he here writes ἡμᾶς, thereby including Titus with himself, is fully explained by the assumption that Paul had not been in Crete except in company with Titus, who therefore had shared the vicissitudes of Paul's reception. The expression is even more natural if Titus continued to encounter the hostility of certain Christians after the apostle's departure. We are led to the same conclusion by ii. 8, where, reversing the order, Paul includes himself with Titus. Here Titus is represented as a teacher both of the younger and older members of the Church. In this capacity he is to be himself an example of good conduct; in fulfilling his office he is to be incorruptible and dignified, and what he teaches is to be above all criticism. To this description of Titus' chief work is added the remark, "That he

that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of us." Now, since non-Christians would have only the rarest opportunity to hear Titus' preaching, it is manifest that no reference is here had to the opinions of those outside the Christian circle, unlike ii. 5, 10, where the language is very different, and where reference is had to conduct that could be observed. Rather must these persons be the obstinate teachers (i. 9), who have no love for Paul and Titus (iii. 15), whose method of teaching, mercenary, unsound, and condemned as it is by their own consciences (i. 11, 13, 15, iii. 11), is quite the opposite of that enjoined upon Titus. These teachers were inclined to speak evil of Paul and Titus, and actually indulged in such talk. It is mainly because of this attitude of theirs toward Titus that Paul adds to his injunction that Titus speak, exhort, and reprove with all authority, the remark, "Let no man despise thee," i.e. assume a contemptuous attitude toward him, as if he had said nothing, and had administered no reproof (ii. 15).

The letter presupposes that the apostle had before him a written communication from Titus, in which the latter had informed him of the difficulties with which he had to contend in carrying out the instructions which had been given him, expressing at least doubt as to the possibility of carrying out the most important of them. Only on the assumption that Paul is writing in reply to expressions of this kind on Titus' part can the strongly emphasised τούτου χάριν, with which he begins, be explained (i. 5). This, and this primarily, was the purpose for which Paul had left Titus there. He is consequently not fulfilling his obligation if he is merely endeavouring to help the Christians there in his capacity as a teacher, and fails at the same time, on account of existing difficulties, to do anything appreciable in the way of organising the Churches. Just as definite a contrast is presupposed by the ἐγώ in the relative sentence, as by the τούτου χάριν.

otherwise it is quite without point (cf. vol. i. 526, in connection with Phil. i. 3; cf. also similar sentences elsewhere without ἐγώ, 1 Tim. i. 3; 1 Thess. iv. 11; 1 Cor. xvi. 1, xi. 2, vii. 17). In opposition to what is said by those persons who create difficulties for Titus, either by denying his commission and capacity for organising the Church, or by giving him advice concerning the same contrary to instructions left him by the apostle, Paul lays emphasis upon the fact that he, the apostle, has given Titus instructions with reference to this matter which Titus is to carry out. The attentive reader observes a connection between this ἐγώ and the equally significant ἐγώ in i. 3. It is this contrast, just coming to light in i. 5, and expressed in various ways throughout the letter, which explains why in the greeting of this letter Paul speaks of his calling with a detail and an emphasis not observable in 1 Tim. i. 1; 2 Tim. i. 1, and comparable only to Rom. i. 1-7. To be sure, he is no lord over other Christians and their faith (2 Cor. i. 24), but, like all Christians, a servant of God (cf. Rom. i. 1; vol. i. 352); indeed, without the faith which all the elect of God have (i. 1), and the faith which he has in common with Titus (i. 4), he would be nothing. But at the same time he is an apostle of Jesus Christ (i. 1), and so personally and in special measure, by divine commission, he is entrusted with the preaching of that eternal life which has been promised of old, but has now become manifest through the word of the gospel (i. 2 f.). The same is to be said with reference to the commission given to Titus by Paul, and is to be borne in mind by the Christians among whom Titus is to carry out this commission.

The letter is concluded by a benediction upon all the Christians in Titus' vicinity, which benediction is preceded by a personal greeting to Paul's friends in Crete, the expectation being disclosed much more clearly than in either 1 Tim. or 2 Tim. (above, p. 42, n. 7 end) that Titus will communicate the contents of the letter to the Christians there.

Titus' position (n. 2) is practically the same as that of Timothy in Ephesus, with the difference already noted, that the problem in Crete was the primary organisation of the Church, whereas in Asia a group of Churches that had been already organised was placed under Timothy's care, and only in exceptional cases, such as the organisation of a new Church, was he called upon to appoint officers (above, p. 34). This difference explains why Titus' office was even more temporary than Timothy's. Titus had gone to Crete with Paul only a short time before, and he is to leave again, without any promise on Paul's part to come back, and without the appointment of his successor. Paul does intend, however, to send to Crete a certain Artemas, of whom we have no other mention, or Tychicus, mentioned so often as the companion and messenger of Paul (Acts xx. 4; Eph. vi. 21; Col. iv. 7; 2 Tim. iv. 12). As soon as one or the other of these men arrives Titus is to hasten at once to Paul, going to Nicopolis, where Paul plans to spend the winter (iii. 12, n. 3). This is the apostle's intention. At the same time, from the fact that he does not set a definite date when Titus is to arrive in Nicopolis, apparently intending to summon him through Artemas or Tychicus when he is ready, we infer that at the time of his writing Paul did not know just when he himself would reach Nicopolis.

Possibly he intended to utilise the time of his sojourn there in extending his work, in verification of certain earlier statements of his about the extension of his missionary work in this direction (Rom. xv. 19; vol. i. 415 f.). It is also natural to suppose that the journey of Titus to Dalmatia (2 Tim. iv. 10) was made soon after a sojourn of Paul and Titus in the neighbouring province of Epirus. Still, all that can positively be inferred from Tit. iii. 12 is that Paul intended to remain in

Nicopolis until the end of winter, and at the opening of navigation in March following to set out at once from this point upon a sea journey (cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 6). The choice of Nicopolis as a point of departure shows that this journey was to be in a westward direction, and that its ultimate destination was Italy. In regard to a certain Zenas, a lawyer, and Apollos, who is so well known as to need no further designation, Paul makes request that Titus, with the help of the Cretan Christians, furnish all they need for a journey and set them on their way (iii. 13 f., n. 4). If Paul had meant, as Chrysostom thought he did (xi. 729), that Titus was to send these men to him, he would certainly have said so. That they were with Titus prior to the arrival of this letter is unlikely, because in outlining Titus' duties the presence of so distinguished a teacher as Apollos could not have been so entirely overlooked had he been on the island with Titus at the time. Nor is it clear why Paul should have requested the Christians in Crete to set Zenas and Apollos on their way, if they neither came from him nor were going to him, or to a place he had designated. In the last case the place would be named. Whence they came and their destination Titus would learn from the men themselves; all that we know is that they did not arrive after the letter reached its destination. The only natural assumption is the one pointed out by Theodorus (ii. 256), namely, that Zenas and Apollos were the bearers of the letter, and that the first stage of their journey took them from the place where Paul was to Crete, whence, replenished and set forward by Titus, they were to continue their journey to some destination unknown to us.

From what is here said of Apollos, we infer that Paul already knew him personally, an acquaintanceship formed during the latter part of the apostle's three years' work in Ephesus. To the earlier part of this period belongs the Corinthian work of Apollos, whom

Paul had not then come to know (Acts xviii. 24-xix. 1). In the spring of 57 Apollos was in Ephesus with Paul, and had been there for some time, being for the present unwilling to leave (1 Cor. xvi. 12). A journey of Apollos to Corinth is here certainly spoken of; and it is possible that some weeks after 1 Cor. was written, about the time that Paul left Ephesus to go to Macedonia (Acts xx. 1; 2 Cor. i. 8, ii. 12 f.), Apollos also left and set out upon a journey to Corinth, which could have been made by way of Crete. In this case, however, Paul must have written Titus during the months that he was in Macedonia. But this is clearly impossible, since at this time Paul was planning to spend the winter, not in Nicopolis, but in Corinth (1 Cor. xvi. 6), and in the following spring it was his purpose to journey, not from Nicopolis westward, but from Corinth to Jerusalem. Both projects were carried out practically as he had planned. Furthermore, during the period following the composition of 1 Cor., Titus was not in Crete, but in accordance with Paul's instructions journeyed from Ephesus to Corinth, whence he went to meet Paul who was journeying slowly by way of Troas through Macedonia on his way to Corinth, joining him in Macedonia (2 Cor. ii. 12 f., vii. 5-16; vol. i. 326 f.). Nor is there any more opportunity for the residence of Paul in Crete, presupposed in Tit. i. 3, during the months immediately following the events described in 1 Cor. xvi. 1-9, than there is for the activity of Titus there, which followed Paul's sojourn. Neither can room be made for the Cretan sojourn in the three months spent in Greece after Paul's departure from Ephesus (Acts xx. 3); for these were the closing months of the winter, the end of which he intended to await in Corinth (1 Cor. xvi. 6). In these circumstances he could not have written Titus that he intended to spend the winter in Nicopolis; and although, as we learn from Rom. xv. 25-32, his mind was turning toward the West at that time, he did not plan to journey directly thither with the coming of spring, but held to his original purpose of first visiting Jerusalem. From Acts xx. 3–xxi. 17 we know that this plan was actually carried out. In order, therefore, to find a place in Paul's career for Titus, and the facts upon which it is based prior to his long imprisonment, one must go back beyond the middle of the period of work in Ephesus, and assume that Paul stopped in Crete on the occasion of his flying journey from Ephesus to Corinth, about which Acts is silent, left Titus there, and wrote Titus some time after his return to Ephesus. If in addition to the assumption that Paul made this journey, which Acts does not mention, by way of Macedonia,—an assumption made in the supposed interest of 1 Tim. (above, p. 35 f.),—it be assumed that the apostle also touched in Crete, the journey becomes such an important part of the apostle's life-history that the silence of Acts is almost unintelligible. Furthermore, it leaves quite unexplained Paul's intention to spend the ensuing winter in Nicopolis; for at that time the important work in Ephesus, covering as it did the whole province of Asia,—a work which, when 1 Cor. xvi. 8–11 was written, was nowhere near completion,—could have been scarcely more than begun. But it is altogether unlikely that long before actually leaving Ephesus Paul should have formed the definite plan of spending a winter or part of a winter in Nicopolis, making his way thence farther westward. On the other hand, it is very improbable that the plans of which his mind was so full at the time of his correspondence with the Corinthians, and which were carried out at the beginning of 58, should have suddenly displaced the entirely different plans of which we learn in Titus. The collection, with which the journey to Jerusalem was intimately connected, was a matter of long standing, having been carried on for a considerable period before Paul left Ephesus (2 Cor. viii. 10, ix. 2; vol. i. 318 f.). Finally, it is to be noticed that the resemblance between 1 Tim. and Titus is so great that they must be classed together, both as regards language and thought, just as Ephesians and Colossians. If Paul wrote them at all, he must have written them within a short time of each other. The proof that Paul could not have written 1 Tim. until after he was liberated from his first Roman imprisonment (above, p. 35 f.) is valid also for Titus, and vice versa. If the latter was written in the interval between the first and second Roman imprisonments, then his short residence in Crete belongs in the same interval. On the journey from Cæsarea to Rome, Paul did not touch at Crete (Acts xxvii. 7-15), and Titus was not with him at that time (Acts xxvii. 2). Furthermore, the manner in which Paul speaks in Tit. i. 3 of his residence in Crete and of Titus' commission, precludes the possibility of the intervention of the two years spent in Rome, and of several months preceding and following these two years, between the sojourn of Paul and Titus in Crete and this Epistle.

The letter gives us, therefore, two more stations of that journey in the eastern part of the empire which Paul made in the interval between Philippians and 2 Tim., namely, Crete and, at least prospectively, Nicopolis.

1. (P. 44.) Concerning Jews in Crete, cf. 1 Macc. xv. 23 (Gortyna); Acts ii. 11; Philo, Leg. ad Cal. xxxvi.; Jos. Ant. xvii. 12. 1; Bell. ii. 7. 1; Vita, 76 (his last wife an "aristocratic" Jewess from Crete); Soer. H. E. vii. 38 (concerning a pseudo-Moses, who led the Jews astray, κατ' ἐκάστην τῆς νήσου πόλιν). Moreover, the legend that the Jews came originally from Crete, and that their name is derived from Mount Ida there (Tac. Hist. v. 2), would hardly have arisen if there had not been a considerable number of Jews on the island. Homer, Iliad, ii. 649, followed by many poets, calls Crete ἐκατόμπολις; and even though perhaps it may have become comparatively depopulated since the Roman occupation, its cities were not few (Strabo, p. 476; Ptol. iii. 17). In the second century we hear of bishops in Gortyna and in Knossus (Eus. H. E. iv. 23. 5, 7). According to Jerome (vii. 706, cf. Soer. H. E. iii. 46), the verse quoted in Tit. i. 12 is to be found in a book entitled Περὶ Σφημῶν, by Epimenides, a contemporary of Solon. In calling this poet, then, a prophet of the Cretans, Paul shows a knowledge of the tradition concerning him (Plato, Leg. p. 642; Plut. Solon, vii.; Diog. Laert. i. 10. 109-115). Theodoret thought mistakenly that Paul was citing from Callimachus, who was a native of Cyrene, not Crete, and who in his "Hymn to Zeus," ver. 8, appropriated only the first half of Epimenides' hexameter, namely, the charge of untruthfulness, a trait of the Cretans which had become proverbial (cf. Wettstein's Sammlungen, ad loc.). Theodoret was misled by Chrysostom, who, while he names the right author Epimenides, quotes the words which in Callimachus follow ψεύσται, ver. 8 f., as if they came from Epimenides (xi. 744). Theodore is the first Father from whom we are able to ascertain clearly what is only hinted at in Chrysostom and Jerome, namely, that the heathen opponents of Christianity (Porphyry? Julian?) inferred from this passage that Paul agreed with the poet in his defence of the eternal deity of Zeus against the lies of the Cretans, who thought that Zeus' grave was on their island. Consequently these heathen writers, too, must have been thinking not of Epimenides, but of Callimachus, who did actually appropriate part of the older poet's verse with this very end in view. And some of the Christian apologists and commentators have followed them.

2. (P. 48.) Titus is called bishop of Crete by Eus. H. E. iii. 4. 6; Ambrosiaster, p. 313, in his Prologue; Const. ap. vii. 46. More guarded and more nearly correct are Ephrem, 269; Theodorus, ii. 233, cf. p. 122; Theodoret, 698. With regard to mistaken identifications of Titus with Titius Justus and with Silvanus, see vol. i. 208, 266. Beside the statements in Gal. ii. 1-3; 2 Cor. ii. 13, vii. 6-14, viii. 6, 16, 23, xii. 18; 2 Tim. iv. 10, we have no reliable testimony concerning Titus, except perhaps the assertion of Acta Thecla, cc. ii. iii., that he was staying with Onesiphorus in Iconium when Paul came thither for the first time. Possibly the Zeno mentioned there and called the son of Onesiphorus may be the Zenas of Tit. iii. 13. Concerning later fabulous tales, which are referred to a Vita Titi written by Zenas, cf. Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelgesch. ii. part 2, 401 ff.; also the passages of the Vita Titi published by M. R. James in JThS. vi. 549 ff. (July 1905) are without historical value.

3. (P. 48.) Of the numerous cities which were named Nicopolis in commemoration of a victory, some must be excluded in a consideration of Tit. iii. 12 on account of their location, some on account of their late origin. (1) The Nicopolis in Armenia (Strabo, 555; Ptolem. viii. 17. 40) is ruled out on this ground, as also (2) the one in Egypt, near Alexandria (Jos. Bell. iv. 11. 5); (3) Emmaus in Palestine, not called Nicopolis until the third century; (4) the one founded by Trajan on the Danube, which still retains the name; and (5) another in the Hæmus (Ptolem. iii. 11. 11, cf. Forbiger, iii. 750, A. 66, S. 753; Mommsen, Röm. Gesch. v. 282, who, however, identifies No. 4 with No. 5; C. I. L. iii. p. 141). (6) Likewise the Nicopolis on the Nestus (Ptolem. iii. 11. 13) which was founded by Trajan (Forbiger, Pauly, RE. v. 637, under No. 2; Mommsen, op. cit. 281). This must have been the city meant by those writers who remarked, in commenting on Tit. iii. 12, that it lay in Thrace (Cramer, Cat. vii. 99). (7) A city of this name in Bithynia (Plin. H. N. v. 32. 150; Steph. Byz. sub verbo) offers no point of connection for any probable conjectures. (8) Similarly, the Nicopolis in the north-east corner of Cilicia (Strabo, 675; Ptolem. v. 8. 7) is not to be thought of; for no reason can be conceived which could have induced Paul to spend the winter in this out of the way mountain town rather than in a large community like Antioch; or, if rest were his aim, in his native city, Tarsus, or in some place from which he would have abundant opportunities to continue his journey in the spring. The only one remaining is (9) the Nicopolis founded by Augustus at the outlet of the Ambracian Gulf as a memorial of the victory at Actium, by far the most important and famous city of this name, and a generation later the chief scene of Epictetus' labours as a teacher. Tacitus, Ann. ii. 53 (for the year 18), calls it urbem Achaiaë; on the contrary, Epictetus, Diss. iii. 4. 1, speaks of an ἐπίτροπος Ἠπειρώου residing in Nicopolis and governing the land from thence; cf. C. I. G. No. 1813*b* (add. p. 983); C. I. L. iii. No. 536 (?); about the year 150, Ptolemy, iii. 14. 1, 15. 1, distinguishes Epirus, in which Nicopolis is situated (xiv. 5), from Achaia as a separate province. Our information as to these changing conditions is not very clear (Mommсен, op. cit. 234; Marquardt², i. 331). Jerome (Vall. vii. 686, 738) considered it self-evident that this Nicopolis was meant; and even those who called it Nicopolis Macedoniae (see Tischendorf's apparatus on the subscription) could hardly have had another in mind; for no other of the cities mentioned above was in Macedonia proper, not even No. 6. Jerome, 686, assumed mistakenly, with many Greeks and Syrians, that the letter was written from Nicopolis. Wieseler, Chron. 353, sought to prove, on the ground that Nicopolis belonged to Achaia, that Tit. iii. 12 is simply a more definite statement of the purpose expressed in 1 Cor. xvi. 6. But this is impossible, since 1 Cor. is addressed solely to the local Church at Corinth, and not, like 2 Cor., to all the Christians of Achaia. And even in 2 Cor. πρὸς ὑμᾶς would mean "to" or "in Corinth."

4. (P. 49.) In itself, νομικός, iii. 13, cf. Luke vii. 30, x. 25 = νομοδιδάσκαλος, Luke v. 17; Acts v. 34 = γραμματεὺς, Luke v. 21, vi. 7; 1 Cor. i. 20, could denote a rabbi (cf. Ambrosiaster, p. 317, "quia Zenas hujus professionis fuerat in synagoga, sic illum appellat"). But since the Jewish scribe who became a Christian by that very act separated himself from the rabbinic body, and since the retention of rabbinic methods and ways of thinking was anything but a recommendation in Paul's eyes (1 Tim. i. 7), Zenas is here characterised not as legis (Mosaicae) doctor, but as juris peritus. The word denotes not an office, but usually the practical lawyer, through whose assistance, e.g. a will is made (Epict. Diss. ii. 13. 6-8; Berl. äg. Urk. No. 326, νομικός Ῥωμαϊκός, No. 361, col. iii. 2, 15), or a lawsuit carried on (Artemid. Oneirocr. iv. 80, cf. iv. 33, νομικοὶ νομικὰ ἢ ἰατροὶ ἰατρικὰ . . . λέγουσιν). Plutarch (Sulla, 36) applies this name to the renowned jurist Mucius Scaevola. προ-πέμπειν means here, as elsewhere in the N.T., to speed the departing traveller on his way, whether he is just setting forth on his journey or is passing through the place. Occasionally this consisted simply in accompanying him a short distance (Acts xx. 38, xxi. 5); as a rule, however, and here also, if we may judge from what follows, it includes equipping him with all things needful for the journey, cf. 3 John 6 (Rom. xv. 24; 1 Cor. xvi. 6, 11), and is almost synonymous with ἐφοδιάζειν, Jos. Bell. ii. 7. 1; Ant. xx. 2. 5. For an illustration, cf. Acta Petri cum Simone, ed. Lipsius, 48. 1-18.

§ 36. THE END OF PAUL'S LIFE.

If we were certain that Paul was put to death at the end of the Roman imprisonment in which we find him when he wrote Ephesians, Colossians, Philemon, and Philippians, it would be necessary to reject as forgeries the three letters which have been inappropriately called the Pastoral Epistles (n. 1). This belief, which has long been one of the principal grounds of objection to the genuineness of these Epistles, and which has been a source of insufferable violence done to the Epistles by those defending their genuineness, either wholly or in part, does not rest upon the foundation even of ancient, to say nothing of trustworthy tradition. It is simply an hypothesis, which has strong historical evidence against it, and nothing in its favour (n. 2). An expectation of early release so definite as that expressed by Paul in Phil. i. 19, 25, ii. 24, is not likely to have failed of fulfilment, since this expectation is based not upon desires, conjectures, and inferences, which, judging from Acts xxv. 18, 25, xxvi. 31 f., xxviii. 15, 18, pointed in that direction from the first (cf. Philem. 22), but primarily upon the actual course of the trial, which after protracted delay had been actually begun. Moreover, it was not Paul's personal opinion alone, but the judgment of all who followed the course of his trial, even of non-Christians, that it would shortly terminate in his release (vol. i. 540 ff.). For this reason we are not justified in comparing the repeated οἶδα of Philippians with the οἶδα which Paul used at Miletus shortly before he was arrested in Jerusalem (Acts xx. 25, 38) to declare his expectation that the elders and the Church in Ephesus would see his face no more (n. 3). It is to be observed, first of all, that we do not have here, as in Phil. i. 19, 25, ii. 24, Paul's own language, but at most only a saying of the apostle's as Luke, his companion, remembered it. But, leaving that out of account, the later "I know," in which is expressed the hope of reunion with the Philippian Christians and the Christians in the East generally, would quite annul the "I know" spoken five years before, when reunion with the Christians in Ephesus seemed quite impossible. Then it must be remembered that in the prophetic utterances on the basis of which Paul made this statement, — being careful to note that it is only his personal conviction (xx. 25), — nothing is said of his death, but only of chains and persecution (Acts xx. 23, xxi. 11), and that Paul simply explains that he is ready, if necessary, even to die in Jerusalem, expressly stating, however, that he does not know what awaits him there (Acts xx. 22, 24, xxi. 13, cf. Rom. xv. 31). The expression of this indefinite feeling of Paul's, accompanied by the acknowledgment that all is uncertainty, that possibly his life might end where on three different occasions later it was actually threatened (xxi. 31, xxiii. 12–15, xxv. 3), refers only to Jerusalem and Palestine. According to Acts, he was desirous of seeing Rome, and it did become later the scene of the labours for which he was rescued from all dangers (xix. 21, xxiii. 11, xxv. 10–12, xxvii. 24, xxviii. 5, 15, 30, 31); so that, in view of the connection in Acts, it is hardly likely that the author intended the passage in the 20th chapter of Acts (xx. 25) to be a prophecy of Paul's martyrdom in Rome. By a more careful consideration of the text, the meaning of the expression seems to be only that the personal intercourse, often broken off, but always taken up again, which had existed between Paul and the Eastern Churches up to the present time had at last reached its end, since Paul, in case he should not lose his life in Jerusalem, purposed now to go to the West. But even assuming that when he left Miletus Paul was confident that he would never see the elders of Ephesus again, this is no reason for assuming that he never did. Paul never claimed to be able to predict the future, and insisted particularly that statements of his with reference to his future plans should not be considered irrevocable (2 Cor. i. 15–17; vol. i. 344, n. 2).

It is, of course, possible that Paul was deceived in his expectation of an early release, so confidently expressed in Philippians; but this is not at all likely, because of the facts upon which this expectation was based. Events entirely unforeseen must suddenly have given an unfavourable turn to the trial, which, when Philippians was written, was as good as ended. The Sanhedrin in Jerusalem, which for nearly three years (from the hearing before Festus in the latter part of the summer of 60 A.D. to the writing of Philippians, which did not take place until after the spring of 63) had made no effort to renew the charges against Paul before the imperial court (n. 4), are not likely to have done so after so long an interval, particularly since under Albinus (62–64), Festus' successor in the procuratorship, there were things enough in Jerusalem to keep them occupied (cf. Schürer, i. 583 [Eng. trans. i. ii. 188]). Moreover, after their experiences in Palestine (Acts xxiv.–xxvi.), the Sanhedrin could have entertained very little hope of accomplishing anything against Paul in Rome. The assumption that before the trial was entirely ended, the favourable outcome of which in the near future Paul expected when he was writing Philippians, the persecution of the Roman Christians under Nero broke out, and that Paul was one of the victims of the same, is improbable on chronological grounds. If Paul reached Rome in March or April of the year 61 (Part XI. vol. iii.), and if soon after the spring of the year 63 the trial began, which, according to Philippians, gave rise at once to confident expectations of a successful outcome, it is impossible to understand what could have protracted it until the summer, or rather the autumn, of the following year 64. Such, however, must have been the case if Paul was one of those Christians who, according to Tacitus' account (Ann. xv. 44), were executed for the burning of Rome, since Nero did not accuse the Christians until he had availed himself of every other means of averting from himself the suspicion of having burned the city. This accusation was probably not made before October 64

(n. 5). It is thus easily understood why those who feel that Paul's execution must be associated with the wholesale execution of Christians which took place in the latter part of the summer or in the autumn of the year 64, are inclined to date Paul's arrival in Rome in the spring of 62, and the composition of Philippians at the beginning of the summer of 64 (see per contra, Part XI. vol. iii.).

But the particular presupposition which is the main reason for a change of date, namely, that Paul was executed shortly after the writing of Philippians, and that he was one of a number of Christians to suffer martyrdom, and hence must have been put to death in the year 64, gets no certain support in ancient tradition. The only thing that can be directly inferred from Acts xxviii. 30 f. is that the author knew what it was that terminated the situation which is there briefly described, and which he says lasted for two whole years. Why does he fail to state what this was? Whether we assume that Acts xxviii. 30 f. is the conclusion of the work as Luke planned it, or whether he intended to complete the work in a third book, in either case—in the former case even more than in the latter—his silence about the event marking the close of the two years is inexplicable, if the trial which ended with the apostle's execution occurred at this time. Neither the book nor the whole work could have had a more fitting close than the account of the martyrdom of the apostle upon whose history the attention of the reader has been kept constantly fixed from the thirteenth chapter; and certainly a writer who was able in three lines to convey to the reader an idea of the great work which Paul did during two years in the capital of the empire, was able just as briefly and just as skilfully to tell of the glorious ending of this work, and of the apostle's career. The author could not leave the reader to guess this end, because after all the deliverances and consolations through which Paul had been brought to Rome (Acts xxi. 31–35, xxiii. 10-30, xxv. 3, xxvii. 24, 42-44, xxviii. 5, 15), and after the opinions expressed by the highest officials concerning the charges made by the Jews (Acts xxv. 2-8, 18-20, 26 f., xxvi. 31 f., xxviii. 18), the death-sentence of Paul would be the last thing that the reader would expect. The only plausible inference to be drawn from the sudden breaking off of the narrative in Acts xxviii. 30 f. is that these two years were followed by another period in Paul's life history and missionary work of such considerable length that it could not be treated in Luke's second book without making this disproportionately long compared with the first.

Now, even assuming that the Epistles to Timothy and Titus are spurious, they furnish important evidence that Paul's life continued beyond the two years in Rome and beyond the time when Philippians was written; for, as has been shown, they presuppose that after his acquittal by the imperial court at Rome, and after his liberation from his imprisonment in Rome, which had lasted until then, Paul visited his eastern Churches in Macedonia and Crete, Miletus and Troas, probably also in Corinth and Ephesus; and, on the other hand, engaged in missionary work in regions lying westward from Rome, probably in Spain. If all this were told in the letters, or even clearly stated as information, we might assume that it was forged, either with a view to enlarging the history of Paul's life or supplying the Epistles with a historic background. But, as a matter of fact, the most of these events and those of greatest importance are simply taken for granted, as we should expect them to be in genuine Epistles. What we are compelled to infer from incidental hints, and that rather vaguely, e.g. the fact that he was in prison when 2 Tim. was written, and how he came to be there; the missionary work carried on after he was set free from his first imprisonment in regions hitherto unvisited by him; what took him to Crete; why he planned to go to Nicopolis,—all this and much more must have been known to the readers, whose knowledge of the situation the author took for granted. If this author were Paul himself, then these letters are standards by which every other account of this period, inside the Canon and out of it, is to be judged, and any additional evidence is superfluous. If the author was a pseudo-Paul belonging to the period between the years 70 and 140,—the latest possible date for the composition of the letters,—the tradition of which he made use must have existed in such clear outlines and have been so generally known, that it required only the slightest reference and the most casual connections to recall to the readers' minds the course of events and induce them to accept this forgery, which was based thus upon recognised historical facts.

Evidence of the existence of such a tradition regarding the closing years of Paul's life, covering the period after the close of Acts, but independent of the Pastoral Epistles, is furnished by the letter sent by the Roman Church to the Church in Corinth of which Clement of Rome is commonly regarded as the author (n. 6). Since Clement's letter was written certainly not later than the year 96, and expressly mentions the apostles Paul and Peter as heroes and sufferers of the then living generation, it is evident that Clement and the Roman Church were not wholly dependent for their knowledge concerning the close of the apostle's life upon written sources, which so far as we know were not yet in existence, but made use of trustworthy oral traditions. An officer in the Roman Church in the year 96, who would certainly have been a man of years, would have been a younger contemporary of Paul's, and could recall the time when the apostle's death took place. It is quite possible, as Irenæus testifies (iii. 3. 3), that Clement had had personal intercourse with Paul and Peter. Certainly he possessed independent information about Paul's history, as is evidenced by his statement that Paul was bound with chains seven times (n. 6). His other somewhat rhetorical statements in praise of the two apostles seem to take for granted acquaintance with the events in question on the part even of his younger readers. However, although not acquainted with the events, we of to-day may recognise the following points:—(1) Peter and Paul died in Rome as martyrs. (2) Paul had preached the gospel in the most western portion of the then known world, i.e. in Spain. (3) As regards the order of events, Peter's martyrdom seems to have preceded that of Paul; for, otherwise, the name of Paul would be mentioned first, since he is praised more at length, and with more high-sounding phrases, than is Peter, and seems to have been regarded by the author as the more important personality, either in general or in this particular regard. As the text stands, however, Paul's name is inserted between that of Peter, of whom Clement says little, and the mention of a large number of Christian martyrs, men and women, whose sufferings are summarily referred to, without names (chap. vi.). Even if we did not know independently that Paul had not been in Spain prior to his imprisonment in Cæsarea and Rome, of which account is given in Acts, so that this journey, if it took place at all, must have followed his release from this imprisonment, and his martyrdom, if suffered in consequence of a judicial sentence, must have followed a second arrest after the Spanish journey,—in any case we should infer from the order of Clement's sentences that Paul's Spanish journey took place at the very end of his life, and that he was arrested and brought before the authorities subsequent to the Spanish journey. Clement's general statement that these events happened within the memory of the generation living at the time when the letter was written (96 A.D.), agrees with the other traditions which place them in the reign of Nero; and this agreement is still further confirmed by the fact that from earliest times the impression could not be avoided that the sufferings of Christian men and women in Rome, the story of which Clement relates immediately after the account of the martyrdom of the two apostles, were the same as those described by Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44), and hinted at by Suetonius (Nero, xvi). The most that can be inferred from Clement's statements is that the martyrdom of Peter and of Paul, and the persecutions of the year 64, belong to the same period, and that is all that is affirmed by the earlier traditions (n. 8). Almost without exception, in this earlier tradition, the name of Peter precedes that of Paul, as in Clement, which would indicate that Peter's death preceded that of Paul; thus contradicting the view which arose after the middle of the fourth century, that the two apostles suffered martyrdom on the same day of the same year, the 29th of June. It can be shown that this story grew out of a Roman festival commemorative of the removal of the remains, or what were supposed to be the remains, of the two apostles to the Appian Way in the year 258 (n. 9); so that it can be left out of account in any attempt to determine the real date of the apostles' death. The only thing which can be definitely concluded from the establishment of this festival in or near the year 258, is that up to the middle of the third century the Roman Church had no definite tradition regarding the exact date of the apostles' martyrdom (n. 8).

On the other hand, the memory of Paul's journey to Spain lingered long (n. 7). In the Muratorian Canon Paul's journey to Spain is put on exactly the same footing as the martyrdom, the circumstance that these two facts are not mentioned in Acts being adduced as proof that Luke confined his narrative in Acts to what he himself had experienced (n. 7). Although the fragmentist may be dependent, here as elsewhere, upon apocryphal accounts, he takes for granted that in the year 200 these two facts were commonly accepted in the circle to which he belonged, i.e. in the Roman Church, or a Church closely associated with the same. The Acts of Peter, which were certainly not written in Rome, and which embody Gnostic tendencies, are some thirty or forty years older. According to these legends, Paul, who had remained until then a prisoner in Rome, journeyed to Spain to preach the gospel there in consequence of a vision. During his absence in Spain, which did not cover a period of more than a year (ed. Lipsius, p. 46. 3), Peter came from Jerusalem to Rome, and after successful contests with Simon Magus was crucified head downwards. Although in this account Peter's departure from Jerusalem is set twelve years after the beginning of the apostolic preaching (p. 49. 22), Nero is declared to be the emperor in whose reign Peter worked and died in Rome (pp. 100. 15, 102. 2, 103. 2). Likewise the martyrdom of Paul, which took place later than that of Peter, and which is referred to occasionally in these legends, is dated still in the reign of Nero (p. 46. 8). The testimony of the Acts of Paul, which show a catholic tendency, and are evidently of later date than Leucius' Acts of Peter and John, is not so clear, and at this point the newly found Coptic fragments, which have been recently published, do not furnish any more light (n. 10).

That as time went on the tradition concerning Paul's liberation from his first protracted imprisonment, the resumption of his missionary work, and another arrest shortly before his execution, should gradually die out, is not to be wondered at. There was no connected account of these events which was regarded as trustworthy. In the West, confusion was caused especially by the Roman legend about the simultaneous martyrdom of Paul and Peter. This legend certainly made it difficult to find a place for so important a period of Paul's career subsequent to the time when Philippians was written as was required by the tradition of the first and second centuries. The testimony of this earlier tradition is, however, quite independent of that which we have in the Epistles to

Timothy and Titus. The latter tell us of extended journeys which Paul made in the East (Crete, Macedonia, Miletus, Ephesus (?), Corinth (?), Nicopolis), after he was freed from his first imprisonment. There is only one passage which would indicate any considerable extension of Paul's missionary work at this time, namely, 2 Tim. iv. 17; and from this passage it must be inferred that Paul pressed westward from Rome in order to do missionary work. On the other hand, in the tradition traced from Clement to the Muratorian Canon nothing is said of a tour among the Churches in the East after Paul was released from his imprisonment, while the fact that after being set at liberty Paul preached in Spain—a fact which we learn from 2 Tim. iv. 16 f. only after careful interpretation and correct inference—is clearly stated. Taken together, these two entirely independent witnesses furnish a trustworthy historical picture. Such a relation subsisting between documents which at latest must have been written at the beginning of the second century, and a tradition first vouched for by a witness living at the end of the first century, proves that both rest upon yet older foundations, namely, upon an account of the close of Paul's life which was circulated in the decades immediately following his death. To suppose that this account was drawn from Rom. xv. 24, 28, rather than from fact, is unreasonable on several grounds. (1) No one could help but recognise that the hopes which Paul there expresses remained in large part unfulfilled. At that time Paul hoped in the following summer to journey from Palestine to Italy, and after a short stay in Rome to visit Spain. Instead, he reached Rome in the spring of the year 61 a prisoner, and remained there for years; so that no one would have felt tempted by Rom. xv. 24, 28 to invent the story of his subsequent visit to Spain. Only let it be remarked in passing that if the chapter in which this passage is found was appended to Romans in the interval between Paul's death and the time of Marcion (vol. i. 379 f.), the passage is strong proof that Paul did actually go to Spain. For, while it is perfectly natural for Paul himself to talk of plans and hopes which were never carried out nor realised, it is inconceivable that statements of this kind should be put into his mouth after his life had ended, without his having gone to Spain. (2) There is not the slightest suggestion in Rom. xv. which would occasion the invention of the later journeys in the East presupposed in the "Pastoral Epistles." If these journeys were invented on the strength of Phil. i. 25 f., ii. 24, Philem. 22, we should find mentioned in the "Pastoral Epistles" Philippi and Colossæ, not Crete, Miletus, and Nicopolis. (3) It is inconceivable that Clement and the other younger contemporaries of Paul, especially Romans of their generation, should have formed their conception of the last events in the apostle's life from a very arbitrary interpretation of one or more passages in Paul's Epistles, rather than from their own recollection of the events. In view of all this we are led to conclude that Paul was set at liberty by the imperial court, as he so confidently expected when he wrote Philippians, and not long after this letter was written visited the East again and preached the gospel in Spain, before he was arrested a second time in Rome and put to death. Regarding the order of these events we can do no more than make conjectures. The consideration suggested (vol. i. 547 f.) in favour of the view that Paul visited the Churches in the East in the summer of 63 shortly after he was released, preaching in Spain later, must give way before the stronger reasons which make the reverse order seem probable. The statements of 2 Tim. iv. 13, 20 would seem to be in the highest degree unnatural, if between the events there mentioned, namely, the sojourn of Paul in Miletus (Corinth?) and Troas and the writing of 2 Tim., there intervened not only the winter in Nicopolis (Tit. iii. 12), a second arrest in Rome, and the journey of Onesiphorus to Rome (2 Tim. i. 16), but also missionary work in Spain, which must have occupied at least several months. Assuming, as we must from Phil. ii. 19-23 (vol. i. 547 f.), that when his trial was completed Paul did not leave Rome at once, but awaited the return of Timothy, whom he did not send to Philippi until his case was decided, at the very earliest he could not have gone to Spain until the autumn of the year 63. Possibly he did not reach his destination until the spring of the year 64. In neither case could the winter which he planned to spend in Nicopolis at the close of his extended journeys in the East (Tit. iii. 12) have been the winter of 63-64, hardly that of 64-65; for in the latter case it would be necessary to compress the missionary work in Spain and the tour of the Eastern Churches all into a single year, from autumn 64 to autumn 65, if indeed it be not necessary to crowd both these extended journeys, which lay in opposite directions and required much time for the fulfilment of their objects, into the summer of 64. If for this reason the winter spent in Nicopolis could not have been prior to 65-66, then the winter 66-67 is the earliest winter at the beginning of which the imprisoned Paul could have hoped to have Timothy with him in Rome (2 Tim. iv. 21). If events happened as Paul expected they would when he wrote his last letter, he was still alive at the beginning of the winter of 66-67, but suffered martyrdom not very long afterward. In accordance with the results of the preceding investigations, the following is suggested as the probable order in which the events following the imprisonment recorded in Acts took place. If Timothy returned to Rome from Philippi in the autumn of 63, Paul set out upon his journey to Spain either immediately or at latest in the spring of 64. If the statement of the Acts of Peter, that his work in Spain covered a year, be accepted, he left there at the earliest in the autumn of 64, or possibly in the spring of 65, in order to carry out the other part of his plan—the promised visiting of his Eastern Churches. Whether he stopped in Rome, where in the autumn of 64 the Christians there suffered such severe persecution (above, p. 57 f.), or passed by Rome on his way to the East, going possibly to Apollonia and thence to Philippi by the Via Egnatia, no one knows. Nor can it be determined with any degree of probability in what order he reached the various points visited upon this last journey (Corinth (?), Crete, Macedonia, Troas, Ephesus (?), Miletus).

Since Timothy had been for some time in Ephesus when Paul made this journey in the summer of 65 (above, p. 57 f.), he apparently did not accompany him to Spain, but during this time was engaged in carrying out Paul's commission in Ephesus. The winter of 65–66, or the end of it, Paul and Titus seem to have spent in Nicopolis. When Paul started in the spring of 66 from Nicopolis for Italy, Titus may have set out from the same point on his preaching tour in the neighbouring district of Dalmatia. Paul's second arrest after his return to Rome, the journey of Onesiphorus to Rome, and the writing of 2 Tim., belong in the summer of 66. Paul was beheaded on the Ostian Way not before the end of the year 66, but at the latest before the death of Nero (June 9th, 68).

1. (P. 55.) According to Heydenreich, Pastoralbr. i. 7 (anno 1826), the name "Pastoral Epistles" has been applied to the letters to Timothy and Titus "from the remotest times." But the present writer cannot find the name in either Bengel, J. D. Michaelis, Semler, Schleiermacher (1807), or Planck (Bemerkungen über den 1 Tim. gegen Schleiermacher, 1808); on the contrary, it appears first in P. Anton, Ecceget. Abh. der Pastoralbriefe S. Pauli, 2 Teile, Halle, 1753, 1755, then in Wegscheider, Der 1 Tim. 1810, S. vi; Eichhorn, Eind. iii. 315 (1812). In a measure it is appropriate for 1 Tim. and Tit., but not at all for 2 Tim. In the ancient Church, passages like 1 Tim. iii. 1–7 and Tit. i. 5–9 were read on the occasion of the choice and ordination of bishops and elders (Polycarpi vita, by Pionius, xxii.; cf. the Jacobite liturgy in the Revue de l'Orient chrétien, i. 2 [1896], p. 10). Bengel, in the Gnomon, on 1 Tim. i. 2 still follows the isagogics of the ancient Church (GK, ii. 75 ff.), and groups together rather the four letters which Paul addressed to individuals.

2. (P. 55.) In reference to the last events of Paul's life, cf. especially

HOFMANN, NT, v. 3-17; SPITTA, Zur Gesch. u. Liter. des Urchristentums, i. 1-108; STEINMETZ, Die zweite röm. Gefangenschaft des Ap. Paulus, 1897; also the remarks of RANKE, Weltgesch. iii. 1. 191 f.; ERBES, Die Todestage der Apostel Paulus und Petrus, 1899 (Teste u. Unters., N. Folge, iv. 1), treats the Biblical accounts and those of the early Church in a manner so defective, high-handed, and superficial, that the present writer must here forego a refutation of his position.

3. (P. 55.) Acts xx. 25, 38 was turned to account by Baur long ago as an argument against a release from the first Roman imprisonment (Pastoral-briefe, 92 ff.). The emphasis here is not upon the contrast between what Paul does not know (xx. 22) and what he really knows, but between the vague suggestions of prophetic utterances (xx. 23) and what Paul himself (ἐγώ must not be overlooked) knows. He knows what his future relation to the Ephesians will be; he does not know what will befall him in Jerusalem. The former, then, must be independent of the latter, and οὐκέτι ἴψευσθε κτλ. holds good even if he loses neither freedom nor life in Jerusalem. Besides, this phrase does not mean that none of the elders of Ephesus will ever see him again; Paul makes this statement not of them, but of all the Christians of those regions among whom he had gone about during the last years. Now the prediction that none of these many Christians would ever see him again before his death would certainly not be put in the apostle's mouth ex eventu; for Christians from Asia, e.g. Tychicus, Epaphras, and Onesiphorus, did actually see Paul when a prisoner in Rome. Then οὐκέτι has not the same meaning as οὐ πάλιν, but implies that an end has now come to the personal intercourse which Paul has kept up for years, though not uninterruptedly, with the Christians of Ephesus and with the Churches of the province of Asia. At the same time nothing at all is said as to how long a time the negative shall retain its force, and the possibility is in no wise excluded that a time will come again when Paul will resume personal intercourse with the Churches of Asia. Cf. John xvi. 10 and xvi. 19. All that is said is that what has existed so long now terminates. It is a parting for a long time, but not necessarily for ever.

4. (P. 57.) According to Acts xxviii. 21, the Sanhedrin had done nothing to secure the co-operation of the Jews in Rome in its prosecution of Paul up to his arrival in that city. These Jews were ready enough at other times to lend a hand in affairs of this kind, cf. Jos. Ant. xvii. 11. 1; Bel. ii. 6. 1; Vita, 3; Philo, Leg. ad Civi. xxiii.

5. (P. 58.) The conflagration began in the night of July 18-19, was extinguished six days later (July 24), but then broke out afresh and burned several days longer (Tac. Ann. xv. 38-41; Suet. Nero, xxxviii.; Eus. Chron., anno Abr. 2079, incendia multa). Then followed, according to Tacitus' description, several things which must have taken time before the Christians were attacked (Tac. Ann. xv. 44), e.g. care for the homeless, beginning of the rebuilding, religious expiatory rites (cc. xlii.-xliv. mid-year, cf. chap. xlv. "interca," chap. xlv. "per idem tempus," chap. xlvii. "fine anni"). All this, however, falls within the year 64.

6. (P. 60.) After recounting a number of Biblical examples of righteous men who had to suffer from the jealousy of the unrighteous, Clement writes, chap. v. 1: ἀλλ' ἵνα τῶν ἀρχαίων υποδείγματα πανσιώμεθα, ἔλθομεν ἐπὶ τοῖς

ἔγγιστα γενομένους ἀθλητάς· λάβωμεν τῆς γενεῆς ἡμῶν τὰ γενναῖα ὑποδείγματα. 2. διὰ ζῆλον καὶ φθόνον οἱ μέγιστοι καὶ δικαιοτάτοι στίλοι ἐδιώχθησαν καὶ ὥς θανάτου ἤθλησαν. 3. λάβωμεν πρὸ ὀφθαλμῶν ἡμῶν τοὺς ἀγαθοὺς ἀποστόλους. 4. Πέτρον, ὃς διὰ ζῆλον ἄδικον οὐχ ἓνα οὐδὲ δύο ἀλλὰ πλείονας ὑπῆνεγκεν πόρους, καὶ οὕτω μαρτυρήσας ἐπορεύθη εἰς τὸν ὀφειλόμενον τόπον τῆς δόξης. 5. διὰ ζῆλον καὶ ἔριν Παῦλος ὑπομονῆς βραβεῖον ἔδειξεν. 6. ἐπτάκις δεσμὰ φορέσας, φυγαδευθεὶς, λιθασθεὶς, κῆρυξ γενόμενος ἔν τε τῇ ἀνατολῇ καὶ ἐν τῇ δύσει, τὸ γενναῖον τῆς πίστεως αὐτοῦ κλέος ἔλαβεν. 7. δικαιοσύνην διδάξας ὅλον τὸν κόσμον καὶ ἐπὶ τὸ τέλος τῆς δύσεως ἐλθὼν καὶ μαρτυρήσας ἐπὶ τῶν ἡγουμένων, οὕτως ἀπηλλάγη τοῦ κόσμου καὶ εἰς τὸν ἅγιον τόπον ἐπορεύθη, ὑπομονῆς γενομένος μέγιστος ὑπογραμμός. With regard to this, we may remark: (1) The text here given, which, aside from slight changes of punctuation, follows Gebhardt-Harnack (cf. Lightfoot, Clement, ii. 25, and Spitta, Urchrist. i. 51, 57), is confirmed in all essentials by the Latin translation since discovered, though it cannot be decided from the ostendit of the Latin translation whether we should read ἔδειξεν (Cod. C), or ὑπέδειξεν, or possibly ἐπέδειξεν (cf. Clem. Alex. in Cramer's Cat. vii. 426, and Euthalius, ed. Zacagni, 522, ἐπιδείξασθαι, in a similar connection). (2) Since in phrases like λαμβάνειν, ἔχειν, τιθέναι πρὸ ὀφθαλμῶν (Polyb. ii. 35. 8; Epict. Diss. i. 16. 27, iv. 10. 31; Iren. iii. 3. 3), and in all similar expressions (ἐν χερσίν, πρὸ ποδῶν), the Greeks are not accustomed to append a possessive genitive of the personal pronoun, it is exceedingly improbable that Clement intended the ἡμῶν of § 3 to be taken with ὀφθαλμῶν. Rather, he calls Peter and Paul "our good apostles"—the apostles of the Romans and likewise of the Corinthians, whom he is addressing (chap. xlvii. 3 f.; Dion. Corinth., quoted in Eus. H. E. ii. 25. 8; Iren. iii. 1. 1, 3. 2, 3; GK, i. 806, A. 4). And he gives ἡμῶν an emphatic position before τοὺς . . . ἀποστόλους (cf. per contra, chap. xlv. 1, οἱ ἀπόστολοι ἡμῶν), because he wishes to single them out as the apostles who stood in closest relation to the Romans (and Corinthians). They are οἱ ἔγγιστα γενομένοι ἀθληταί in the first place with regard to time (τῆς γενεᾶς ἡμῶν), and also with regard to the place where they received the victor's prize for their patience, namely, Rome. Likewise the ἐν ἡμῖν in chap. vi. 1 (cf. iv. 2) is meaningless, unless we are to understand Rome as the place where the Christian martyrs who followed Peter and Paul were put to death. If Clement is here bidding the readers picture to themselves the whole body of apostles, it is incomprehensible why he should say nothing of the execution of James the son of Zebedee (Acts xii. 2), of John's exile, and of other sufferings of the apostles about which tradition gives us less certain knowledge, or at least why he should not indicate by a comprehensive καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ ἀπόστολοι that these are meant. The construction and interpretation given above of ἡμῶν τοὺς ἀποστόλους, and that alone, explains this silence. He is speaking only of the two apostles of whom, at the outset, he bade the readers think as "our good apostles." (3) That Clement possessed information about Peter and Paul not derived from books is clear from his own historical position (above, p. 60), and is also confirmed by the ἐπτάκις δεσμὰ φορέσας. It is hard to see why this number should point to the existence of a comprehensive written account from which it was taken (so Spitta, Urchrist. i. 51). Paul found occasion once, while writing, to express the repetition of similar experiences in numbers (2 Cor. xi. 24 f.);

but there is no reason why he may not have done the very same thing in oral narratives, and his friends likewise. At any rate, the statement is not drawn from sources preserved to us. Adding the five scourgings by the Jews (2 Cor. xi. 24) to the two imprisonments in Caesarea and Rome does not give seven imprisonments, as Zeller, ThJb, 1848, S. 530, thought (cf. also Hilgenfeld, Clem. Ep. ed. 2, p. 90). With just as good reason the thrice repeated beating with rods (2 Cor. xi. 25) could be transformed into three imprisonments to help along such addition. In 1900, without any idea that Mommsen (ZfNTW, 1901, S. 84, A. 1) would really work it out, the present writer published the suggestion, that the seven imprisonments of Clement were to be explained as due to the addition of πεντάκις and τρίς, at the same time assuming a confusion of seven and eight. Blass, NKZ, 1895, S. 721, claims that these seven imprisonments are to be found in Acts, namely, (1) in Philippi (Acts xvi. 23); (2) in Jerusalem; (3) in Caesarea under Felix; (4) under Festus; (5) on the voyage; (6) in Rome; and in addition to these (7) the second Roman imprisonment, from which 2 Tim. dates. But this cannot be even artificially done. Nos. 2-6 represent only a single period in which Paul bore chains continuously, except for very brief interruptions (Acts xxii. 30, and perhaps xxvii. 42-44), which Acts touches upon only lightly, or leaves altogether to conjecture. There is no basis either in the text of Acts or in the nature of the case for distinguishing Nos. 3, 4, 5. Nor is it correct to hold that Clement presupposed on the part of the Corinthians an acquaintance with these facts, which in its turn would imply that Acts was the common source of the knowledge then extant in Rome and Corinth. In this case Clement would have contented himself with a general statement about Paul's imprisonments, as he has done in all the other particulars. The fact that he writes ἐπτάκις and not πολλάκις proves independent knowledge of Paul's life history. According to 2 Cor. xi. 23 (ἐν φυλακαῖς ὑπερβαλλόντως), Paul had suffered, even before his arrest in Jerusalem, several imprisonments of no trilling kind beside that in Philippi. If Clement regarded the confinement beginning in Jerusalem and ending in Rome as a single imprisonment, and if he knew of a second Roman imprisonment ending with death, there are still five left which Paul may have had in mind in 2 Cor. xi. 23. Of these we know only the one in Philippi (Acts xvi.). (4) The word μαρτυρεῖν in Clement does not by itself mean "to die a martyr's death," as it does not infrequently after the middle of the second century (Mart. Polyc. xix. 1, cf. Lightfoot, op. cit. 26), but rather "to bear witness." This is proved by the added phrase, ἐπὶ τῶν ἡγουμένων, § 7, which, since it designates no particular persons as the rulers at that time, cannot be intended to indicate the date, like ἐπὶ Κέρου βασιλέως, ἐπὶ Πεισιστράτου ἀρχοντος, or like ἐπὶ Πορτίου Πιλάτου (παθόντα or σταυρωθέντα) in the Apostles' Creed. Its meaning is rather coram magistratibus which does not suit the act of execution, but is appropriate enough in describing a spoken testimony and confession (cf. 1 Tim. vi. 13). As far as this expression itself goes, it might include each and every confession which Paul had ever witnessed before any magistrates, whether in Philippi, Jerusalem, Caesarea, or Rome (so Hofmann, v. 71; Spitta, i. 57). The context, however, makes it plain that Clement here has in mind the last confession of both apostles, the confession which resulted immediately in their execution.

Even earlier, in § 2, ὥς θανάτου does not mean "as long as they lived," in which case it would stand before ἐδιώχθησαν, but characterises the death of the apostles as the culmination of sufferings undeserved but patiently endured, i.e. as martyrdom (cf. Phil. ii. 8). Paul's death is the theme of the very first sentence which treats of him (§ 5), and forms the closing thought in both of the sentences co-ordinated with this, §§ 6, 7. Further, in § 4 we have two parts: First, a summary reference to Peter's sufferings; second, an account of his entrance into glory. These parts are separated by οὕτως, which implies that the former is the presupposition of the latter. μαρτυρήσας, then, since it follows οὕτως, is so closely connected with the statement about Peter's death that it is best to translate: "And so (at the end of a life of such suffering and because of it) did he, bearing witness, proceed to the well-deserved place of glory." In the corresponding statement about Paul, indeed, while οὕτως, as before, brings to an end the description of his life, and indicates this life experience as the presupposition of his death, μαρτυρήσας precedes this adverb instead of following it. The "testimony before the rulers" seems therefore to be viewed as an incident in the course of his life, not as a circumstance connected with his death. But (1) it is the very last incident in his life story. And (2) οὕτως necessarily refers in particular to that event in Paul's previous life last mentioned: "So (i.e. not, therefore, without having first borne witness before the rulers) was he released from the world." (3) The meaning of μαρτυρήσας must be the same in § 7 as in § 4. While (4) ἡγούμενοι is used of all persons who have a share in the government (Acts vii. 10; Clem. 1 Cor. xxxii. 2, xxxvii. 2; in lxi. 1 the emperor himself is included, though in xxxvii. 3 he is mentioned separately), even within the community of the Church (Acts xv. 22; Heb. xiii. 7, 17, 24; Clem. 1 Cor. i. 3); where, however, as here, there is no definite specification, local or otherwise, οἱ ἡγούμενοι can refer only to the supreme authority in Rome (Clem. 1 Cor. lxi. 1; Altertümer von Pergamum, viii. 2. 347, Inscription No. 356, and the inscription cited there from the Bull. de Cor. hellén. ix. 75). At the same time, if Clement had known of a personal meeting between Paul and Nero on the occasion of Paul's second legal defence, he certainly would not have failed, when speaking of the magistrates with whom Paul as the accused had to do, to mention the emperor (cf. xxxvii. 3, li. 5, lv. 1; Mark xiii. 9; 1 Tim. ii. 2; 1 Pet. ii. 14, 17, but particularly Acts xxvii. 24). With reference to chap. vi., cf. the commentaries of Lightfoot and Harnack, and above, p. 60. It is true that τούτοις τοῖς ἀνδράσι . . . συνηθροίσθη πολὺ πλῆθος ἐκλεκτῶν means not only that these many, like the apostles, have died as martyrs or entered into blessedness, but also that this great multitude have joined themselves to the apostles—have gathered about them (cf. 1 Kings xi. 24; 1 Macc. i. 55). This could be said all the more aptly of the victims of the Neronian persecution (§ 39); but even if this were not the case, it would be appropriate in a comprehensive retrospect like this if the death of Peter and of Paul only fell somewhere within the time of Nero. Just as for the German nation the years 1813–1815, with their triumphs, heroes, and victims, form the one epoch of the War of Liberation, although a period of peace divides this war into two unequal parts, so to the Christians of the year 96 the martyrdoms of 64–67 meant a single group of struggles and sufferings, upon which a peace of thirty years had ensued. (5) Anyone who divides the then known world or the Roman world empire into East and West, as Clement does here, must necessarily assign Italy and Rome to the West; for the Adriatic and Ionian Seas formed the natural boundary between the two parts of the empire, and were actually regarded as the boundary (Monimentum Ancyrae v. 31, cf. Mommsen, *Res gestae Augusti*², p. 118; Treaty of Brundisium between Antony and Octavian, 40 B.C., in which Scodra [Scutari] was established as the boundary, Appian, Bell. civ. v. 64; Plut. Antonius, xxx.). Clement could have said, then, simply with reference to Paul's preaching in Rome, that he had preached in the West as well as in the East (v. 6; cf. Ign. Rom. ii. 2; pseudo-Clement, ad Jac. i.; Jul. Afric. Chron.; Routh, *Rel.*² v. 264. 7), and perhaps also, considering the rhetorical character of the passage, that Paul had taught the whole world righteousness (v. 7). But when Clement goes even beyond this last expression, and adds, plainly in order to define it more closely, καὶ ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα τῆς δόσεως ἐλθὼν, he evidently means that Paul carried his preaching beyond Rome, where Clement is writing, to the very limit of the western half of the then known world, or, in other words, to the westernmost boundary of the lands bordering the Mediterranean, i.e. to Spain. The boundary of the West is the Atlantic Ocean, cf. Appian, Bell. civ. v. 64, τὰ δὲ ἐς δέσιν τὸν Καίσαρα (ἔχειν) μέχρι ὠκεανοῦ. The situation of Gades is described by Vell. Paterc. i. 2, as in ultimo Hispaniae tractu, in extremo nostri orbis termino; by Philostr. vita Apoll. v. 4, as κατὰ τὸ τῆς Εὐρώπης τέρμα. Cf. Strabo, pp. 67, 106, 137, 169, 170; Appian, proem. iii.; Hispan. i.; Eus. v. Const. i. 8. 2-4; Credner, Gesch. d. Kan. 53; Gams, Kirchengesch. Spaniens, i. 11-16; Lightfoot, Clement, ii. 30. Paul had come from the East, and so from this standpoint Clement could not possibly have called Rome the (as respects the East) limit of the West (so Hilgenfeld, Apost. Väter, 109); for τέρμα denotes, not the point or line where something begins, but the point or line where something ends; cf. Polyb. xl. epil. 14, παραγεγορότες ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα ὅλης τῆς πραγματείας—τὸ τέλος, opp. to ἀρχή; Epiaph. Her. xxix. 8, ἦλθεν ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα τῆς βίβλου, or in a geographical connection, Herod. vii. 54, ἐπὶ τέρμασι τοῖσι ἐκείνης (sc. τῆς Εὐρώπης), in contrast to the Hellespont, the crossing of which marked Xerxes' first entrance into Europe. Besides, on Malta and in Puteoli, Paul was already in the West before he came to Rome. It is equally impossible for τὸ τέρμα to mean the goal of Paul's life, or of the course set before him, so that τῆς δόσεως would merely signify that this goal was in the West, i.e. in Rome (essentially this view is held by Baur, Pastoralbr. 63; Paulus, i. 264; Hilgenfeld, Eind. 319; Otto, Gesch. Verh. der Pastoralbr. 167). Since it was unavoidable that every unbiassed reader would take the genitive with τὸ τέρμα as the designation of the territory of which it was the boundary, Clement must have expressed such a thought in other language, possibly by καὶ ἐν τῇ δόσει ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα τοῦ βίου (τοῦ δρόμου) ἐλθὼν. Further, to take τῆς δόσεως attributively (= τὸ ἐν τῇ δόσει) would force upon us the absurd idea of a western, in contradistinction to an eastern, end of Paul's life. Nor can it avail here to recall to mind the circus with its double meta; for Clement must have said that the world is a circus, and that the second meta, the goal of the race, lies in the western part of this circus, if he wished to be understood. There is no better ground for the claim, which Lipsius seems to have made up to the very end of his life (Apokr. Apostelgesch. ii. 1. 13 : also Hesse, Hirtenbriefe, 247), that "the boundary of the West" must denote the same place as that in which Paul "bore witness before the rulers," and in which he "was released from the world." In reaching the limit of the West, Paul did not necessarily reach at the same time the end of his life also. He may quite well have turned back, and, so far as this phrase is concerned, may have died in Jerusalem. The participles διδάξας, ἐλθών, μαρτυρήσας, just like the participles in § 6, describe what Paul did or suffered before his death, without placing the individual acts in any more definite relation to one another.

7. (P. 62.) Can. Mur. line 37, "sicuti et semote (-ta) passionem (-ne) Petri evidentiter declarat, sed et profectionem (-ne) Pauli ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscentis"; cf. GK, ii. 6, 56 f., 141; Spitta, Urchrist. i. 60-64. Concerning the Gnostic Acts of Peter (ed. Lipsius, pp. 45-103), cf. GK, ii. 832-855. The approximate date of its composition can be determined only on the presupposition—which is hardly to be contested, however—that it is very intimately connected with the Acts of John, and was written, if not by the same author, then at least by one of similar views, and at the same time a fellow-worker; such a view is supported both by the similarity of their content and by the general consensus of tradition; cf. GK, ii. 839 ff., 858, 860; James, Anecd. apocr. ii. (Texts and Studies, vol. v. Cambridge, 1897) pp. xxiv f., 151 f. The new fragments of the Acts of John, published partly in the book just cited, pp. 1-25, and partly by Bonnet (together with the earlier known passages in Acta Apost. apocr., ed. Lipsius et Bonnet, ii. part 1, pp. 151-216), show, as in spite of many objections the present writer still maintains, that the alleged author "Leucius" was a Valentinian, who, however, considered it advisable to speak the language of his school openly in only a few passages. The date of composition, then, is probably as determined by the present writer, circa 160-170 A.D. (cf. GK, ii. 864; NKZ, 1899, S. 210-218). With regard to the probable dependence of the Can. Mur. upon the Acts of Peter and of John, see GK, ii. 36-38, 844, 862 f. According to the Acts of Peter, Paul's release from his first imprisonment was not the result of a judicial decision, but the jailer, Quartus, who had become a Christian, "permansit (read permisit) Paulo ut ubi vellet iret ab urbe" (Lipsius, 45. 6). Paul received the direction to go to Spain through a vision after having fasted three days ("jejunans triduo," 45. 8; cf. 63. 11, and Can. Mur. line 10). As soon as the Roman Christians besought Paul not to forget them and not to stay away long ("ut annum plus non abesset," p. 46. 3), there came the voice from heaven with regard to Paul: "inter manus Neronis . . . sub oculis vestris consummabitur," p. 46. 8. Many accompanied him to the place of embarkation, and two youths sailed with him to Spain (p. 48. 8, 17). Reference is made to this journey also in a later passage (51. 26, "Paulus profectus est in Spaniam," cf. 45. 10, "qui in Spania sunt"; 45. 12, "ut proficisceretur ab urbe"; cf. Can. Mur. l. 38); there is also an allusion to his return to Rome after Peter's death (p. 100. 13). It should be added that at about the time of Paul's journey to Spain, Timothy and Barnabas set forth from Rome for Philippi on a commission from Paul (p. 49. 9), which is clearly an elaboration of Phil. ii. 19. Concerning the Acts of Paul, see below, n. 10. This ancient tradition is confirmed also by the words ἐλθόντος

εἰς τὴν Ἱσπανίαν τοῦ ἁγίου Παύλου ἀπὸ τῶν Σπανίων (pp. 118. 3, 120. 12), at the beginning of the combined Acts of Peter and Paul, according to which both apostles die as martyrs on June 29th of the same year (Lipsius, 176. 5). This work has not only lost track of the original significance of the festival on that day, but proceeds to invent tales on the basis of a misinterpretation of the inscription, "ad catacumbas," which the bishop Damasus caused to be put upon the common tomb of the two apostles (p. 174, see below, n. 9). It could not, therefore, have been written earlier than 400 A.D. Origen (quoted in Eus. H. E. iii. 1) describes Paul's missionary activity in the apostle's own words, Rom. xv. 19; but naturally it does not follow from this that he knew nothing of the journey to Spain, or that he gave no credence to the story. We might conclude with as much reason that Origen intended by this use of Rom. xv. 19 to give the lie to the statements in the N.T. about Paul's preaching in Rome. Whether or not Origen refers to the Spanish journey in Hom. xiii. in Gen. (Delarue, ii. 95), as Spitta, i. 84, thinks, is not quite clear. Of the later writers who speak definitely of the journey to Spain may be mentioned: Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. xvii. 26, probably in dependence upon Clement's letter, with which he was acquainted; cf. Cat. xviii. 9; Spitta, i. 55); Epiphanius (Har. xxvii. 6); Ephrem Syr. (Expos. ev. concord. 286, "Paulus ab urbe Jerusalem usque ad Hispaniam [predicavit]); Chrysostom, who had read the Acts of Paul several times and placed confidence in it (GK, ii. 886) (de laud. Pauli hom. vii.; act. ap. hom. lv.; 2 Tim. hom. x.; epist. Hebr. hypoth., Montfaucon, ii. 516, ix. 414, xi. 724, xii. 2); Theodoret in Phil. i. 25 and 2 Tim. iv. 17. The Acta Xanthippæ et Polyxenæ (Apocr. anecd., ed. James, 1893, i. 58-85), which, at the very outset, is clearly dependent upon the Gnostic Acts of Peter (Lipsius, 45. 10), makes Paul go from Rome to Spain and stay there several months at least, while Peter journeys from the East to Rome to thwart Simon Magus (James, op. cit. 75. 6). The groundlessness of the opinion that the tradition of the Spanish journey and of the second Roman imprisonment has arisen from Rom. xv. 24, 28, can be seen from the fact that important defenders of the view that Paul was twice imprisoned in Rome do not mention Spain at all, but merely speak in general of a resumption of missionary preaching in the interval between the two imprisonments; so Eus. H. E. ii. 22. 2 (see below, n. 8), the real Euthalius, circa 350, who reckoned the interval at ten years (Zacagni, 532), and Theodore (Swete, i. 116 f., 205 f., ii. 191, 231). Jerome also, who in the main follows Eus. H. E. ii. 22, only hints indefinitely at Spain in the words "in occidentis partibus" (Vir. Ill. v.; cf. the Prologue in Thomasius, ed. Vezzosi, i. 382 f.). In his commentary on Isa. viii. 23, ix. 1 (Vall. iv. 130), Jerome is not giving his own view, but is reporting in direct discourse the view of the Nazarenes, who saw a fulfilment of that prediction in Paul's extended preaching activity ("in terminos gentium et viam universi maris Christi evangelium splenduit"). If Jerome reports them correctly, these Jewish Christians, removed from the world as they were, certainly knew that Paul travelled as far as Spain. Jerome gives this as a matter of personal knowledge in his comment on Isa. xi. (p. 164, "ad Italian quoque et, ut ipse scribit, ad Hispanias alienigenarum portatus est navibus). The "ut ipse scribit" can refer only to Rom. xv. 24, 28, not to 2 Tim. iv. 17. Jerome says the same thing again, tract. de ps. lxxxiii. (Anecd. Maredol. iii. 2. 80) after giving a free rendering of Rom. xv. 19-21: "deinde dicat, quod de urbe Roma ierit (al. iturus sit) ad Hispaniam." In his careless fashion he mistakes the expression of the purpose for an attestation of its execution. But this is occasioned and in a measure excused by the contrast to the Ecclesiasticæ historiæ (p. 163), in which we are told of the journeys of other apostles to Persia, India, and Ethiopia. The tradition about the Spanish journey finds its starting-point in Paul's own words. Concerning c. Helvid. iv., see Spitta, i. 92. But Jerome (Vir. Ill. i., v.), by accepting the Roman tradition of the simultaneous martyrdom of the two apostles on June 29th of the same year (below, n. 9), helped to spread an error which, by its contradiction of the older tradition, must have had a confusing effect; since it necessarily led to a lengthening of Peter's stay in Rome in a way quite unhistorical (§ 39, n. 5), or to a shortening of the last part of Paul's life in a manner equally disregarding of the facts. Particularly those who, like Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii. 28, 29), connected the alleged simultaneous martyrdom of the two apostles with the burning of Rome in 64, could hardly withstand this temptation. Furthermore, the Roman Church had a political interest in the matter; for in the year 416 Innocent I. (Epist. xxv. 2) denied that any beside priests ordained by Peter or his successors had founded Churches in Italy, Gaul, Spain, or Africa, or in Sicily and the other islands of the West; and he formally challenged those who claimed that another apostle had founded the Church in any one of these provinces to prove this by written records. It is plain that Innocent knew of such claims. The Spanish Church could not take up his challenge; its literature begins with the Biblical poems of Juvencus, 330 A.D. No more than the Churches of Gaul and Africa did it possess a tradition concerning its origin based on documents. Since Rome had spoken and Spain had made no reply, Gelasius in 495 could state as a fact that Paul had never carried out his purpose of going to Spain, using this statement in defence of changes in the papal policy (Ep. xxx. 11, ed. Thiel, i. 444; cf. the opinion of the same Gelasius as to the time when the two apostles died, below, n. 9). Consequently it is almost a matter of surprise that not only Spaniards, like Isidorus (de Ortu et Obitu Patrum, chap. lxix., ed. Arevalus, v. 181), but also Gregory of Rome (Moral. xxxi. 103), ventured to speak again of Paul's journey to Spain as an historical fact.

8. (P. 62.) DIONYSIUS of Corinth, in his letter to the Romans and the bishop then in office, Soter (about 166-174 A.D.; Eus. H. E. ii. 25. 8; cf. iv. 23. 9-12) writes in terms not exactly elegant: ταῦτα καὶ ὑμεῖς διὰ τῆς τοσαύτης νοουθεσίας τὴν ἀπὸ Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου φυτεῖαν γεννηθείσαν Ῥωμαίων τε καὶ Κορινθίων συνεκεράσατε· καὶ γὰρ ἄμφω καὶ εἰς τὴν ἡμετέραν Κόρινθον φυτεύσαντες ἡμᾶς ὁμοίως ἐδίδαξαν, ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν ὁμοίως διδάξαντες ἐμαρτύρησαν κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρὸν. The present writer translates the last sentence: "For both of them, planting (or founding a Church) also in our city of Corinth, taught us (Corinthians) in like fashion (in a similar manner, in mutual agreement and harmony); and in like fashion (in the same harmonious manner) they taught also in Italy in the same place, and suffered a martyr's death at the same time." The words φυτεία, φυτεύειν refer to 1 Cor. iii. 6 ff.; cf. Acta Petri, ed. Lipsius, ss. 19. The better known fact, and the one generally admitted, seems to be that Peter and Paul were the founders of the Roman Church. His emphatic claim that the same two apostles founded the Church in Corinth is perhaps based only on 1 Cor. i. 12, iii. 22. The repeated ὁμοίως must naturally have the same meaning in both sentences. Therefore ὁμοσε certainly cannot mean "labouring together, working hand in hand," a possible translation in other connections. This thought would presuppose, indeed, that they laboured at the same time, but that has been expressed already by ὁμοίως. We must take it rather in its original local sense as a reinforcement of εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν, and, so far as Italy is an extended territory containing various places, as a closer definition of it. εἰς τὴν Ρώμην might be substituted for it. With regard to the thrice repeated use of a phrase of direction to indicate place in which, cf. Mark i. 39, xiii. 10, xiv. 9; Acts xxiii. 11; 2 Cor. x. 16. Whether both apostles preached at the same time is not the question in regard to Rome any more than in regard to Corinth. Besides, only a very heedless reader could find in the words of Dionysius any reference to a journey of the two apostles to Rome in company; cf. Spitta i. 82. It is their deaths which are said to have occurred at about the same time, nothing more. IRENAEUS regards the time when Peter and Paul were engaged in preaching the gospel at Rome, and in founding and building up the Church there, as a continuous period, which serves him as a time for dating the Gospel of Matthew. In speaking of the writing of Mark, he also makes a combined reference to the death of the two apostles (iii. 1. 1, 3. 2, 3). If he assumed a long interval between these two deaths, both statements would be impossible. No more can be inferred from it, however, than from a remark about the time when Hegel (1818-1831) and Schleiermacher (1810-1834) were teaching in Berlin, followed by another, in which reference is made to the time "after the death of the two great teachers." The statement in a work about Peter and Paul, falsely attributed to Symeon Metaphrastes (Acta SS. Jun. v. 411 ff.; cf. Lipsius, Ap. AG. ii. 1. 8-11; 217-227), deserves attention. The unknown author appeals to many ancient writings, correctly, e.g. (414), to Justin and Irenaeus with reference to the statue of Simon Magus in Rome; to Eusebius not quite precisely (422), since the citation comes through Euthalius, who is not mentioned; incorrectly (423) to Caius, Zephyrinus, and Dionysius. He writes, p. 423c: λέγουσι δὲ τινες προλαβεῖν μὲν τὸν Πέτρον ἐνιαυτὸν ἓνα καὶ τὸ μακάριον ἐκείνου καὶ δεσποτικὸν ἀξιασθαι πάθος, τὴν ψυχὴν τῶν προβάτων προθέμενον, ἀκολουθήσαι δὲ ταύτῃ τὸν μέγαν ἀπόστολον Παῦλον, ὡς Ἰουστίνος καὶ Εἰρηναίου φησιν, ἐφ' ὅλοις ἔτσι πέντε τὰς συνάξεις καὶ τὰς ἀντιθέσεις πρὸ τῆς εἰς Χριστὸν ἀναλύσεως καθ' ἑαυτοὺς ποιούμενους, καί γε ταῖς ἐγὼ μάλλον πείθομαι. If we understand aright these words, which are misinterpreted by Erbes (64) in such incredible fashion, Irenaeus is adduced, along with Justin, as a witness not only for the fact that Paul suffered martyrdom in Rome one year later than Peter, which reminds us of the one year between Paul's first and second Roman imprisonments in the Acts of Peter (above, p. 73, line 12 from end), but also for the further fact that the period during which Peter and Paul laboured at laying foundations in Rome (Irenaeus' assumption, as we have seen above) lasted full five years in all. If Paul came to Rome in the spring of 61, he must have been executed in the spring of 66, and Peter a year earlier, i.e. in the spring of 65. This calculation is not far astray from the probable dates, especially if we may take the one year as a round number for a year and several months. TERTULLIAN is the first writer of repute who expressly assigns Peter's crucifixion and Paul's beheading to the time of Nero, who, according to

Apol. v., was the first persecutor of the Christians (Scorp. xv.; cf. Marc. iv. 5; Præser. xxxvi.; Apol. xxi., discipuli without mention of names; moreover, Bapt. iv., Peter baptizing in the Tiber; Præser. xxxii., Clement ordained by Peter). Tertullian hints in Scorp. xv. that he derived these facts from writings, the trustworthiness of which is by no means universally recognised. The words “quæ ubicumque jam legero pati disco” cannot relate to the instrumenta imperii and the vite Cæsarum, to which he has previously referred the heretics who doubt the duty of martyrdom (Prodicus, Valentinus; cf. Heracleon, as quoted in Clem. Strom. iv. 71); for such details about the martyrdom of Peter and Paul are to be found not in these writings, but in the Acts of Peter and Paul, in distinction from the absolutely trustworthy canonical Acta which he has previously cited. Concerning Caius, see the following note. HIPPOLYTUS, who was acquainted with the Acts of Paul (Comm. in Dan. iii. 29; cf. Niceph. H. E. ii. 25; GK, ii. 880; Bonwetsch, Stud. zu d. Komment. des Hipp. 1897, S. 27), touches upon the last part of the apostles’ life but once, and then only to say that Simon Magus in Rome opposed “the apostles,” i.e. Paul and Peter (Refut. vi. 20). ORIGEN (quoted in Eus. H. E. iii. 1) knows that Peter was crucified head downwards in Rome, and that Paul likewise suffered martyrdom in Rome under Nero. The author of the work de Rebaptismate, written in Cyprian’s name, had read in a book, which he entitles Prædicatio Pauli—probably the Acts of Paul—of a meeting of Paul and Peter in Rome (Cypr. Opp., ed. Vindob. Append. 90; GK, ii. 881 ff.; but also ThLb, 1899, col. 316). Lactantius, Inst. iv. 21 (GK, ii. 884) probably draws from the same book his account of the preaching in Rome, and of the execution of both apostles by Nero. With regard to the latter event, he speaks more precisely in de Mort. Persec. ii.; “cumque jam Nero imperaret, Petrus Romam advenit. . . (Nero) Petrum cruci affixit et Paulum interfecit.” Peter, bishop of Alexandria, says the same thing, and emphasises the fact that both apostles died in the same city, without, however, expressing himself more definitely as to the time (Epist. Canon. chap. ix.; Routh, Rel. S.² iv. 34). EUSEBIUS, who, in H. E. ii. 25. 5, iii. 21. 1, 31. 1, puts Paul before Peter, nevertheless follows the usual order at other times when he is speaking of their martyrdom or their tombs in Rome: Demonstr. Evang. iii. 5. 65; Theoph. Syr. iv. 7 (see following n.); v. 31 (not correctly translated by Lee, p. 315; the proper rendering is: “Moreover, Simon Peter was crucified in Rome head downwards [κατὰ κεφαλῆς], and Paul was put to death, and John was consigned to an island”). Cf. also the translation by Gressmann, S. 241, 25. After he has followed Paul’s history up to the end of Acts, he continues (H. E. ii. 22. 2): τότε μὲν οὖν ἀπολογησάμενον αὐθις ἐπὶ τὴν τοῦ κηρύγματος διακονίαν λόγος ἔχει στείλασθαι τὸν ἀπόστολον, δεύτερον δ’ ἐπιβάντα τῇ αὐτῇ πῶλει τῷ κατ’ αὐτὸν τελευθῆναι μαρτυρίῳ. On the occasion of this second Roman imprisonment he wrote 2 Tim., which confirms this tradition by its reference to the first defence, as a result of which he was rescued from the clutches of Nero, etc. In his Church History, Eusebius refrains from making any more definite chronological statement, except to say that Paul’s death, as well as Peter’s, falls in Nero’s reign; and Theodore went too far when he claimed (Swete, i. 115)—plainly relying upon the arrangement of the material in Eus. H. E. ii. 25, 26—that Paul was executed at the time when the Jewish War broke out. In his Chronicum, also, Eusebius shows that he has no more exact tradition at his command. According to the Armenian version (Schoene, ii. 156), he remarks under anno Abrah. 2083 (67 A.D.): "Nero super omnia delicta primus persecutiones in Christianos excitavit, sub quo Petrus et Paulus apostoli Romæ martyrium passi sunt." Jerome in his rearrangement of this work under anno Abrah. 2084 (68 A.D.), instead of the italicised words, writes persecutionem . . . in qua, and in Vir. Ill. i. and v., puts the death of both apostles in the fourteenth year of Nero, which in the Chronicum coincides with anno Abrah. 2084; but this must have been through a misunderstanding, or a forcing of Eusebius' very carefully chosen expression. The same must have been the case with the real Euthalius earlier, about 350 A.D., when, appealing to Eusebius' Chronicum (Zacagni, 529), he places the death of Paul in the thirteenth year of Nero (p. 532), anno Abrah. 2083. Perhaps also it was in this way that Epiph. Har. xxvii. 6 came to make the statement that both apostles died in the twelfth year of Nero. Eusebius himself knows no more than what he says, namely, that Peter and Paul died under Nero, and does not intend that 67 shall be regarded as the year in which both apostles died, as is proved also by his remark at the year preceding (anno Abrah. 2082 = 66 A.D.), that Linus succeeded Peter as bishop of Rome. It was only his way of looking at the history, according to which the slaying of the Christians was the climax of Nero's crimes (Eus. H. E. ii. 25. 2-5), that caused him in his Chronicum to place the persecution of the Christians at the end of that emperor's reign. And even so, by speaking of persecutiones in the plural, he also acknowledges that what he has in mind is not a single event confined to a definite year. He puts the burning of Rome under anno Abrah. 2079 = 63 A.D. (Jerome, anno Abrah. 2080 = 64 A.D.), and mentions Paul's death incidentally under anno Abrah. 2083 = 67 A.D. But since he could not make out a definite year for Paul's death, either from tradition or by an artificial computation of the bishops' terms of office, which perhaps served in Peter's case, he contented himself with jotting down under the heading, "Nero the Persecutor of the Christians," that Paul, as well as Peter, suffered martyrdom under this emperor.

9. (P. 62.) The earliest information concerning 29th June as "Peter and Paul's Day" is found in the Roman Depositio martyrum of the year 336 (Lib. Pontificalis, ed. Duchesne, i. 11): "iii. Kal. Jul. Petri in Catacumbas et Pauli Ostense Tusco et Basso cons." (258 A.D.). Alongside of this confused statement of the calendar should be placed rightly the statement, in itself also but slightly illuminating, of the so-called Martyrol. Hieron. (ed. Duchesne et de Rossi, Acta SS. Nov. tom. ii. part 1, p. [84]): "iii. Kal. Jul. Romæ Via Aurelia, Natale sanctorum apostolorum Petri et Pauli, Petri in Vaticano, Pauli vero in via Ostensi, utrumque in Catacumbas, passi sub Nerone, Basso et Tusco consulibus." This clearly distinguishes three places at which the 29th of June was celebrated as Natalis, — the commemoration-day of Peter and Paul, as martyrs (cf. the Depos. Mart.: "xviii. Kal. Octob. Cypriani Africae, Romæ celebratur in Callisti"). The three places are the Vatican Basilica, as specially connected with Peter, the St. Paul's Church on the road to Ostia, as connected with Paul, and the cemetery, called ad Catacumbas by the Church of St. Sebastian, on the Via Appia in memory of both apostles. A hymn bearing the name of Ambrosium (cf. Drexes, Ambros. als Vater des Kirchengesangs, S.

139, No. 15. 7) gives evidence that the processions on 29th of June visited all three places. The year 258, indicated by the consuls named in the Depositio and in the Martyrol. Hieron. is, of course, not the time of the apostles' death, or of their first interment, but, just as in both of the instances, in which the Depositio designates a definite year by naming the consuls (xiv Kal. Jun. und x Kal. Oct.), denotes the time of a later transference of the bones of the martyrs. Consequently we may regard it as certain that in the year 258 and, indeed, on the 29th of June of this year, the bones of both apostles were placed ad Catacumbas, and that this has been the reason for the celebration of that particular day. For the month in the date given cannot be separated from the year. The former comes first, and the year, separated from it, forms the end of the statement. This is the simple and necessary result of the fact that the Depositio and the Martyrol. Hieron. are festival calendars for all years. Through a metrical inscription of the Pope Damasus (366-384) we know that the alleged or actual remains of the apostle rested for a long time ad Catacumbas (Damasi Epiigr. 26, ed. Ihm, p. 31; cf. Liber Pontif., ed. Duchesne, pp. 84, 85, 212). This inscription and the buildings erected there by Damasus, as well as the continued celebration of the 29th of June ad Catacumbas, at a time when the bones of Peter had long rested in the Vatican, and those of Paul on the road to Ostia, prove that their temporary common interment ad Catacumbas had left a deep impression. This interment cannot have been for a short period, and the question arises, When did it end? As evident fables are to be rejected, the statements of Liber Pontif. (pp. 66, 67, 150) that Pope Cornelius (251-253 A.D.) transferred the bodies of the two apostles from ad Catacumbas to their final resting places on the Via Ostia and in the Vatican; and the traditions in the Syriac Acts of Sharbil (Cureton, Anc. Docum. 61 f.) that this occurred under Pope Fabian (236-250 A.D.) are untrustworthy; for, according to the reliable date of the Depositio, the interment ad Catacumbas did not take place until 258, under Pope Sixtus II. Just as worthless is the statement of a letter of the Arcopagite, translated into Syriac and other languages, about the discovery of the head of Paul during the papacy of Sixtus (Xystus), but according to a Latin version during that of Fabellius (!), Pitra, Analecta, iv. 245, 267, 270, cf. Salom6 Bassor. trans. by Schönfelder, p. 79). Depending solely on a mis-understanding of the inscription of Damasus (cf. V. Schultze, Arch6ol. Stud. S. 242 ff.; Lightfoot, S. Clement, ii. 50), the author of the Catholic Acts of Peter and Paul makes the fantastic statement that the bodies of the apostles were interred on the Via Appia immediately after their death, but provisionally only for a year and seven months, while a worthier burial place was being built (Acta apost. apocr., ed. Lipsius et Bonnet, i. 174, more accurately in the accompanying Latin text, cf. also the second Greek recension, p. 221, where one year and six months are given). More reliable seems the account of the ancient Itineraries, that the remains rested for forty years ad Catacumbas (de Rossi, Roma Sol. i. 180). Since forty is a round number, one might always add a few years more to 298 (258 and 40), and find here the tradition that at the beginning of the fourth century the bodies were removed, one to the Vatican, and the other to the Via Ostiensis. This at all events is pretty near the historical truth. On the other hand, the opinion of Erbes is not tenable (Die Todestage der Apostel. 118, von de Wall, Roma Sacra,

S. 85 et al), namely, that at the time of the Depositio of 336, and also of the chronographer of 354, who introduced the Depositio into his collected work, the remains of Peter still rested ad Catacumbas, while the bones of Paul had already been transferred to the Ostian road. This view depends solely on the uncorrected text of the Depositio, which at all events does not state this clearly. Moreover, it has against it not only the later text, according to which Constantine the Great had the bones of Peter interred in St. Peter's at the Vatican, and those of Paul in St. Paul's on the Via Ostiensis (Liber Pontif. pp. 78, 79, 176, 178, 193-195; de Rossi, Inscr. Christ. ii. 20, 21, 345 f.), but most of all the testimony of Eusebius (+ circa 340). Besides the less clear statements of his Church History (ii. 25. 5, iii. 31. 1), what Eusebius has to say in his Theoph. written about 330-340, and preserved only in Syriac, should not always be overlooked (cf. Lightfoot, Dict. of Christ. Biog. ii. 333; Gressmann, TU, N. F. viii. 3; also Theoph. Griechische Christliche Schriftsteller, Eusebius, 2te Hälfte, 3te Bd., ed. Gressmann, p. xx*). In iv. 7 of this work Eusebius relates of Peter (inaccurately translated by Lee in the English trans. p. 221, more correctly by Gressmann, S. 175*): "His memory among the Romans up to the present time is greater than that of those who lived earlier; so that he was honoured also with a magnificent mausoleum outside the city, and countless multitudes from all over the Roman Empire hasten to it as to a great sanctuary and temple of God." (Cf. Jerome, Vir. Ill. i: "Sepultus Romæ in Vaticano juxta viam triumphalem, totius orbis veneratione celebratur"). After some remarks about the writings of John and about his grave, Eusebius continues: "So in like manner the writings of the apostle Paul also are made known throughout the world and enlighten the souls of men; moreover, the martyr-character of his death, and the mausoleum over him, are extraordinarily and splendidly praised in the city of Rome until this day." From this it is evident (1) that about 330-340 Peter and Paul were no longer resting together, i.e. ad Catacumbas, but each had his own particular memorial church in separate places. (2) Eusebius, who of course knew of the Basilica Petri at the Vatican, built by Constantine, can have meant nothing else than this by the memorial church which he so pompously described. He certainly could not have referred to the unpretentious tombs of both apostles on the Via Appia. Moreover, St. Peter's at the Vatican stood "outside the city." (3) Constantius, while he was ruling in the West (351-361), may have added so much to the adornment of St. Peter's, built by his father, that he could pass for the finisher of the edifice; it was, however, not at that date that the remains of Peter were interred in the Vatican basilica, but before the writing of the Theoph., in fact, according to the description of Eusebius, considerably earlier, therefore certainly before 330. Accordingly, the text of the Depositio is badly mutilated, and is to be corrected by other traditions; an et Pauli has fallen out after Petri, and similarly, by an ocular error—a mistake more easily explainable—a Petri in Vaticano has fallen out before et Pauli, and, further, an in via before Ostense. Moreover, even after such a restoration of the text, this statement of the calendar gives evidence of a misunderstanding of the tradition which it contains. It is quite impossible for the reader to see which of the facts stated concerns the date "June 29 . . . under the consuls Tuscus and Bassus," while the author himself seems no longer to have known it. At least the chronographer of 351, who inserted the calendar of martyrs in his compilation, takes the 29th of June (naturally not of the year 258, but of the year 55) as the common date of the death of Peter and Paul, both in the catalogue of Roman bishops—the so-called Catalogus Liberianus—and in the Fasti Consul. (Mommson, Chron. minora, i. 57, 73). While the chronologists give varying dates for the year of the apostles' death (Jerome, Vir. Ill. i. v., cf. above, p. 78, gave the year 68), yet since the middle of the fourth century at the latest there prevailed in Rome the tradition that both apostles died at the same time, i.e. on the 29th of June in the same year. In the so-called Decretum Gelasii (Epist. pontif., ed. Thiel. i. 455), the opinion that Peter and Paul died at different times is condemned as heretical twaddle (sicut hæretici gurrunt). It is not impossible, though not demonstrable, that this part of the Decretum, as also others (GK, ii. 259–267), had been already discussed at a Roman Synod under Damasus. Once the 29th of June had become in the West the memorial day for both apostles, the older tradition, according to which Peter died a considerable time before Paul, could maintain itself only in a modest form by allowing that both indeed died on the 29th of June, but that Paul died a year later than Peter (here following ancient tradition, above, pp. 73, 76). So Prudentius (Peristeph. xii. 3–6, 11–24), and even in the sixth century, Gregory of Tours (Glor. Mart. i. 29), and the Roman deacon, Aratus, at the end of his metrical version of Acts (Migne, lxxviii. 246). Augustine assumes a rather critical attitude toward the Roman tradition in his sermons on “Peter and Paul’s day” (Serm. ccxcv.–ccxcix. cclxxxi.), e.g. Serm. ccxcv. (ed. Bass. vii. 1197: “quamquam diversis diebus paterentur, unum erant. Præcessit Petrus, secutus est Paulus”), and Serm. cclxxxi. (vii. 1508: “Petri et Pauli apostolorum dies, in quo triumphalem coronam devicto diabolo meruerunt, quantum fides Romana testatur, hodiernus est . . . Sicut traditione patrum cognitum memoria retinetur, non uno die passi sunt per cæli spatia decurrente. Natalitio ergo Petri passus est Paulus ac per hoc ita singuli dies dati sunt duobus, ut nunc unus celebretur ambobus”). Cf. also the pseudo-Augustinian Serm. ccv. (Bass. xvi. 1209), and another given by Lipsius, Ap. AG. ii. part 1, 240. The celebration of the 29th of June arose from an event in the local church history of Rome, and for a long time also was confined to Rome. The true Euthalius, who belongs to the period before 390 (NKZ, 1904, S. 388 f.) knows of the celebration as one peculiar to Rome (Zacagni, Monum. coll. i. 522), and does not say, like the author of the Martyrium, falsely ascribed to him (Zac. 536), that Paul suffered martyrdom on the 29th of June, but simply that the Romans celebrate his memory and his martyrdom annually on that day. Outside of Rome this “Peter and Paul’s Day” was not widely observed. The Calendar of Martyrs, preserved in Syria in a MS. of 412 (ed. Wright, p. 1; Acta SS. Nov. ii. p. lii.), puts the martyrdom of both apostles on the 28th of December; but this has no more significance than the assignment of the death of Stephen, the first martyr, to the 26th of December, and of James and John, the sons of Zebedee, to the 27th in the same calendar. In fact, there was no tradition concerning either the day or the year of the death of the two apostles. Also in Rome during the third century there existed no such tradition; otherwise how could the interment of the remains of both apostles ad Catacumbas on the 29th of June 258 have become the only memorial day of the great martyred apostles of Rome! The question where the alleged or actual bones of the apostles rested before the 29th of June 258, is of less significance for our knowledge concerning the end of Paul's life than for our criticism about Peter in Rome (§ 39). It receives the same answer whether we start from what was believed forty years before, or from what happened sixty to seventy years afterward. Since the interment beside the Via Appia was a late and temporary expedient, it seems almost self-evident that when, perhaps sixty years after their lodgment there, the apostles' remains were again removed, it was that they might be buried, not at random, but in the places already hallowed by their memory, i.e. that they were brought back to the very places whence they were taken in 258. The final interment of Paul on the Via Ostiensis, and of Peter in the Vatican, attests the fact that it was believed that they were buried there originally. But we are led to the same conclusion by what the Roman Caius under the bishop Zephyrinus (199–217 A.D., i.e. about forty to fifty years before the Depositio by the Via Appia) certifies in his dialogue with the Montanist Proclus (Eus. H. E. ii. 25. 7): ἐγὼ γὰρ τὰ τρόπαια τῶν ἀποστόλων ἔχω δεῖξαι· ἐὰν γὰρ θελήσῃς ἀπελθεῖν ἐπὶ τὸν Βατικανὸν ἢ ἐπὶ τὴν ὁδὸν τὴν Ὀστίαν, εὐρήσεις τὰ τρόπαια τῶν ταύτην ἰδρυσαμένων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. In contrast to the authority of the apostles and their followers, to whose labours and graves in the province of Asia the Montanist had appealed (Eus. H. E. iii. 31. 4, cf. v. 24. 1–6, iii. 31. 3), the Roman names the authority of his Church, its apostles and their graves, which could still be pointed out. Eusebius, without hesitation, took τρόπαια to mean the graves and monuments of the apostles (H. E. ii. 25. 5 f., iii. 31. 1); the later writers for the most part understood by it the places where they were executed (Hofmann, v. 10, vii. 1. 205; Lipsius, Ap. AG. ii. part 1. 21; Erbes, 68 ff.). Taken by itself, the word has neither of these meanings, but denotes a token commemorating some victory won, set up on the spot where the enemy was turned to flight—originally a bundle of captured weapons hung up on a tree or a pole (Pauly, RE, vi. 2165 f.). The memory, however, of the martyrs and other illustrious dead always clung about their graves. It was not the place where Polycarp was burned, but where he was buried, that was considered sacred (Mart. Polyc. xvii. xviii.; cf. the letter of Polycrates quoted in Eus. H. E. v. 24. 4, and Pionius, Vita Polycarpi, chap. xx., concerning the grave of Thraseas of Eumeneia at Smyrna). In particular cases it may have been actually true, or at least so preserved in people's memory, that the place of death and that of burial coincided altogether or nearly so. John expires in the grave which he himself has ordered to be dug (Acta Joannis, ed. Zahn, 250). In Jerusalem, in Hecgeippus' time, there was pointed out, near what was once the temple, a pillar which marked the spot where James was said to have been slain and burned (Eus. H. E. ii. 23. 18; see vol. i. 108, n. 4). This may have been so also in the case of Peter and Paul. The Gnostic Acts of Peter (ed. Lipsius, 100. 8) show the greatest indifference as to his burial, putting this sentiment in the mouth of Peter himself, and contain no statements at all about the place of his crucifixion and interment (pp. 90, 100). The same is true with reference to Paul in the ancient Acts of Paul (pp. 112–117). Both writings lack every trace of Roman local tradition, and certainly arose in the East (GK, ii. 841, 890). But from all analogies it would seem clear that the tradition in Rome during the second century about the death of Peter and Paul and their graves must have been connected with certain definite spots, even if this fact were not also attested by Caius about 210 and, indirectly, by the two later transferences of the remains. Previously, Erbes (ZfKG, vii. 33) assumed that suddenly in 258, perhaps as the result of a pretended revelation, the remains were found in some corner or other where up to that time they had lain neglected and hidden. He has now himself given up this view (1899, S. 132), and claims that Paul lay buried on the Via Appia from the very first, and that Peter's bones were likewise to be found there after about 200. But on this supposition the separation of the remains of the two apostles, who were so intimately connected in the tradition, and their removal from the Via Appia, where they had been honoured so long, to their separate tombs on the Via Ostiensis and in the Vatican, seems an act arbitrary in the extreme. The tradition that Peter was executed in the one place and Paul in the other, would not be a sufficient motive for such an act. The writer at least knows of no case in which the body of a martyr was subsequently removed from his grave to the place where he was executed. Rather those who separated the remains of Peter and Paul and buried them in places wide apart—and this was accomplished before Constantine's death in 337—must have believed that they were restoring the original conditions. The interment ad Catacumbas, which must have arisen out of the necessities of the times, was from the first intended to be only a temporary entombment. In view of all this, we are probably to understand by the τρόπαια of Caius, as Eusebius did, the tokens marking the places where the two apostles were buried. Nevertheless, as in the case of James, these may very well have been regarded as marking at the same time the places of execution. That they were actually so regarded is attested by the later tradition, according to which both apostles were buried near to where they died; cf. with reference to Peter, Linus, Martyr. Petri, x. ed., Lipsius, 11. 16; the Catholic Acts of both apostles, 168. 8, 172. 13, 177. 1, 212. 12, 216. 15, 221. 6; cf. with reference to Paul the Mart. Pauli, likewise ascribed to Linus, 38. 21, 41. 10 (outside a gate of the city); the Catholic Acts of both apostles, 170. 3, 177. 1, 213. 6, 214. 8, 221. 8; cf. with reference to both, Lib. pontif. under Cornelius (Duchesne, i. 150). The tokens to which Caius refers need not have been monuments erected by Christians in the apostles' honour; such tokens could be any objects whatever which were supposed to date from the time of the events in question, e.g. a pillar, as that which marked the spot where James was killed and buried (Eus. ii. 23. 18), or a tree, as the myrtle on the grave of Thraseas at Smyrna (Pionius, Vita Polyc. xx.), or the vine which grew on the spot where the blood of the martyr Philip fell to the earth (Acta apocr., ed. Tischendorf, 92, 94), or the plane-tree under which Simon Magus was supposed to have taught while in Rome (Hippol. refut. vi. 20). As a matter of fact we read in one of the recensions of the Catholic Acts of Peter and Paul (Lipsius, 214. 9), that Paul was executed near a cembra (stone-pine) or pine, and in both recensions that Peter was buried under a terebinth on the Vatican (pp. 172. 13, 216. 15). The expressions ὑπὸ τὴν τερέβινθον and (214. 9) πλησίον τοῦ δένδρου τοῦ στροβίλου refer in each case to a well-known tree which can be seen at a distance. It is not impossible that this terebinth was the ancient oak on the Vatican, of which Pliny, H. N. xvi. 44. 237, gives an account; cf. Erbes, ZfKG, vii. 12 A. 2. Concerning the genus pine, cf. Erbes, 1899, S. 92.

10. (P. 63.) The recovery and publication of the Coptic Fragments of the Acts of Paul (Acta Pauli aus der Heidelberger Koptischen Papyrus Hs. Nr. 1 Herausgeg. von C. Schmidt, Uebersetzung, Untersuchungen und Koptischer Text, 1904) has given us much new information, corrected old mistakes, and happily confirmed certain conjectures, though it has thrown no new light on the presentation of the close of Paul's life which this legend contains. These Fragments have removed every doubt as to the fact that the Martyrdom of Paul, which has come down to us in the original Greek and in several translations as an independent writing (Lipsius, pp. 104-117; Schmidt, S. 85-90) formed the concluding portion of the entire work. But we know now, no more than formerly, what immediately preceded this conclusion, though this is the point of especial interest. The wholly arbitrary way in which that elder in the province of Asia, who around 170 to 190 wrote the Acts of Paul, made use of the material of Acts and the Pauline Epistles for his fabrication, renders uncertain every conjecture concerning the progress and content of his narrative where the text is in doubt. The Martyrdom which closes with the execution of the apostle begins with his arrival in Rome; for it begins with the statement that Luke, who had come thither from Gaul, and Titus from Dalmatia were awaiting him, and the meeting with these friends had rejoiced and enheartened him. From this it would seem to be out of the question that this should have been preceded by an account of any intercourse between Paul and the Roman Christians and of other important events following his arrival in the city. On the contrary, his expectant friends were in all probability the first ones whom he greeted. The only thing that could have preceded it is an account of his journey to Rome. At first Paul finds himself at liberty in the city, and only after a lapse of some time is arrested together with many other Christians. There is not the slightest intimation of a contemporaneous presence of Peter in Rome. Especially of any meeting of Paul and Peter, concerning which old authors always have something to say on the authority of the Acts of Paul (above, p. 77), not only is there no intimation, but there is really no room in this connection for stating it. The inference is consequently to be drawn that the Acts of Paul are here narrating a second arrival of Paul in Rome, having recorded in a previous passage an earlier presence and imprisonment of the apostle in the city. As the statement that Paul hired a barn and carried on there a successful ministry of preaching (Lipsius, p. 104, 4 ff.), calls to mind Acts xxviii. 16, 30, so the statement regarding Titus and Luke suggests 2 Tim. iv. 10 f. The friends, who at the time of an imprisonment of the apostle had gone to Gaul and Dalmatia (Luke instead of Crescens), had returned from these journeys to Rome before the arrival of Paul, whose liberty of action was in no wise impaired. An earnest consideration is due the conjecture of M. R. James (JThSt—January 1905, p. 244 ff.), who is the best informed scholar of the Christian apocryphal literature—that the Acts of Paul did not interpolate its fabrications at all into the gaps of Luke's Acts of the Apostles, but appended them to the canonical Acts.

§ 37. THE GENUINENESS OF THE EPISTLES TO TIMOTHY AND TITUS.

The confident denial of the genuineness of these letters—which has been made now for several generations more positively than in the case of any other Pauline Epistles (n. 1)—has no support from tradition. The fact that Marcion did not include them in his collection does not prove that he was unacquainted with them; on the contrary, according to tradition, he knew and rejected them, stating his reasons for so doing (GK, i. 834). Traces of their circulation in the Church before Marcion's time are clearer than those which can be found for Romans and 2 Cor. A strong argument in favour of their genuineness is the large number of personal references which they contain,—references that can be explained neither as derived from other probable sources nor as growing out of the idea under the influence of which the letters might have been forged. This is especially true in the case of 2 Tim., least so in the case of 1 Tim.; although, comparing the letters as a whole with those which in the second century and later were attributed to Paul and the other apostles, all three of them furnish proof of their own genuineness (n. 2). What was said above (p. 60 f.) in connection with the discussion concerning the historical value of the letters, even if spurious, about the way in which facts presupposed are handled in all three letters, especially in 2 Tim., also goes to prove their genuineness (n. 3). Historical facts which a forger finds it necessary or advantageous to invent he is wont to state clearly and expressly for the benefit of his reader, who, of course, cannot know these facts beforehand. Furthermore, these facts are generally borrowed from older sources which are genuine or supposed to be genuine, which in this case would have been the other Pauline Epistles and Acts. Now the whole group of facts presupposed in these letters carry us beyond the period dealt with in Acts and verified by references in the earlier Epistles of Paul. Moreover, these facts, which are new to us, are everywhere incidentally referred to in a manner intelligible only to readers already familiar with the actual situation. The majority of the persons introduced in these letters are not mentioned anywhere else in the N.T., nor in the post-apostolic literature not dependent upon these Epistles; as, for example, Hymenæus, 1 Tim. i. 20, 2 Tim. ii. 17; Philetus, 2 Tim. ii. 17; Phygelus and Hermogenes, 2 Tim. i. 15; Lois and Eunice, 2 Tim. i. 5; Onesiphorus and his house, 2 Tim. i. 16, iv. 19; Crescens, Carpus, Eubulus, Pudens, Linus, Claudia, 2 Tim. iv. 10, 13, 21; Artemas and Zenas, Tit. iii. 12 f.; Alexander, 1 Tim. i. 20, 2 Tim. iv. 14. Even if the last named person could be identified with the Alexander mentioned in Acts xix. 33 (against this identification cf. above, p. 21, n. 3), this latter passage does not account for the reference in the Epistles to Timothy; for the Alexander in Acts is described simply as a Jew, without any indication of the relation which he sustained to Paul and Christianity; whereas in 1 and 2 Tim. he is represented as a Christian, hostile to Paul and his doctrine, fallen from the faith, put under the ban by the apostle, and not an ἀργυροκόπος, as we should expect if the passage were dependent upon Acts (Acts xix. 24), but a χαλκεύς (2 Tim. iv. 14). These sixteen new names are by no means mere names, the introduction of which can be explained by the necessity which the writer felt of giving his forgery the appearance of a genuine letter by putting in personal notices, a necessity, let it be said, which other writers who forged Apostolic Epistles in the second century seem hardly to have experienced (n. 2). They represent real persons. Even though this may not be said of the Roman Christians, who in 2 Tim. iv. 21 send greetings, the fact that no one of their names is taken from Rom. xvi. does argue in favour of their historicity. The difficulty of gaining definite ideas from the statements about Onesiphorus (above, p. 20, n. 1), Lois and Eunice (p. 22, n. 4), Crescens (above, p. 11 f.), Hymenæus and Philetus, Phygelus and Hermogenes, Alexander (above, p. 21, n. 3), Zenas (above, p. 54, n. 4), Carpus and the articles which Paul left with him (above, p. 16), is that which is natural in connection with such notices found in genuine letters belonging to the remote past. On the other hand, what is said is of such a character that it is difficult to believe it to be invented. This is true also of statements about the persons mentioned elsewhere in the N.T. A pseudo-Paul might have taken the name Demas (2 Tim. iv. 10) from Col. iv. 14; Philem. 24; but what could have influenced him to set the conduct of Demas in such sharp and unfavourable contrast to that of Luke when he is mentioned in Colossians and Philemon along with Luke as one of Paul's honoured helpers? What led him to associate Demas with Thessalonica? The forger might have been influenced by Eph. vi. 21 to speak of the sending of Tychicus to Ephesus (2 Tim. iv. 12), i.e. if the Epistle was already provided with the false title πρὸς Ἐφεσίους. But even if no account be taken of the fact that the whole of 2 Tim. introduces us to a period in Paul's life considerably later than the composition of Ephesians, it would have been very much more natural for him to speak of the sending of Tychicus to Colossæ, and almost inevitably there would have been some trace of the influence of Eph. vi. 21 f. or Col. iv. 7 f.; but no such influence is discernible; indeed, in Tit. iii. 12 we find Tychicus on his way to Crete with an unknown person named Artemas. To be sure, Apollos (Tit. iii. 13) was a distinguished name; but there is not the slightest hint which would remind the reader of the well-known and thoroughly individual character of this person as he appears in 1 Cor. and Acts, while here, too, he appears in company with a person otherwise unknown, on a journey to Crete. From Acts xx.

4, 15, xxi. 29, one might learn that Trophimus had once been at Miletus with Paul; but in order to invent the further statement that Paul had left him there sick (2 Tim. iv. 20), it would be necessary directly to contradict what is there said about him. That Erastus' home was Corinth might be inferred from Rom. xvi. 23 (cf. xvi. 1); but anyone writing in dependence upon Rom. xvi. would not be likely to represent him as a traveller stopping in Corinth instead of continuing his journey beyond that point (2 Tim. iv. 20). These various statements are not derived from earlier writings which have come down to us, nor are they due to the influence of ideas which we can detect in the Epistles. Both Timothy (1 Thess. iii. 2; 1 Cor. iv. 17, xvi. 10; Phil. ii. 19-23) and Titus (2 Cor. vii. 6-15, viii. 6, xii. 18) had occasionally performed functions as the apostle's representatives in the Churches organised by Paul. Therefore it was not unnatural to conceive of them as having been temporarily at work in the same way in Churches other than those mentioned in the earlier Epistles, and to give literary currency to his wishes with reference to the organisation of Church life in the form of letters from Paul to them. But it is inconceivable that a pseudo-Paul, who with this purpose in view wrote these letters on the basis of the earlier Epistles, should have presented to the readers such a very unfavourable picture of Timothy, whom the real Paul praises so often and so highly (e.g. Phil. ii. 20-22). All the legendary tales of the ancient Church were laudatory in spirit, and all the unfavourable judgments which became current in the second century concerning persons mentioned with honour or praise are either due to tendencies opposed to the N.T. tradition and the tradition of the early Church, e.g. in Marcion and the pseudo-Clementines, or are to be regarded as historical testimony of a kind that could not be invented, and of value because supplementing our imperfect knowledge of these times and personalities, e.g. the unfavourable stories about Nicolaus. Now there can be no idea of any intention on the author's part to present Timothy in an unfavourable light, since by the very act of addressing to him two letters of Paul he accords him special honour, and in spite of all the defects of his character which we discern in the Epistles, represents him as being tenderly beloved by the apostle. Consequently this picture of Timothy and the letters in which it is found must be considered genuine. It is hard to understand how anyone can feel this critical argument weakened by the sentimental consideration that, if the Epistles to Timothy are accepted as genuine, the image of a saint is destroyed.

At this point the question arises as to the purpose of the alleged forgery, which must be satisfactorily answered before anyone acquiesces in the judgment that the letters are spurious. The principal motives of the forger have been found in what is said in 1 Tim. and Titus concerning the regulation of the life of the Church and in all three letters in opposition to certain doctrinal errors.

With reference to the first point, it is to be remarked at the outset that the pastoral office described above (pp. 29 ff., 43 f.), which Titus temporarily occupied in Crete and Timothy in the province of Asia over large groups of Churches, is quite without parallel in the organised Church life of the post-apostolic age. It grew out of the unique and general relation of the apostolate to the establishment and oversight of the Churches, a function which these helpers of Paul exercised under his commission and as his temporary representatives. Now if, following the misleading precedent of interpretation in the ancient Church (above, p. 41, n. 6, and p. 53, n. 2), and influenced by certain imperfect modern analogies, anyone is inclined to consider their position, that of a bishop, he ought at least to regard Timothy not as a bishop of Ephesus, but as a bishop of Asia, and Titus as a bishop of Crete; and then perhaps it will be recalled that while there were bishops of Ephesus, Smyrna, and Laodicea in the province of Asia, and bishops of Gortyna and Knossus in Crete, there were never any bishops of Asia and of Crete. The local Churches of the post-apostolic and early catholic age were autonomous corporations; the monarchical episcopate was the highest office in this local Church, and lasted for life. And so it remained up to a time prior to which the "Pastoral Epistles" must certainly have been written, when it became customary to look upon bishops as successors to the apostles, and more and more to regard as peculiarly theirs certain Church functions. Although the personal distinction of individual bishops like Ignatius and Polycarp, or the historical dignity of the Churches over which they presided, may have given them the moral right to reprove and to advise Churches other than their own, in the second century no bishop of Ephesus, or even of Rome, could have exercised in any Church save his own so much authority over the organisation, and so determinative an influence in regulating the details, of the Church life as that which Timothy and Titus were instructed to exercise over all the Churches scattered through wide regions; and, as a matter of fact, no bishop ever did assume such authority and influence. Therefore it is inconceivable that between 70 and 170 a pseudo-Paul should have written 1 Tim. and Titus, in which the whole Church life of entire districts is represented as being under the determining influence of a form of personal government which in his time was not even in existence, and of the working of which, in the apostolic age, there is hardly the least suggestion in the rest of the N.T.

Furthermore, with regard to offices in local Churches, there is not to be found anywhere in the Epistles an enumeration of the officials and a description of their functions, such as might give the impression that a definite number and order of officers is recommended or introduced, over against another system then in vogue. On the contrary, a fixed order is presupposed, and the qualifications are mentioned necessary for the election and installation of officers in the Church, also the qualities which these officers must show in performing their functions. Consequently it is impossible to derive from the letters a definite answer to the question as to the number of officers in the Church, for this is always presupposed. If we had only 1 Tim. we might infer from iii. 1-13 that the officers of the Church were simply one ἐπίσκοπος and a number of διάκονοι. The error of this conception we should immediately discover, however, from the fact that in both apostolic and post-apostolic times, whenever these two titles are used comprehensively to denote the officers of the local Church, several ἐπίσκοποι as well as several διάκονοι are mentioned (n. 4). A form of government in which all the official service in the local Church was performed by one bishop and a number of deacons never existed. Moreover, in a different connection but in the same letter (v. 17-22), we learn of Church officials called πρεσβύτεροι. That there were several of these officers in every Church we would naturally assume, even if special mention were not made of those elders who devoted themselves to teaching (v. 17), and of the individual elder against whom a charge may be preferred (v. 19), and if we did not read in iv. 14 of the πρεσβυτέριον of Timothy's home Church as a corporation acting as a unit. Evidently the name is derived from the office, for there could not be πρεσβύτεροι in the clear sense here intended, namely, "ruling elders," without a presbytery, any more than there could be senators without a senate (n. 5). Being members of the body which administered the affairs of the Church, the individual elders were officers in the Church. From the connection in which 1 Tim. v. 22 stands, there can be no doubt that when persons became members of the presbytery hands were laid upon them, and they were set apart to this position and work by the prayer of the Church, just as were other members of the Church who were appointed to perform special service and to occupy a special position in the Church. Consequently the only difference between them and the ἐπίσκοπος in iii. 1-7 is a difference of name; for the care of the Church which the latter is to exercise is described as προΐστασθαι, προστῆναι (iii. 4 f.), as is also the office of the elders (v. 17). The fact that the latter are not mentioned in the apparently complete list of the officers of the Church in iii. 1-13, can be explained only if the same persons were sometimes called πρεσβύτεροι, sometimes ἐπίσκοποι. The fact that in one place Paul calls them πρεσβύτεροι is explained by the circumstance that in the preceding context he has been exhorting Timothy to proper conduct in relation to the older members of the Church (n. 6). From among the πρεσβύτεραι (v. 2) special mention is made of the widows (v. 3-16); from the class πρεσβύτεροι, in the wider sense (v. 2), the προεστῶτες πρεσβύτεροι are distinguished (v. 17-19); so that he is thinking of their official position only as that which gives them a place of honour and determines the treatment they are to receive. On the other hand, where the special point under discussion is their office proper and the qualifications necessary in order to its assumption, they are very properly called ἐπίσκοποι and their office ἐπισκοπή (iii. 1 f.). That this was really the relation subsisting between elders and bishops is positively proved by Tit. i. 5-9; for no exegetical device can obscure the fact that in this Epistle the identity of ἐπίσκοπος and πρεσβύτερος is taken for granted (n. 7). Titus is to appoint elders in every city in Crete, i.e. to provide the local Church with a presbytery. When, now, we find that the statement of qualifications necessary in order to the appointment of an elder is confirmed by a statement as to the requirements which are to be made of a bishop, it follows, not only that the elder was a bishop, but also that there was no official with the title ἐπίσκοπος who stood at the head of the presbytery. It is the same sort of Church organisation which, according to Acts, existed in the Churches of Asia Minor in Paul's lifetime; according to the Epistle of Clement, in Rome and Corinth at the close of the first century; and, according to the Epistle of Polycarp, in Philippi as late as the beginning of the second century (n. 8). Now, however, from Revelation, the Epistles of Ignatius, and the tradition concerning the disciples of John, we learn that by the close of the first century the monarchical episcopate had been generally introduced and firmly established in the Churches of Asia Minor, which was the destination of 1 Tim., and that after the middle of the second century this form of government became more and more common in the Churches of Europe. How could a pseudo-Paul, writing in the year 100 or 160 with a view to exerting some influence upon the system of Church organisation in his time, ignore so completely the Church life which he observed about him, and present Paul and his helpers so entirely in the dress and language of 50-70 in all that affected the essential forms of Church organisation? The aim on the forger's part in this way to avoid all tell-tale anachronisms would directly contradict his other purpose, namely, in Paul's name to influence the Church of his own time; while everyone acquainted with ancient literature, particularly the literature of the ancient Church, knows that a forger or fabricator of those times could not possibly have avoided anachronisms.

No objection can be raised on the ground that in these letters alone Paul discusses specifically the arrangement of offices in the Church and the duties of chief officers and deacons, whereas in the other letters he limits himself to indefinite hints and incidental references (1 Thess. v. 12; 1 Cor. xii. 28, xvi. 15 f.; Rom. xii. 7 f., xvi. 1; Gal. vi. 6; Eph. iv. 11; Col. iv. 17; Phil. i. 1); for the reason that there are no other Epistles of Paul in which the external conditions are the same as in Titus and 1 Tim. Even in 2 Tim. nothing is said about bishops, deacons, elders, and widows, nor about Timothy's pastoral relation, he being represented simply as an evangelist, and as a sharer of the apostle's preaching and teaching office (above, pp. 5 f., 29 f.). It cannot, therefore, be claimed that an interest in the official organisation of the Church, such as Paul himself did not feel, is a peculiarity of the author of the Pastoral Epistles. Effort to supply the Churches which had just come into existence in Crete with officers by the apostle's express command (Tit. i. 5) may not be in accordance with certain fancies of constructive historians, but agrees perfectly with Acts (Acts xiv. 23; cf. n. 7), and with the Epistle of Clement (chaps. xlii. 4–xliii. 1, xliv. 1–3), the earliest sources which we have that deal with the development of the organisation of the Gentile Christian Churches, as well as with the fact that a few weeks, or at most a few months, after it came into existence, the Church in Thessalonica had officers charged with arduous duties (1 Thess. v. 12). According to the most probable interpretation of 1 Tim. iii. 11, female διάκονοι are mentioned; but this does not take us beyond Paul's own time (Rom. xvi. 1). The obscurity to us of the instructions with regard to widows (1 Tim. v. 3–16), particularly their relation to the deaconesses, is due solely to the meagreness of the reports that have come down to us. Two points are of critical importance—(1) The explicitness and exactness which in very marked degree distinguish these instructions from those concerning bishops and deacons (e.g. v. 9), show that the distinction given to certain widows in the Church is an arrangement not nearly so old nor so well established as the episcopate (office of presbyter) and diaconate. (2) No traces are found here of that development of this arrangement, testified to by Ignatius, by virtue of which unmarried women were reckoned among the widows (n. 9).

It would necessarily be a cause of suspicion if the conception of the spiritual office that appears in these letters were different, not only from Paul's, but also from that of the N.T. generally. Such would be the case if a higher kind of morality were demanded of the "clergy" than of ordinary Christians, e.g. if they were forbidden to marry a second time. This ancient interpretation of Tit. i. 6, 1 Tim. iii. 2, 12 is proved to be false by the fact that the μᾶς γυναικὸς ἀνὴρ is simply one of the duties and virtues—the first mentioned—that become every Christian. A writer with any other idea must have regarded the remarriage of widowers as an exceedingly heinous sin. But that our author did so regard it is impossible to believe; since the re-marriage of widows, which has always been regarded as more objectionable than that of widowers, is not only declared allowable, in accordance with 1 Cor. vii. 39, but in the case of the younger widows it is even commended (1 Tim. v. 14); while in general the writer seems to look with favour upon the married life (1 Tim. ii. 15, iv. 3). The main question that Paul asks with reference to overseers and deacons seeking installation, and with reference to widows claiming special honour from the Church, is whether their married life has been, and is, pure, untainted by unlawful sexual intercourse (n. 10). Only when the rule is so interpreted is it possible to see the connection between it and the other requirements that follow and are directly connected with it, especially the requirement that before being installed as an officer in the Church a man must have proved himself efficient in managing his own household and in bringing up his own children (Tit. i. 6; 1 Tim. iii. 4 f., 12; cf. v. 7, 10, 14).

While these personal qualifications, without which no one may assume any office in the Church, are very carefully enumerated, positively and negatively, the functions of the different officers are nowhere named, it being constantly assumed that they are known. Hence it could have been no part of the author's purpose to broaden the scope of their offices, to increase their authority, or to introduce any change whatever in the relation between the Church and its officers. The difference in this respect between these letters and the Epistles of Ignatius, and even those of Clement and Polycarp, is very marked. Any member of the Church may offer prayer in the public gatherings (above, 40, n. 4). Teaching is not limited to an office. This is evident as well from the whole impression of the letters as from the teaching done by Titus and Timothy, who held no office in the local Church, but are engaged in teaching as representatives of Paul and sharers of his apostolic vocation, which included not only missionary effort among those who did not yet believe, but also the instruction and guidance of existing Churches. From the fact that women are forbidden to teach publicly in the congregation (1 Tim. ii. 12, above, p. 40 f.), while they are permitted, especially the older women, to teach other women by word and good example (Tit. ii. 3), it is to be inferred that every man had the right to engage in teaching. Only on this presupposition is it possible to understand what is said in 1 Tim. i. 3-7, vi. 3-5 about ἑτεροδιδασκαλοῦντες, and in 2 Tim. iii. 6-9, Tit. i. 10-14 about persons of a worse character. They are not blamed for teaching without having the proper authority to do so. Consequently they are not official teachers who have made improper use of their office and are to be deposed, but simply members of the Church who, believing themselves to possess unusual insight and special ability to teach, have put themselves forward as teachers in the Churches and homes in a perverse or even injurious manner, whose activity Timothy is to forbid and Titus strenuously to oppose. The same conditions are here presupposed that we observe in Jas. iii. 1 ; Rom. xii. 7 ; 1 Cor. xii.—xiv. ; Col. iii. 16. There is nothing said in 2 Tim. ii. 2 which would imply that teaching was an official function. It is true that among the elders officially appointed those who engage in the arduous work of speaking and teaching are especially mentioned, and with special warmth commended to the support of the Church (1 Tim. v. 17 f. ; cf. Gal. vi. 6 ; 1 Cor. ix. 6–14). Because of the large number of teachers who do harm, special care is also to be exercised in choosing persons who are to be at the head of the Church ; they are to hold the true Christian doctrine, and must be able with sound doctrine to exhort the members of the Church and to controvert those who oppose it (Tit. i. 9). In this sense ability to teach is mentioned as one of the necessary qualifications of the head of a Church (διδασκτικός, 1 Tim. iii. 2 ; cf. 2 Tim. ii. 24). But it is to be observed that in the latter passages nothing is said about public addresses before the congregations, and from the one first quoted it is clear that an elder (i.e. a bishop) could exercise his office satisfactorily without teaching at all. That frequently the head of the Church should be also a teacher is certainly no innovation of the post-apostolic age (vol. i. 465, with reference to Eph. iv. 11) ; it is rather the natural presupposition of the later development, when the heads of the Churches came to be also regularly its teachers (Clement, 2 Cor. xvii. 3–5 ; Just. Apol. i. 67).

In addition to this quiet work of the teacher, an important rôle was still played in the life of the Church by prophecy. In the passages where Paul makes predictions concerning the future of the Church, he depends not upon written prophecies, nor upon some special revelation made to himself, but upon the prophetic spirit present in the Church and expressed in the utterances of individual prophets (1 Tim. iv. 1 ; cf. 2 Tim. iii. 1 ; below, p. 110). Prophecy within the Church must have been the determinative influence in the selection of Timothy to assist the apostle in preaching and in his endowment with the necessary qualifications for the office (1 Tim. i. 18, iv. 14; above, p. 23, n. 5). In 1 Tim. iv. 14 this endowment is directly attributed to prophecy, the laying on of the hands of the presbytery being mentioned as a concurring circumstance, while in 2 Tim. i. 6 the laying on of the hands of the apostle himself is declared to be the means by which Timothy became possessed of the charisma, the use of which is the same as the exercise of his calling. The fact that in one instance the laying on of the apostle's hands is mentioned, in the other, of the hands of the presbytery, is due to the different point of view from which Timothy's work in the Church is conceived in the two letters. Where Timothy is thought of as overseer and director of the life of the Church in the province of Asia, he is reminded of the fact that the officers of the Church to which he originally belonged had a part in calling him to service in the Church. But where he is thought of as an evangelist, having part in the apostle's preaching vocation, emphasis is given to the laying on of the apostle's hands. Between endowment by prophecy and endowment by the laying on of hands there is no more contradiction than between the fact that in one instance Paul, in the other the presbytery, laid hands upon Timothy. The author did not find the two contradictory; why should we? We have the same representation in Acts xiii. 2-4 (cf. Clement, 1 Cor. xlii. 4, above, p. 41, n. 5). It would be extremely arbitrary to declare the passages in a book which attribute to the Holy Spirit the installation of officers in the Church, or the appointment and commissioning of missionaries (Acts xx. 28, xiii. 4; cf. Ignatius, Philad. address), to be in contradiction to other passages in the same book which speak of the choice of officials by the Church (Acts vi. 5), or of the installation of such by missionaries engaged in organising Churches (Acts xiv. 23). Neither can it be argued that in 1 Tim. iv. 14, v. 22, 2 Tim. i. 6 the ordination was regarded as a sort of sacrament with magic effect, because the laying on of hands is used as an abbreviated technical expression without mention of the petition and the consecrating prayer, which probably were always accompanied by the laying on of hands, symbolising the bestowment of the desired gifts, since in other passages the abbreviated expression (Acts viii. 17-19, ix. 17, xix. 6; cf. Mark vi. 5, viii. 23, 25; Luke xiii. 13; Heb. vi. 2) is found as well as the longer one (Acts vi. 6, xiii. 3; cf. xxviii. 8). From cases of this kind it can no more be inferred that magic powers were attributed to the laying on of hands, quite apart from prayer and faith, than it can be inferred from cases where only prayer is mentioned, without the laying on of hands (Acts i. 24; in cases of healing, Jas. v. 14; Acts ix. 40), that the latter was omitted.

Evidence of the late date of these Epistles and one of the main motives for their composition have been found in what is said in them about false teachers and false doctrines (n. 11). If one is to avoid making the spuriousness of the Epistles—which is the point to be proved—the presupposition of the argument, it is necessary at the outset to distinguish between what Paul says about certain phenomena existing at that time, and phenomena which he expects to appear in the future; also between persons who have forsaken the faith and have separated themselves from the Church, or who have been expelled, and others who are still within the Church, but either teach in a manner positively harmful or countenance such teaching. In the nature of the case there are various points of connection between these groups, in particular the prophecy of future degeneracy is suggested by existing phenomena; but this does not justify us in treating these distinctions as if they were merely negligible differences in the form of the presentation. The persons, the opposing of whose harmful activity is Timothy's chief business in Ephesus (1 Tim. i. 3, n. 12, and above, p. 39, n. 3), are members of the Church, subject to its confession and discipline; for Timothy is not directed to warn the Churches under his care against them, but is to command them to refrain from teaching. What Paul says in describing their work as teachers is manifestly designed not only to open Timothy's eyes and convince him of the peril to which the Church is exposed through them, but to furnish him with the truths by the presentation of which he is to influence them to leave off their harmful activity. These persons are not yet αἵρετικοί, i.e. they have not yet separated themselves from the worship and fellowship of the Church; persons of this character are to be left to their fate (Tit. iii. 10; cf. 1 Cor. xi. 19). Only in case of persistence in their work, in spite of the reprimand of Timothy or Titus, is it expected that they will continue outside the organised Church what they are forbidden to carry on within the same. This conclusion, namely, that until now these persons had remained in the Church, follows not only from the fact that Timothy is to command them to cease teaching, but also from the fact that individuals belonging to this party who had gone farther than the rest had been subjected to Church discipline by Paul (1 Tim. i. 20; cf., however, 1 Cor. v. 12). From Tit. i. 9 it appears, further, that the opposition to sound doctrine by these persons was made within the sphere of the same Church life as that affected by the teaching and exhortation of the teaching bishop. For Titus to have sharply controverted and stopped the mouths (Tit. i. 11, 13) of these persons would merely have exposed him to ridicule had they been non-Christians. Moreover, the purpose of this interference on Timothy's part, namely, that the persons in question might become sound in the faith, very clearly takes it for granted that they in some degree possess the faith and have confessed it publicly (cf. Tit.

i. 16). They are described as unbelievers (Tit. i. 15), if not, indeed, as worse than unbelievers (1 Tim. v. 8), because they do not hold the true doctrine taught by Jesus and His Church, and, following the unhealthy tendencies of their minds, set forth things both foolish and worthless (1 Tim. vi. 3 f.; cf. Col. ii. 19; above, pp. 31 f., 39, n. 3).

The function of teaching had not yet come to be associated with a churchly office (above, p. 97); still there were διδάσκαλοι, persons who made teaching in the Church their chief business (Eph. iv. 11; 1 Cor. xii. 28 f.; Rom. xii. 7; Acts xiii. 1; Didache xiii. 15; cf. 2 Tim. ii. 2, iv. 2). Besides the apostles, upon whom there devolved, in addition to preaching the gospel to unbelievers, the duty of teaching within the Church (1 Cor. ii. 6–iii. 3, iv. 17; Col. i. 28; 1 Tim. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 11; Acts ii. 42), and Paul's helpers, who had part in this work (above, pp. 31 f., 46), such teachers were to be found both among the officers of the Church and outside of this circle (above, p. 97). But if these ἐτεροδιδασκαλοῦντες had been elders or bishops there would certainly be some trace of it, either in the passages which discuss the ἐτεροδιδασκαλεῖν, or in those dealing with the officers of the Church. Consequently these are to be sought among the "laity." On the other hand, the teaching in question is not the deliverance of a single discourse (1 Cor. xiv. 26), but teaching work regularly practised, as is evidenced by the word ἐτεροδιδασκαλεῖν (n. 12). From 1 Tim. vi. 3–10 it is clear that these persons made a profession of teaching in the technical sense, for which they took compensation, realising considerable profit (n. 13). It is not simply their incidental purpose of profiting from their work, nor their overweening sense of superior knowledge of the Scriptures and of Christianity (1 Tim. vi. 4, 20, i. 7), that Paul condemns, but he twice describes their commercial method of teaching as ἐτεροδιδασκαλεῖν, which would imply, not that they set forth a false doctrine differing from Christian doctrine and the gospel of Paul, but that they worked like false teachers, played the rôle of false teachers,—in other words, used abnormal and wrong methods (n. 12). This error would not, of course, be serious if it were only some defect of delivery, without reference to what they taught. That, however, their presentation of the fundamental truths of Christianity was not regarded by Paul as false and deceptive, is evident. Such an error, above all, would not be left unmentioned. Paul himself would surely have indicated the character of its contents, and have directly condemned it; still more would this have been done by a pseudo-Paul, who in Paul's name was endeavouring to check the spread of these false doctrines. These teachers are charged, rather, with paying attention to matters that give rise to disputations and do not promote the exercise of his calling on the part of a steward of God (1 Tim. i. 4, above, p. 39, n. 3), whereas they should hold fast the sound words and teachings revealed by Jesus Himself, and the pious doctrine which has since existed in the Church (1 Tim. vi. 4). They are accused of an unwholesome disposition to engage in disputes and strife of words (vi. 4), disputes just as profitless and worthless (Tit. iii. 9) as are the subjects to which they are fond of paying attention. To be sure, they do discuss the law,—and only the Mosaic law can be meant,—claiming to be its correct interpreters, on the ground of their fundamental acquaintance with it (1 Tim. i. 7). For this reason the discussions which usually followed in the wake of their teaching are called strifes about the law (Tit. iii. 9). But they make no attempt to set forth the moral purpose of law (1 Tim. i. 5), or to unfold its typical and prophetic significance, which, according to 1 Tim. i. 8 (cf. 2 Tim. iii. 15 f.), they would be entirely right in doing; but they prefer rather to discuss unauthenticated fables and endless genealogies (1 Tim. i. 4; Tit. iii. 9), with Jewish (Tit. i. 14), profane, and old wives' fables (1 Tim. iv. 7). To attempt to identify these μῦθοι and γενεαλογίαι with the fantastic speculations of the second century, particularly with the gradations of æons of the Gentile-Christian gnosis, as has been done, is much less natural than to suppose that men like Irenæus and Tertullian in their contest with the Valentinians used phrases of Paul's in describing his system (n. 14). Even if it were not expressly stated in Tit. i. 10 that the chief persons to be opposed were teachers of Jewish origin, and in Tit. i. 14 that these persons occupied themselves with Ἰουδαῖκοι μῦθοι, and in Tit. iii. 9 that they occasioned νομικαὶ μάχαι, all this, which is formally expressed in these passages would be clear from their claim to be νομοδιδάσκαλοι (1 Tim. i. 7),—a designation elsewhere given to the rabbis (Luke v. 17; Acts v. 34; cf. Rom. ii. 17–23). Although some of these ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι may have been Gentiles by birth, who either had become Jewish proselytes before their conversion to Christianity, or had become acquainted with Judaism after they became members of the Church, there can be no doubt that the whole movement represented by the “false teachers” had its roots in Judaism, more specifically in rabbinic Judaism. Consequently the fables and genealogies which they were so fond of discussing can be no other than those discussed by Jewish scribes. These legendary traditions and endless genealogies were, in all probability, based upon the text of the Pentateuch, or, since νόμος, from which νομοδιδάσκαλος is derived, signifies the entire O.T. (1 Cor. xiv. 21; John x. 34), upon the text of the O.T. generally (n. 15). Even if the Pastoral Epistles are spurious, every word here used proves that they have nothing to do with the gradations of æons and syzygies of the gnostic systems. In contrast to the language of the ecclesiastical opponents of these teachings, who regarded them as blasphemous obscurations of the one true God, and shunned their authors as creators of idols (Iren. i. 15. 6), all that is here said against the genealogies is that they are endless (1 Tim. i. 4) and foolish, as are also the disputations about them (2 Tim. ii. 23), and the wranglings about the law with which these disputations are connected in Tit. iii. 9. The fables, of which, according to 1 Tim. i. 4, the genealogies seem to have been a part, are not only described as Jewish (Tit. i. 14), which of itself would be nothing against them, but are also called βέβηλοι καὶ γραώδεις (1 Tim. iv. 7). The latter is certainly an opprobrious term, but at the same time is proof positive that the errors here under discussion are not destructive in character; the former term, which is employed to describe all the teachings of the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι (1 Tim. vi. 20; 2 Tim. ii. 16), when used of things, is simply the opposite of ιέρως. While the orthodox teacher derives his truth from the ιερά γράμματα (2 Tim. iii. 15), which accordingly has to do only with things relating to the religious life and to salvation, and so is holy, these teachers handle profane subjects and set forth doctrines which, while they may have their starting-point in the Holy Scriptures, really lie quite outside the sacred sphere within which the orthodox teacher moves. Both teachers and doctrines are spoken of with a great deal of contempt. The knowledge of which they boast cannot properly be called such (1 Tim. vi. 20). In reality they know nothing of the things about which they speak, and do not understand the scope of their own claims (1 Tim. i. 7, vi. 4). The very questions which they and their hearers discuss prove their lack of common sense and want of real culture (2 Tim. ii. 23). Their teaching is described as vain words (1 Tim. i. 6, ματαιολογία; Tit. i. 10, ματαιολόγοι; cf. Tit. iii. 9, μάταιοι), words without meaning (1 Tim. vi. 20; 2 Tim. ii. 16, κεροφωνίαι), and both directly and by contrast as worthless (Tit. iii. 9, ἀνωφελεῖς; cf. ὠφέλιμος, Tit. iii. 8; 1 Tim. iv. 8; 2 Tim. iii. 16). It is called worthless because it contributes nothing to the intelligent fulfilment of the Christian teacher's office, giving rise only to fruitless investigations and strifes about words (1 Tim. i. 4, vi. 4; 2 Tim. ii. 14, 23). Moreover, Paul's helpers are exhorted not to permit themselves to become involved in these useless and profane teachings, investigations, and disputations (1 Tim. iv. 7, vi. 20; 2 Tim. ii. 16; Tit. iii. 9). The very language in which these warnings are expressed, and the suggestions of the warning not to make their teaching a means of profit (1 Tim. vi. 5-11; cf. 2 Tim. ii. 4) as do these teachers, together with the exhortations rather to be zealous in the presentation of the real truth (1 Tim. i. 18, iv. 6, vi. 2, 20; 2 Tim. ii. 1-15, iii. 14-iv. 5; Tit. ii. 1, iii. 1-8), prove that these warnings to Timothy and Titus are very seriously intended. In the mouth of a pseudo-Paul, whose purpose was in the name of the apostle to combat the known errorists of the second century, such language would be proof of the utmost stupidity, as it would be in the case of Paul himself, if he were dealing with teachers who denied any of the fundamentals of the faith of the Church.

The same conclusion follows if we look at these phenomena from a side other than that indicated by their designation as μῦθοι and γενεαλογίαι. It stands to reason that persons who called themselves teachers of the law handled the legal contents of the Torah, and from 1 Tim. i. 8-11 it is clear that, contrary to the spirit of the gospel, they considered certain requirements of the Mosaic law binding upon Christians. But if, after the manner of the Galatian Judaisers, they had made the observance of the Mosaic law, or even only of essential parts of it, a condition of salvation, thereby denying the gospel of Paul, neither Paul nor a pseudo-Paul could have passed it by, nor have spoken in the above manner of their absurd and profitless teaching. Nothing is said of circumcision, the Sabbath, or similar legal requirements. But from Tit. i. 14-16 we learn that they developed out of the law and on the basis of it all sorts of regulations concerning things "clean and unclean," and from the description in this passage of these regulations as commandments of men (cf. Col. ii. 22; vol. i. 465), we infer that they prescribed ascetic rules with reference to foods and the whole manner of living which went beyond the obligations of the Mosaic law. This conclusion is confirmed by the manner in which this warning against profane and old wives' fables is coupled with the exhortation to prepare for a life of piety upon earth and for the glory of the life to come, not by bodily asceticism, but by a discipline of the inner self (1 Tim. iv. 7-10); since Timothy is repeatedly warned himself not to follow the false tendencies of these persons, possibly we are to infer from 1 Tim. v. 23 (cf. Rom. xiv. 21) that they forbade the use of wine. While from what has been said these teachers seem not to have been of any great importance, at the same time Paul does not conceal either from himself or from his disciples the harm which they are doing in the Church, and the danger in which they themselves are involved. Being quarrelsome and dogmatic, it is difficult to correct them; they are insubordinate and disobedient (Tit. i. 10, 16); puffed up by their imaginary knowledge, they resist the representatives of genuine Christianity (Tit. i. 9; 2 Tim. ii. 25). In Crete, particularly, Paul seems to have had unfortunate experiences with these persons (above, p. 45). And indeed Timothy also is instructed not to enter into discussion with them, but simply to command them to desist from their work (1 Tim. i. 3, cf. iv. 11). However, in one passage, where evidently the same or similar persons are referred to (2 Tim. ii. 14-16, 24), Timothy is exhorted not to act unkindly in dealing with them, always bearing in mind the possibility of their conversion to true knowledge (2 Tim. ii. 25 f.). Titus, on the other hand, is emphatically told to silence them, and to reprimand them sharply and authoritatively

(i. 11, 13, cf. ii. 15), and then if they withdraw from the Church, to whose discipline they will not submit, after exhorting them once again, or at most twice, he is to leave them to their fate (iii. 10). Consequently the whole tendency of the movement must have been away from the Church. In proportion as they were prevented from teaching publicly in the assemblies of the Church, they must have made an effort to introduce their ideas into homes; though it is to be observed that this feature of their work is mentioned in Tit. i. 11 and not in 1 Tim. Concerning 2 Tim. iii. 6, see below, p. 114 f.

Not only were these persons injurious to the Churches, but they themselves were in great danger. Paul considers their condition diseased (1 Tim. vi. 4; Tit. i. 13), as proved chiefly by his regular designation of the true doctrine, which they do not hold, and which on that account is to be preached with all the greater zeal as sound (n. 16). Their spiritual life therefore is in peril, and, unless they are converted, they must remain the prey of Satan (2 Tim. ii. 25 f.). The harmful effects of their departure from the real truth and their capricious meddling with questions entirely secondary, morally unfruitful, and without religious value, are already apparent in their moral life. While prescribing all sorts of ascetic rules for themselves and others, they are the victims of covetousness, and really deny the God whom they profess to know (1 Tim. vi. 3-10; Tit. i. 13-16). Here again it is apparent that they did not teach an immoral doctrine of God, as did the "Gnostics" according to the unanimous testimony of the Church of the time, but accepted, formally at least, the God of the common Christian faith.

The question now arises as to the relation between these ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι and those who are described as having fallen from the faith and as being outside the Church. According to 1 Tim. vi. 21, some of those who belonged apparently to the party or the movement represented by the ἐτεροδιδάσ-

καλοι had missed the mark with regard to the faith, and so had gone astray, from which it is to be inferred incidentally that this was by no means true of them all. From the context of 1 Tim. vi. 3-10 it appears that those who had erred from the faith in consequence of their love of money belonged to the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι. A certain connection seems to exist also between the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι described in 1 Tim. i. 3-7 and the two men mentioned in i. 20; for while the former have disregarded the great underlying principle of every commandment, namely, love, which presupposes a pure heart, a good conscience, and an unfeigned faith (cf. also Tit. i. 15), the class of whom Alexander and Hymenæus are mentioned as terrible examples have completely abandoned or "thrown overboard" (Hofmann) a good conscience, in consequence of which their faith has suffered shipwreck. They had reached the point where they reviled that which was holy to the Christians, and Alexander at least, if he be the same as the Alexander spoken of in 2 Tim. iv. 14 (above, p. 21, n. 3), had gone so far as openly to oppose the apostolic preaching. If Paul had given them over to Satan for correction, he had not done so without communicating with the Church to which they belonged, and so not without their excommunication from the same. The blasphemous doctrines which they confessed may have been as various as the conduct by which they showed that they had renounced obedience to their own conscience. That the two cases were not entirely alike is evident from 2 Tim. ii. 17, where Hymenæus' name is not coupled with that of Alexander, but with that of a certain Philetus, it being declared that the two had proclaimed the doctrine that the resurrection was past already, and had secured some following. Here again things are said in the preceding context which seem to connect these persons with the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι (ii. 14-16a); although both the language and the contents of the passage render impossible the assumption (cf. Hofmann, vi. 257) that Hymenæus and Philetus are mentioned as examples of this group, so that everything is true of the latter which is said of the former. This identification is impossible, because in all the passages which have been considered (1 Tim. i. 3-20, vi. 10, 21), those who had openly fallen from the faith are distinguished from the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι, and the latter are never accused of godlessness, blasphemy, and destructive errors. Besides, if this were the case, it would not be enough for the apostle to say that Timothy, in view of the anticipated progress of this godless teaching, is to proclaim the word of truth fearlessly and urgently, and not to occupy his attention with strifes about words and the unspiritual scholasticism of these teachers—poor weapons, indeed, against such serious errors! From the analogy of the other passages, we conclude that the relation between the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι and those who had openly fallen from the faith of the Church, some of whom, like Alexander, Hymenæus, and Philetus, had already been excommunicated, was genetic. Not a few of these apostates must have come from the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι, and served to illustrate the harmful character of this method of teaching, which overlooked and diverted attention from the fundamentals of Christianity. It does not necessarily follow that Alexander, Hymenæus, and Philetus were Jews by birth, for this was not uniformly the case with the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι (above, pp. 44, 103). Connection with Judaism is, however, proved from extra-Biblical traditions. According to these traditions, the doctrine in question, which, of course, never consisted solely of the bald contention that the resurrection is already past, existed in a twofold form. According to the one form of the doctrine, a man experienced a resurrection in his children. According to the other, the resurrection in which the Church believed meant the rise of the new man from the old in conversion and baptism (n. 17). As the authors and earliest representatives of the latter view, which seems to have been suggested by conceptions of Paul's (Eph. ii. 5 f., iv. 23; Col. ii. 12 f., iii. 1, 10), are mentioned the Antiochian proselyte Nicolaüs (Acts vi. 5), who seems eventually to have gained a following in the Churches of Asia Minor (Rev. ii. 6, 15), and the Samaritan Menander, a follower of Simon Magus, who was half-Jewish, had been circumcised, and lived in Antioch (Just. Apol. i. 26). The former view, which was suggested by Jewish expressions, such as "to awaken seed or children," according to an early legend was disseminated by disloyal followers of Paul in the apostle's lifetime. The cruder forms of the doctrine are probably the earliest, and nothing is more natural than to suppose that it was taught first by teachers of pure Jewish blood, and that the doctrine was given its more refined and spiritual form by half-Jews like Nicolaüs and Menander, whence it passed in this form into the various systems of the Gentile Christian gnosis.

That Paul expected these abnormal phenomena which existed in the Church of his time to affect the future, is evidenced not only by the way in which he expresses his expectation that the doctrine of Hymenæus and Philetus will spread like a gangrene, attacking other members of the Church, and that those who hold it will become more and more godless (2 Tim. ii. 16-18, cf. iii. 13), but also by the manner in which, on the basis of prophecy, he predicts new facts, which, while they may and do have their prelude in the present, really belong to a future, indeed, to the final age. The τὸ δὲ πνεῦμα ῥητὴς λέγει ὅτι κτλ. in 1 Tim. iv. 1 is not quoted as scripture (Heb. iii. 7), neither is the tense used historical (Acts i. 16), from which it may be concluded, first of all, that Paul is referring to prophetic utterances which at the time this letter was written were still current in the Churches (cf. Acts xx. 23, xxi. 4, 12, xiii. 2, xvi. 6). We know how highly Paul prized such prophecies, and what definite expectations he based upon them (1 Thess. v. 19 f. ; 2 Thess. ii. 2 ; vol. i. 226 f.). He uses the indirect form of discourse, evidently because he wants to state in a few words what the prophets had said in numerous discourses. Still the ῥητὼς indicates that he intends to reproduce the special prophecy which he has in mind, just as explicitly and definitely as is possible in the case of predictions made at various times often only suggested, and, so far as we know, never written down. In this connection it is, of course, to be remembered that the fruitful source of all Christian prophecy was the prophetic testimony of Jesus Himself (Rev. xix. 10), and there is much here that reminds one of many recorded sayings of Jesus (Matt. vii. 15–23, xxiv. 4 f., 11 f., 24 ; GK, ii. 545 ff.). But what the Spirit said to the Churches at that time goes far beyond these sayings. At a later time, which does not necessarily mean the final age, but simply the future as distinguished from the present (cf. Acts xx. 29), many shall depart from the faith, because they give heed to seductive spirits and the teachings of dæmons, who in hypocritical guise speak lies. Even though the correct meaning of the separate words and their proper connection be subject to doubt and debate, it is at least clear that not only the apostasy of numerous members of the Church, but also the appearance of the false teachers through whom this is to be brought about, is referred to the future ; for if the reference were to definite phenomena, which were known either because the prophecies in question had been heard before, or because the readers of the letter had learned of the facts through their own experience, or by having been previously informed of them, the articles could not possibly be omitted in describing these phenomena. Consequently it can be neither the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι nor the false teachers and blasphemers of 1 Tim. i. 20, 2 Tim. ii. 17 f. that are here referred to. Furthermore, the terms used to describe these teachers who are to appear in the future are not intended simply to express horror at the sinister and seductive power of these men (cf. 2 Cor. xi. 14; 2 Thess. ii. 11; 1 John iv. 1-3, 6; 2 John 7), but are chosen in view of the character of their teaching (cf. Ign. Smymn. ii.). By forbidding believers to marry on the ground that it is impure, and by forbidding the use of certain foods on the ground that they are evil and not intended by God for use by pious men or by others, they act as if they were bodiless spirits endeavouring to realise in themselves and those whom they seek to win a type of spirituality contrary to nature. Although they may declare it necessary for Christians to be like angels (Luke xx. 36; Col. ii. 18; vol. i. 466, 469), the prophetic spirit pronounces them deceptive spirits and lying dæmons. If it be regarded as certain that these teachers and the doctrines attributed to them belong to the future, it follows that it must have been conditions in the Churches under Timothy's care which influenced Paul or a pseudo-Paul to recall this prophecy, and to urge Timothy to preach truths that would counteract these false doctrines which were to appear in the future (1 Tim. iv. 4-6). From the fact that in the very next verse we have statements which apply to the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι (iv. 7 f.), it is clear beyond question that it was the ascetic rules of these teachers, derived from the Mosaic law (above, p. 105), that occasioned the exhortation. The ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι did not forbid marriage nor declare that certain forms of food in customary use were of themselves objectionable and not fit to be used by Christians; this was to be done in the future by the deceiving spirits; but these commandments of men with reference to the disciplining of the body (Tit. i. 14 f.; 1 Tim. iv. 8) prepared the way for false doctrines which deny the fundamental laws of life established at the creation.

In 2 Tim. iv. 3, without appeal to a definite prophecy, Paul speaks of a future time when men generally, including thus at least numerous Christians, will not bear sound doctrine, i.e. will find it too strict or too monotonous, and in their wanton desire for what is new and interesting will provide for themselves teachers after their own liking, finally closing their ears entirely to the truth and giving heed to fables. In view of this prospect, Timothy is to devote himself the more earnestly to preaching before the evil time comes (2 Tim. iv. 2-5); he is to see to it that there are others besides himself and after him who shall propagate sound doctrine (2 Tim. ii. 2). While it is not here stated in so many words that the beginnings of this very unsound development of ecclesiastical taste, so to speak, existed already in the present, it must have been the case; for otherwise the ἑτεροδιδάσκαλοι in Ephesus and Crete would not have met with approval. In 2 Tim. iv. 4 the word translated fables has the article prefixed, so that it designates the whole class of unauthenticated fables, including thus the rabbinic tales of which the ἑτεροδιδάσκαλοι made so much (1 Tim. i. 4; Tit. i. 14, iii. 9); while the recurrence here of the word "sound doctrine" proves that Paul had in mind their unsound methods and the morbid taste of numerous members of the Church who gave heed to them. Nevertheless Paul's words are still prophetic, because he speaks of a future time when this perverted taste, now to be observed in isolated cases, shall become general in the Church, resulting in the increased number and more perverse character of these teachers.

There is a third passage (2 Tim. iii. 1-5) written in the prophetic spirit relating less directly to harmful teachers and doctrines. In the last days, reads the passage, shall come evil times. The future tense makes it impossible to assume that the reference is to the present Christian era, treated as the final age (IIeb. i. 1; 1 Pet. i. 20; Jas. v. 3; 1 Cor. x. 11; Acts ii. 17). It can mean only the future which still lies before the persons for whom the letter was intended—the time approaching, the end of the age (2 Pet. iii. 3). The thing that will make these times so evil and so hard for Christians to bear will be a widespread moral degeneracy. The prediction is made with reference to men in general. But from the statement at the end of the passage that in these times men will love pleasure more than God, and that while retaining outwardly a form of godliness they will deny its power, it is clear that the persons referred to are members of the Church, showing that it is a general moral decline of Christianity that is here predicted, or rather that a prophecy to this effect is recalled to Timothy's mind (cf. Matt. xxiv. 12, 38, 48 f., xxv. 5; Luke xviii. 8; 2 Thess. ii. 3; vol. i. 240). Clearly this would not happen did there not exist in the present foreshadowings and examples of such sham Christianity, which it is necessary for Timothy as a teacher rightly to judge and handle. Similarly, the sudden transition from the description of evil times to come and of the general character of the generation then living to the exhortation, "From these persons turn away," has its justification in the fact that he goes on to speak of persons now living who belong to the class of sham Christians just described (2 Tim. iii. 6–9). But these living sham Christians are described as teachers whose conduct bears a certain resemblance to that of the true teacher, just as the Egyptian sorcerers did to Moses, but who in reality, like those sorcerers, are opposed to the truth represented by the servant of God.

Inasmuch as 2 Tim., unlike 1 Tim. and Titus, was not written with a definite group of Churches in view among which Paul's helper was to work, neither iii. 6–9 nor iv. 3 (cf. ii. 14–16*a*, 23) can be interpreted as referring exclusively to the ἐπεροδιδύσκαλοι in Ephesus and Crete. That, however, Paul had these and persons of a similar character in view there is no reason to doubt. Like the ἐπεροδιδύσκαλοι (Tit. i. 11), the persons described in 2 Tim.

teach from house to house, and neglect the moral aspects of Christian truth (1 Tim. i. 5), persuading sinful women to become their disciples instead of exhorting them to repentance, and gratifying their idle curiosity by telling them all sorts of fables and Biblical curiosities. These persons in Tit. i. 10 are condemned in practically the same terms as in 2 Tim. iii. 5; τετυφωμένοι, 2 Tim. iii. 4, is to be found also in 1 Tim. vi. 4; the expression ἄνθρωποι κατεφθαρμένοι τὸν νοῦν, 2 Tim. iii. 8, is almost exactly the same as that which is found in 1 Tim. vi. 5. The fact that Paul himself enters the realm of Jewish mythology in quoting the names of Jannes and Jambres only serves to strengthen the impression that he has principally in mind false teachers who were for the most part Jewish. This impression is not at all weakened by the fact that he assures Timothy for his encouragement that these sham Christian teachers will not be able to accomplish more, since their folly will soon become manifest to all Christians (iii. 9); for the contrary remark in 2 Tim. ii. 16 applies not to the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι, but to the false doctrine of Hymenæus; and wherever the former are mentioned they are spoken of slightly, and described as foolish persons who, without much ceremony, are to be forbidden to carry on their work. Although individuals of evil character, both Christians and teachers, will wax worse and worse (2 Tim. iii. 13), the sham Christian teachers described in 2 Tim. iii. 6-9, who in their essential characteristics represent the same class as the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι in Ephesus and Crete, have no future, no matter how much harm they may do in the present. On the other hand, the false doctrine mentioned in 2 Tim. ii. 17 f. was to have a future, while the false doctrine predicted by the prophetic spirit in 1 Tim. iv. 1-3 belonged wholly to the future. All this is in agreement with history only if these Epistles were written in the apostolic age. Nothing resembling the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι is to be found in the post-apostolic age.

Cerinthus is out of the question, for his Judaism is only a learned myth (vol. i. 515, n. 4). The Naassenes, who, to be sure, according to Hippolytus' description, adopted Jewish elements in their syncretistic system (n. 11), were anything but Jewish teachers of the law. From the letters of Ignatius we learn that in the year 110 wandering teachers of Jewish origin, with reference to whom Ignatius uses several phrases to be found in the Pastoral Epistles, were seeking entrance into the Churches of Asia Minor (vol. i. 497, and below, n. 14). These, however, were real false teachers; they taught that the essentials of the Mosaic law were binding upon all Christians, as for example the law concerning the Sabbath. They denied the reality of Christ's humanity, especially the reality of His death and resurrection, and of the resurrection of Christians from the dead, none of which were tenets of the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι (cf. Zahn, Ignatius, pp. 356-399). Neither does the picture of the Judaisers opposed in the Epistle of Barnabas, nor the Ebionism that appears in the pseudo-Clementine literature, show features resembling the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι of the Pastoral Epistles. On the other hand, as has been pointed out, the manner in which they make a business of teaching allies these teachers with the Petrine party in Corinth (vol. i. 288 f.), while their neglect of the essentials of Christianity and their emphasis upon ascetic rules based upon the Mosaic law connect them with the Jewish Christian teachers in Colossæ (vol. i. 462). But in the Pastoral Epistles we have no appeal on the part of the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι to the authority of another apostle or of the mother Church; nor is anything said about philosophy and philosophical speculations concerning nature, while the Epistles to the Corinthians and the Colossians are silent about rabbinic myths, investigations and disputations about genealogies, and specific legal requirements of the O.T. Furthermore, if the earlier Epistles of Paul really reflect conditions in the Church at the time when they were written, the rise and spread in various directions, such as Ephesus and Crete—and, judging from the hints of 2 Tim., even more widely—of a form of a pious sounding doctrine assuming to be Christian, but really representing the worst sort of rabbinism—of sufficient importance to be opposed as seriously and energetically as it is in these Epistles—is a new phenomenon, to which Paul bears witness only in his last letters. For a pseudo-Paul in the post-apostolic age—when Christians of Jewish birth had become more and more exceptions in the Gentile Christian Church—to have invented a description of and then vigorously to have opposed the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι, who did not exist in his own age and who were without parallel in the earlier Epistles of Paul, would have been to expose himself to ridicule without apparent purpose or meaning. As has been shown above (p. 107 f., and n. 17), the real heresy, which, according to 2 Tim. ii. 18, existed at the time, is represented by ancient accounts, the trustworthiness of which at this point cannot be questioned, as having existed in a twofold form even in the apostolic age. So far as we are able to trace its development, it originated in Jewish and semi-Jewish circles in Palestine (n. 17). The fact that this is not directly stated proves that what we have here is not the attempt of some later writer artificially to put himself and his readers back in the apostolic age; while the fact that it is assumed in 2 Tim. ii. 17 that this development will take place, and the fact that we are able to form an idea of its character only from the context, prove that the author did not live at a time when Gentile Christian Gnostics of different schools were actually proclaiming this or a similar doctrine. The fact that this prophecy was fulfilled, and that this doctrine did develop and spread, is no proof that it was not Paul who gave utterance to the same. The same is true with reference to the prophecy concerning a future false teaching in 1 Tim. iv. 1–3 and the related passages, 2 Tim. iii. 1-5, iv. 3 f., unless it be assumed as self-evident that Christian prophecy which began with Jesus and was developed in His Church never developed anything but phantasies. Marcion forbade the members of his Church to marry, and degraded the God of creation and His work. Ideas of this kind were developed further by Encratism and Manichæism. That, however, a pseudo-Paul, who had lived through the experience of Marcion's activity, writing in the name of Paul and of the prophets of the early Christian Church, would have used only the language of 1 Tim. iv. 1-3 in opposing him, it is impossible to believe. Neither can we suppose that he would have found in certain doctrines of Jewish Christian teachers of the law (above, pp. 102 f., 105 f.) the antetype of Marcion's anti-Jewish teaching, nor is it any more likely that in another passage he would have finally betrayed himself by the use of Marcion's antitheses (n. 18).

A comparison of the statements in these Epistles about various kinds of false doctrine, and of those portions of the same that deal with the organisation and officers of the Church with conditions actually existing in the Church, especially the Church of Asia Minor, at the beginning and during the course of the second century, proves just as clearly as does the external evidence that they must have been written at latest before the year 100. But they could not have been written during the first two decades after Paul's death, because of the character of the references to persons, facts, and conditions in Paul's lifetime and his own personal history, and because of the impossibility on this assumption of discovering a plausible motive for their forgery (above, p. 88 ff.). Consequently the claim that they are post-Pauline, and contain matter which is un-Pauline, is to be treated with the greatest suspicion. Passing by altogether or with the briefest mention what is manifestly foolish (n. 19), we must admit that it is really a cause for suspicion if in 1 Tim. v. 18 we have cited as Scripture a gospel-saying to be found in exactly the same form in Luke x. 7, and with slight differences in Matt. x. 10, inasmuch as elsewhere Paul quotes the sayings of Jesus only from the oral tradition, and in 1 Cor. ix. 14 reproduces this same command of Jesus, but in a free rendering. Especially is this suspicion justified in view of the fact that considerable time elapsed after the death of Paul before the Gospels came to be quoted as Scripture. But, assuming that a pseudo-Paul wanted to support the Mosaic regulation, which required a somewhat bold interpretation in order to render it applicable to the teachers (1 Cor. ix. 9), by adding a saying of Jesus' which referred directly to Christian teachers and had greater authority, it would have been quite out of keeping with the custom of the second century for him to have quoted it without saying that it was a word of the Lord, and so smuggling it in, as it were, obscurely as a word of Scripture. It is very much more likely that the ἡ γραφή λέγει refers only to the passage from the law, and that the other is a proverb of which Jesus Himself made use. There are other sentences of Paul's which seem to be proverbs, although we have no means of proving that they are such (1 Cor. v. 6; Gal. v. 9; 2 Thess. iii. 10). In 1 Cor. xv. 32 f. only the scholar would recognise the verse from an Attic comedian which follows a quotation from Isa. (xxii. 13), with only two words intervening (vol. i. 71, n. 19). Without question we do find in these letters, and only in these letters, the unmistakable traces of a fixed baptismal formula (n. 20); but this is a cause for suspicion only if we know certainly that such a formula did not originate until after Paul's death. But this is precisely what we do not know. It is also to be admitted that Paul does speak in these Epistles more frequently and more definitely than in the earlier letters, of orthodox teaching which was to be handed down from teacher to disciple, of a confession to be made publicly before the Church, of a form of words which the disciple when he teaches is to use as a summary of Christian truth, and of the truth embraced in this doctrine as the norm of speech and conduct for all (2 Tim. i. 13, ii. 2, 8, 14, iii. 10, 14; 1 Tim. i. 10, iv. 6, vi. 1, 3; Tit. i. 9, ii. 1, 10). That this point of view was not altogether foreign to Paul is evident from Rom. vi. 17, xvi. 17; 1 Cor. iv. 17, xv. 1-3; Col. ii. 6 f.; Eph. iv. 20 f. That in the course of time this way of looking at things should be confirmed, and that it should come more and more to view in face of the growing tendency about him to teach perversely for gain and even to teach false doctrines, is perfectly conceivable, as is also his anxiety, in view of his approaching death, that there shall be faithful and able witnesses of the truth proclaimed by him among the Gentiles. Similarly can we understand the manner in which, in view of the perils that exist and still threaten, he comforts himself by recalling that immovableness which through her divine origin belongs to the Church as the pillar of the truth (1 Tim. iii. 15; 2 Tim. ii. 19). That the idea of the unity of the Church was not foreign to Paul nor a late development of his thought, has been shown in the discussion of Ephesians (vol. i. 503 f.). The fact that the form of Christianity and the teaching here dealt with are unhealthy, explains why orthodox teaching is so often spoken of in these Epistles as sound (above, p. 107, and n. 16). In proportion as the ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι subordinated the moral aspects of Christianity to their rabbinic fancies and ascetic hobbies, it was natural that this side of Christianity should come strongly to view, and that its opposition to all immorality should be emphasised (1 Tim. i. 10, vi. 1; Tit. ii. 1-4), and that the whole doctrine of the Church based upon the gospel and faith in the same (cf. 1 Tim. i. 11-16; Tit. iii. 3-7) should be described as a single commandment (ἡ ἐντολή, 1 Tim. vi. 14; ἡ παραγγελία, 1 Tim. v. 18, cf. iv. 11). To call this un-Pauline is to forget that Paul speaks of a law of Christ and of God which Christians are to fulfil (Gal. vi. 2; 1 Cor. ix. 21; cf. Rom. viii. 4), and also calls the gospel itself, which excludes all boasting, a law of faith (Rom. iii. 27, 31), and speaks of faith and of its manifestation in the life as obedience (Rom. i. 5, vi. 16, xvi. 26). Nowhere in these Epistles do we find sentences that sound so "un-Pauline" as 1 Cor. vii. 19, and which can be so readily mistaken as a fusion of genuine Pauline teaching with its opposite, as Gal. v. 6. Here full emphasis is laid upon the doctrine of redemption and of justification not by works but by grace (Tit. ii. 11-14, iii. 4-7; 1 Tim. i. 12-16, ii. 4-7; 2 Tim. i. 9), while in addition we have the bold statement (1 Tim. i. 9) that for the just man, and consequently for the sinner who has been made righteous by the mercy of the Saviour (1 Tim. i. 13-16), there is no law.

With regard to that last refuge of so-called criticism, namely, the linguistic character of the letters, it is to be remarked at the outset that a pseudo-Paul, by repeating and imitating Pauline expressions, would be sure to make mistakes and so betray himself. The opposite is what we really find. Even the greetings, which would be most apt to be handled in this way, are thoroughly original, showing dependence neither upon earlier letters nor upon the common model (n. 21). Here also is to be observed the peculiarity of Paul's style, by which he repeats within short range a characteristic word once used or a related word (vol. i. 516, n. 7), without prejudice to the fact that for one not a Greek he has command of an unusually large number of words and expressions (n. 21), which would tend rather to increase with time than to diminish. It is also to be observed that 1 Tim. and Titus were written within a short time of each other and for like reasons, and that 2 Tim. also is considerably closer to these letters both in time and purpose than it is to any of the Epistles that we have investigated. Consequently the fact that these three letters have certain expressions in common which either are not found in the earlier Pauline Epistles at all, or occur only rarely, is no proof that they are spurious, but only goes to confirm the conclusion arrived at from the investigation of their contents, that they all belong to the same period in Paul's life, and that the last. If it be admitted that the linguistic phenomena of the letters controvert altogether the efforts of numerous "apologists" to find a place for 1 Tim. and Titus in the earlier period of Paul's life, then the "critics" in their turn ought not to deny that 2 Tim. is different from the other two not only in content, but also linguistically. Such difference is very difficult to understand if all three are the work of a forger, but very easy to explain if they were written by Paul under the conditions which the letters themselves disclose.

1. (P. 85.) SCHLEIERMACHER was the first to deny positively the genuineness of 1 Tim. (Über den sogen. ersten Brief des Paulos an den Timotheos. Kritisches Sendschr. an Gass, 1807; Werke zur Theol. ii. 221-320), at the same time admitting the genuineness of 2 Tim. and of Tit. BAUR (Die sogenannten Pastoralbr. des Ap. Pl. 1835) pronounced them all spurious. With many, who in other respects have not followed the critical paths which Baur struck out, this opinion has gained the weight of a dogma. A summary of the works in which this view is taken is given by HOLTZMANN (Die Pastoralbriefe, krit. u. exeg. behandelt, 1880). At the outset the "critics" (e.g. v. Soden, *HK*², iii. 1. 196) always make the assertion that "there is no place in Paul's life for the situations presupposed" in these letters, the worth of which assertion can be judged in the light of p. 54 ff. Not a few have made the attempt to find a genuine kernel in the letters, while at the same time rejecting the whole mass of enveloping material; in recent times, LEMME (Das echte Ermahnungsschreiben des Paulus an Tim. 1882) and HESSE (Entstehung der ntl. Hirtenbriefe, 1889). The former made the attempt with 2 Tim., the latter with all three letters, the conclusion of the investigation being that a genuine letter to Titus lies at the basis of our Tit., and that at least the fragment of a genuine letter to Timothy is retained at the close of 2 Tim. In like fashion KRENKEL (Beiträge [1890], 395-468) thinks that he is able to distinguish parts of three genuine letters, namely (1) a letter dating from the time of Acts xx. 1f., probably addressed to Titus while he was staying in Crete (= Tit. iii. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 20; Tit. iii. 13); (2) one dating from the imprisonment in Caesarea, probably to Timothy (= 2 Tim. iv. 9-18); and (3) one written during the imprisonment in Rome to an assistant staying in Ephesus (= 2 Tim. iv. 19, i. 16, 17, 18b, iv. 21). Hypotheses of this kind, in which as a rule only their inventors believe, could establish a claim to serious consideration only if developed with an unusual degree of ingenuity and care. But this we fail to find when, e.g. we read that according to 2 Tim. ii. 14-iv. 5, Timothy, instead of hastening to Rome, as he is commanded to do in the genuine part (iv. 9, 21), is to labour officially in a circle of Churches as a resident successor of the apostles there (Lemme, 37); or that Paul maintained a thoroughly negative attitude toward the religion of the O.T. (including that of Abraham, David, and Elijah?), accepting only its scriptures (55); or when Krenkel, 421, seeks to support the essential historicity of the facts presupposed in Tit. by the assumption that Titus at the time of Acts xx. 1-3 went to Crete, possibly from Athens, while Paul turned aside to Corinth (cf. per contra, Tit. i. 5, ἀπέλπιόν σε ἐν Κρήτῃ); or when the same critic (422) discovers in Acts xxvii. 7 f. that Paul landed in Crete, but met no Christians there; or when, further on (444), he explains the difference between 2 Tim. iv. 18 and Philem. 22—a sentence which, he alleges, was written shortly before—as due to a change of mood for which there was no real motive.

2. (Pp. 85, 86.) The Epistle to the Laodiceans (GK, ii. 584) and the Third Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians contain the name of no person belonging to the time when they purport to have been written except that of Paul; the Epistle of Peter to James (Clementina, ed. Lagarde, p. 3) none except those of Peter and James. It is only in the apocryphal Epistle of the Corinthians to Paul (ed. Vetter, p. 52) that certain other names are to be found, namely, Stephanas, from 1 Cor. i. 16, xvi. 15-17, as bishop of Corinth, and among the members of the presbytery associated with him, in addition to two unknown persons, a Theophilus (Luke i. 3; Acts i. 1) and a Eubulus (2 Tim. iv. 21). Further, in association with the Simon of Acts viii., a Cleobios, an unfaithful disciple of the apostles, repeatedly mentioned in the literature of the second century, sometimes in connection with Simon, sometimes not (GK, ii. 596, n. 3); finally a Theonas, perhaps the Theodas who was known in the second century as a disciple of Paul (Vetter, p. 53, A. 1; Forsch. iii. 125). Only in the last of the four forged letters mentioned are to be found hints of definite historical situations (vv. 2, 8); yet even here we have not independent fiction, but a component part of a larger narrative fiction, the old Acts of Paul. Moreover, this letter is composed on the basis of 1 Cor. vii. 1 quite as mechanically as Paul's reply based on 1 Cor. v. 9, and the Epistle to the Laodiceans based on Col. iv. 16. Suffice it merely to mention later and more wretched inventions, such as a letter of John preserved by Prochorus (Acta Jo. p. 63; cf. GK, i. 217, A. 2), and the correspondence between Seneca and Paul, which are even poorer in quality.

3. (P. 85.) Ranke (Weltgesch. iii. 1. 191): "The widespread doubt as to the genuineness of the Epistles to Timothy is due to the fact that we possess no reliable information whatever concerning that epoch. Various circumstances are mentioned which we are unable to place in relation to others about which we possess knowledge. But they are details of a minor character, and who would be likely to have invented them?"

4. (P. 91.) Phil. i. 1 of the single Church, σὺν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις. Just so Clem. 1 Cor. xlii. 4; Herm. Sim. ix. 26. 2, 27. 2; cf. Vis. iii. 5. 1; Didache, chap. xv., cf. Forsch. iii. 302-310. The single προεστώς over against the plurality of δάκονοι in Just. Apol. i. 65, 67, can prove nothing to the contrary; for the διάκονος is here viewed as the leader of the worship, and such leading can hardly be performed by more than one at a time.

5. (P. 91.) Just as the πρεσβύτεροι τοῦ λαοῦ in Jerusalem (Matt. xxi. 23; Acts iv. 8) form the πρεσβυτέριον (Acts xxii. 5) or γερονσία (Acts v. 21), i.e. the great Sanhedrin, in the same way the πρεσβύτεροι τῆς ἐκκλησίας (Acts xx. 17; Jas. v. 14) everywhere make up a πρεσβυτέριον (Ign. Eph. ii. 2, iv. 1; in all twelve times). The name πρεσβύτερος among Jews and early Christians was not, any more than "senator" among the Romans, an official title, or more precisely, the designation of an official, but denoted membership in the senate which had the rule over the congregation. But for that very reason the πρεσβύτερος was assured of a share in the government of the congregation (κυβέρνησις, 1 Cor. xii. 28; ποιμένες, Eph. iv. 11; ποιμαίνειν, 1 Pet. v. 2 f.; Acts xx. 28; 1 Cor. ix. 7; προϊστάσθαι, 1 Thess. v. 12; Rom. xii. 8; 1 Tim. v. 17; Herm. Vís. ii. 4. 3; ἡγείσθαι, Acts xv. 22; Heb. xiii. 7, 17, 24; Clem. 1 Cor. i. 3, perhaps also lxiii. 1; προηγείσθαι, Clem. 1 Cor. ii. 6; Herm. Vís. ii. 2. 6, iii. 9. 7), and an official character was lent to his actions in so far as he performed any functions whatever in his capacity as πρεσβύτερος. E. Kühl (Die Gemeindeordnung in den Pastoralbr. 1885) treated this subject with especial reference to Hatch's hypotheses. Cf. also Zöckler, Bibl. u. kirchenhistor. Studien (1893), ii., "Diakonen und Evangelisten," where ample notice is taken of the more recent literature; see especially S. 33-37, 63-71.

6. (P. 92.) One reason for the choice of the word ἐπίσκοπος instead of πρεσβύτερος (1 Tim. iii. 2) may be found in the locus communis immediately preceding (iii. 1). The reading ἀνθρώπινος (instead of πιστός) ὁ λόγος, which was the only prevalent reading in the West until Jerome's time, seems to the present writer so incapable of invention, and the change in uniformity with i. 15, iv. 9, 2 Tim. ii. 11, Tit. iii. 8, so comprehensible, that in spite of its incomplete attestation (Greek only in D*) he is compelled to conclude that it was the original reading. It was probably a proverb of rather broad significance and non-Christian origin (cf. Rom. vi. 19). Moreover, the use of the singular τὸν ἐπίσκοπον, which of itself is not peculiar (1 Cor. vii. 32-35, xiv. 2-4; 2 Cor. xii. 12, τοῦ ἀποστόλου; cf. also the change of number in 1 Tim. v. 1, 2 and v. 3-5), was particularly natural after the saying in iii. 1, in which the individual who desires an office is mentioned. In like manner the transition from τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους (Tit. i. 5) to τὸν ἐπίσκοπον (i. 7) is occasioned by the intervening εἴ τις (i. 6).

7. (Pp. 92, 94.) Baur (Pastoralbriefe, 80 f.), who admits that πρεσβύτερος and ἐπίσκοπος refer to the same office, argues that Tit. i. 5 means that in each of several cities a presbyter was to be appointed, who was called ἐπίσκοπος in relation to the individual Church, but πρεσβύτερος in relation to his colleagues in the other Churches. But herein are two claims that contradict the history. Churches with a single bishop which did not at the same time have a number of presbyters are as thoroughly unknown in the whole extent of the early Church (n. 4) as is a college of presbyters composed of the overseers of the various local congregations. But aside from this, the difficulty with this view is not so much that the two elements of the command, namely, "to appoint a man as ἐπίσκοπος of each single church," and "thereby to make him member of the general presbytery of Crete," are not clearly expressed; they are rather not expressed at all. The construction necessitates such an interpretation here just as little as in Acts xiv. 23 (cf. per contra Matt. xxvii. 15, κατὰ δὲ ἑορτὴν . . . ἐνα). It would be possible with Hofmann to take πρεσβύτερους as a second predicate accusative, supplying the first accusative or direct object from i. 6; but considering the common occurrence of combinations like καθιστάναι τύραννον (Herodot. v. 92 at the beginning; βασιλεῖς, Dan. ii. 21; κριτὰς, 2 Chron. xix. 5, everywhere without a double accusative), and in view of the analogy of χειροτονεῖν (Acts xiv. 23; Ign. Smyrn. xi. 2), such an interpretation is not very probable. Cf. Clem. 1 Cor. liv. 2, οἱ καθισταμένοι πρεσβύτεροι. The early commentators without exception recognised the identity of presbyter and bishop in Phil. i. 1; Tit. i. 7; 1 Tim. iii. 1-7 (Ambrosiaster on these passages; Jerome, Vall. vii. 694f.; Theod. Mops. i. 199, ii. 118-126, 168f., 239). The Syrians (Ephrem, Comm. in Pauli Epist. 249, 269, and the Peshito) go so far as to translate ἐπίσκοπος and ἐπισκοπή in Tit. i. 7, 1 Tim. iii. 1f. by presbyter and presbyteratus.

8. (P. 93.) Acts xiv. 23, xx. 17, 28 (which latter passage, Acts xx., treats only of the elders of Ephesus, and not, as Irenæus (iii. 14. 2) and Baur (83) interpreted it, of the bishops and presbyters of the western part of Asia Minor, where also the πρεσβύτεροι of the local Church, as Luke calls them, are called by Paul ἐπίσκοποι in view of their official work among the flock entrusted to them). Further, cf. 1 Pet. v. 1-4 (πρεσβύτεροι—ποιμαίνειν [in addition to this ἐπισκοπεῖν, according to the majority of the witnesses]—ποίμνιον—ἀρχιποίμην = ii. 25, ποιμένα καὶ ἐπίσκοπον). For Rome and Corinth, Clem. 1 Cor. 42. 4 (the first converts appointed by the apostles everywhere in town and country as ἐπίσκοποι καὶ διάκονοι, xlii. 5 (foretold in Isa. lx. 17), 40 (foreshadowed by priests and Levites, cf. xliii.), xliv. 1, 4 (ἐπισκοπή, the office of the foremost men); xliv. 3-6, xlvii. 6, liv. 2, lvii. 1 (the superintendents appointed by the apostles in Corinth, i.e. the ἐπίσκοποι, yet πρεσβύτεροι for all that). Concerning the concurrent testimony of Hermas, cf. the writer's Hirt des Hermas, 98ff.; with reference to Philippi, his Ignatius, 297-301, 535; concerning the Didache, Forsch. iii. 302-310. As for the testimony of Acts, suspicions of its trustworthiness cannot influence our judgment in this matter; for the incidental and incomplete character of the statements on the subject excludes the possibility that the author was endeavouring to trace a definite official organisation of his time back to an apostolic foundation.

9. (P. 95.) With reference to widows, cf. the writer's Ignatius, S. 333-337, 580-585; Uhlhorn, Die christl. Liebestätigkeit, i. 159 ff.

10. (P. 95.) The interpretation and practical application of Tit. i. 6, 1 Tim. iii. 2, 12, according to which the clergy, in distinction from the laity, are forbidden to marry a second time, is of early date, and was known to Tertullian, de Eschort. cast. vii.; Monog. xii., who combated it with no little skill. The content of the prohibition, however, he understood in the same sense, and his object was simply to extend its application to all Christians. The Catholic interpretation and praxis are attested by Origen, Hom. xvii. in Luc.; in Matt. hom. xiv. 22 (Delar. iii. 645, 953); Hippol. Refut. ix. 12; the so-called Apostolical Constitutions, xvi. 3 (Funk, Doctr. XII. apost. p. 60), according to the most likely interpretation; Ambrosiaster, ed. Bened. pp.

294, 295. Jerome, while rejecting what he terms Tertullian's exaggeration likewise accepts this view (Vall. vii. 696 f.), as also Chrysostom (xi. 598 f., 605, 738), although both were acquainted with the correct exegesis, which before this had been supported by Ephrem, p. 249, and with especial positiveness by Theodorus (ii. 99-106). Among moderns, cf. particularly Hofmann on Tit. i. 6. Schleiermacher, who (191) recognised the correct interpretation of Tit. i. 6, would not admit that it held for the similar words in 1 Tim. iii. 2, since, as he claimed, such a meaning is impossible in v. 9, at least, and a uniform interpretation is required throughout the same letter. If it is sufficiently established that Tit. i. 6 should be taken as a prohibition of all sexual intercourse out of wedlock, then the same interpretation holds also in 1 Tim. iii. 2, 12. But these sentences are related to 1 Tim. v. 9 exactly as the two halves of 1 Cor. vii. 2 to each other; for the meaning of this latter passage is not only that men and women should as a rule be married, but also that each one, whether man or woman, should confine sexual intercourse to the consort; cf. 1 Thess. iv. 3; Eph. v. 22, 28, 33. The implied contrast is never a recognised and regulated bigamy, polygamy, or polyandry, but always sexual intercourse that is out of wedlock and adulterous. Not infrequently expressions are used for such intercourse which the ill-informed might understand as denoting a formal marriage relation (1 Cor. v. 1; John iv. 18, vol. i. p. 296, n. 4). The impossibility of referring the prohibition to a second marriage is, however, still more clear in 1 Tim. v. 9 than in the other passages, since this sentence stands in the closest proximity to the command that the younger widows should marry again (v. 14).

11. (Pp. 99, 116.) Baur says (Pastoralbriefe, 10): "In a word, we have before us in the heretics of the Pastoral Epistles the Gnostics of the second century, particularly the Marcionites" (see below, n. 18). Hilgenfeld (Einl. 748, 752), while agreeing with Baur in essentials, distinguishes, however, a double heresy, the Gentile Christian Gnosis, including that of Marcion, and a Jewish legalistic tendency, both of which, he holds, are opposed in 1 Tim. i. 3-11 as well as in Tit. i. 14, iii. 9. Mangold (Die Irrlehrer des Pastoralbr. 1856), partly in dependence upon Ritschl, who holds the false teachers of Tit. to be Therapeutæ, i.e. degenerate Essenes, and partly following Credner, though he most warmly opposes that writer's division of the false teachers in the Pastoral Epistles into four classes, undertakes to show that in all three Epistles, Essenism is attacked. In Tit. he thinks this party, who are seeking to force their teaching upon the Church, is still altogether outside of Christianity; in 2 Tim., which was written earlier than 1 Tim., they are attempting a "fusion of their dogmas with Christian ideas," to the support of which they are attempting to win over individual Christians (28); lastly, in 1 Tim. they are making a menacing assault upon the whole Church of Ephesus. Lightfoot (Bibl. Essays, 1893, pp. 408, 411-418, this part written as early as 1865) attempted to prove that the attack here is aimed against the party of the Naa-enes described by Hippolytus, Refut. v. 6-11, or a party very closely related to this sect. Careful exegesis, in which regard Hofmann has rendered the greatest services here also, excludes all these and similar interpretations. Hort's discussion (Judaistic Christianity, 1894, pp. 130-146), which exegetically closely follows B. Weiss, is the best thus far.

12. (Pp. 100, 101, 102.) Ἐρεπιδιδασκαλίαν, formed from a word ἐρεπιδιδάσκω

καλος (Eus. H. E. iii. 32. 8), which may have been already in use at that time or only made up for the occasion,—it makes no difference which,—belongs to that numerous class of verbs derived from compound nouns or adjectives which “denote the existence in a state or the customary exercise of an activity” (Blass-Kühner, i. 2. 337; cf. S. 260). Examples in Paul’s writings are ἀγαθοεργεῖν, ἑτεροφυγεῖν, ξενοδοχεῖν, ἀκοῦσποτεῖν, τεκνογονεῖν, τεκνοτροφεῖν. There was no such verb as διδασκαλέω, which one MS. of Clem. Hom. ii. 15 gives, any more than ἐργάω, γινέω, δοχέω. Furthermore, the analogy of νομοδιδάσκαλος (1 Tim. i. 7), καλοδιδάσκαλος (Tit. ii. 3), ψαλοδιδάσκαλος (2 Pet. ii. 1), κακοδιδάσκαλος (κακοδιδασκαλεῖν, Clem. 2 Cor. x. 5; see also Eupr. c. Rhet. xlii., even with acc. γενε.), γεροντοδιδάσκαλος (Plato, Euthyd. 272), γραμματοδιδάσκαλος (Plut. Alex. vii.), δοκλοδιδάσκαλος (title of a comedy by Pherecrates), ἰεροδιδάσκαλος (Dion. Halic. ii. 73), παιδοδιδάσκαλος, πορνιδιδάσκαλος, χοροδιδάσκαλος κτλ., proves beyond doubt that ἑτεροδιδάσκαλος is a teacher of the kind denoted by ἑτερο-, and certainly not, as Otto, 45; Kölling, i. 254 ff.; Hesse, 77, 125, tried to make out, “one who has another teacher.” The word ἑτεροδιδάσποτος, which, according to Kölling, 261, decides the matter, is not pertinent, since διδάσκαλος is a very common substantive, while δάσποτος, on the contrary, is no word at all. The rule which is given to justify this remarkable interpretation (Kölling, 254) is contradicted by the whole great class of so-called attributive compounds (Blass-Kühner, i. 2. 312 f.), e.g. καλλίσαιος, Rom. xi. 24; καλλίχθυσ, κακόδουλος, κακόμαντις, γλυκίμηνος, παμβανδαίς, παμμίτωρ, ἀρχιερεῖς, πρωτόμαρτις, to which also the word ἑτεροδιδάσκαλος belongs. Of the two chief meanings of ἕτερος (illustrated also in compounds, e.g. ἑτερόφθαλμος, one-eyed; ἑτερίγλωσσος, speaking another tongue), naturally only the second is in place here. As in ἑτερόδοξος, ἑτερόδοξω, ἑτερόδοξία (Ign. Magn. viii. 1; Smyrn. vi. 2; Jos. Bell. ii. 8. 5), it may retain its primary significance of simple difference or divergence, whether from the standpoint of the speaker or from that of the person or thing spoken of; but quite commonly also may denote more specifically divergence from what is correct. A “teacher of a different kind,” a “teacher with divergent views” (Hofmann), is an abnormal, perverse teacher (cf. ἕτερον εὐαγγέλιον, Gal. i. 6; 2 Cor. xi. 4). To exercise the functions, to perform the part, of such a teacher is ἑτεροδιδασκαλεῖν. To be sure, such activity cannot very well be carried on without ἐτέρως διδάσκειν, and often implies also ἕτερα or ἀλλότρια διδάσκειν. But the ecclesiastical use of the word in the sense of “to propound a false doctrine” (Ign. ad Pol. iii. 1; Eus. H. E. vii. 17. 4; cf. κακοδιδασκαλία, Ign. Philad. ii. 1; Hippol. Refut. ix. 8) was an inexact application of an expression perhaps coined by Paul himself. Although we are not justified in referring every word in Tit. i. 10-16, iii. 9, or even iii. 9-11, to the same phenomenon which is characterised in 1 Tim. i. 3-11, vi. 3-10, but should rather assume that various sorts of people were to be found among the “many” in Tit. i. 10, yet the repetition of the same or similar expressions admits of no doubt that in Tit. also Paul had in mind primarily ἑτεροδιδασκαλοῦντες of the same kind as were then busy in Ephesus and its vicinity. And other sentences as well, 1 Tim. iv. 7, vi. 20, 2 Tim. ii. 14, 16, 23, are through their similar terminology connected with these passages.

13. (P. 101.) According to well-known classical usage, ἐπαγγέλλεσθαι, 1 Tim. vi. 21, also points to the plying of the business of teaching as a profession; so likewise αἰσχροῦ κέρδους χάριν, Tit. i. 11. The rule that the preacher of the gospel should also draw his support from this labour, which Paul had recognised as a principle in 1 Cor. ix. 6-14 (cf. Matt. x. 10; Luke x. 7), had been applied by the Petrine party to themselves, although they were not so much missionaries as teachers within existing Churches (vol. i. 290). Paul himself extends it to the presbyters, especially those who devote themselves to the calling of teachers, 1 Tim. v. 18; hence he could not oppose on principle the custom of these ἐπεροδιδασκαλοῦντες of receiving remuneration, but, just as in 2 Cor. ii. 17, in opposition to the Petrine party, limited himself to reproving the sordid mind, the base greed of gain, with which they made use of their acknowledged right.

14. (Pp. 103, 116.) In comparison with the procedure of many modern critics, it seems pardonable that the ancient Catholic writers against heresy should have been fond of regarding without sharp discrimination the most various sayings in these and other Pauline Epistles as predictions of the false doctrines of their own times. Cf. Tert. Præscr. vi., "provid erat jam tunc spiritus sanctus," etc., referring to Gal. i. 8; Irenæus in the title of his great work, ἔλεγχος καὶ ἀνατροπὴ τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως, following 1 Tim. vi. 20 (cf. Iren. ii. 14. 7). 1 Tim. i. 4 and the related passages were especially favourite citations in connection with the Valentinian doctrine of æons, though they were taken not so much as specific predictions of this doctrine as general statements which could be applied to it (Iren. i. præm. 1; Tert. c. Val. iii.; Præscr. iii. xxxiii.). On the other hand, Ign. Mgn. viii. uses language which suggests 1 Tim. i. 4, Tit. i. 14, iii. 9 of the Judaistic teachers of his time, without, however, mentioning γενεαλογίαί. The ancient commentators uniformly maintain the Jewish character of the "false teachers in the Pastoral Epistles," suggest rabbinic fables, and are too much inclined to view these teachers as men of like opinions with the Judaists in Gal.; Ambrosiaster, pp. 269, 314, 316; Jerome, Vall. vii. 710 f., 734 ff.; Pelagius (Jerome, Vall. xi.), pp. 405, 431 f., 434; Ephrem, pp. 244, 251, 271, 275; Theodorus, ii. 70-74; Chrysost. xi. 551, 556, who, however, p. 552, refers incidentally also to Greek legends about the gods; Theodoret, p. 639, who yet cannot let the opportunity slip, p. 673, in commenting on 1 Tim. vi. 20, of bringing in also the Gnostics who sprang from Simon.

15. (P. 103.) Even in the N.T. we have examples of such rabbinic traditions, in part of a genealogical nature: Matt. i. 5, Rahab, the mother of Boaz; 2 Tim. iii. 8, the names of the Egyptian magicians; Heb. xi. 37, the sawing asunder of Isaiah. All that the Jews called haggadah (agadah) belongs here. "Haggadoth" can be translated by "legends," hence in Greek by μῦθοι. But see Schurer, ii. 339, A 26 [Eng. trans. ii. i. 339], who here accepts Bacher's conclusions. What an important part of these "haggadoth" were the genealogies, the forefathers' wives, whom the O.T. leaves nameless, or their sons and daughters, who are not enumerated with any completeness, is shown by the Book of Jubilees (e.g. iv. 8; cf. Dillmann in Ewald's Bibl. Jahrb. iii. 79 f., 87; Ronsch, Buch der Jubil. 485-489). Ancient history, even among the Greeks, consisted of myths and genealogies (Polyb. ix. 1. 4, 2. 1; Diiod. Sic. iv. 1, cited by Hort, p. 135); and this was all the more true in the case of the Jew, who had Genesis to build upon. Not a little of such history had found its way even to Hellenistic Jews like Philo and Justin Martyr's Trypho; cf. Goldfahn (Just. M. und die Agada; Siegfried, Philo, 146). Philo calls the whole content of the Pentateuchal narrative which lies between the creation of the world and the giving of the law τὸ γενεαλογικόν (de vita Mos. ii. 8; elsewhere, however, he calls it τὸ ἱστορικόν, de prom. et pun. 1). Theodorus, ii. 72, cites, as a proof of the confusion of Jewish genealogies, the difference between the lists of Jesus' ancestors in Matt. and in Luke. Jerome (Vall. vii. 735 f.) tells of a Jewish Christian in Rome who perplexed the simple by the display of his genealogical wisdom with regard to Matt. i. and Luke iii. This was probably the proselyte Isaac, perhaps identical with the Christian exegete known as "Ambrosiaster" (cf. ThLb. 1899, No. 27; ZKöm. Gal. 22 f.; NKZ, 1905, S. 419-427). It is not at all impossible that even in Paul's time Jewish Christians had set on foot endless discussions about Christ's lineage, a matter which Paul also considered important (2 Tim. ii. 8; Rom. i. 3).

16. (Pp. 107, 120.) 1 Tim. i. 10, vi. 3; Tit. i. 9, ii. 1; 2 Tim. i. 13, iv. 3; cf. Tit. ii. 8, λόγος ὑγίης; Tit. i. 13, ii. 2, ὑγιαίνειν (ἐν) τῇ πίστει. It is hardly necessary to recall that ὑγιαίνων, ὑγίης means simply "healthy" (sanus), and not also "wholesome" (saluber).

17. (Pp. 109, 117.) According to Acta Theclæ, xiv., Demas and Hermogenes (2 Tim. i. 15, iv. 10), who are here substituted for Hymenæus and Philetus (above, p. 21; GK, i. 789, ii. 901 f.), say of Paul: καὶ ἡμεῖς σε διδάξομεν ἥν λέγει οὗτος ἀνάστασιν γίνεσθαι (al. γενέσθαι), ὅτι ἤδη γέγονεν, ἐφ' οἷς ἔχομεν τέκνοις [καὶ ἀνιστάμεθα θεὸν ἐπεγνώκοτες ἀληθῆ]. The words in brackets, which are essentially confirmed by the Coptic translation (Schmidt, S. 35. 24), but are wanting in two Lat. VSS. and one Syr. VS., and which were also lacking in the copy which Ambrosiaster read (Ambros. Opera, ii. App. p. 308 on 2 Tim. ii. 18), as shown by the construction, are a later addition. In addition to Ambrosiaster, only the first explanation is ascribed to the persons mentioned in 2 Tim. ii. 17; Epiph. Hær. xl. 8; Pelagius (Jerome, Vall. xi. 425 in connection with another allegorical interpretation modelled after Ezk. xxxvii.); Theodorus, ii. 209; Theodoret, p. 685. The second explanation, a hint of which Ephrem (p. 261) gives in connection with the same passage ("resurrectio . . . non corporum sed animarum," cf. a Coptic fragment of the Acts of Paul, ed. Schmidt, p. 73. 15), is ascribed by Hippolytus (de resurr. ad Mammaram, Syriac in Pitra, Anal. iv. 61, German in Hippolyts klein. Schriften, ed. Achelis, S. 251) to Nicolaüs, from whom he thinks Hymenæus and Philetus and other Gnostics received it; a resurrection through conversion and baptism. Hippolytus ascribes similar opinions to the Naassenes (Refut. v. 8, p. 158). According to Irenæus, i. 23. 5, Menander also taught a resurrection through baptism which makes one immortal; cf. the hint in Just. Apol. i. 26; Iren. ii. 31. 2 of the Simonians and Carpocratians: "esse autem resurrectionem a mortuis agnitionem ejus, quæ ab eis dicitur, veritatis." This is given more at length in Tert. Resurr. xix. In Præser. iii. the same writer, after citing 2 Tim. ii. 17, adds: "id de se Valentiniani asseverant." Justin wrote against this doctrine of a merely spiritual resurrection (ed. Otto, ii. 211-249, especially p. 243; cf. ZfKG, viii. 1-37). The antiquity of this spiritual explanation of the Christian doctrine of the resurrection is attested by its dissemination in the most various circles before 150, as well as by the σάρκως ἀνάστασιν in the Apostles' Creed; cf. the writer's Das apostolische

Symbolum, 96-100. How much older may be the first mentioned interpretation of the doctrine quoted in 2 Tim. ii. 18?

18. (P. 118.) Baur (Pastoralbr. 26 f.) was the first to find in 1 Tim. vi. 20 a play upon the title of Marcion's famous Antitheses. He also (15-18) understood the word νομοδιδάσκαλοι, 1 Tim. i. 7, of the Marcionites, hostile as they were to the Mosaic law, and took 1 Tim. i. 8 not as a concession, but rather as directed against them. Moreover, he found in the contests about the law, Tit. iii. 9, from which Titus is to refrain, the battles between the Marcionites and their opponents concerning the worth of the law, in which battles even the author himself had taken part. Not even the much abused Church Fathers ever contrived anything like this. Where Irenæus (ii. 14. 7) applies 1 Tim. vi. 20 to Gnostics, he leaves out the words καὶ ἀντιθέσεις; if he had applied it to Marcion, he would have exchanged γνώσις for some other word, for that did not characterise Marcion in the least. Concerning Marcion's work, The Antitheses, see GK, i. 596 f. It is plain that the νομοδιδάσκαλοι, if they are meant in this passage too, did not, like Marcion, bring out contradictates between the law and the gospel, but sought in rabbinical fashion to force their own way to knowledge, and to lead others thither through the mutually contradictory decisions of the "wise." They cultivated the Halakah as well as the Haggadah; cf. Hort (op. cit. 140 ff.); Weber, Jüd. Theol. § 24.

19. (P. 118.) Baur (126), Hilgenf. (Einl. 764, cf. Holtzmann, Pastoralbr. 269) thought that they could infer from the plural βασιλεῖς, 1 Tim. ii. 2,—which occurs in a similar connection also in Polyc. Phil. xii. 3 (cf. per contra, 1 Pet. ii. 13, 17), and has led to a similar conclusion with respect to that letter, — that 1 Tim. was not written until the time of Antoninus, or not until after 137. In reply, it should first be remarked that a joint rule of two Augusti occurred for the first time in 161, and that, on the contrary, co-regencies, as that, e.g. in which Marcus Aurelius shared after 147, occurred repeatedly after the time of Augustus (Mommsen, *R. Staatsrecht*², ii. 1089 ff., 1109 ff.; Wieseler, Beiträge zur Würdigung der Evv. 186-196). Justin in the time of Antoninus Pius could speak of βασιλεῖς with reference to the co-regency of Marcus Aurelius (Apol. i. 14, 17), although there was only one αὐτοκράτωρ (Apol. i. 1, ii. 2); and this could have been done just as well under Augustus or Vespasian with reference to the co-regency of Tiberius or of Titus. Further, it is arbitrary to take the anarthrous βασιλεῖς ("such as are kings") as referring exclusively to the man or men who possessed supreme power in Rome at the time; for in N.T. times, in addition to the emperor, there was more than one bearer of the title of king who had significance for the Christians; cf. the closing sentence of Strabo's Geography, xvii. 25. We can see from the N.T. what a part kings like Herod Agrippa i. and ii. and Aretas iv. played in the history of the apostles (Acts xii. 1-22, xxv. 13-26, 32; 2 Cor. xi. 32). The extensive kingdom of Pontus, in which Christian Churches existed (1 Pet. i. 1), continued until 63 a.d., and a queen dowager, Tryphæna, a Thracian by birth, but belonging to the royal house of Pontus by marriage, is connected in ancient tradition with the earliest history of the Christians of Asia Minor (GK, ii. 906). Are we to suppose that the Christians were not permitted to pray for these kings, or that they did not reckon these among the βασιλεῖς and βασιλεύοντες (Matt. x. 18, xvii. 25;

Mark xiii. 9; Luke xxi. 12, xxii. 25; Acts ix. 15; Rev. i. 5; 1 Tim. vi. 15) or that all the books in which we read such things were written later than 137? But the plural can just as well be understood as denoting a class (cf. Matt. ii. 20). In the same sense Tatian (Oratio ad Græc. iii. 10) writes of βασιλεῖς and οἱ βασιλεῖς, without losing sight of the fact that only one was ὁ βασιλεὺς (chap. iv.), Epictetus, probably under Trajan, speaks of καταφρονεῖν τῶν βασιλέων (Diss. i. 29. 9), although for the most part he represents the one emperor as ὁ τῖραννος, and Galenus in addressing the one emperor says ὑμῶν τῶν βασιλέων (ed. Kühn, xiv. 659). As this apostolic precept then came to be applied in the changeful course of the political history, the actual result was that the Christians even in apostolic times as well as later prayed for the successive Roman emperors and other possessors of princely power on earth, though Paul himself need not have reflected particularly upon the co-existence and succession of power involved in βασιλεῖς. Cf. for this co-existence Clem. 1 Cor. lxi. 1, according to which the Roman Church prayed for a plurality of rulers to whom God had intrusted royal authority, and for the succession (Tert. Apol. xxx., "precantes sumus semper pro omnibus imperatoribus"), which is followed, chap. xxxi., by the quotation from 1 Tim. ii. 2., Lightfoot cites still other examples, Lightf. Ign. Pol. i. 576.

20. (P. 119.) Traces of a baptismal creed, 1 Tim. vi. 12-16; 2 Tim. ii. 2-8, iv. 1; cf. the writer's Das apostol. Symbolum, 38-44; Haussleiter, Zur Vorgeschichte des ap. Glaubensbekenntnisses, 32-39. If in 1 Tim. iii. 16 we read ὁμολογοῦμεν ὡς, according to Cod. D, this verb (cf. vi. 12) might seem to point to a formulated confession, and it seems to the present writer certain that the clauses so introduced were not constructed by Paul off hand. However, the poetic strain in these words suggests more naturally a psalm than a baptismal confession.

21. (P. 121.) While the Epistle to the Laodiceans (GK, ii. 584) constructs its greeting from Gal. i. 1 and Phil. i. 2, and hence uses also the solemn Pauline form of the greeting proper (χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη κτλ.), we find the latter neither in 1 Tim. nor in 2 Tim., though in a measure at least it is retained in Tit. i. 4 (according to the better MSS.). On the contrary, in 1 Tim. i. 2, 2 Tim. i. 2, ἔλεος, which is never used by Paul at this point in his letters (cf., however, Gal. vi. 16; 2 John 3), is placed between χάρις and εἰρήνη; and, moreover, at this place in all three letters we find employed a mass of thoughts and words, some of which are not used by Paul at all, and others not in greetings. It is altogether incomprehensible that a forger should have taken the beginning and end of Rom. as his model in forming such a salutation as Holtzmann (116) claims with reference to Tit. i. 1-4. The diction is treated extensively enough by Holtzmann (Pastoralbr. 84-118), Kolling (i. 17 206); briefly and well by Hofmann (vi. 57 f., 211 f., 320), Lightfoot, Bibl. Essays (401 f.); cf. all the remarks above upon the diction of Eph. and Col. (366 ff.). With the fundamentally wrong opinion of Schleiermacher (77), who calls Paul a writer "whose vocabulary is, as is well known, so very limited," cf. the opinion of E. Curtius, vol. i. 70, n. 18. In the first place, we find a correspondence to the usage of Paul of which examples were given, vol. i. 516, in those words used several times either in 1 Tim. and Tit. alone or in 2 Tim. only which do not occur elsewhere in Paul, or at least not with the same signification. Here naturally we need not take into account, even aside from the fact that they occur but once, ordinary designations of persons and things of which Paul has not had occasion to speak else where, as μάμμη, 2 Tim. i. 5; βιβλία, μεμβράνα, φελόνης, χαλκεύς, 2 Tim. iv. 13 f.; στόμαχος, 1 Tim. v. 23. (a) Among the words used more than once those peculiar to 2 Tim. are: κακοπαθεῖν and συγκακοπαθεῖν, i. 8, ii. 3, 9, iv. 5 (cf. Jas. v. 10, 13); προκόπτεται, ii. 16, iii. 9, 13 (cf., however, Gal. i. 14); ἐπαισχύεσθαι, ἀνεπαίσχυντος, i. 8, 12, 16, ii. 15 (Rom. i. 16 is the only other passage where it is used similarly); σωρεύω, ἐπισωρεύω, iii. 6, iv. 3; εὐχρηστος, ii. 21, iv. 11 (Philem. 11). (b) 1 Tim. and Tit. have in common, to begin with, certain expressions in the greeting: γνήσιον τέκνον ἐν πίστει and γνήσιον τέκνον κατὰ κοινὴν πίστιν respectively (cf. Phil. ii. 20, 22, γνησίως . . . τέκνον), ἐλπίς, κατ' ἐπιταγὴν (τοῦ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν) θεοῦ. The latter expression occurs in just the same form in Rom. xvi. 26 (cf. 1 Cor. vii. 6; 2 Cor. viii. 8; Tit. ii. 15), a passage the Pauline authorship of which has been denied without good grounds (vol. i. 386 f.), and in which are still other resemblances to Tit. i. 2 f., namely, χρονοὶ αἰῶνιοι (this also in 2 Tim. i. 9), φανερῶν, κήρυγμα; these recur also in 1 Tim. iii. 16, though only in part (μυστήριον . . . ἐφανέρωθη . . . ἐκηρύχθη ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν). Furthermore, peculiar to 1 Tim. and Tit. are a multitude of attributes of the bishops and deacons who are to be appointed (Tit. i. 6–9; 1 Tim. iii. 1–13, and in related passages): ἀνέγκλητος, Tit. i. 6, 7; 1 Tim. iii. 10, for which, however, the very common word in Paul, ἀνεπίληπτος, is substituted in 1 Tim. iii. 2, v. 7, vi. 14; further, μίας γυναικὸς ἀνὴρ (cf. also 1 Tim. v. 9, and above, p. 125); τέκνα ἔχων κτλ., μὴ πάροινος, μὴ πλήκτης, φιλόξενος, νηφάδιος, 1 Tim. iii. 2, 11; Tit. ii. 2; ἀσχροκερδής, 1 Tim. iii. 8; Tit. i. 7; σεμνός, σεμνότης, 1 Tim. ii. 2, iii. 4, viii. 11; Tit. ii. 2, 7 (but also in Phil. iv. 8); σώφρων, σωφρόνως, σωφρονίζειν, 1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 8, ii. 2, 4, 5, 12; only once in 2 Tim. i. 7, σωφρονισμός. εὐσεβεία occurs nine times in 1 Tim. and Tit. (1 Tim. ii. 2, iii. 16, iv. 7, 8, vi. 3, 5, 6, 11; Tit. i. 1), in addition to εὐσεβεῖν, 1 Tim. v. 4; εὐσεβῶς, Tit. ii. 12, as over against a single εὐσέβεια and εὐσεβῶς in 2 Tim. iii. 5, 12. Certain terms applied to the perverse teachers are lacking in 2 Tim.: ἐπεροδιδασκαλεῖν, 1 Tim. i. 3, vi. 3 (cf. καλοδιδάσκαλος, Tit. ii. 3); μῦθοι καὶ γενεαλογίαι, 1 Tim. i. 4; Tit. i. 14, iii. 9 (only μῦθοι alone in 2 Tim. iv. 4); προσέχειν, 1 Tim. i. 4, iii. 8, iv. 1, 13, vi. 3 (middle voice). In addition to ἔργον ἀγαθόν, which is a common expression from the time of the older letters on (Rom. xiii. 3; 2 Cor. ix. 8; Eph. ii. 10; Phil. i. 6; Col. i. 10; 2 Thess. ii. 17), and which is to be found in all three letters (especially in the connection πρὸς or εἰς πάν ἔργον ἀγαθόν, Tit. i. 16, iii. 1; 2 Tim. ii. 21, iii. 17); ἐν παντὶ ἔργῳ ἀγαθῷ, 1 Tim. v. 10; Col. i. 10 (cf. also 1 Tim. ii. 10; 2 Tim. iv. 18), we read καλὸν ἔργον (sing. and plur.) only in Tit. ii. 7, 14, iii. 8, 14; 1 Tim. iii. 1, v. 10, 25, vi. 18, never in 2 Tim. Just as Eph., written at the same period as Col., is, for this very reason, and because of the similarity of the subjects treated, most closely related in vocabulary to that Epistle, so, in like manner and for the same reasons, 1 Tim. is more closely related to Tit. than to any other Epistle of Paul, including 2 Tim. (c) But it is also apparent that 2 Tim. has a certain similarity of diction, sometimes to 1 Tim. sometimes to Tit., and again to both letters. Here belongs, in the first place, what was remarked above under (b) concerning εὐσεβεῖν, σώφρων, πρὸς πάν ἔργον ἀγαθόν. καλὸν ἔργον is not used in 2 Tim., indeed, but it is nevertheless worthy of note that καλός, which Paul used only sixteen times in all his other Epistles, occurs twenty-four times in these three small letters, and that, while it is used elsewhere by Paul only predicatively (Gal. iv. 8; 1 Cor. v. 6; Rom. vii. 16, cf. 1 Tim. i. 8, ii. 3, iv. 4) or substantively (Rom. vii. 18, 21; 2 Cor. xiii. 7), it occurs here twenty-one times as attribute, and that, too, also in 2 Tim. i. 14, ii. 3 (κ. στρατιώτης, cf. 1 Tim. i. 18), iv. 7 (κ. ἀγών, cf. 1 Tim. vi. 12). There should be mentioned, further, παράτιθεσθαι, παραθήκη, 1 Tim. i. 18, vi. 20; 2 Tim. i. 12, 14, ii. 2 (different in 1 Cor. x. 27); πιστός ὁ λόγος, with or without further addition, 1 Tim. i. 15 (concerning iii. 1 see above, p. 124, n. 6), iv. 9; 2 Tim. ii. 11; Tit. iii. 8; διαμαρτύρομαι ἐνώπιον κτλ., 1 Tim. v. 21; 2 Tim. ii. 14, iv. 1 (cf. 1 Thess. iv. 6, also for the enforcing of a command). While διδασχῆ elsewhere (Rom. vi. 17, xvi. 17; 1 Cor. xiv. 6, 26; so also Tit. i. 9) denotes the subject-matter of the teaching given or the particular didactic discourse, it is used in 2 Tim. iv. 2 of the teaching function. On the other hand, διδασκαλία, which occurs in our letters fifteen times, in all the rest only four times, denotes not only, as in Rom. xii. 7, xv. 4, the teaching function or the act of instructing (1 Tim. iv. 13, 16, v. 17; 2 Tim. iii. 10, 16; Tit. ii. 7), but also, as in Col. ii. 22, Eph. iv. 14 (?), the content of the teaching given: Tit. ii. 1, 10; 1 Tim. i. 10, iv. 1, 6, vi. 1, 3, perhaps also Tit. i. 9; 2 Tim. iv. 3. Concerning "sound teaching" see above, p. 129, n. 16. To be mentioned also are βέβηλοι κενοφωνίαι, 1 Tim. vi. 20; 2 Tim. ii. 16; λογομαχία, -εῖν, 1 Tim. vi. 4; 2 Tim. ii. 14; ἀστοχεῖν, 1 Tim. i. 6, vi. 21; 2 Tim. ii. 18; τυφλοῦσθαι, 1 Tim. iii. 6, vi. 4; 2 Tim. iii. 4; ἄνθρωποι κατεφθαρμένοι τὸν νοῦν, 2 Tim. iii. 8, cf. 1 Tim. vi. 5; εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν ἀληθείας (ἐλθεῖν), 1 Tim. ii. 4; 2 Tim. ii. 25, iii. 7, cf. Tit. i. 1; 1 Tim. iv. 3, where it should be remarked concerning ἐπίγνωσις in general that it is not until the Epistles of the imprisonment that it occurs with any frequency, namely, eight times in Eph., Col., Philem., Phil., elsewhere only in Rom. (three times). A development in diction seems unmistakable, and that, too, with reference to matters of belief. Paul represents Christ elsewhere also as σωτήρ (Eph. v. 23; Phil. iii. 20), and speaks not only of a saving work on the part of God (1 Cor. i. 21, cf. 2 Tim. i. 9), but also of such a work on the part of Christ (Rom. v. 9, cf. 1 Tim. i. 15); nevertheless it is felt to be a different usage when now we find "our Saviour" as a regular designation, sometimes of Christ (Tit. i. 4, iii. 6; 2 Tim. i. 10), sometimes of God (1 Tim. i. 1, ii. 3, iv. 10; Tit. i. 3, ii. 10, iii. 4), and once even "our great God and Saviour Christ Jesus" (Tit. ii. 13). A usage which has its analogy, perhaps, in 2 Thess. ii. 8, but which is new notwithstanding, is that here the future appearing of Christ, of which Paul has spoken elsewhere, indeed, by no means infrequently, is called regularly ἡ ἐπιφάνεια, Tit. ii. 13; 1 Tim. vi. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 1, 8. The same is also used of the first appearance of Christ, 2 Tim. i. 10, cf. Tit. ii. 11, iii. 4. If the context in which this occurs twice should possibly point to the wording of an original form of the baptismal confession, the word ἐπιφάνεια could suggest to us the name and original meaning of the very ancient festival of Epiphany.

VIII.

THE EPISTLES OF PETER AND JUDE, AND THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

§ 38. THE READERS AND THE AUTHOR OF THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PETER — THE INTERNAL EVIDENCE.

ACCORDING to 1 Pet. i. 1, this Epistle is addressed to Christians in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. When it is observed that not a single one of the old geographical names is here mentioned which is not also the name of a Roman province, and when the fact is recalled that the province of Galatia included Lycaonia and those parts of Phrygia and Pisidia which did not belong to the province of Asia (vol. i. 174 f., 183 f. n. 3), it becomes clear that the letter is intended for the whole of Asia Minor, with the exception of Cilicia (n. 1). Inasmuch as there were Christian Churches in Cilicia at a very early date (Acts xv. 23, 41; cf. Gal. i. 21; Acts ix. 30, xi. 25), we must assume that they are not here overlooked; but being more closely allied to the group of Churches centring in Syrian Antioch, are intentionally excluded from the group of Churches on the other side of the Taurus, all of which had a similar origin.

It is perfectly evident that the letter has to do with the Christian Churches in the provinces mentioned, and not with individual Christians of a particular sort resident there, in addition to whom there may have been other Christians or Christian Churches in the same region. This is conclusively proved by the parting benediction in v. 14; for here the readers are spoken of as all the Christians—naturally all the Christians in the provinces mentioned in i. 1. Cared for by their own presbyters, they are the flocks of Christ, the Chief Shepherd (v. 1–4), in Asia Minor. They are spoken of only in contrast either to their heathen neighbours (ii. 12, 15, iii. 1, 13–17, iv. 3 f., 12 f.), the whole Church upon earth (v. 9), or a single local Church outside of Asia Minor (v. 13).

This decides at once the question regarding the previous history of the readers and their national and ecclesiastical character; for, from Acts (xiii. 14–xiv. 25, xvi. 1–10, xviii. 19–xx. 38) and from Galatians, Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon, we know through whose efforts mainly the Churches in the provinces of Galatia and Asia were founded (1 Cor. xvi. 1, 19), and what their character was from the beginning. According to the testimony of his own letters and of Acts, Paul was the missionary who, in the sense of Rom. xv. 20, 1 Cor. iii. 10, 2 Cor. x. 15, laid the foundations of Christianity in all this region. In the cities to which he did not bring the gospel himself, it was preached by the friends and helpers who followed up his personal labours and acted as his representatives; and although these Churches were only thus indirectly founded by himself, Paul reckoned them among the Churches committed to his special care. This view is presupposed in his letters to the Churches in the province of Asia which remained personally unacquainted with him (Ephesians, Colossians, also Philemon, cf. vol. i. p. 449, n. 3, 460), and in such expressions as are found in Rom. xv. 16–23, xvi. 4, 16; 2 Cor. xi. 28; 2 Tim. iv. 17 (cf. above, p. 11). The supposition that Paul found in Ephesus or Iconium Christian Churches already organised or even individual Christians, or that Epaphras discovered such in Colossæ or in Laodicea, is contrary to the evidence of all existing sources of information. As regards the province of Asia and its capital city, Ephesus, this is contradicted by the testimony of Acts xviii. 19, xix. 8, and also xix. 1-7. It was just because there was no Christian Church in Ephesus before Paul's arrival, not even of the most elementary kind, that it was possible there, as in Alexandria (Acts xviii. 24 f.), for single confessors of Jesus to remain without Christian baptism and without any relation to the development of the Church (vol. i. p. 262).

It is just as certain also that the Churches in the provinces of Asia and Galatia founded by Paul and his helpers were all Gentile Christian in character, notwithstanding the fact that they were always organised in connection with synagogues already existing, and in spite of the reception into their membership of numerous Jews. This is almost as strongly expressed in Acts (Acts xv. 3, 12, 19, xxi. 19), which records facts that might lead one to suppose that the Churches were partly Jewish, partly Gentile Christian in character, as by Paul himself (Gal. iv. 8; Eph. ii. 11-iii. 13). On the other hand, Paul does not deny that there were native Jews in the membership of these Gentile Christian Churches (vol. i. p. 192, n. 6). Regarding the founding of the Churches in Cappadocia, Pontus, and Bithynia, regions which Paul did not visit personally, we have no information. But it is probable that in these provinces, which, viewed from the direction of Jerusalem and Antioch, were only the Hinterland of the provinces of Galatia and Asia, the gospel was preached somewhat later, but under practically the same conditions, except that the proportion of Jews in the population was less, and consequently there were fewer of them in the membership of the Churches organised there than in Galatia and Asia.

In view of the clear facts in the case, it is one of the most striking proofs of the lack of historical insight in the handling of the N.T. writings, that from the time of Origen on the view could gain ground in the Greek

Church that 1 Peter was directed to the Jewish Christians scattered in the provinces named (n. 2). It is even more strange that this view should find stubborn defenders to-day, though modified to the extent of holding that the letter was addressed by Peter to Jewish Christian Churches existing in Asia Minor before Paul began his missionary labours in that region (n. 3). Nothing could be further from the truth than to claim that the only argument against the assumption of the existence of such Jewish Christian Churches in Asia Minor before Paul's labours began is the silence of Acts. As already indicated, we have to do here with the very explicit testimony both of Acts and of Paul's letters. If Jewish Christian Churches existed in Galatia and Asia, especially in the larger cities where there were numerous Jews, e.g. Pisidian Antioch and Iconium, Ephesus and the cities on the Lycus, before the gospel was preached in these places by Paul, Barnabas, Epaphras, and other co-labourers of theirs unknown to us, then the whole representation in Acts is not only incomplete, but positively false. In all these districts Paul finds only Jews and Gentiles who had never heard the gospel until they heard it from him, and who were constrained by his preaching to take a stand with reference to it. Even if the agreement in Gal. ii. 6-10 be still falsely interpreted to mean that Paul was compelled to give up all missionary work among persons of Jewish birth (cf. per contra, vol. i. p. 265 f.), it is nevertheless impossible to explain the fact that repeatedly Paul begins his preaching in the synagogue,—indeed, in Ephesus he confined his work to the synagogue for the whole of three months (Acts xix. 8),—and, on the other hand, fails even to greet the Jewish Christian Churches in the same places, and makes no use of the foundation which in them was already laid. And who were the missionaries who established Churches all the way to the coast of the Black Sea before the Christians in Antioch gained courage to send Paul and Barnabas out into the world? (Acts xiii. 2). If, in view of 1 Pet. i. 12, it be suggested that this was done by persons from Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, and Pamphylia (Acts ii. 9 f.), who heard the preaching at Pentecost, it must be remembered that these hearers were not pilgrims to the feast, who, after the feast, returned to the lands of their birth, but Jews from abroad residing in Jerusalem (Acts ii. 5, vi. 9, vol. i. 61), who became members of the Church in Jerusalem. It is true that after the death of Stephen many of these Christians did attempt successfully to spread their faith outside of Palestine (Acts xi. 19 f.). The gospel, however, was not carried beyond Antioch and Cyprus by their efforts, but, according to all existing accounts, by Paul and Barnabas. Moreover, what is to be done with Paul's own testimony? It was "the Churches of Galatia" (Gal. i. 2; 1 Cor. xvi. 1), not individual Christians in Galatia, who received the gospel from Paul, working sometimes in conjunction with Barnabas, sometimes with Silvanus (Gal. i. 8, iv. 13; vol. i. p. 179), in quite the same way that the Church in Corinth received the gospel (Gal. i. 9; cf. 1 Cor. xv. 1-3). Under the figure of the mother (Gal. iv. 19) is expressed, if possible, even more strongly than by the figure of the father (1 Cor. iv. 15), the fact that all the Churches in this province owed their origin to Paul. Where, then, are the Jewish Christian Churches, governed by their own presbyters (1 Pet. v. 1-4), which are supposed to have existed in the province before Paul's coming? Similarly in Colossæ and Laodicea, Epaphras brought the gospel not to individual Christians of a particular class or race, but to the Churches (Col. i. 1, 7, iv. 13, 16). Furthermore, when Paul mentions Epānetus (Rom. xvi. 5), he speaks of him not as a first-fruit of his personal labours in Asia, but as the first convert of this province; and from the connection in which he is spoken of, he must have become acquainted with the gospel in the house of Aquila, who came to Ephesus for the first time along with Paul (vol i. 417, n. 21).

The terms that are here used to characterise the Christian readers and Churches have been misunderstood from very early times, because of their relation to Israel and to Jewish conditions. This association is true of παρεπίδημοι (i. 1) and πάροιχοι, which is joined with it (ii. 11; παροιμία, i. 17), only to the extent that the combination occurs twice in the LXX (n. 4). In themselves the words are quite secular in character, as is abundantly evidenced by their use in literature and inscriptions. The first expression means the stranger who comes from a foreign land, and remains only temporarily in a given place of residence. In distinction from ἐπιδημεῖν (Acts ii. 10), it emphasises more definitely the merely temporary character of the residence. Πάροιχος, on the other hand, which is practically synonymous with μέτοικος, more commonly used by the older writers, means the resident, that is to say, the stranger, who, as distinguished from the citizen, lives by the tolerance and under the protection of the State. It may also mean the tenant, as distinguished from the property holder and his family. With these words is joined as practically synonymous ξένος (Eph. ii. 19; Heb. xi. 13). J. D. Michaelis (Einkl. 1445 ff.) thought that the words were used to describe persons who before their conversion were Jewish proselytes. That this is not the case, and that no comparison is implied between the readers and such proselytes as regards their relation to Christianity, is evident from the simple fact that in the two passages in the LXX (Gen. xxiii. 4; Ps. xxxix. 13, n. 4) where παρεπίδημος occurs—in both instances joined with πάροιχος, as in 1 Pet. ii. 11—the reference is not to strangers living in Israel, but to the patriarchs living in strange countries, without fixed abode or permanent possessions, and to pious Israelites whose whole life was conceived after the pattern of the life of their ancestors.

It will be seen that even in the O.T. these two synonymous ideas are used to denote, on the one hand, the relation of the pious to God, and, on the other hand, their relation to earthly rights, possessions, and abode. In conscious imitation of this O.T. usage, as evidenced by Heb. xi. 13–16, xiii. 14, there grew up the view, already discussed (vol. i. p. 81 f.), which comes to light in all the N.T. writings, that Christians, being citizens of a heavenly commonwealth, are strangers, residing only temporarily in this world, or residents without rights of citizenship, remaining here only by the sufferance of the possessors and rulers of this world. While the Jews of the diaspora made every effort either to become citizens with full rights in Gentile communities, or to secure legal recognition as a separate community (n. 4), Christians, even when they possessed landed property and rights of citizenship, regarded themselves, nevertheless, as παροικοὶ καὶ παρεπίδημοι, thereby bearing witness that they possessed and sought a fatherland not to be found upon this earth (Heb. xi. 14–16). That these words are used in quite the same sense in 1 Peter is shown by ii. 11, where these particular characteristics of the readers are mentioned as a motive for a distinctive Christian manner of life, as distinguished from that led by the heathen. It is even more clearly demonstrated by i. 17, where manifestly the whole earthly life of Christians is described as the time of their παροικία (cf. iv. 2; Gen. xlvii. 9). This also proves that the expressions are not at all meant to imply that the readers are persons living far from their earthly home, e.g. Jews dwelling outside of Palestine; for then it would follow that they needed only to return to Palestine, in order to be exempt from all the moral obligations spoken of in i. 17, ii. 11. Furthermore, in i. 1 f., the language shows that the readers are strangers and sojourners in the world, not by reason of the external circumstances of their life, but because they have been chosen by God, i.e.

in accordance with His own original provision, and through conversion and baptism (i. 1 f.). These words describe readers simply as Christians, and the names of the provinces that follow in the genitive might have been added directly, just as it is possible to say αἱ ἐκκλησίαι τῆς Ἰουδαίας (Gal. i. 22), in the sense of αἱ οὖσαι ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ (1 Thess. ii. 14). This connection is not interfered with by the intervening διασπορᾶς, which is used without the article, and so cannot possibly further describe the readers as those elect strangers, i.e. Christians, who belong to the Jewish diaspora of Pontus, Galatia, etc. (n. 5). Rather does it serve to emphasise the thought expressed by παρeπίδημοι by adding the thought of Jas. i. 1, that as Christians the readers live scattered abroad like the Israelites after they were driven from the Holy Land. As indicated above (vol. i. 93, 100, n. 12), this idea grew up originally out of very concrete conditions; and so here Peter probably has in mind the actual conditions of his readers. It is, of course, possible in itself to conceive of all the Christians as dwelling together in one place like the Mormons on the Great Salt Lake, instead of scattered abroad in little groups over the wide world like oases in the desert or islands in the sea (Theoph. ad Autol. ii. 14). But at the beginning of a letter intended for a large number of Churches scattered over the whole of Asia Minor it was very natural to recall their actual condition, and this thought is very properly followed by the enumeration of all the provinces where these Churches were. But notwithstanding this fact, διασπορᾶς, like the preceding παρeπίδημοι, is used to describe the religious condition of the readers. For it will be observed, the thing contrasted with their present scattered condition is not the return of them all to an earthly home, but their gathering into the kingdom of Christ (Matt. xxiv. 31; Didache x.), when the Chief Shepherd shall appear (1 Pet. v. 4). Still, the fact that up to this time these small Churches had always existed scattered abroad over the wide world, outnumbered a hundred or even a thousand times by the heathen who surrounded them, must have intensified the feeling that as Christians they were only strangers and sojourners in the world, as it would also tend to make them constantly mindful of the inheritance laid up for them in heaven (i. 4).

In this manner the greeting opens the way for the main thoughts of the Epistle. But it contains nothing which can obscure the fact, firmly established by historical evidence, that the letter was directed to the Gentile Christian Churches in Asia Minor founded by Paul and his helpers. This is confirmed in the further course of the letter itself, particularly by the manner in which characteristics of Israel are applied to the readers. Thus in ii. 5, 9, in accordance with Ex. xix. 5 f., Isa. xliii. 20, they are called a royal priesthood, a chosen race, a holy people, God's peculiar people. In ii. 10, by a free application of the words with which Hosea (ii. 1-3, 25) prophesies the restoration of Israel to the rank of God's people, it is said of the readers that they who once were no people have become a people of God, that they who once were not the objects of the divine mercy have now experienced this mercy (ii. 5-10). Nor is the fact concealed that they have obtained all this mercy and dignity because by faith they have followed the call of the gospel by which they have been summoned out of darkness into His marvellous light (ii. 9, cf. i. 12, 15, 22-25, ii. 2, 7). In contrast to them stand not the unbelieving majority of the Jewish people, but all who have heard the gospel and not accepted it. They are not called the true people of God, or the spiritual Israel, in contrast to the Jewish people who have become unworthy of this name. On the contrary, the definite article is consistently avoided (cf. the opposite usage in Jas. i. 1; Gal. vi. 16; Phil. iii. 3), i.e. without the implication of any such contrast these exalted titles are applied to them in just the same way in which James, Paul, and John speak of the rise of a people of God from among the Gentiles in Acts xv. 14; Gal. iii. 7, 29, iv. 28; Eph. ii. 11-22; Rev. v. 9 f. They are not sons of Abraham and daughters of Sarah (which simply expresses the same thought with reference to women) by reason of birth, but have become such through their conversion and the character of their subsequent life (iii. 6). That the readers are Gentiles, is proved most decisively by the way in which the words of Hosea, referred to above, are used. Paul, who understood the words as a prophecy of the ultimate pardon of Israel, to be fulfilled at the last day (Rom. ix. 25, xi. 26-31),—frequently overlooked by the interpreters without any apparent necessity,—quotes the substance of the passage accurately. Peter, who only uses the language of the prophet to clothe his own thoughts, modifies the passage essentially to suit his purpose, using, in order to describe the readers before their conversion, the words οἱ πότε οὐ λαός instead of οὐ λαὸς τοῦ θεοῦ (Hos. ii. 1, 25; cf. i. 9, οὐ λαός μου). Unlike the degenerate Israel, they were not deprived of the rank of the people of God after having once had it, but before their conversion were not yet a people at all. It was not until after they had received the gospel that the readers, who belonged to the most diverse races, Greeks and Barbarians, Phrygians, Celts, Scythians, became united into one people, in fact into a holy people of God (Col. iii. 11; Acts xiv. 11, xvii. 26). Having become such in consequence of the divine call, the obligations devolving upon the people of God in the O.T. passed over to them (i. 15 f.). But the contrast to the holy life, which they must now lead as Christians, is their former life in heathen immorality. This is indicated most clearly in iv. 2-4, where participation in immoral idol worship is mentioned last in the list of the vices to which they were addicted before their conversion. Moreover, there are unequivocal references to this same practice in i. 14, 18.

While it is true that hostility to Christ (Acts iii. 17 ; 1 Tim. i. 13) and the legalistic bias of the Jews, which made them so unfriendly to the gospel (Rom. x. 3), may be described as accompanied by ἄγνοια, it will be observed that neither of these attitudes is referred to in i. 14, but rather the sinful lusts in which the readers lived in the time of their ignorance (cf. ii. 11, 24, iv. 1-4). This can mean only that ignorance of God and His will which characterised the Gentile in distinction from the Jew (1 Thess. iv. 5 ; 2 Thess. i. 8 ; Gal. iv. 9 ; 1 Tim. ii. 4 ; 1 Pet. ii. 15 ; Acts xvii. 23, 30). Judged by the Christian standard, there were evil traditions even among the Jews (Matt. xv. 2, xvi. 6), with which it was necessary for Jews to break in order to become Christians (Gal. i. 13 f. ; Phil. iii. 7 ff.). But, in contrast to these, no Christian in ancient times was so foolish as to call the sinful life of heathenism (iv. 3), even when led by Jews, a vain manner of life handed down from their fathers (i. 18, more explicitly described in Eph. iv. 17 f.). The use of such an expression cannot be justified by assuming that a contemptuous judgment of the Jewish cultus and the Pharisaic manner of life is here expressed ; for of such a judgment there is not the slightest suggestion throughout the entire letter. In contrast to the holy life which they are now required to live, stand rather the lusts of the flesh (i. 14, ii. 11). Furthermore, the clear comparison of the redemption of the readers with that of Israel from Egypt, implying as it does a comparison of their former walk with the life of Israel while they were in heathen bondage, indicates that they have come from heathenism and not out of a life under the Mosaic law. Only by exegesis of the worst sort can it be made to appear from ii. 25 that such language could be used exclusively of Jews who had always been members of the household of God (n. 6). To the unbiassed judgment all the passages in the letter bearing upon the question as to the character of the readers only confirm what is certainly known from history concerning the origin and character of the Christian Churches in Asia Minor. From this point of view alone is the expressed purpose of the letter intelligible.

It is Peter's intention to encourage his readers, and to confirm them by bearing witness to the fact that it is the true grace of God into which they have been brought by their conversion, and in which they have since stood (v. 12). The oppressed condition in which they were at the time is, of course, an additional reason why he writes to them. But nothing is anywhere said which would imply that the readers were in danger even under the stress of persecution of doubting the truth of their faith. Apart from this, the significant thing for them is the fact that it is Peter who bears witness to the genuineness of their state of grace. Inasmuch as there is no trustworthy tradition and not the slightest hint in the letter itself that Peter had had direct personal relations with these Christians, had ever been among them, or was personally known to individuals among them (n. 7), it could have been only his ecclesiastical position, known throughout the entire Christian world, and the character of the Churches in Asia Minor, equally well known, that gives his letter the significance which he indicates at the close. To them as Gentile Christians it is an encouragement, and tends to strengthen their faith, that the foremost amongst the apostles, the most distinguished apostle of the circumcision (Gal. ii. 7), bears such testimony to their Christian character. It is with this in view that he praises the word of the gospel which was preached to them, describing it as the means of a second birth, and as the living word of God, having the promise of eternal continuance (i. 23-25). This explains also why he declares that the missionaries who brought this word to them preached the gospel in the spirit sent from heaven (i. 12), and finally his assurance that even the O.T. prophets, or rather the spirit of Christ dwelling in them, which, reaching out beyond the clear knowledge of the prophets themselves, made predictions concerning the grace that was to reach even to the readers,—a preliminary revelation, the recording of which by the prophets was not so much for their own benefit as for that of the readers (i. 10–12).

If in this passage Peter had in mind only the contrast between the ancient prophets and Christians of the present (cf. Matt. xiii. 17; Heb. i. 1, xi. 40), it is impossible to understand why he continued to address the readers, distinguishing them from himself instead of identifying them with himself and with all Christians by the use of “we” and “us.” The contrast here cannot be, as in i. 3–4*a* and 4*b*–9, that between the apostle and other eye-witnesses of the gospel history on the one hand, and Christians converted later through the gospel on the other (see below); since in the prophets there is no hint of any kind concerning this temporal distinction within the Church. On the contrary, Peter has in mind words like Isa. ii. 1–4, xlii. 1–12 (Matt. xii. 18–21), Isa. xlix. 6 (Acts xiii. 47), and here expresses thoughts concerning the relation of O.T. prophecy to the preaching of the gospel among the Gentiles such as are found in Rom. i. 2, xv. 4–13, xvi. 26; Eph. iii. 5–12.

In introducing himself, the author uses the name given him by Jesus, and the official title received from Him (i. 1). He does not, however, use the original Aramaic form of the name, Kepha, but the Greek translation which was current among Gentile Christians (n. 8). He does not say much about himself, but what he does say is significant. When in v. 1, in addressing the πρεσβύτεροι, and pointing out his own relation to them, he calls himself συμπρεσβύτερος, this cannot mean that he like them is an old man; for although the contrast between πρεσβύτεροι and νεώτεροι (v. 1, 5) does suggest difference of age, the character of the exhortations addressed to both show that the πρεσβύτεροι are here viewed in their capacity as heads of the Churches, to whom obedience is due, and who have the power to demand and to compel the same authoritatively, and for their own ends (cf. Tit. i. 7; 1 Tim. iii. 3, 8), but who, if they are true shepherds, ought not so to do. In this calling Peter is their companion, only with the self-evident distinction that their exercise of the same is limited to the local Church, while that of Peter, being an apostle (i. 1), extends over the entire Church (v. 9). Attention is called to this distinctive position by the statement which the author here makes, that he was a witness, i.e. an eye-witness, of the sufferings of Christ (n. 9). Here are only two strokes of the pen; but by the one we have sharply outlined the figure of the disciple, who, with a few others, had been an eye-witness of the struggle in Gethsemane, and had seen Jesus bound and taken from one judge to another (Mark xiv. 33, 37, 47, 54; Luke xxii. 61; John xviii. 10-27); the other pictures the apostle, to whom especially Jesus had given the command to feed his sheep (John xxi. 15-17) and strengthen his brethren (Luke xxii. 32). Furthermore, no one but an eye-witness of the events recorded in the gospel history (Luke i. 2) could well describe the attitude and relation to Christ of persons in Asia Minor, converted after Jesus' death, not only as that of faith without sight, but also as that of love for one whom they had never seen (i. 8). In the Epistles of Paul, of whose language we are so often reminded by 1 Peter, we seek in vain for similar expressions, even where it would have been most natural for one who could speak in this way to have done so (e.g. Gal. iii. 1; Eph. i. 13). This note is struck by only one other of the original apostles (John i. 14, xix. 35, xx. 29; 1 John i. 1-4, iv. 14). Finally, no one could speak of the resurrection of the Lord as the means of his regeneration (i. 3), except one who through the conviction of Jesus' resurrection had been roused from the doubt into which he had been cast by the death of Jesus, to a new life of hope and faith. Peter does not speak in this way concerning the readers, the instrument of whose regeneration is rather the living word of God (i. 23), but where he specially speaks of himself and those like himself, and before he passes to his address to the readers (i. 4*b*, n. 10).

As has already been remarked, the writer of the letter had no share in the conversion of the readers, and there is nothing to indicate that there had been direct personal relations between himself and them. This impression is strengthened, especially by what is said in v. 12–14. Peter sends special greeting neither to an individual nor to a particular class among the readers, which is all the more striking when compared with the very different manner in which Paul writes to Churches not founded by himself (Rom. xvi. 3–16; Col. iv. 15–17; vol. i. 387 f.). The only greetings which he sends are those from the local Church where he was, and from Mark, whom he calls his son, to all the readers. The latter is only a figurative way of saying that Mark, with whose family Peter had long been intimate (Acts xii. 12), had become a believer through Peter's influence (cf. 1 Tim. i. 1; 2 Tim. i. 1; Tit. i. 4; Philem. 10). In the same way, the Church in Babylon is not spoken of in a prosaic manner, but is personified, and in order to bring out its spiritual relationship to the readers, who are the elect of God (i. 1), is called fellow-elect (2 John 1, 13, n. 11).

While this greeting does not necessitate at all the assumption of intimate relations between the Church in "Babylon" and the Churches in Asia Minor (cf. Rom. xvi. 16*b*; Phil. iv. 22; Gal. i. 2), such relations are presupposed by the greeting from Mark. Now, since Mark did not accompany Paul on any of his three missionary journeys through Asia Minor,—having separated himself from the apostle at the beginning of the first journey, and not joining him again for a long time (Acts xiii. 13, xv. 38),—but in the year 62 or 63 did intend to make a journey from Rome to Asia Minor (Col. iv. 10), this letter could not have been written until after Mark had carried out this intention, and so had come into personal contact with all, or some of the Churches of Asia Minor, or with individual members of them. On the other hand, Silvanus, who accompanied Paul on his second missionary journey, had become acquainted with many of the Churches in Asia Minor, and had helped in the building up, possibly also in the founding, of many of them (Acts xv. 40, xvi. 5 ; cf. Gal. iv. 13, vol. i. p. 178 f.). For this reason Peter could describe Silvanus, through whom he addressed the readers in this letter, as a faithful, trustworthy brother, with the evident expectation that they would agree with him (v. 12). But what does he mean when he says—and the order of the words indicates a certain emphasis—“By Silvanus, the faithful brother, as I account him, I have written to you briefly”? So far as the words themselves are concerned (n. 12), the expression γράφειν διά τινος might refer to the person who delivered the letter. But, in the first place, it strikes one as strange to find the bearer of the letter specifically mentioned, whereas in the other N.T. Epistles either the identity of the bearer is not disclosed at all, or is left to be inferred from indirect statements (Rom. xvi. 1 ; 1 Cor. xvi. 17 ; 2 Cor. viii. 16–24 ; Eph. vi. 21 ; Col. iv. 7). Furthermore, it is impossible to explain why Silvanus should be mentioned with so much emphasis in this passage as the bearer of the letter, and why the concurrence of the readers in the praise bestowed upon him should be expressly asked. If this is the meaning, the remark is in all respects without point ; for if Silvanus delivered the letter as it was addressed, then the readers, when the letter was in their hands, no longer needed to be told that Peter had believed him possessed of the modest amount of trustworthiness requisite for this task before he sent him. If, contrary to all expectations, Silvanus failed to deliver the letter, then the written testimony at the end of the letter, of the writer's confidence in Silvanus, which the latter was on the point of basely betraying, would be of value neither to the persons addressed, who in that case would not receive the letter, nor to Peter himself. It scarcely needs to be remarked that the statement is even more meaningless if Silvanus is here thought of as the amanuensis to whom Peter dictated his message; since Peter could not express his deliberate opinion as to the trustworthiness requisite for this task—and anything less than trustworthiness would imply a degree of deceit on the part of the amanuensis entirely incredible—without implying his suspicion as to the person in question; and if he had any suspicion he could satisfy himself by reading the letter through, while in a matter of this sort the readers could not have an opinion of any kind. The only alternative that remains is the most natural one, namely, that Silvanus' part in the composition was so important and so large that its performance required a considerable degree of trustworthiness. It is not Silvanus' letter, written merely at Peter's direction; for from beginning to end Peter is the one who speaks in the letter, without even formally mentioning Silvanus as a joint author, as Paul sometimes does (1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1). In fact, to have done so would have tended to defeat the expressed purpose of the letter, namely, to be a testimony of the apostle of the circumcision to Gentile Christians (above, p. 145 f.). It purports to be a letter of Peter's; and such it is, except that Peter left its composition to Silvanus, because he regarded him as better fitted than himself, indeed as better fitted than anyone else, to express in an intelligible and effective manner the thoughts and feelings which Peter entertained toward the Gentile Christians of Asia Minor. Just as Peter believed that in the performance of this duty Silvanus would have the best interests of the readers in view, and would write with appreciation of their needs, so he hopes that the readers, who have come to know Silvanus in part through his labours among them as a missionary preacher, will believe that he has faithfully reproduced Peter's sentiments, and that he would not have written what he did in Peter's name if he had known that this was not Peter's mind. So, instead of making the distance between himself and the readers seem greater by speaking to them through another, Peter by this means introduces himself to them in the most effective way possible. All that we know of Silvanus from other sources, his prominent place among the officers and prophets of the mother Church, the duty which he performed in Antioch as their ambassador (Acts xv. 22-40), the favourable testimony to his character which we gather from Paul's Epistles (2 Cor. i. 19; cf. 1 and 2 Thess.), as well as the trustworthiness to which Peter bears testimony here, tends to justify the assumption that he would prove himself worthy of the confidence placed in him in the entrusting to him of the composition of this letter. We have no a priori means of determining how comprehensive the conferences between Peter and Silvanus, which necessarily preceded the writing of such a letter, may have been.

1. (P. 134.) The omission from 1 Pet. i. 1 of the two small districts of Lycia and Pamphylia, of whose Church history in early time we know practically nothing (Acts xiv. 25), will scarcely be accounted strange, especially in view of the fact that, prior to 74 A.D., they were not permanently organised into an independent province (Marquardt, *R. Staatsverw.*² i. 375 f.). On the other hand, it is peculiar that Pontus and Bithynia, which had been united in one province since 65 B.C. (Marquardt, 351), are separated as far as possible in this list. It is possible that this entire province is designated by the name "Bithynia" (cf. Tac. Ann. i. 74, xvi. 18), and that Pontus stands for Pontus Polemoniacus, which was a principality until 63 A.D. (Marquardt, 360). If 1 Pet. was written in 63 (§ 39), account need not yet necessarily be taken of the union of this land with Galatia, which is also placed in the year 63. In any case, the order of the names is peculiar: starting from the north coast (Pontus), we go inland to Galatia, then eastward (Cappadocia), then westward (Asia), and, finally, in a northerly direction until we reach the shore of the Black Sea again. Bengel's remark, "Quinque provincias nominat eo ordine, quo occurrebant scribenti ex oriente" (cf. v. 13), which has been accepted by Wetstein (ii. 698) and Niebuhr, following Bunsen (Anal. antonic i. 134), does not explain the order nor even the name with which the list begins, since the person in Babylon facing or journeying toward Asia Minor was nearer Cappadocia than Pontus. The differing order in the free reproduction of Origen (see n. 2) has no more significance than the omission of Asia in A, of Bithynia in B. Pontus is mentioned elsewhere in the N.T. only in Acts ii. 9, xviii. 2; in both cases as the home of Jews (cf. Philo, ad Cal. xxxvi.). Is it perhaps possible that Aquila and Priscilla, who were living in Asia Minor sometime after 1 Pet. was written (2 Tim. iv. 19), laboured on behalf of the gospel in their native Pontus? In these regions also it is natural to seek the Scythian Christians to whom reference is made in Col. iii. 11, who may have come hither in consequence of the commerce between the northern and southern shores of the Black Sea. Here, too, may have been found slaves who had wandered far from their homes. In 112, Pliny had to deal with persons (Ep. xvi. ad Traj.) who claimed that they had abandoned the Christian faith twenty years before. They may have become Christians many years earlier. The fact that, according to the testimony of Pliny, Christianity was widely spread in this region, is evidence that it was brought hither not very much later than it was preached in the province of Asia. For in the second century we have evidence of the existence of the episcopates of Sinope (Epiph. Hær. xlii. 1) and Amastris (Eus. H. E. iv. 23. 6, v. 23. 2).

2. (P. 137.) Origen, quoted by Eus. iii. 1. 2, Πέτρος δὲ ἐν Πόντῳ κ. Γαλ. κ. Βιθ., Καππαδό. τε καὶ Ἀσίᾳ κεκηρυχέναι τοῖς ἐκ διασπορᾶς (αὐ. ἐν διασπορᾷ) Ἰουδαίοις ἔοικεν. Thus, indirectly, we have characterised the readers of the letter, whose title is here made use of. More directly and definitely by Eus. himself, iii. 4. 2, τοῖς ἐξ Ἑβραίων οὖσιν ἐν διασπορᾷ Πόντου—Βιθυνίας γράφει. Cf. the prologue in Zacagni (Mon. coll. 492), Cramer (Cat. viii. 41), Matthæi (Epist. cath. 44). Just as Eusebius (op. cit.) implies a contrast between Peter's work and the missionary labours of Paul among the Gentiles, so Didymus (Migne, 39, 1755; cf. the scholion in Matthæi, p. 196) treats it as an extension of his preaching among the Jews beyond the boundary of Palestine. In the West, at least at a later time, a more correct view prevailed, as is proved by the title of the letter (ad gentes), which, in spite of the original text, the person who translated Didymus into Latin, a contemporary of Cassiodorus (cf. Forsch. iii. 11, 135), made the old Alexandrian employ in his comment on 1 Pet. ii. 9 f.

3. (P. 137.) The view briefly described on p. 136 f. has been maintained mainly by B. Weiss (Der petr. Lehrbegriff, 99 ff.) since 1855, and by many later writers. It is defended at great length by Kuhl in the revision of Luther's Kommentar über die Briefe Petri und Judæ, 5te Aufl. 1887, 6te Aufl. 1897.

4. (Pp. 139, 140.) In Gen. xxiii. 4 עַבְדִּי אֲנִי, LXX πάροικος καὶ παρεπίδημος, we find Abraham among the children of Heth, and distinguished from the "people of the land," who owned the ground. There is a retrospective reference to this position of the patriarchs also in Ps. xxxix. 13 (xxxviii. 12; cf. Gen. xlvii. 9; 1 Chron. xxix. 15). Here belong also Lev. xxv. 23, where the same combination of words (but LXX reads προσωλήτοι καὶ πάροικοι) is used to designate the Israelites in their own land in contrast to God, the real possessor of the land, and the passages where $\pi\acute{\alpha}\rhoοικος = \text{נָּזִיר}$, used of Israel in Egypt, or of Moses among the Midianites (Gen. xv. 13; Ex. ii. 22, xviii. 3; Deut. xxiii. 8). Where נָּזִיר means the non-Israelite resident in Israel, LXX seldom (Deut. xiv. 21) renders it by $\pi\acute{\alpha}\rhoοικος$, which more often corresponds to נָּזִיר (frequently with $\muισθωτός$, Ex. xii. 45; Lev. xxii. 10, xxv. 6, 40), but often by $\pi\rhoοσίγλυτος$ (Ex. xx. 10; Lev. xxv. 35, 47), and even by the Aramaic $\gammaειώpas$ (Ex. xii. 19; Isa. xiv. 1; cf. Just. Dial. cxxii., address), from which was derived the opprobrious term gi'aur, used in the Islamic period. It has yet to be proved that $\pi\acute{\alpha}\rhoοικος$ was ever used in Christian or in post-Biblical Jewish literature in the sense of proselyte. Cf. further, vol. i. 82, and Lightfoot (St. Clement, ii. 5 f.). The difference between the Christian and Jewish points of view is very clearly indicated by the Jewish inscriptions in Hierapolis (Altertümer von Hierapolis, by Humann, etc., 1898, S. 138, No. 212, $\tau\eta\ \kappaατοικία\ τῶν\ ἐν\ Ἱεραπόλει\ κατοικούντων\ Ἰουδαίων$). Here they formed a separate community ($\delta\ \lambda\acute{α}ος\ τῶν\ Ἰουδαίων$, S. 96, No. 69, 4-6), with their own city hall and archives (No. 69, 7, No. 212, 6; cf. S. 174, No. 342). Cf. also Jos. Ant. xvi. 6, 7. It also deserves notice that the only parallel in the N.T. Epistles to the designation of the readers, entirely without the article, is to be found in 2 John 1 ($\acute{\epsilon}κλεκτη\ \kappaυρία$). This is not to be explained by assuming that there were other Christians to whom the same name might be applied, since in that case it would be sufficient to say $\tauοῖς\ οὖσιν\ ἐν\ Πόντῳ$ (cf. Phil. i. 1), even if $\tauοῖς\ \acute{\epsilon}κλεκτοῖς$ had preceded. The real explanation is that the omission of the article serves here, as in 2 John 1, to emphasise more strongly the qualities mentioned, and to make more easily recognisable the figurative meaning of phrases used (cf. Jas. i. 18, $\acute{\alpha}παρχήν\ τινα$). Where the readers are called Christians in a literal sense, the article is not wanting, v. 14.

5. (P. 141.) It is taken for granted as certain that $\acute{\epsilon}κλεκτός$ in i. 1 is used in an attributive sense, as is always the case where the word stands in an attributive relation to another idea (1 Pet. ii. 4, 6, 9; 1 Tim. v. 21; Ex. xiv. 7, xxx. 23; 2 Sam. viii. 8); and, on the other hand, that $\piαρειδίημοι$ is used substantively, as in ii. 11 and in the LXX, where it is used as a translation of a substantive (n. 4). Furthermore, it is assumed that ver. 2 is not dependent upon $\acute{\epsilon}κλεκτοῖς$ alone, but upon the whole phrase, $\acute{\epsilon}κλ. . . \deltaιασπορᾶς$, for otherwise ($\tauοῖς\ \acute{\epsilon}κλ.$ would need immediately to precede $\kappaατὰ\ πρόγνωσιν$. Consequently it is not simply change of residence that makes the readers $\piαρειδίημοι\ διασπορᾶς$, but the Divine election and separation; and this election, in turn, together with the position of the readers in the world and their attitude toward God, corresponding to a Divine purpose, is due to the sanctifying work of the Spirit, and has for its purpose a constant obedience (cf. i. 14, 22) and a continuously needful purification through the blood of Christ (cf. 1 John i. 7). Since, besides the Christians here addressed, there were very many others to whom the $\acute{\epsilon}κλεκτοὶ\ \piαρειδίημοι$ applied equally well, it is perfectly evident that if the purpose here were to distinguish these Christians from others, $\acute{\epsilon}κλεκτοὶ\ \piαρειδίημοι$ would have to be followed by $\tauοῖς\ ἐν\ τῇ\ διασπορᾷ$, especially in view of the fact that it is without the article (cf. Jas. i. 1; vol. i. p. 79 f., n. 6), or by $\tauοῖς\ ἐκ\ τῆς\ διασπορᾶς$, if the word be used in its concrete sense ("Jews scattered among the heathen"). In this case the connection of ver. 2 would be rendered at least very difficult, since what is said in this verse has no connection with the alleged membership of the readers in the Jewish diaspora, but relates solely to their Christian character. That the insertion of a simple local name, such as Πόντου κτλ., does not preclude modification by clauses that follow, is proved by 1 Cor. i. 2; 1 Thess. i. 1. Consequently διασποράς, like so many similar genitives in the N.T. (Jas. i. 25, ἐπιλησμονῆς; 1 Pet. i. 14, ὑπακοῆς; Luke xviii. 6, τῆς ἀδικίας), is purely attributive=διεσπαρμένοις, and like ἐκλεκτοῖς παρεπιδήμοις, applicable to all Christians.

6. (P. 144.) Kuhl claims that ἐπιστρέφειν, in ii. 25 (which would apply also to the intransitive active, the sense of which is not essentially different), means in this passage, according to the predominant usage of the N.T., "to turn one's self again to that which one has formerly been." This meaning does not suit in those passages where the word is used of the conversion of the Gentiles (1 Thess. i. 9; Acts xi. 21, xiv. 15, xv. 19, xxvi. 18, 20; ἐπιστροφή τῶν ἐθνῶν, Acts xv. 3), which proves that this cannot possibly be the meaning of a word which is used alike of the conversion of Jews (Acts iii. 19, ix. 35; 2 Cor. iii. 16) and of the conversion of sinners generally (Jas. v. 16f.; Mark iv. 12; Luke i. 16f., xxii. 32). Nor is this meaning possible in passages like Matt. ix. 22; Mark v. 30, viii. 33 (cf. Matt. xvi. 23); Acts ix. 40, xvi. 18; Rev. i. 12; nor in Gal. iv. 9, where πάλιν would then be superfluous. The only passages remaining where ὑποστρέφειν (cf. the variant readings in Luke ii. 20; 2 Pet. ii. 21) and ἀνακάμπειν (Luke x. 6 = Matt. x. 13) are used in practically the same sense are Mark xiii. 16; Matt. x. 13, xii. 44; Luke viii. 55, xvii. 4; Acts xv. 36; but here there is no reference to conversion. The attempt to give the word this meaning is not any more successful if "bishop" be taken as referring to God, not to Christ, as is done by Kuhl and Weiss, without any good reason (cf. per contra, v. 4). Then it has also to be assumed that God was the Shepherd and Bishop of the souls of alleged Jewish Christians in Asia Minor before they fell into a heathen manner of life (iv. 2-4), from which manner of life it is assumed they have now returned again to their God. In proof of this fantastic representation of the personal history of all the Christians in Asia Minor, —quite as unknown to Peter as to ourselves,—it is claimed that in speaking of their wanderings (πλανώμενοι, not πλανώμενα), Peter compares them to sheep, which implies that they have always belonged to the flock of God, i.e. the people of Israel. But suppose that Peter not only compared them with sheep who had gone astray, but called them that in so many words, are we to assume that the sheep in Matt. xxv. 32 or John x. 16 are only Jews? In order to escape these interpreters, Peter ought to have called his readers swine or dogs (Matt. vii. 16, xv. 26). Possibly not even this would have sufficed, since in Phil. iii. 2 Jewish Christians are called dogs!

7. (P. 145.) The sole source of the tradition that Peter laboured in Pontus and other provinces of Asia Minor is 1 Pet. i. 1. This is proved by the language of Origen (above, p. 152, n. 2), who refers to this work as only probable. Cf. what Origen says with the more definite but very brief remarks in Epiph. Hær. xxvii. 6; Ephrem, Expos. ex. conc. 286. With regard to the other Syrians who refer to such work on Peter's part, see § 39, n. 3. In a later recension of the Acts of Andrew (ed. Bonnet, 1895, pp. 9, 14, not included in the collected edition of the elide Acta apocr., ed. Lipsius et Bonnet), there is to be found a confirmation of an alleged journey of Peter and Andrew to Sinope: καθὼς αὐτὸς Πέτρος ἐν τῇ καθολικῇ αὐτοῦ ἐπιστολῇ γράφει διεληλυθέναι Πόντον καὶ Γαλατίαν; cf. Eriph. Mon., ed. Dressel, p. 45. So this story is not even a legend, to say nothing of a primitive legend (as affirmed by Lipsius, Die apokryph. Apostelges. ii. 1. 4), but is simply the fabrication of exegesis.

8. (P. 146.) John is the only one of the evangelists who preserves the original Κηφᾶς (John i. 42); but the fact that he adds immediately a translation, and from this point on throughout the book—indeed, before this point—uses only Πέτρος (i. 40), shows that the readers were as unfamiliar with Κηφᾶς as they were with Μεσσίας (for Χριστός) or ῥαββί (for διδάσκαλος); cf. i. 38, 41. That this was true even more widely, is proved by the entire avoidance of Κηφᾶς in the Synoptics and in Acts even where the names of the disciples are given (Mark iii. 16; Luke vi. 14; especially peculiar is its omission in Matt. xvi. 16–18, where the Aramaic Βαρϊωνᾶ is used). Paul's constant use of Κεφᾶς in 1 Cor. (i. 12, iii. 22, ix. 5, xv. 5) is explained by the fact that he has in mind the followers of Cephas from Palestine, of whose language we learn in 1 Cor. xvi. 22; vol. i. 288 ff. In Galatians the tradition wavers, and is also rendered uncertain by the fact that the versions give no sure support for the correct reading, inasmuch as the Syriac versions use Kepha everywhere, and the Latin as well as the Greek texts of the West almost without exception offer Petrus. If, as the present writer believes to be the case, Πέτρος is to be read in Gal. ii. 7, 8 (but in i. 18, ii. 9, 11, 14 Κηφᾶς, ZKom. Gal. 68) the very remarkable change in ii. 9 to the Aramaic form of the name, after the Greek form had been used twice in ii. 7–8, is very naturally explained by the fact that thereby, just as by the use of στυλοί, Paul desires to give the form of speech used by the Judaistic teachers who had come to Galatia from Palestine. He then retains in ii. 11, 14 the form of the name used by these teachers, since he wishes to place in its proper light an incident which had been misrepresented by them in a hostile spirit. This motive also suits i. 18. Cf. in addition also § 41, n. 9. The fact that a number of ancient writers discover in several N.T. passages a Cephas distinct from Peter deserves mention only as a matter of curiosity: see Clemens Al. in Eus. H. E. i. 12. 2. (Cephas is here held to be one of the seventy disciples; cf. Forsch. iii. 68, and above, vol. i. 267f.); Apost. Const. chap. i. (Doctr. XII. Apost., ed. Funk, p. 50); Chron. pasch., ed. Bonn, i. 421. Cf. Jerome in Gal. ii. (Vall. vii. 408).

9. (P. 147.) Modern usage ("to give testimony, witness for Christ," and similar expressions) very easily obscures the meaning of biblical expressions which sound the same. Christ Himself would not be the faithful and true witness (Rev. i. 5, iii. 14) had not His revelation in the world of the truth of salvation been based upon His own immediate knowledge (John iii. 11, 32, v. 31, viii. 14, xviii. 37; 1 Tim. vi. 13). Seeing and testifying are inseparable (Rev. i. 2; John i. 34; 1 John i. 2, iv. 14). The disciples of Jesus could not be His witnesses unless with their own eyes they had seen Him who lived on earth and died and rose again, and unless they had perceived through all their senses His entire manifestation of Himself (John xv. 27, xxi. 24; Acts i. 8, 21 f., ii. 32, iii. 15, v. 32, x. 39, 41; 1 John i. 1–3; 2 Pet. i. 16–18); nor could Paul, had he not seen and heard Him at least once (Acts xxii. 15, xxvi. 16; 1 Cor. ix. 1, xv. 8, 15; and, on the other hand, cf. the distinction made in Acts xiii. 31 f.). With reference to Stephen, cf. Acts xxii. 20 with vii. 55. That Peter means in this strict sense to designate himself a witness of the sufferings, and so of the life of Jesus, is proved by the clause which follows, ὁ καὶ τῆς μελλούσης ἀποκαλύπτεσθαι δόξης κοινωνός, which does not mean participation purely in thought or in speech, but in fact and in person. Although the suffering of Christians born later than the time of Christ may be called fellow-suffering with Him (Rom. viii. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 11 f.; 2 Cor. i. 5), that does not of itself make anyone a witness of the sufferings of Christ. And even if it did, in the whole of 1 Pet. no trace is to be found of personal suffering on the part of Peter. If the participation in the glory of Christ for which Peter hopes, of which, according to Mark ix. 3-12, 2 Pet. i. 16-18, Luke xxiv. 34, John xxi. 2-23, 1 Cor. xv. 5, Acts x. 40 f., he already had a foretaste, is to be construed as in correlated contrast to the statement that he was a witness of His sufferings, then this last statement must imply also that Peter was an eye-witness of the Passion of Jesus.

10. (P. 148.) That δι' ἀναστάσεως κτλ., i. 3, is to be taken with ζῶσαν instead of with ἀναγεννήσας (thus Bengel, Hofmann), is extremely improbable. (1) ζῶν used attributively without the article cannot well be modified by an adverbial clause (cf. i. 23, ii. 4 f.; John vii. 38; Acts vii. 38; Rom. xii. 1); (2) it would require, not διὰ with the genitive, but διὰ with the accusative (John vi. 57; Rom. viii. 10), or ἐξ ἀναστάσεως (John iii. 5; Rom. i. 4; 2 Cor. xiii. 4). Of course, the interchange between "we" and "you," which may be compared to the similar interchange in Eph. i. 3, 13, Gal. iii. 23-iv. 7, is not to be understood as implying an absolute contrast applicable without exception to every single sentence. That would imply, for example, that Peter and men like him had already ceased to believe without seeing (i. 8); or that their inheritance was no longer preserved in heaven, but had been already received by them on earth; or that the readers had not been born again unto a living hope; or that the resurrection of Christ had no significance for their regeneration (cf. per contra, 1 Pet. iii. 21). It will be noticed, however, that where Peter describes the Christian state from the point of view of himself, he expresses himself in accordance with his own experience, just as in speaking of the Christian state of the readers he emphasises what is peculiar about their relation to the blessings of redemption in distinction from his own. That in i. 3, 4 he transfers himself vividly in imagination to the moment when he and his fellow-disciples were begotten again to a life of hope through the self-witness of the Risen Christ, is very clearly shown by the τετηρημένῃ . . . εἰς ἡμᾶς; since, if he merely intended to say here without reference to any specific point of time that all Christians would have to wait until the parousia in order to receive the inheritance which is laid up for them in heaven, it would have been necessary to use the expression τηρουμένῃ ἡμῖν, or rather ἡμῖν. But Peter is speaking from the point of view of the resurrection of Jesus. He and his fellow-disciples did not then immediately enter upon the possession of their inheritance (cf. Acts i. 6), but were quickened to a lively hope of the same, while the inheritance itself was deposited in heaven with Christ who had been raised to heaven (cf. Col. i. 12, iii. 2), where the inheritance had since been preserved. This took place, however, with a view to those who were to be called later, among whom the readers belonged. In order that these might be called and converted, the first disciples had to be content with expectation and hope of the inheritance which was not to be received until afterward.

11. (P. 148.) The interpretation of ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή to mean Peter's wife, advanced, e.g. by Mill (Nov. Test. p. 718), and Bengel in his Grammon, is not found, to the writer's knowledge, in any ancient author. It is true that Clemens Al. (Forsch. iii. 92, 102) understood by ἐκλεκτή κυρία, 2 John 1, "quandam Babyloniam Electam nomine," a real woman named "Eklekte," although this does not prevent him from interpreting the phrase allegorically with reference to the Church. The fact that he places her in Babylon can hardly be explained otherwise than by assuming that he identifies this Eklekte, or her sister mentioned in 2 John 13, whose name likewise must have been Eklekte (if, indeed, τῆς ἐκλεκτῆς is not to be taken only as an appositive to σοῦ), with the Syneklekte of 1 Pet. v. 13. But of the opinion that she was the wife of Peter, of whom Clement relates stories elsewhere derived from apocryphal sources (Strom. vii. 63 = Eus. H. E. iii. 30. 2; GK, ii. 828), the present writer finds no trace either in Clement or in any ancient writer. The Commentary of Didymus ends with 1 Pet. iv. An orator by the name of Chrysostom (Montfaucon, i. 821) is able to justify the contention that Peter had a wife only on the ground that mention is made in the Gospels of his mother-in-law. As a matter of fact, the opinion common in the early Church, that, according to Matt. xix. 27, Peter forsook even his wife (Orig. tom. xv. 21 in Matth. vol. iii. 683), and the consequent rejection of the interpretation of 1 Cor. ix. 5 to mean the wives of the apostles,—a view held by Clemens Al. Strom. iii. 53 (Jerome, c. Jovin. i. 26),—prevented the interpretation of 1 Pet. v. 13 to mean Peter's wife. The first trace of this interpretation which the present writer finds is that in the somewhat confused account of Barhebraeus concerning various opinions on 1 Pet. v. 13 and Acts xii. 12 f. (ed. Klamroth, pp. 15, 29). On the other hand, the interpretation of the word to mean the Church of the place in question is represented by the insertion of ἐκκλησία before συνεκλεκτή in 8, several cursives, Pesh. ("The elect Church"), Vulg. (Ecclesia quæ est in B. conlecta), Jerome (Vall. vi. 757), Cramer (Cat. viii. 82). That this is the correct interpretation is proved (1) by the fact that otherwise the relationship to Peter of the person sending greetings would have to be expressed, whereas the use of συν- to express the relation of the one sending greetings to those to whom the greetings are sent is entirely intelligible and sufficiently anticipated by i. 1 and ii. 9; (2) by the fact that a greeting from the wife of Peter to the whole Church of Asia Minor would presuppose a peculiar ecclesiastical importance on her part, which is all the more improbable because of the fact that Peter had had no direct relations with the readers; (3) by the fact that there is no plausible way in which to explain the mention of the place where this woman was residing, which at that time could not have been the place of Peter's residence.

12. (P. 149.) Ignatius, Philad. xi. 2; Smyrn. xii. 1, γράφω ὑμῖν διὰ Βούρρον, is, taken alone, quite as ambiguous as 1 Pet. v. 12. But from the analogy of Ignat. Rom. x. 1, γράφω ὑμῖν δι' Ἐφεσίων, which manifestly describes the Ephesian Christians, among them Croeus (cf. Ign. Eph. ii. 1), who is mentioned immediately in the same passage, as the forwarders and bearers of the letter, and of Polyc. (ad Phil. xiv. 1), it is clear that Burrus also is simply the bearer of the letter (cf. the writer's Ignatius, 242 f., 262). So in the very common notes at the end of the Pauline Epistles, διὰ Φοίβης, etc. (Tischendorf, ii. 457, 568, etc.). On the other hand, it is clear that the same words can be used to describe the composition of a letter. Concerning the epistle which Clement wrote by commission and in the name of the Roman Church, without anywhere disclosing his own identity, Dionysius writes to the Romans (in Eus. H. E. iv. 23. 11): τὴν προτέραν ἡμῶν διὰ Κλήμεντος γραφεῖσαν (ἐπιστολὴν ἡμῶν). Acts xv. 23 is ambiguous; for, while without any question Judas and Silas are described as the bearers of the communication from the Jerusalem Church (xv. 22, 25-27, 30), it is possible that they were also commissioned by the assembly to prepare it. The expression γράψαντες διὰ χειρὸς αὐτῶν, and the fact that it is used independently along with πέμψαι (xv. 22, 25, 27), favour the latter view, which is also more in keeping with the character of the men and the commission given them. The analogous understanding of 1 Pet. v. 12 is anticipated by Jerome, who undertakes to explain the difference in style between 1 Pet. and 2 Pet. by assuming that he made use of different interpretes (Epist. cxx. 11, ad Hedib.). Jerome makes no mention of Silvanus, nor does he think of a subsequent translation of letters written by Peter himself in a different language; but of the writing of the letters by helpers having more linguistic ability than Peter, commissioned by him, and in his name (cf. GK, ii. 881). In modern times a more or less strong influence upon the form and contents of 1 Pet. has been attributed to Silvanus by H. Ewald (Sieben Sendschreiben des NT, 1870, S. 3, 73), W. Grimm (ThStKr, 1872, S. 688 ff.), Spitta (Der 2 Pt. u. Ju. 1885, S. 531).

§ 39. TIME AND PLACE OF THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PETER.

The location of the Church from which greeting is sent to those in Asia Minor, and thus the locality where Peter was residing at the time, is described as Babylon. This does not appear to be intended as news, by which the readers are informed for the first time of Peter's place of residence. Such a communication would be without parallel in all other N.T. Epistles, and totally different in form from similar communications in other letters (n. 1). Assuming that the readers already know where Peter is staying, the name Babylon seems rather to be intended to describe the conditions by which he himself and the Church where he resides are surrounded. In v. 9 it was suggested that the whole Church throughout the world had to endure the same sufferings as the readers. So here attention seems to be called to the fact that the small portion of the "brotherhood" from whom Peter sends greeting, and Peter himself, are in the capital of the empire, and so just as much strangers, far removed from the land of promise and the city whose true citizens are Christians, as the readers, who are so sorely in need of consolation (above, p. 140 f.). If, also, we take into consideration the fact that the Church sending greetings is personified, being represented as the sister of the Churches in Asia (above, p. 148), and that Mark is called the son of Peter only in a figurative sense, it follows, even on purely exegetical grounds, that it is Rome, the capital of the empire, which is called Babylon, the place of the writer's residence. If the Babylon at the southern extremity of the Nile delta, or the ancient city of that name on the Euphrates, long destroyed (n. 2), be meant, it is impossible to explain how every trace of the tradition of the work of Peter on the Nile or the Euphrates could disappear from the Church as a whole, and, in particular, from the Churches of the lands in question. And this difficulty is increased by the fact that it is not a question of an accidental sojourn, but, as the names of two such prominent missionaries as Silvanus and Mark along with that of Peter prove, of important missionary labours on the part of Peter in these countries. The Church in Alexandria and Egypt never attributed its founding to Peter, but always to Mark (§ 51, n. 8). And for centuries nothing was known in the tradition of the Syrian Church as to a residence of Peter in Babylon, until some scholars of the Middle Ages undertook to prove it from 1 Pet. v. 13 (n. 3). If there had existed such traditions as made possible the literal interpretation of the name Babylon, which was also the most natural one, the interpretation that makes 1 Pet. v. 13 refer to Rome—which came more and more to be accepted, and which can be traced back to the beginning of the second century—could certainly not have been universally accepted; in fact, could scarcely have arisen at all. The entire absence of such traditions makes it impossible to believe—more so, in case the letter is spurious, than if the letter is genuine—that the writer would lead his readers to suppose that he was in Egypt or Babylonia. On the contrary, even assuming that the letter is spurious, the age and general acceptance of the interpretation of 1 Pet. v. 13, which makes it refer to Rome, are proofs that Peter visited Rome. Rightful opposition to the extravagant claims which for more than a thousand years the Bishops of Rome have made on the basis of this fact, ought not so persistently to mislead Protestant scholars into the denial of the well-attested fact itself (n. 4).

If, then, it be accepted as certain that 1 Peter was written in Rome, or purports to have been written there, the time of its composition is fixed within comparatively narrow limits. The story that Peter's Roman episcopate lasted from twenty to twenty-five years did not appear until after the beginning of the fourth century, and all the more ancient traditions affirm that Peter did not come to Rome until the time of Paul's activity there; while the few definite accounts which we have from the second century place the whole of Peter's residence and his martyrdom in the interval between Paul's first imprisonment in Rome and the second, which ended with his execution. To this are to be added all the indications that Peter was crucified late in the summer or in the autumn of the year 64 in the Vatican gardens, in order to satisfy the fury of Nero (n. 4). Moreover, with these ancient traditions agrees the negative testimony of the N.T. writings which cover this period. Leaving out of account Acts xxviii. 30 f., the silence of Paul concerning contemporaneous work in Rome on the part of Peter in the letters of the first Roman captivity, especially in passages like Col. iv. 10 f. and Phil. i. 14–18, would be inexplicable if Peter were preaching there at the time. It is even more inconceivable that

Peter, in a letter to the Churches in Asia Minor founded by Paul and his helpers, should send greetings from the Roman Church and from Mark, and say nothing about Paul, if Paul were living and working in the same community. Even assuming that the letter was written shortly after the death of Paul, Peter's entire silence regarding him could not be explained as due to tender regard for the Christians of Asia Minor, who were in so much need of comfort in other respects, but would have to be regarded as an extremely unnatural thing, no matter whether the readers learned of the apostle's death shortly before receiving Peter's letter, or were informed of it for the first time by the person who brought the same. On the other hand, everything fits together naturally, providing we follow the tradition, freed from later fictions. If Mark, who, up to the time when Colossians was written, was known in Colossæ only by name as the cousin of Barnabas, journeyed from Rome to Asia Minor shortly after the sending of Colossians, sometime during the autumn of 62 or the spring of 63 (Col. iv. 10), such a relation of Mark to the Asian Churches would have been then established as is presupposed in 1 Pet. v. 13. It is at least possible that this journey of Mark in the East was extended to Jerusalem, his native city, and that he informed his "father," Peter, of the condition of things in Rome. If Peter heard of the troubles which Jewish Christian preachers were making for Paul in Rome (vol. i. 442, 543), and learned of Paul's intention immediately after being liberated, as he expected to be, to go from Rome to the far West, it is possible that he felt called to go at once to the capital of the empire, now that Paul had left it. This was not in any sense a violation of the agreement made with Paul and Barnabas some twelve years before (vol. i. p. 266), since the Church in Rome from its beginning was anything but a Church founded by the apostle to the Gentiles, being composed largely of native

Jews, part of whom were Jewish Christians from Palestine (vol. i. pp. 421-434). If Peter reached Rome, apparently in company with Mark, in the autumn of 63, or even as late as the spring of 64, Paul was no longer there. If Paul had undertaken a missionary journey to Spain of uncertain duration, it was all the more natural for Peter, following Paul's example, to assume the care of the Churches in Asia, as he does in writing 1 Peter. By making use of the assistance of Silvanus, whom many of the Christians addressed in the letter had come to know in his capacity as Paul's helper, he was able the more easily to strike the note that would find an echo in the hearts of the Christians in Asia Minor who had been instructed by Paul and his helpers. When Paul found time again to visit the East, and long before he was imprisoned again in Rome and executed, Peter had suffered martyrdom in that city. Peter laboured there at most not more than a year, possibly only part of a year. Since there is nothing in 1 Peter to indicate that Peter had recently come to Rome, and since, on the other hand, his residence there seems to be already known to the readers when he writes, it is probable that the letter was not written until sometime in the course of the year 64, a few months before its author's death.

1. (P. 158.) Paul always left it to the persons by whom his letters were dispatched to say from what point they brought his letters to the readers. Only in rare instances does he mention a city in such a way that his residence there can be inferred, e.g. 1 Cor. xvi. 8. There is a certain hint in Rom. xvi. 1, cf. xvi. 23, which can easily be as misleading as 1 Thess. iii. 1. On the other hand, see Ign. Magn. xv. ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς Ἐφέσιοι ἀπὸ Σμύρνης, ὅθεν καὶ γράφω ὑμῖν; cf. Eph. xxi.; Trall. xii.; Rom. x.; Philad. xi.; Smyrn. xii.

2. (P. 159.) Babylon in Egypt, situated between Memphis and Heliopolis, on the site which afterwards became Cairo, was a city of no small importance (Strabo, xvii. p. 807), and is also occasionally mentioned in ecclesiastical literature: Athan. Hid. Arian ad mon. 72; Theodoret on Ezek. xl. (Schulze, ii. 929); Epiphanius (Mon., ed. Dressel, p. 6) goes so far as to call it τὴν μεγάλην βασιλίδαν. Regarding the rapid decline of the ancient Babylon on the Euphrates, see the review in Pauly-Wissowa, RE, ii. 2679ff. Strabo (xvi. p. 738) applies to it the verse, "The great city has become a wilderness"; Pliny says (H. N. vi. 122): cetero (i.e. with the exception of the temple of Bel, which still remained) ad solitudinem rediit; Pausanias says (viii. 33. 3; cf. i. 16. 3), speaking not with reference to his own time, but with reference to the time of the founding of Seleucia, that only the walls of Babylon were left. Of the Jews in Babylon, i.e. in Babylonia (cf. Philo, Leg. ad Cai. xxxi. 36), it is possible that some few found lodging among the ruins of the ancient city (Theodoret on Isa. xiii., Schulze, ii. 264); but the great majority of them dwelt in the neighbouring cities of Seleucia, Nehardea, and the villages (Jos. Ant. xviii. 9. 1-9).

3. (P. 159.) Probably Papias favoured the interpretation of Babylon which made it refer allegorically to Rome (GK, i. 888); for, according to Eus. H. E. ii. 15, the story told by Clemens Alexandrinus in the sixth book of his Hypotyposes about the origin of Mark in Rome during the time when Peter was preaching there, is supported by the testimony of Papias (see below, § 51, n. 10). The further tradition given by Eusebius in the same passage, that Peter wrote 1 Pet. in Rome, and that Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13) is a figurative expression for Rome, cannot be traced back to Clement, a witness named before and alongside of Papias; for although in his comment on 1 Pet. v. 13 he takes advantage of the occurrence of the name of Mark in order to speak of the Roman origin of his Gospel, he says nothing about the place where 1 Pet. was written, either in this passage or anywhere else in his commentary. Indeed, elsewhere he identifies Babylon with the ancient city in the land of the "Parthians" (Forsch. iii. 83, 95, 102, 72 f.; above, p. 157, n. 11). It was therefore probably Papias who interpreted Babylon in 1 Pet. v. 13 to mean Rome, as Rufinus understood him to do. With this agrees the fact that Papias quotes passages from 1 Pet. (according to Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 16); that he places high value upon the Apocalypse, which might easily suggest such an interpretation of Babylon; and, finally, the fact that he interpreted other biblical passages allegorically (Patr. apos., ed. minor, p. 74). This interpretation was from the first the prevailing one in the Church, and continued to be so; cf. Jerome, Vir. Ill. viii.; or Hilary (of Arles?) on 1 Pet. v. 13 (Spicil. Casin. iii. 1. 241, where we have also the purely allegorical interpretation in confusione gentium); Andreas on Rev. p. 76, καὶ ἡ πρεσβυτέρα δὲ Ῥώμη Βαβυλὼν ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ Πέτρου προσαγορεύεται; Cramer, Cat. viii. 82; Schol. in Matt. pp. 80, 205; and Tischendorf. Similarly there does not exist any tradition worthy of credence concerning the residence of Peter on the Euphrates. That Clement was not familiar with any such tradition, is sufficiently proved by the fact that he says nothing about it in connection with 1 Pet. v. 13 and 2 John 1, 13 (above, p. 157). In the Acts of Philip, which were not written before 400, and which are absurd in character (Acta apocr., ed. Lipsius et Bonnet, ii. part 2. 16. 7; cf. Forsch. vi. 18-24), it is related that Philip went to the land of the Parthians, and in a certain place (ἐν τινι πῶλει) found Peter. If there were any connection between this story and 1 Pet. v. 13, it would be indicated by the use of the name Babylon. Nor is there any independent tradition behind the story; for, in addition, Philip finds there John (op. cit. p. 162), who had just as little to do with the Parthians as did Philip himself. Cosmas Indicopleustes, who questioned the genuineness of the Catholic Epistles (GK, ii. 232), cites 1 Pet. v. 13 once (Montfaucon, Coll. nov. Patrum, ii. 147f.), without so much as saying that it was written by Peter, making the reference apparently only in order not to omit mention of the fact that there is in the N.T. an uncertain suggestion of an early spread of Christianity in Mesopotamia. He makes Thaddeus the missionary of Persia. According to the more ancient tradition, Thomas was the apostle to Parthia, to which territory Babylon belonged (Origen in Eus. H. E. iii. 1. 1; Clement, Recogn. ix. 29; Ephr. Expos. ev. concord. 286; Rufin. H. E. i. 6; Socr. H. E. i. 19). This is not contradicted by the other tradition, likewise ancient, which makes Thomas the apostle of India; indeed, there is a certain connection between the two, since in the latter at least the bones of Thomas, who died in India, are represented as being brought to Mesopotamia, or more specifically to Edessa (Acta Thomæ, Supplement, Cod. apocr., ed. Bonnet, 94. 10, 131. 18, 159. 15; Acta apocr., ed. Lipsius et Bonnet, ii. part 2, 286. 11; Ephr. Carm. Nisib. xlii.; Chron. Edess. cc. xxxviii. lxi., ed. Hallier, 61 f., 103, 111; Rufin. H. E. ii. 5; also Chrysostom, Montf. xii. 237, makes reference to the same). On the other hand, neither are there traces of any tradition of Peter's activity in Babylon among the interpreters of the Antiochian school, nor in the Syrian national Church. The "Teaching of Addai," the essential parts of which were known to Eusebius (H. E. i. 13), makes Thomas the principal leader of missionary work in the East, who sent Addai, one of the seventy or seventy-two disciples, to Edessa (ed. Phillips, p. 5). On the other hand, it is Peter who sends the Epistles of Paul from Rome to the Syrian Christians (p. 46). This legend knows nothing of an Antiochian episcopate of Peter, but is familiar only with his Roman episcopate; for it is only through the mediation of Peter's Roman colleague that Serapion of Antioch receives ordination as a bishop, an imprimatur which goes back ultimately to Peter. Among the places where Peter preached, Ephrem mentions besides Rome only the districts in Asia Minor mentioned in 1 Pet. i. 1 (Expos. ev. conc. 286; above, p. 154; cf. Hymn. ed. Lamy, i. 342, 712, Peter in Rome; Carm. Nisib. lix. 2 f.; Expos. ev. conc. 231, 237, crucified head downward). The Syriac "Teaching of the Apostles," of a somewhat late date, mentions Addai as the missionary of northern Mesopotamia, and his follower Aggai as the founder of the Churches in "the regions about Babylon" and in the lands lying farther east. On the other hand, according to this same account, Peter founded Churches in Antioch and the parts of Syria adjacent, in Pontus and other provinces of Asia Minor, before he went from Antioch to Rome, where, with Paul, he suffered martyrdom under Nero (Cureton, Ancient documents, 33, 34, 35). It also quotes among the letters of the apostles, "What Simon wrote from Rome" (p. 32), i.e. 1 Pet., and interprets Babylon to mean Rome. Cf. the note at the end of a MS of the sixth or seventh century (Wright, Catal. p. 82), "The end of the letter of the apostle Peter, written from Rome." Similarly the confused views about Rome or Rhode, a daughter of Peter, of which Barhebraeus gives an account in connection with 1 Pet. v. 13; Acts xii. 12, 13 (above, p. 157, n. 11), are to be traced back ultimately to the interpretation of Babylon to mean Rome. [Barhebraeus himself understands the "Church," which he read in the Syriac text of 1 Pet. v. 13 (above, p. 157), to mean "The assembly of the apostles in Jerusalem"; and "Babylon" he takes as referring to the upper room, Acts i. 13, where he represents the Pentecostal miracle and many others to have taken place. Possibly with this view of Barhebraeus is to be connected the no less remarkable statement about 1 Pet. to be found in

Syncellus, ad A. M. 5540 (ed. Bonn, 627), ἄλλοι δὲ ἀπὸ Ἰόππης φασὶ γεγράφθαι, where there is an evident attempt to connect the letter with Acts ix. 36-x. 23.] The Syriac "Teaching of Simon Kepha" (Cureton, Anc. doc. 35-40) deals only with the twenty-five years of Peter's labours in Rome. The Acta Maris (ed. Abbeloos, 1885, dated by the editor in the fifth or sixth century) speak of Peter in Rome (pp. 31, 35), and describe the founding of the Church in Babylonia by Mare (47 ff.) without any suggestion of earlier, perhaps fruitless, preaching by the apostle in the same regions. George, bishop of the Arabians (translation by Ryssel, S. 58), writing in the eighth century, speaks of "Peter and Paul in Antioch and Rome and the regions adjacent," but says nothing more. Likewise Solomon of Bassora, writing in 1220 (translation by Schönfelder, S. 77), says, "In Antioch one year, in Rome twenty-seven." The only missionaries of Mesopotamia in general—particularly of Babylonia—known to Ebedjesu (Assemani, Bibl. or. iii. 2. 4) are Thomas, Bartholomew, Addai, and Mare. When, therefore, Amrus and Jeshujab (Assemani, iii. 2. 6 f.; cf. also Abbeloos, p. 10) claim with express reference to 1 Pet. v. 13 that Peter also was in Babylon, it is perfectly clear that this is not Syrian tradition, but only a product of later erudition. Lipsius' claim, based upon these quotations (Apokr. apostelgesch. ii. part 1. 3, n. 3, ii. part 2. 145), that from the first the Syrian Church was unanimous in its interpretation of 1 Pet. v. 13 to mean Babylon proper, and held the corresponding form of the tradition, is a strange perversion of the actual facts in the case, while his further conjecture that the tradition of Simon Peter's presence in Babylon was supplanted by the tradition of the work of Simon Zelotes in these regions (ii. part 2. 146, Supplement, S. 32) is without foundation, because the latter tradition was just as much unknown among the Syrians as the former. It should be mentioned also that the pseudo-Moses of Chorene (Chron. ii. 33, translated by Lauer, S. 94; A. Carrière, La légende d'Abgar, etc., 1895, p. 406), in his letter from Abgar to Nerseh in Babylon inserts a prophecy about the coming of Simon, i.e. Peter, to Babylon. Erbes (ZfKG, 1901, S. 18 f.), who blindly follows Lipsius in respect of the Syrian tradition, feels the insufficiency of his evidence against the Roman sojourn of Peter, and takes refuge in the desperate assumption that by Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13) Jerusalem is to be understood.

4. (P. 160.) Among the martyrs whose murder is to be avenged by the overthrow of Babylon are to be found, according to Rev. xviii. 20 (cf. xvii. 6, xix. 2), also apostles. Now it is true that Babylon in Rev. is not entirely synonymous with Rome, but is a metaphorical name for the imperial city in every age, especially in the last age. When, however, this book was written the imperial city was Rome. And if more than one apostle had not suffered martyrdom in Rome, then no apostles' blood had been shed in the imperial city, and the sentence is meaningless. What other apostle's name occurs so naturally in connection with Paul as that of Peter? Lipsius' argument against this interpretation (Apokr. apostelgesch. ii. 1) requires no refutation. The series of witnesses for Peter's presence in Rome, who mention him by name, begins with Clemens Romanus (above, 60, 68 ff.). The second witness is Ignatius; for although the thought that he was not in a position to give commandments to the Church like an apostle is expressed elsewhere (Thrall. iii. 3; cf. Eph. xi. 2-xii. 2), only in his letter to the Romans does he use these words, οὐχ ὡς Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος ὑμῖν διατάσσομαι (iv. 3). Since, however, there is no suggestion of a letter from Peter to the Roman Church, Ignatius' statement must mean that Peter had had to do with the Romans in person. In all probability the third witness is Papias (above, p. 163, and below, § 51, n. 10). As the fourth, the present writer, with greater confidence, mentions Marcion. By changing the text of Phil. i. 15-18, especially by inserting the οὐδέν μοι διαφέρει of Gal. ii. 6, he forces the reader to his view that Paul is referring in this passage to Peter and his companions (GK, i. 592, A. 3, 648; ii. 528). In Marcion's text, Col. iv. 11 and Phil. i. 15-18 were written on the same page, so that he also maintained that the persons referred to in the former passage were there called Jewish preachers in Rome by Paul, who could not have recognised them as his fellow-labourers. No one claims that Marcion was ignorant of the composition of Phil. in Rome, or that he denied it, so that he must have held that Peter was actively engaged as a preacher of the gospel in the vicinity of Paul while he was a prisoner in Rome. Connected with the testimony of Marcion is that of Dionysius of Corinth, Irenæus, Canon Muratori (to the extent that it connects the Passio Petri with the departure of Paul from Rome to Spain), already discussed (above, p. 73 ff.), also that of Caius of Rome, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Origen, Petrus Alexandrinus, Lactantius, and all the later authors, including the Syrians, who made no effort to take Peter away from the Romans in order that they might claim him for themselves (above, p. 163 f.). There is to be added also the testimony of Clemens Alexandrinus in two passages of his Hypotyposes mentioned above, p. 163, n. 3 (Lib. vi. fragments 15, 16; and on 1 Pet. v. 13, Forsch. iii. 72, 83, 95). This testimony is limited to the preaching of Peter in Rome and the origin of Mark, and contains no indication as to date. Of course, Eusebius' appeal to the authority of Clement (H. E. ii. 15. 2) cannot be made to cover the whole narrative from ii. 13 on. Even that which immediately precedes the appeal to Clement in Eusebius' account—leaving out of account the fact that he appeals at the same time to the authority of Papias—is only partly Clement's, since it contradicts Clement's own statements which have been accurately handed down to us (Forsch. iii. 72, A. 1, and below, § 51, nn. 8, 9). In addition, we have also the legends belonging between 160 and 190, especially the Acts of Peter, a Gnostic document (above, p. 73 f.). In all authors heretofore mentioned, when chronological data are given at all, it is no more than the general statement that the two apostles worked in Rome, and suffered martyrdom at about the same time; while a few others, such as Tertullian, Origen, and Lactantius, affirm that the apostles were put to death by Nero. In the Acts of Peter, on the other hand, we have the more definite statement that the whole Roman residence of Peter and his martyrdom fell in the one year which, according to this same document, intervened between the first and second Roman imprisonments of Paul, and was occupied by his Spanish journey (above, pp. 62-67, 73-84). This same representation of the matter comes to view in the Canon Muratori, since this does not bring together the martyrdom of the two apostles, but the Spanish journey of Paul and the martyrdom of Peter. The fact that the Acts of Peter place the whole of Peter's Roman residence in the reign of Nero, and nevertheless make Peter leave Jerusalem for Rome twelve years after the beginning of the apostolic preaching (Lipsius, 49. 11), is not to be explained as due to an impossible chronological reckoning, but to the naive combining—quite in keeping with the fantastic character of this work of Leucius—of the prevailing tradition, according to which both Peter and Paul worked in Rome and were put to death under Nero, with a saying of Jesus which the author took from a much older work, namely, The Preaching of Peter (Clem. Strom. vi. 43; GK, ii. 821). The latter writing, which claims to be a work of Peter himself, while possibly containing a prophetic reference to the death of Peter, naturally contains no account of the same (GK, ii. 820–832). It is also to be observed that none of the writers mentioned considered Peter as bishop of Rome. Leaving out of account Clemens Romanus, Ignatius, and Clemens Alexandrinus, who make no definite statements about the relation of Peter to the Roman Church, Dionysius (Eus. ii. 25. 8), Irenæus (iii. 1. 1, 3. 2, 3), Caius (Eus. ii. 25. 7) speak of Peter and Paul as the missionary preachers through whom the Roman Church was founded. Linus and his successors on the Roman throne are not as bishops successors of Peter. Not Peter, but “the apostles,” gave Linus his episcopal office (Iren. iii. 3. 3). The Roman bishops were counted from Linus, who was reckoned as the first bishop; they were not designated first, second, third after Peter, but from the time of the apostles (ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων). The different reckoning to be found in Irenæus, i. 27. 1, iii. 4. 3, which presupposes that there was a bishop preceding Linus, namely, Peter, is a falsification, inconsistent with the fundamental views of Irenæus; and that it is an error is confirmed by text tradition. Even Epiphanius (Hær. xxvii. 6), who makes use in this passage among other authorities of reports of Hegesippus (cf. Lightfoot, Clement, i. 328 f., cf., however, Forsch. vi. 260), mentions as the first of the Roman bishops not Peter, but “Peter and Paul,” beginning with these very clear words: ἐν Ῥώμῃ γὰρ γεγόνασι πρῶτοι Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος ἀποστόλοι καὶ ἐπίσκοποι. Even the ancient Acts of Peter and the Acts of Paul make the two apostles simply preachers of the gospel in Rome, labouring hand in hand; there is no suggestion that Peter occupied the position of a bishop in Rome (GK, ii. 840). And the same is true even of the late recensions of the legends, e.g. the so-called “Linus,” and the combined Acts of Peter and Paul. Obscure, to say the least, is the indication of Peter’s bishopric in Rome to be derived from the fact that Tertullian makes Clement receive ordination from Peter alone (Præser. xxxii.; but cf. chap. xxxvi.). It is not until the middle of the third century that we find the Roman bishopric clearly represented as the cathedra Petri, e.g. in Cyprian (Epist. lv. 8, lix. 14), and in a sermon of practically the same date in Cyprian’s name by a Roman bishop, de Aleatoribus, chap. i., and in the fabricated letter of Clement to James (Clementina, ed. Lagarde, 6), which can hardly be of an earlier date. Leaving out of account the end of the Teaching of Addai (ed. Phillips, Syr. 52, Eng. 50), concerning which it may be questioned whether the conclusion belonged originally to this writing, the other parts of which are to be dated prior to Eusebius, Eusebius is the first known writer who states that Peter was bishop of the Roman Church for a definite number of years. But in the ecclesiastical history and in other works where he speaks of Peter in Rome (Demonstratio evang., de Theophania), he never calls him a bishop, and in speaking of the Roman bishops he always uses the ancient mode of expression already mentioned (H. E. iii. 21. 2). Nor does he say anything as to the time when Peter left Antioch and Euodius succeeded him there (iii. 22, 36. 2). The time of Peter's arrival in Rome he indicates very indefinitely (ii. 14. 6 under Claudius); and this disagrees with the date given in the Chronicle, which was written earlier. All this goes to show that Eusebius placed no reliance whatever upon the dates given in the Chronicle, which, though definite, are self-contradictory. In the Chronicle (Armenian version), under the date anno Abrah. 2055 (A.D. 39)=the third year of Caius, he remarks that Peter came to Rome after the founding of the Church in Antioch, and lived there as head of the Church for twenty years; but he does not make Euodius succeed Peter as bishop of Antioch until anno Abrah. 2058 (A.D. 42)=the second year of Claudius. Generally, the Roman episcopate of Peter is placed at "twenty-five years" instead of twenty; so, e.g. in the list of bishops in the Roman Chronicle of 354 (Catal. Liberianus in Duchesne, Lib. pont. i. 2). Incorporated in this Chronicle is a depositio martyrum (op. cit. p. 11), which shows that Peter's induction into the office of bishop was celebrated on viii. Kal. Mart.; see also the Chronicle of Eusebius as revised by Jerome under the date anno Abrah. 2058 (A.D. 42)=second year of Claudius (cf. Vir. Ill. i.); also the Teaching of Addai and the majority of later catalogues (cf., however, Duchesne, Lib. pont. i. 16, 34, 39, 40). This is not the place in which to investigate the origin of the sacred number 25, which possibly may be only an expression in round numbers for "something more than twenty years." It is perfectly evident, however, that Eusebius, who did not find and who does not give any definite tradition about the time of Peter's death (above, p. 78 f.), did not get his twenty years by counting back from the year of Peter's death. On the other hand, from the ecclesiastical history we learn what it was that led him to assume this long residence of Peter in Rome, in contradiction to the universal testimony of the early Church and the indirect testimony of the N.T. From Justin (Apol. i. 26) and Irenæus (i. 23. 1), Eusebius was acquainted with the tradition that Simon Magus came to Rome in the reign of Claudius, and was there deified (H. E. ii. 13. 2-5). Now, the tradition that Simon came to Rome in the reign of Claudius can hardly be due to a misinterpretation of the inscription on a statue of the Sabine god, Semo Sancus, which stood on the island in the Tiber, a misinterpretation reproduced in Justin, Irenæus, Tertullian, and many later writers (see Otto on Just. Apol. i. 26; Öhler on Tert. Apol. xiii.), and which in different form is made use of in the ancient Acts of Peter (ed. Lipsius, 57. 24). Rather does the misinterpretation of the inscription presuppose the tradition about Simon. There is nothing about the inscription to suggest the time of Claudius (C. I. L. vi. 1, No. 567), and there is nothing in the account in Acts viii. which could suggest its dating in this reign. Furthermore, only if it were already known from other sources that Simon Magus was once in Rome, could it possibly occur to anyone that this statue and its inscription had reference to him. Consequently, it follows that before the middle of the second century it was generally believed in Rome that Simon lived there, and carried on his work under Claudius; and the present writer knows no reason why this should not be regarded as a genuine tradition. Now, in the Acts of Peter (written between 160 and 170), a book which was much read in the East as well as in the West (GK, ii. 843-848), we have the account of numerous contests in Rome between Simon Magus and Peter, all of them connected more or less closely with Acts viii. (GK, ii. 854). To be sure, these contests are said to have taken place in the reign of Nero, while Paul was occupied with his Spanish journey; but in this same story the tradition which connects Simon Magus with Claudius has apparently a certain connection with the anachronistic statement that these took place twelve years after the beginning of the apostolic preaching (above, p. 166, last line). With this tradition is to be connected the story (Acta Petri, pp. 48. 19 ff., 49. 21 ff.) that immediately after the first appearance of the Magician in Rome, Peter in Jerusalem received the divine command to go to Rome in order to combat him. Under the influence of this narrative, especially of the proofs there adduced of the divine guidance in the whole matter (Acta Petri, pp. 49. 17-31, 51. 25-31, 52. 17), Eusebius writes that shortly after the appearance of Simon Magus in Rome, while Claudius was still on the throne (H. E. ii. 14. 6, παρὰ πόδας γούν ἐπὶ τῆς αὐτῆς Κλαυδίου βασιλείας), Divine Providence sent Peter to Rome to oppose him. When, on the other hand, the persecution of Christians by Nero was regarded as the climax of his atrocities, and in consequence of this the martyrdom of the two apostles was brought down toward the end of his reign (above, p. 78), Peter's residence in Rome is made to cover more than a decade. Eusebius was not the only writer—perhaps he was not the first one—who was led by the Acts of Peter, through the combination of the tradition of Simon Magus' residence in Rome under Claudius with the tradition of Peter's martyrdom in Rome under Nero, to assume a long Roman episcopate of Peter. Once it had arisen and become current, the story lost all connection with its sources. Even in the Chronicle of the year 354 the twenty-five years' episcopate is treated as an independent date, and incredibly enough is placed between 30 and 55 A.D., both in the list of bishops and in the Fasti Consulares (cf. Mommsen, Chron. min. i. 57, 73). The later Lib. pontif. retains the twenty-five years, although it places both the arrival of Peter in Rome and his death in the reign of Nero, which covered only thirteen years (Duchesne, i. 50, 118). With regard to the manner of Peter's death, in 2 Pet. i. 14 the expectation is expressed, based upon a prediction of Christ's, that he will die a quick, i.e. a sudden and violent, death. When John xxi. 18-23 was written, it must have been generally known that Peter was crucified prior to the destruction of Jerusalem. While Clement (ad Cor. v., see above, p. 68 ff.), Canon Muratori, and many other writers merely say that he died a martyr's death, from Tertullian on there is frequent mention of his crucifixion in Rome (above, p. 76 f.). It is not possible certainly to determine from Origen (c. Cels. ii. 14. cf. Eus. Chron. under anno Abrah. 2048) whether this report had been heard by Phlegon, a manumitted slave of Hadrian's. The legend that he was crucified head downward is evidently an invention of the Gnostic Acts of Peter, which date from about the year 170 (ed. Lipsius, p. 92 ff.),—an invention, however, which is accepted by Origen as true (Eus. H. E. iii. 1. 2). The way is prepared for this story by the conversation between Peter, as he was fleeing from Rome, and Christ who appeared to him, in which Christ says first, εἰσέρχομαι εἰς τὴν Ῥώμην σταυρωθῆναι, and then ναί, Πέτρε, πάλιν σταυροῦμαι (p. 88. 9, cf. GK, ii. 846). The common source of this story and that of the crucifixion of

Peter head downward is evidently the ambiguous saying of Christ which Origen (in Jo. tom. xx. 12) quotes from the Catholic Acts of Paul, ἀνωθεν (i.e. denuo, but also desuper) μέλλω σταυρωθῆναι. Since, for chronological and other reasons, it is unlikely that the author of the Acts of Peter made use of the Acts of Paul, it is probable that the author of the Gnostic Acts of Peter and the author of the Catholic Acts of Paul, who wrote not much later, took the story from an older source, probably the "Preaching of Peter." For the original meaning of the saying, which possibly had nothing whatever to do with the death of Peter, see GK, ii. 878. In view of these facts, it is altogether unlikely that the story of Peter's crucifixion head downward is historical. On the other hand, there is no reason to call in question the Roman local tradition, firmly established by the year 210, and so certainly not due to a sudden new discovery or invention, that Paul was beheaded on the Via Ostiensis and Peter crucified near the Mons Vaticanus, and that both were buried near the places where they were executed (above, p. 81 f.). Had there been an inclination to supply by invention what could not be certainly known,—in view of the connecting of Peter and Paul, which was quite universal from the time of Clemens Romanus,—it would have been natural to think of them as united in death and burial. On the Mons Vaticanus, in the Ager Vaticanus, were the gardens of Agrippina and Domitia, both of which became the property of Nero. According to Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44), it was in these extensive pleasure-grounds that the terrible executions of Christians took place in the year 64 (hortos suos ei spectaculo Nero obtulerat), and among those sacrificed were also crucibus affixi. The agreement of this statement with the tradition about the manner and place of Peter's death has all the more weight, because the tradition of the early Church shows no connection between the martyrdom of Peter and the burning of Rome, much less does it show affinities with the description of Tacitus. Only by taking chap. vi. of Clement's letter in connection with chap. v. is it possible to infer any connection between the scenes described by Tacitus and the death of at least one of the apostles. To these considerations is to be added the fact that the entire Roman residence of Peter must fall in the interval between the first and second Roman imprisonments of Paul (above, p. 160 f.), i.e. between the autumn of 63 and the autumn of 66. There is consequently nothing in the way of the assumption, made so natural by traditions which there is no reason to suspect, that Peter perished late in the summer of 64 as a victim of Nero's attack upon the Christians in Rome. Baur (Christent. der drei ersten Jahrh. 2te Aufl. 86-93, 141-145; Paulus, 2te Aufl. 246-272) believed that the entire tradition of Peter's residence in Rome, which has just been examined, could be explained from the pseudo-Clementine Romance and so refuted; and this view has been taken up and further developed especially by Lipsius (Quellen der römischen Petrusage, 1872; JbPTh, 1876; Apocryph. Apostelges. ii. part 1. 11, 28-69, 358-364; Supplement, 32-34). Since in this literature Simon Magus, with whom Simon Peter wages constant and successful contests, is only a mask for Paul, and not in any sense an historical person, the entire tradition about Peter in Rome is only the presentation in historical form of the thought that the Christianity preached in Rome by Paul was to be overcome by Jewish Christianity represented by Peter, or that it was to lose its detested peculiarities through union with its opposite. With regard to this view the following brief remarks may be made:—(1) The pseudo-Clementine Romance was not known in the West until Rufinus translated one recension of the same into Latin in 400 (cf. the same author's Prefatio ad Gaudentium). Even Jerome (Vir. Ill. xv.), speaking with regard to this literature, is able only to repeat in a very inaccurate way what he had read in Eus. H. E. iii. 38. 5. It is entirely inconceivable that the entire tradition of the Western Church concerning Peter in Rome should rest upon an appropriation and an entire misunderstanding of the Ebionitic legend as to the identity of Simon Magus and Paul. (2) Peter's presence and martyrdom in Rome were known to the Roman Church as early as the year 96 (above, pp. 61 f., 68 f.). The pseudo-Clementine Romance could not possibly have been written before 160, and in all probability originated in the course of the third century. (3) In both the existing recensions of the Romance it ends with the arrival of Peter in Antioch, whither Simon Magus had gone before him. That there was another recension of this Ebionitic legend, which included the work of Peter in Rome, and dealt with his contests with Simon Magus there, is merely a conjecture for which there is no proof. In the two existing recensions there are only two brief hints that in his preaching journeys Peter finally reached Rome (Hom. i. 16; Rec. i. 13, 74). Assuming that the letter of Clement to James is an integral part of the Homilies, this merely presupposes that Peter was a bishop in Rome, appointed Clement his successor, and died a martyr's death after having borne testimony to Christ publicly before the emperor (Epist. Clem. ad Jac. i.). There is no suggestion that the Magician went to Rome and was there overcome by Peter. According to Hom. xx. 13–17, 22, the Magician did not go from Antioch to Rome, but fled to Judea in order to escape the officers of the Roman emperor. We have the same testimony in Rec. x. 55–59. Quite inconsistently with this statement in Rec. iii. 63–64, cf. ii. 9 (Hom. ii. 27 is only remotely parallel to the latter passage), we have references to the miracles, the deification, and the statue of Simon in Rome. But not even here do we find any statements about contests in Rome between him and Peter. (4) In the Ebionitic literature, Simon Magus was not always the mask for Paul. In those portions which show the marks of greatest age, Paul is sometimes combated in his own name (Epiph. Hær. xxx. 16), sometimes opposed anonymously, being styled simply a "hostile man" (Rec. i. 70, 71; Epist. Petri ad Jac. chap. ii.); but he is distinguished from Simon Magus (Rec. i. 72). Even in the Clementine Homilies, in which alone Simon Magus stands as a veiled representative of Paul (Hom. xvii. 13–19; cf. ii. 22, xi. 35, xvii. 5, xix. 22), Paul is not the only person whom he represents. Simon Magus has a history, and teaches a doctrine which certainly cannot be regarded as simply a caricature of the life and teaching of Paul (Hom. ii. 22–32, xviii. 6, 12; Rec. i. 72, ii. 5–15, 38 f., 49 ff., iii. 47). On the contrary, there are essential points in which this picture of Simon Magus agrees with the statements of Justin (Apol. i. 26, cf. i. 56, ii. 15; Dial. cxx.), who was a Samaritan, and could have had no knowledge of the pseudo-Clementine Romance. The picture also has points of contact with the hints in Acts (viii. 9 f.; cf. Klostermann, Probleme im Aposteltest., 15–21), which was written approximately a hundred years before the earliest possible date of the Clementine Romance. (5) The idea of representing and combating Paul under the figure of Simon Magus—which is carried out for the first time in the Homilies of Clement, but not as yet in other writings representing the same tendency—could not have arisen unless Simon Magus already stood for the type of religious teacher who was Christian in name but in reality was anti-Christian, and unless he was generally known in Catholic Christendom which this Ebionitic literature was designed to influence. (6) Even assuming that in Justin much that is unhistorical is combined with the ancient, genuine tradition, and suspecting as much as we will, the alleged writings of Simon Magus (Hippol. Refut. iv. 51, vi. 9 ff.; Jerome in Matt. xxiv. 5, Vall. vii. 193; Const. ap. vi. 16; Maruta, de synodo Nic., translated by Braun in Knöppler's Kirchengesch. Stud. iv. 3. 47), we must nevertheless admit that in the middle of the second century and long afterwards there existed a sect which bore Simon's name, and which in a certain sense could claim to be Christian (Just. Ap. i. 26, speaking of Simon, Menander, and Marcion, πάντες οἱ ἀπὸ τούτων ὀρμώμενοι Χριστιανοὶ καλοῦνται). The first would have been impossible had Simon Magus existed only in imagination and in the partisan narratives of Ebionitic sects and writings. The second fact presupposes that the historical Simon Magus modified his original teaching, which was totally unchristian in character, through contact with Christianity and by the adoption of Christian elements, and that in this modified form it was promulgated by a party bearing his name. It is altogether likely that after his hypocritical conversion (Acts viii. 13–24) he taught the doctrine, the principal tenet of which is found in Iren. i. 23. 1. (7) The tradition concerning Simon Magus in Rome, which probably has some historical foundation (above, p. 168), as it appears in Justin, Irenæus, and Tertullian, has no connection with the tradition concerning Peter and Paul in Rome; while, on the other hand, in Dionysius of Corinth, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Lactantius (probably also in the ancient Acts of Paul, GK, ii. 884), the tradition about Peter and Paul appears without any connection with that about Simon Magus. The first writer who to our knowledge combined these two traditions was the author of the Acts of Peter (circa 170 A.D.), who was a fabricator though not a finished one. His combination of these two independent traditions was not due to the influence of the Ebionitic legend. (a) The romance through which we learn of this legend was not yet written; (b) it contains no narrative about the contests in Rome between Simon Magus and Simon Peter; moreover, (c) the author of these Acts, who belonged to the school of Valentinus, was not at all likely to allow himself to be influenced by such a source. The attempt of Erbes (ZfKG, 1901, S. 1–47, 161–224) to prove that Peter never visited Rome, and that he was crucified not in Rome but in Jerusalem, gives no occasion for correcting or enlarging what was said above, pp. 68 f. and 162–172, nn. 2–4. It is sufficiently characterised by the manner in which Erbes agrees with the oldest witnesses. Concerning 1 Pet. v. 13, see above, p. 163, n. 3); with what Erbes (22 ff.) says concerning Clemens, Romanus, and Ignatius, cf. above, pp. 68 f., 165, n. 4. He does not think it worth while to take Rev. xviii. 20 (xvii. 6, xix. 2) and Marcion into consideration. On the other hand, we learn that neither Irenæus nor the author of the Acts of Peter was acquainted with John xxi. (p. 165), and that the one hundred and fifty-three fishes (John xxi. 11), under the tacit presupposition of the Dionysian Era, refers to the year 153 A.D., in which year Anicetus and Polycarp in Rome came to an agreement concerning the tradition of Peter's presence in that city, pp. 10, 219.

§ 40. THE GENUINENESS OF THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PETER.

The external evidence for the genuineness of the letter is strong; it is known and quoted as the work of the Apostle Peter by two men who were disciples of apostles, and also bishops of two of the Churches belonging to the group to which the letter purports to be addressed, Polycarp of Smyrna and Papias of Hieropolis (n. 1). Polycarp was baptized probably in the year 69, some five years after the probable date of the composition of the Epistle (Forsch. vi. 94 ff.). It is not at all likely that at this early date the Churches in Smyrna and Hieropolis could be deceived into accepting as an Epistle of Peter's written in the year 64 a letter forged in his name in the year 100.

As regards the character of the letter, we are unable to test it by comparison with writings of the same author regarding which there is no question. 2 Peter is one of the most suspected documents in the N.T.; and even if it should be proved genuine, its comparison with 1 Peter as regards point of view and style would not prove much, because of the important part that Silvanus took in the composition of 1 Peter, whereas in 2 Peter there is no evidence that the author made use of an amanuensis. While the discourses of Peter in Acts may faithfully reproduce his thought, and give a true picture of his manner of preaching, it is altogether unlikely that the form in which Luke reproduces them is derived from notes made at the time. But leaving out of account altogether the many changes which may have taken place in these discourses in the course of their transmission to Luke, and which may have been made by Luke himself in committing them to writing, and disregarding the influence which

